"Just so you know," Coldpoint said, "the cop outside that little girl's room, I think he's going to come out poorly."

He let that comment hang in the air.

"What the hell does that mean?" Leonard said.

"It means I got some folks going to pay him and the girl a visit. It means he probably won't be around when morning comes, and neither will the girl. Anyone gets in the way, I've sent two of the best to surprise them. The two Roscoe sent were not so good."

"All niggers," Sheerfault said.

"Shut up," Coldpoint said.

"Don't get all sophisticated now," Leonard said. "Stick to what you really are. And let me tell you, that cop and that girl, anything happens to them, I'll skin you, starting with your dick. If you have one."

"But I haven't given my pair the word yet," Coldpoint said. "I'm waiting until a little later. I can move things forward, I have to. Make it happen sooner. My men, they are very good at what they do. These two"—he nodded at Sheerfault and Bobo—"not so much."

"Hey," Sheerfault said.

The man with the shotgun snickered.

"You best get hold of yourself," Sheerfault said to him. "I know where your big ass lives."

Shotgun man went silent, turned red-faced.

The lady judge, well dressed and out of place, said, "Wait a minute. Are we talking about killing someone?"

"Like it hasn't happened before," Coldpoint said. "Don't get self-righteous now, Jill. None of you. You all are part of this, and we got enough stuff on all of you, you say a word, we all go down. Way down."

The judge maybe wasn't as far to the right of Attila as some suggested, but she was far enough to know when to go along to get along. She swallowed heavily, dipped her head so that her brown teased hair caught the light and bounced off her hairspray. Then she sort of faded like the Invisible Woman. It was as if her personality had been pulled out of the top of her head and cast to the wind.

"Might go easier on you if you did speak up," I said. But that judge wasn't hearing me. Her mind was drifting along somewhere on the River Styx.

"Better wake up," I said to her.

Coldpoint hit me in the back of the head with the gun barrel. It dropped me to my knees and made me see double for a moment.

"Here's what we're going to do," Coldpoint said. "All you people. All of you. You have gotten your hands dirty, and you're going to get them dirty tonight, and for some of you it'll be dirtier than before. But you think I don't have your asses in my pocket, just try and rat on us. And here's another thing, we may get some fine entertainment out of it."

"Will there be a pony?" Leonard said.

He was ignored.

"I like ponies."

I struggled to my feet.

"You like ponies, Hap?"

"Fuck the pony," I said.

"You two, get in that ring and fight," Coldpoint said.

"Not likely," I said.

"I think it'll make for a good match," Coldpoint said, "and here's the thing: you don't, the two at the hospital get dead."

"We do, they'll get dead," Leonard said.

"I can let them live," Coldpoint said. "I can work things out, I make that choice. It’s easier they die, but I can spare them. But not if you two don’t get in that ring.”

“Bullshit,” Leonard said. “I’m not fighting Hap.”

“Sure you are,” Coldpoint said.

“Like we can trust your word,” Leonard said.

“We ought to do,” I said.

“What the fuck, Hap. He ain’t gonna spare nobody.”

“I might,” Coldpoint said. “I will.”

“I tell you this, I come out of here with arms and legs and my nuts swing, and either one of them people are dead, I’m coming after you,” Leonard said.

“You said that already.”

“I didn’t say I’m coming after all of you, though.”

“Now you’ve said it. Get in the ring.”

Leonard looked at me. I said, “It’s okay. Got to do what we got to do.”

I could tell he got it then. No one else would have noted the subtle shift in his features, but I had. Brett had reinforcements coming. All we had to do was fight and stall.

52

They pulled the two fighters sitting on the ground out of there, and the big guy with the shotgun who had helped get them off the bus took them away. After a few moments he came back.

"They're on the bus," he said to Coldpoint.

Coldpoint nodded.

Sheerfault had opened the wire gate and was grinning at us. I really hated him. Bobo stood nearby, his mouth hanging open. I don't know why, but in that moment, I felt sorry for the poor chucklehead. He was like a dog that belonged to bad people.

Once we were inside the fencing, Sheerfault closed the gate. Coldpoint held up his hand. His phone was in it.

"I get the sense you're slacking, I call," he said. "I only have to call. I don't have to wait for anyone to answer. I call, and they go. You got that."

"We got it," I said.

"I better see some serious movement in there, and some hard hits," Coldpoint said. "You can do anything you want to do, but you got to do it for real."

"Shit, Hap," Leonard said.

"I know," I said.

Leonard took off my slicker and hung it on the fence. I remembered he had a gun in the pocket of the slicker, but right then didn't call for trying to shoot it out. Coldpoint and Sheerfault also had guns. And then there were the ones who got off the bus, brought the fighters in. What we had to do was steal some time.

I took off my shirt, and Leonard took off his.

"You boys been working out," Coldpoint said.

"Why, thank you," I said. "Personally, I feel a little fat."

"Do it," Coldpoint said. "Do it now. And be all in about it."

I let out my breath and took a deep one in. I said, "Watch for the low ones, Leonard. I cheat."

"Me too."

"Same alike," I said.

And now the world outside of the ring went away. We had to fight, and we had to keep at it until Brett hooked up Marvin and the others. As far as Coldpoint knew, there weren't any cops about to be involved. Marvin had bearded them in his own den, made them feel foolish, but I was pretty sure that the way it looked to Coldpoint was two lone rogues had slipped up here to get proof of what was going on, and had fucked up and were going to pay for it.

He was right about that last part, of course.

Leonard and I sparred frequently, and we opened up a bit now and then, but not since many years ago, when we'd fought in a kickboxing tournament, but we had never truly gone for broke.

So now we began to circle, and then I began to dance, skipping a little. Leonard grinned at me. He knew I was best when the other guy started, that I was a counterfighter in the ring, though less so on the street. We skipped around each other.

Coldpoint said, "Get to it."

"Don't cramp our styles," Leonard said.

And now Leonard moved, came fast, punched for my head. I nodded to the side and slipped the punch; another came, and I slipped that. He kicked out to my thigh with his right leg, the lead leg, and I lifted my leg and sloughed it off and came at him with a push off my back leg. He was ready for that, knowing I can get off the line faster than him, and knowing my hands were faster, and me knowing he was deceptive and could hit like a mule kicks if a mule was turbo-powered. We clashed a bit, and I grabbed him around the neck and we came in close, him hitting me in the stomach a couple of light shots. I leaned my head in, said, "Make it look real. Lives are on the line."

He butted me. My nose sprayed blood. I tried to move back. He gave me a front kick to the midsection and then dove at me to grapple, but I rolled out of the way. He hit the ground and tumbled and came up and turned and I hooked him to the ribs and skipped back, more hurt than I was letting on. My head rocked and I couldn't breathe. I could hardly hold my body upright, that midsection kick having taken my wind and polished the inside of my backbone.

He gave me a concerned look. He knew that had been pretty damn real, but I gave a gentle nod, not only to let him know I was okay but that what he did was fine. We had to keep it moving, had to keep it real, had to buy Brett and Marvin time.

Now we came together again and Leonard darted a jab, but I double-palmed his arm, kind of climbed it on the outside, and hit him with a ridge hand in the jaw. It was a damn good shot and sent him flying backward. He hit on his back, and damn if he didn't do a back roll and come up on his feet. He looked at me, grinned, and spat a wad of blood in the dirt.

The crowd was going now, cheering, and I was thinking how weird that was. They were loving what we were doing, and when we were done we'd take shots to the head and be slipped into the sawdust pool, and the ones we were trying to protect at the hospital would be dead, but for now they loved us, two pit bulls in the ring, fighting.

I bobbed and weaved, mostly just to give some show, and me and Leonard eased together. He faked a right and caught me with that goddamn cannon-hot hook in the ribs again. I felt something move inside of me that wasn't my last meal. I grabbed at Leonard, trying to pin his arms, and then in that moment, years of training, years of having been in sport battles and real battles linked together, and I just became a man in a ring with another man, not my brother but a fighter. Punches and low kicks were thrown, and one of those low kicks caught me inside the thigh, and without even knowing it was about to happen, I collapsed to one knee. Leonard leaped on me like a giant angry toad, knocking me onto my back. He straddled me and I bumped him. It rolled him on his side. I tried to slip away, but he was on top of me again, straddling me, raining blows on my head. I deflected them with my hands, caught one of his arms, pulled it to me, and tried to throw a leg up and around his neck, going for a triangle hold, but this wasn't Leonard's first rodeo either. He leaned into me and that gave him room to bend his arm a little, and I couldn't hold him. He grabbed my neck with one hand and used his other hand to shove a thumb into the notch in my throat and pressed down.

I lost my grip on his arm, and he grabbed my arm in turn. He swung his body and threw himself back into a lying arm bar, and if he was holding back any I couldn't tell it. Like me he was caught up in the moment. But his grasp wasn't firm. I wiggled free, got to my feet, and so did he.

We threw fist and hammer fist, and close in I palmed him under the chin, and I was sick when it hit, because it was a solid strike, and I could see I had him staggered, and now I knew he was mine, and if I stopped, the phone call would be made, so I started in, threw some solid punches, but not too solid. Had to make it last. But then I realized Leonard was playing possum. He dropped suddenly and spun around close to the ground with an extended leg and swept my feet out from under me.

I came up immediately, but let me tell you, the lights seemed fuzzy and my heart seemed weak, and every move I made was no less trouble than trying to climb a greased pole.

Leonard kicked again; I slid past the kick and grabbed him around the waist, shifted my body, and threw him over my hip. He hit the ground hard. I heard the air go out of him. But as was his manner, he came back from it quickly. He probably couldn't breathe, but he could still move. He rolled and came up and then we exchanged kicks. I couldn't tell you if I hit him or if he hit me because I was out of it. I was beyond pain. I felt myself going numb all over, and then I heard something I thought was familiar, but in my state I couldn't identify it.

"The law," Leonard said.

And then I knew. It was sirens.

There was a mad rush toward the door. The crowd had panicked.

I put my hands on my knees and bent over. I felt faint. Leonard stepped in and got hold of me and straightened me up. All of a sudden, things switched and it was me holding him up.

He said, "I take it back, what I said once about you being fast but not able to hit hard. You hit hard."

"And you're faster than you look."

"We aren't going to do that again under any circumstances," Leonard said.

"I hear that," I said.

Coldpoint, Sheerfault, and Bobo were trotting toward the front of the building, the last ones out, but then Coldpoint turned and came back toward us with his gun held forward. I guess he figured he was going to go ahead and take us out.

Leonard had gotten hold of his jacket now, and he brought out his gun. Coldpoint stared a moment, made a sour face, turned and ran out of the door and into the rain, stood in the opening holding his phone. He pressed it, gave us a shit-eating grin, and ran out of sight.

"Chickenshit," Leonard yelled after him.

Me and Leonard got our shit together enough to head out of the fencing, across the mill, and out of the door. The crowd broke and was running in every which direction. Some of them were trying to climb the hill Leonard and I had come down.

I picked up the golf club I had been forced to drop, and soon after one of the guards came running by, heading for the back of the mill, hoping for a way out. He was the one with the shotgun, and he still had it, but he tossed it into the weeds as he passed. Or almost passed. I swung the club as he came near, caught him alongside the jaw and sent teeth flying.

“Fore,” I said as the big man hit the dirt.

The rain had grown more fierce and was cold on my head and neck and was soaking through my clothes. I don’t know how Aquaman takes it. I saw Coldpoint running toward his car. What was his plan now? Drive to Mexico? Go home and shoot himself?

No plan he could come up with would be any good.

“I’m going to see I can find Sheerfault,” Leonard said.

“Good. I got Coldpoint.”

I splashed along through puddles after him. He was running toward the line of parked cars, but there was no help there. Cruiser lights strobed through the wet night. At the bottom of the road, cruisers were blocking the way out. Highway Patrol and all manner of law were out of their cars and coming up the drive in a herd of law enforcement cloaked in black slickers, their pistols drawn. I could see them nabbing runners left and right, throwing them on the ground and yelling for them to stay put.

I was twenty feet away from Coldpoint when he realized he had no way to go forward, turned and came back in my direction, saw me. He decided in that instant he was going to at least shoot me before all was said and done. His lifted the pistol. I swung the club hard and let it go. It sailed across the distance between us, almost invisible in the rain and the night, caught Coldpoint somewhere in the face. I heard him grunt like a constipated man trying to pass a football, and the pistol went up in the air, and he fell onto the ground and rolled up against one of the parked cars.

By the time I reached him, he was trying to use his butt to push away from the car, but that hit had been a good one. His jaw was hanging down on one side.

He tried to say something but couldn't, just held up his hands in an I quit position.

"Reba or Officer Carroll are hurt, I'll kill you, Coldpoint."

He smiled, closed his eyes, and leaned against the car. I could see cops coming toward us; within moments they'd have Coldpoint and, if I stood around, me as well.

I turned and looked toward the mill. The crowd had gathered again and were flowing toward me. They had charged to the rear of the property only to discover there was a sharp drop-off with the highway thirty feet below. They had the drop-off on one end, the law on the other, a hill on one side, and a pond full of toxic water and sawdust on the other.

The crowd started running back in my direction. I could see Leonard at the rear of it all, on slightly higher ground, which made him easily visible for a moment. I saw Sheerfault too, running with all his might. Bobo was to the side, mixed into the crowd of runners. Leonard was trying to get to Sheerfault, but the crowd's motion was not working in his favor. I tried rushing to cut Sheerfault off, but he had too much of a lead.

Sheerfault reached the edge of the mill, dashed toward his car. Bobo yelled out to him, "Sheer," and held his hand up, as if he were trying to get the teacher's attention.

Sheerfault ignored him, jumped in his car, hit the wrong gear, backed into the jail bus, whipped it into the correct gear, and whirled the car around with ease. A stuntman couldn't have done it any better. He raced his car down the drive, the lights off, almost hitting me, causing officers to leap aside. But then he hit the brakes as he realized the exit was blocked by cop cars. He jerked it into reverse, hit the gas, went backward up the drive, came to a wide spot, wheeled the car around with another incredible brake stomp and spin, came racing onward. He turned on his lights like he was really going to need them, but there was nowhere he could go that way either, no farther than the end of the drive, anyway. The mill was in front of him, the side of the hill on his right, and the dark sawdust pond to his left. Maybe he thought if he drove fast enough, the car would levitate.

A couple of men from the crowd had gotten into his path as they scrambled for their cars. He didn't slow for them, hit them and knocked them winding. He wheeled left and tried to brake, maybe planning to jump out and make a run for it. There was a way he might go on foot down there, around the pond and down the hill below it and on out to the highway. But the car didn't stop. It began to skid at the edge of the pond in the wet earth. The headlights punched at the water. Sheerfault got the door open, had one leg out. His foot hit the ground and I heard a faint snapping sound as the crowd ran past me and right into the waiting arms of a lot of law.

I wasn't watching the crowd closely, however. I had my eyes on that car and Sheerfault. He couldn't get out and his foot was dragging and the car was sliding. It went over the lip of the dark pond and down into it. I heard Sheerfault scream, then I saw Bobo running that way, yelling, "Sheer, Sheer."

Bobo dove into the pond after the car, only the taillights visible now, like two red primordial reptile eyes.

I ran down there. I hated both those guys, but not so much I wanted to see them drown in that mess. By the time I got to the bank of the pond, the car was gone, gobbled up by the goo.

Bobo was trying to swim in that muck. He was strong. He dove down twice and came up twice, spitting that horrid yuck out of his mouth, but the sawdust water was heavy. It grabbed at him and held him and washed over him. He yelled out for Sheerfault once more, dove down again, and didn't come back up.

There was nothing I could do.

I turned and looked toward the driveway, saw Highway Patrol officers with guns drawn. They were loading the whole gang of them into the jail bus. I saw the two guys who had been the original entertainment looking out of the windows of the bus.

It was all happening fast and smooth by then. I saw a tall black man in a white shirt, white hat, and cowboy boots standing in the middle of it all, lighting a cigar. Texas Ranger, no doubt.

Leonard had slipped down by me by then.

"I didn't get to shoot nobody," he said.

"I'm sorry."

He looked out at the water.

"I seen Bobo go in," he said.

“He won’t be coming up. Shitty way to end up, even for those two. Turned into Rusty Puppies.”

“Deserved way to go,” he said, and casually flipped the pistol he was holding into the muck.

“Had it been me, would you have tried to pull my ass out of that mess?” I said.

“Of course not. I’d hire a backhoe to get your body later.”

We turned with our hands raised and walked toward the Texas Ranger.

54

When we were standing by the Ranger, we saw Marvin walking past the bus. “I got these two,” he said. “They were our inside men.”

The Ranger said, “You’re out of your jurisdiction.”

“Yep,” Marvin said. “But without me and these two knuckleheads, you’d still be at home watching Gunsmoke reruns.”

The Ranger grinned. “I like Gunsmoke.”

“What’s not to like,” Marvin said.

The Ranger went down the hill.

“Reba and Curt?” Leonard said.

“Two men tried to kill them,” Marvin said. “Officer Carroll killed both of them. One shot apiece.”

“Is Curt all right?” Leonard said.

“Actually, he said he sprained a finger reaching for his pistol fast as he did.”

“You know this for sure how?” I asked.

“We have a thing called radios, and we talk on them,” Marvin said. “We’re thinking about getting phones we can carry in our pockets so we talk on those too. Oh, wait. I got one.”

He pulled his cell out of his coat pocket and held it up.

“Of course,” I said. “I knew that. And they can make moving pictures with sound now too, can’t they?”

55

The Ranger used LaBorde as his command center. We told our story to him with Marvin present. We were in the very nice interrogation room. Now that some time had passed, I was really hurting from mine and Leonard's bout. We had found out Coldpoint was in custody but not talking. Wise move, since his two main coconspirators were dead. But then there was the judge and the other bozos who had been at the mill. One of them would talk, that was for sure.

"You two look terrible," the Ranger said. "Like you got hit by a truck and dragged a few miles."

"You think it looks bad, ought to be on this end looking out," I said.

"Yeah," Leonard said. "I think I shit one of my lungs out in the jailhouse toilet."

"You're friends, but you beat on each other like that?" the Ranger said.

"Had to make it look real and kill some time while y'all were fucking around at the doughnut shop."

"I saw you throw a pistol in the pond," the Ranger said to Leonard.

"Did you now?" Leonard said.

"Yep," said the Ranger.

Leonard nodded. "Picked it up inside the sawmill where someone dropped it. I panicked and tossed it in the pond."

"Why would you panic?"

"They call it panic for a reason," Leonard said. "It isn't supposed to make sense."

"Was the gun registered to you?" the Ranger asked.

"Nope. I got it in the sawmill."

It was in fact a cold piece, part of Leonard's stash, and he had brought it with him, but he didn't want to admit that. If he did, some shit might follow.

"We could drag the pond for it," the Ranger said.

"You could," Leonard said. "And you'd find it, but it isn't registered to me."

"And you didn't bring it with you."

"An unregistered gun? Not hardly. That would be unlawful. I just wouldn't do that."

The Ranger looked at me.

"That would be wrong," I said. "Leonard, like myself, is an upstanding citizen."

The Ranger didn't seem to be a man that enjoyed bullshit, but unfortunately for him that night, we were full of it. We had been helpful at the sawmill, but he had an accurate suspicion maybe we had been too helpful, out of line for citizens.

Marvin said to the Ranger, "Could you and me talk outside a moment?"

The Ranger nodded and they went out. They were out there for a long time. Leonard and I sat politely, waiting.

"I think a different coat of paint would be nice in here," Leonard said.

"Looks all right," I said.

"Don't you think it's too dark? I mean, you come in, you're already being interrogated, which is a drag. So something more festive could make life a little better, at least for a few moments."

"Maybe a mobile hanging over the table."

"What I'm talking about. Something shiny."

Finally they came back. The Ranger looked at us.

"You're upstanding fucking citizens that were just there to record bad things on your phone, and the bad things got out of hand, and you got in the middle of them. They made you fight, the cops that you had alerted earlier showed up later than you expected, and there you were. Though for some reason, why you were there still doesn't set right with me."

"We want to be newspaper stringers," Leonard said. "We thought that would be a good place to start."

"Don't push it," the Ranger said. "You can go. I advise you to go. But don't go far away, we might need to talk again, and thanks for the video."

"Thank you, Mr. Ranger," Leonard said.

As I went by Marvin, I whispered, "Thanks."

"Eat shit," he said, and didn't whisper.

My car was in the parking lot where Brett and Chance had dropped it. She and Brett had gone home from there, optimistic that we wouldn't be spending our lives in jail.

We had also been optimistic, but not as much. Now, we felt pretty good. We climbed in the car, me behind the wheel. I had the spare key in my pocket, and since it was a Prius, I didn't even have to take the key out of my pocket. That always made me feel like a big dog. Magic.

"You know," Leonard said, "I wouldn't want to fight you again, you being a brother and all, but I think had we not been stalling for time, and if a few other factors had not been in play, I could have licked you."

"Nope."

"Could too."

"Nope, nope, nope."

"Yep, yep, yep."

"Nope," I said, "and don't say anything else, or you walk home."

"My ribs hurt."

"You can say that. I don't feel so good either."

I eased the car out of the lot.

"Can I stay at your place, Hap?"

"The couch."

"Sure, since Chance has my room."

"It was your room."

"Couch is fine. Buffy can keep me company."

"She sleeps with Chance."

"Oh."

I drove along the streets slowly, as if my car felt as bad as I did. As the moments moved by I felt worse and worse from that beating I had taken from Leonard. Good thing he loved me or I'd have been dead.

"We are seriously a couple of badasses," Leonard said.

"Look up badass in the dictionary, and our fucking picture is right under the word."

“Got that right,” Leonard said. “But I’m a badass might need to rest for a few days, shit some blood, and get my ribs looked after. Maybe get some bionic parts.”

“I got my own health problems.”

“Man, you getting out of my lying arm bar,” Leonard said. “That was some shit.”

“Wasn’t it?” I said.

“You’re supposed to compliment me on something now,” Leonard said.

“You fall down good,” I said.

A few days later when Marvin decided he didn't hate us so much after all, he told us they'd picked up Tamara at the projects and she squealed like a pig. She wasn't so tough. She confirmed what we knew and added a few things, mostly that Timpson had helped beat Jamar to death and that his having me meet him at the Joint was merely so Roscoe could put an eyeball on us and the two dumbasses in the back could see us too. I really hated those bastards, hurting Reba like that, trying to kill her. Marvin promised to make sure when they went away word got spread at the prison that they raped and beat a kid. Even the worst of the worst in prison generally hated anyone who did that kind of stuff, and it often led to a shiv party in the shower.

Couldn't happen to two nicer guys.

They dragged Sheerfault's car out of the muck. He was still in it. Bobo had beat the glass out of the driver's-side window with his fist, which is no easy feat on land and would have been even harder under dark, mucky water. Fact was, I would have thought it impossible.

Bobo had an arm cocked inside the window and had died that way, clutching at the door frame, trying to pull Sheerfault out. I kind of admired him for that.

On a Sunday afternoon, Leonard and Officer Carroll, as I preferred to call him, picked up Reba at the projects and brought her to the house where we were having an indoor cookout. It was raining that day and had been raining all week. Reba still had her arm and leg in a cast and was precariously on crutches.

As they came through the door, Leonard said, "Found the four-hundred-year-old vampire. She's forgoing blood today and having a grilled burger."

"You ain't got no French fries?" she said, crutching her way toward the table.

"We do," Brett said, "they're frying."

Brett and Chance introduced themselves to her.

“Before we picked her up, we got her some fried pies at McDonald’s,” Officer Carroll said. “Leonard said she’d want them.”

“Course I do,” Reba said. “You got something against pie?”

“Not a thing,” Officer Carroll said. He was wearing off-duty clothes. I thought he looked odd out of uniform. He had a finger taped up, the one he had sprung, and he looked as happy and alert as always. I wondered how he was dealing with having shot two people. I had a larger number of dead folks on my head, and there were times at night when it was as if all their bodies were stacked on my chest.

“You and Leonard sure do look like hell,” Officer Carroll said.

“Gives me character,” Leonard said.

“No, it makes you move kind of slow,” Officer Carroll said, and they passed a smile between them.

Leonard, moving stiffly, got Reba positioned in a chair, her broken leg and cast stuck out under the table.

“You done blown up the projects,” Reba said, “and you fucked over them bad po-pos, but they gonna be someone else selling that sugar pop sometime soon. Some other cops gonna run things.”

“I’m a cop,” Officer Carroll said.

“I got my eye on you,” she said. “Even if you did keep me from getting killed.”

“Well, we’re hoping for the best,” Officer Carroll said.

“Hope ain’t nothing but shit misspelled,” Reba said.

“My, you have a mouth on you,” Brett said.

“Shit, you ought to have heard my mama. And on them hamburgers. Like mine well done, and don’t put no goddamn sweet pickles on it, but you got a little mustard, I could take that, you spread it thin.”

Parable of the Stick

Leonard looked up from the newspaper he was reading, a little rag that was all that was left of our town paper, the bulk of it now being on line, and glanced at me.

"So I'm reading in the paper here about how the high school, hell, grade school, all the grades, they got a no fighting policy, no matter who starts it. Some guy jumps you on the playground, lunch break, or some such, and you whack him in the nose so he'll leave you alone, you both go to detention."

"Can't have kids fighting. You and me, we fought too much. Maybe it's not a good thing to learn, all that fighting. We met at a fight, remember?"

"Horse shit," Leonard said, and put the paper down. "Look here, I know a thing about you, and I know how it was for me at school, with integration and all, and I don't think it works like that, and shouldn't. This whole thing about fighting to protect yourself, and getting the same punishment as the one who picks on you, how's that teaching common sense?"

"How's it work, Leonard?"

"Think on it. There's this thing I know about you, let's call it the parable of the stick."

I knew exactly what he was talking about.

I said, "Okay, let's call it that."

"You moved here from a smaller school, and I know you had some problems. We've talked about it. I wasn't there, but I know the drill. Try being black in a formerly all-white school sometime."

"I could try being black," I said, "but I'd still be white."

"You came to school from some little town to Marvel Creek. And there was this bully, a real asshole, bigger than you, and you were small then, right?"

"Not that I'm a behemoth now."

"No, you lack my manly physique, but you've grown into something solid. Then, though, you were a skinny little kid with hay fever and a plan to do something with your life. Which, of course, you failed to do. What were you going to be, by the way?"

"I don't know. A writer I thought."

"Ah, that's right. Hell, I knew that. It's been so long since you mentioned it, I forgot. Yeah, a writer. So you move here, a poor country kid with shabby clothes and his nose in a book, and this guy, this big kid, he picks on you. He does it every day. Calls you book worm or some such, maybe pencil dick. So what do you do? You do the right thing. You go to the principal and tell him the kid's fucking with you, and the principal says, okay, and he pulls the mean kid in and talks to him. So what's the mean little shit do the very next day?"

"Double beats the shit out of me."

"There you have it, but you're not fighting back, right?"

"Oh, I fought back. I just wasn't any good at it then. Probably why I learned martial arts."

"Sure it is. I did the same thing. I wasn't so little and didn't lose too much, but, like I said, I was a black kid in a formerly all-white school, and then there was my extraordinary beauty they were jealous of."

"Don't forget the massive dick."

"Oh yeah, the black anaconda that knows no friends. So this happens a few days in a row, this mean kid ignoring the principal, him not giving a greased dog turd what the principal said. You go home, and your dad, he sees you got a black eye and busted lip, and what does he do?"

"He tells you if he's bigger than me, bring him down to size."

"Right. He says, 'Hap, go out there and get yourself a good stick, 'cause there's plenty of them lying around on the edge of the playground by the woods. You get that big stick, and you lay for him, and when he don't expect it none, you bring that stick down on him so hard it will cause you to come up off the ground. Don't put his eye out with it, and don't hit him in the head, unless you have to, but use that stick with all your force, and if something breaks on him, well, it breaks. You get a licking every day and you don't do something back, taking that licking and being licked is gonna turn into a lifetime business.' He told you that, right?"

"Right."

"And you got you a stick next day at playground break, laid it up by the edge of the concrete wall on one side of the steps that led out of the school, and when the bell rang for the day to end, you got out there as quick as you could, ahead of the mean kid, and you picked up that stick."

"I did at that."

"And waited."

"Like a fucking hawk watching for a rat."

"Down the stairs he came, and you—"

"Swung that stick," I said. "Jesus. To this day I can still hear that fucking stick whistling in the wind, and I can still hear the way it met his leg just above the knee, right as he came down the last step. I remember even better that shit-eating, asshole-sucking grin he had on his face as he came down and saw me, before he realized about the stick. And better than that, I remember the way his face changed when he saw I had that stick. But it was too late for that motherfucker."

"What I'm saying."

"I caught him as he put his weight on his left leg. Smack of that stick on his hide was like a choir of angels had let out with one clean note, and down he went, right on his face."

"And when he started to get up?"

"I brought that stick down on his goddamn back with all I had in the tank, and oh my god, did that feel good. Then I couldn't stop, Leonard. I swear I couldn't."

"Tell it, brother. Tell it like it was. I never get tired of it."

"I started crying and swinging that stick, and I just couldn't fucking stop. Finally a teacher, a coach I think, he came out and got me and pulled me off that bastard, and that bastard was bawling like a baby and screaming, 'Don't hit me no more. Please don't hit me no more.'"

"I actually started to feel bad about it, sorry for him— "

"As you always do," Leonard said.

"—and they carried me to the principal's office, and they brought the asshole in with me, and they put us in chairs beside one another, where we both sat crying, me mostly with happiness, and him because I had just beaten the living hell out of him with a stick and he had a fucking limp. He hurt so bad he could hardly walk."

"What did the principal do?"

"You know what he did."

"Yeah, but now that you're worked up and starting to sweat, let's not spoil it by you not getting it all out, 'cause I can tell right now, for you, the whole thing is as raw as if it happened yesterday."

"It is. The principal said, 'Hap, did you hit him with a stick?' and I say to him, 'Hard as I could.' The principal looks at the mean kid, says, 'And what did you do?' 'I didn't do nothing,' he says. 'No,' the principal said, 'what did you do the day before, and the day before that, and what were you told?' And the kid said, 'I was told to leave Hap alone.'"

"And what did the principal say," Leonard said. "Keep on telling it."

"You're nuts, Leonard. You know what he said."

"Like I said, I never tire of hearing this one."

"He said to the kid, 'But you went back and did it again anyway, didn't you? You went back and did it because you wanted to pick on someone who you thought wouldn't fight back, or couldn't, but today, he was waiting for you. You didn't start it today, but you started it ever other day, and you got just what you deserve, you little bully. You picked on a nice kid that didn't want to fight and really just wanted to get along, and I know for a fact, he asked you to quit, and he came to me, and I came to you, and still you did it. Why?' 'I don't know,' he said. 'There you are,' said the principal, 'the mantra of the ignorant and the doomed.'"

I took a deep breath.

"I remember him saying just that. The ignorant and the doomed. Then the principal said to me, 'Hap. He picks on you again, you have my permission to pick up a stick and just whack the good ole horse hockey out of him. I catch you lying in wait for him again, or doing it because you can, then that's different. That makes you just like him, a low-life bully. He had this one coming, but he's only got it coming now if he starts it. But he picks on you, you give it to him back, and I won't do a thing. I won't say a word.'"

"There you have it," Leonard said. "That's the way we should have kept it. Self-defense is permissible."

"A stick was a little much," I said.

"Yeah, but these kids in school now, they're being taught to accept being victims. Why there's so many goddamn whiners, I think."

"That right?"

"You don't learn justice by taking it like the French. That's not how it works. Someone doesn't give you justice, you got to get your own."

"Or get out of the way of the problem."

"Alright, there's that. But then the motherfucker just moves down the road a little, and picks a new victim."

"I think you're trying to justify what we do sometimes."

"I don't need to justify it. Here's the thing, you get more shit from the meanies because the good folks don't stand up, don't know how, and don't learn how. And they're taught to just take it these days, and do it with a smile. Principal then, he knew what was up. You have any more trouble from the bully after that?"

"Not an inch worth," I said. "We became friends later, well, friendly enough. I think in his case it cured him across the board."

"So he didn't pick someone else to whip on?"

"No, but that doesn't mean it doesn't happen that way. I think he wasn't really a bad guy, just needed some adjustment, and I gave it to him. I think he had problems at home."

"Fuck him and his home," Leonard said. "Everyone now, they don't have an idea what's just, what's right, because they punish everyone the same. Ones that did it, and ones that didn't. I can see that if no one knows what went down, but now, even when they know who the culprit is, one who started it, it comes out the same for both. The good and the bad."

“Could have gone really bad. I could have killed that kid with that stick.”

“That would have been too much, I guess,” Leonard said.

“You guess?”

“Alright, maybe too much, but there’s still something to learn there, still something your dad taught you that matters and has guided you ever since. Don’t treat the just and righteous the same as the bad and the willfully evil, or you breed a tribe of victims and a tribe of evil bastards. Learning to be a coward is the same as learning to be brave. It takes practice. And that, my good brother, is the parable of the stick.”

Tire Fire

We went to the dojo where we trained and had a session in self-defense with the Shen Chuan instructor, and when that was over we had some free mat time. We sparred and did ground work and practiced throws until we were exhausted. We sat down on the mat with our backs against the wall, sweating and breathing hard. Everyone else had gone home, and since we had keys, we just sat there with the lights out and talked.

"Neither of us ever cross the line," Leonard said.

"I beg your pardon?" I said. "I think we have crossed a few lines."

"I mean in here, anywhere we train. We spar, and we go at it pretty hard, but we always hold back."

"We should. Someone might lose an eye."

"I mean we don't quite take the big step."

"That's because I don't hate you, Leonard. And, of course, I wouldn't want to embarrass you."

"It's like that, is it?"

"Pretty much . . . No, it's exactly like that."

"We could find out whose best, you know," Leonard said.

"There was that one time," I said.

"That was almost the real thing. I mean it hurt, and we came close to some damage, but we stalled most of it."

"I don't remember that much stalling," I said. "I thought you might be trying to prove something to yourself."

"Haven't you wondered which of us is the best?"

"Nope."

"Liar."

"I'll be honest," I said. "I don't want to find out."

"You got a point there," Leonard said.

"We might not like how we feel about one another afterwards."

"And your point sharpens."

"And, again, I wouldn't want to embarrass you."

"Oh, you are an asshole," Leonard said.

"You know, I will say this, first time I saw you, at that tire fire fight, I thought you were better than me then."

"Then and now," Leonard said.

"You're not going to give that up, are you? I've gotten a lot better."

"Yeah, but you're lazy. I train harder."

"Probably," I said. "That night, I think you might could have whipped anyone in the world, and I include one of my heroes, Muhammad Ali."

"Greatest fucking boxer that ever lived."

"But he was a boxer. We cheat a lot more. Boxing, maybe he does get you, but the whole enchilada, not so much."

"Kick, bite, head-butt, lock, throw, do ground work, and pick up a stick if it's available," Leonard said.

"What I'm saying."

"It was a hell of a night."

"You know that's right."

It was a night hunt, and I was sick of the whole thing already. I didn't want to shoot any coons or possums, or much of anything. I was ready to get home and shower and pick the ticks off my balls. Sure, coon can be eaten, and I knew families who did, mostly black families, but I didn't want none of it, and unlike my uncle, I didn't sell the skins.

A lot of people ate possum, our family included, if there was nothing else. To me it tasted like greasy pork, and the best way to eat possum was catch it and put it up and feed it some corn for a week or two, and then kill and eat it. But I didn't like to do that anymore, on account of I got attached to the damn things. I was still sick over the hogs we had butchered. I had got to know them. There was a thing Winston Churchill said in a book I read, about how dogs looked up to you, cats down on you, but hogs treated you as equals. This was true, and on that account I was through butchering hogs myself, and from then on my parents, to placate me, bought our pork chops and bacon wrapped in cellophane and found in the freezer section at the store. I preferred being a hypocrite, eating meat someone else killed.

It was finding an animal in a trap that was still alive, seeing my uncle dispatch it with a shotgun butt, that had put me off the idea of trapping and hunting, that and me shooting a bird for no good reason other than to see it fall, and finding it lying on the ground, its beak open, trying desperately to draw in air, its eyes glazing over like a sugar donut. It got to me. One dead bird and thousands of bird songs unsung for no goddamn good reason other than I wanted to see a bird fall.

So there we were out in the woods at night, and I was thinking this was my last hunt, though it wouldn't be, but it would be for a long while. There was a can of Wolf Brand Chili at home, and that was good enough for me. Me and Roger had been hunting and fishing together for years, and on this night we had gone into the woods to spotlight critters, shoot them out of trees, bag them and take them home to be dressed and cooked, but as I said, I knew that night I had completely lost my interest in hunting unless I was actually hungry. Girls were far more interesting. Some of the boys called chasing girls hunting squirrel, which came from the idea that their pubic hair was a pelt. It wasn't exactly forward thinking, but there you have it. Everything in East Texas was compared to hunting.

Our trek had brought us down by the riverside, using our head band lights to travel by. Down close to the river I could smell fish, and then a smell that took me a moment to figure out. It was burning rubber.

We could see the fire after a moment, and it was pretty big. There was an old abandoned, tumbling-down sawmill on the other side of the river where the fire was, and there was a clearing in front of the mill, and it wasn't unusual for kids to drive down there to smoke dope, drink and screw, throw rocks in the water and fire off guns.

The fire was really big, and we could see the silhouettes of people cast off by the firelight. Two of the shadows were moving quickly, and the rest were still, forming what looked like a dark tree line, or the craggy shapes of a mountain. We could hear voices too, some of them yelling. As we neared, moving along the tree line on our side, the voices rose up and rolled over the river like a tide, and came to us in excited cries and yells. There was the sound of grunting, and a slapping sound, as if someone were beating a car seat from time to time with a belt.

Finally we could see the people making the shadows, but we couldn't figure out who was who or what was what. We turned off our headlamps and took them off our heads, and from what I could tell it didn't matter. No one had noticed us when our lights were on.

Roger said, "You want to go see what's happening?"

I didn't, but I was seventeen and didn't want Roger to think my balls hadn't dropped, so I said, "Yeah, let's go see."

We had to go down a pretty good distance before we came to the Swinging Bridge. It was a bridge that had been put across the river by some oil company so they could get down there and drill for oil. It had been built back in the thirties during the oil boom that had engulfed that region. Whole towns had been created by the oil boom overnight. The oil was pulled up and out, and then it was gone, and so was the bulk of the towns. Some survived, like Marvel Creek, made up of a handful of folks rich from the oil boom, and about three or four thousand others, oil field trash, whores, white trash, and poor blacks, a few you might call middle class.

Roger and I went over the bridge, but when we were about halfway over, Roger caught my arm, said, “I changed my mind. I don’t want to see what’s over there. I can see enough already. Lots of white boys down there, and in case you haven’t noticed, I’m black.”

“Hard to miss that,” I said.

Where we were on the bridge it was dark, and there were trees that ran alongside the river, and where there was a gap in them. Through the gap we could see a heap of tires stacked on top of one another, all of them set ablaze, most likely by a nice coating of gasoline and a tossed match. In the light of the fire two young men were fighting. There were two other men lying on the ground. The others were standing or sitting on a rise above them, watching. There was no one along the river’s edge, and the firelight licked out and sent burnt orange light against the shoreline and fell into the water and wavered with its movement. The fighters’ shadows hopped about.

I knew about them. I had been told I ought to fight in them myself, as I was good with my hands and feet and the money was alright. You could also get bad hurt. Some of the folks involved were school kids, but the fighters came from all around, and could range from eighteen to thirty. It was said a young man from over Mineola had been killed somewhere out here, and that his body had been dumped in the river.

I don’t know if it was true or not, probably not, but it was a story that went around like the flu. I knew a lot of the kids in the group, and I knew one of the fighters, the white guy, Charlie. He was an asshole and a bully at school. We had words now and again, but hadn’t exchanged blows; it was close a few times. I knew I was tough, but he scared me a little. He carried a knife and had pulled it at school a couple times.

The young man he was fighting was black. Firelight flickered over his skin like a fevered tongue licking chocolate. He moved smooth and quick, up on his toes, his right side forward, his right hand flicking out and jabbing Charlie as fast as a hungry chicken pecking corn.

Roger said, “I ain’t going down there after all. There’s enough white boys down there to make a surfing movie, and them white girls being there too, they’re bound to show out, and they might show out on me. I can’t believe that nigger is down there. What the fuck?”

“He’s got balls, alright,” I said.

“What he ain’t got is brains,” Roger said. “I do. I don’t want to go down there.”

“I’m going over,” I said. “You got to go on, go. I won’t hold it against you.”

“Hap, them other boys, they don’t see things like you. They haven’t been listening to Dr. King on the TV. They ain’t never read Uncle Tom's Cabin."

"That book's a slow go, by the way," I said. "But you know what, Roger?"

"What?'

"You got a rifle and I got a shotgun."

"Nothing says they ain't got cannons of their own."

"I hear you," I said. "Go on back you want. Wait for me up by the truck."

"It'll take me two hours or so to get back, and then I got to wait on you?"

"Then wait on the bridge for me."

"Damn, Hap. I can't let you go down there by yourself."

"Yeah you can."

"Shit, but I ain't. Goddamn me."

We crossed the bridge and went walking along the riverbank, toward the fighters, past where all their cars were parked. We came first to the two white guys, shirtless, laying out on the ground near the river unconscious. When the fire flicked just right I could see how badly their faces were bruised and cut up. The black fighter was still moving catlike, and Charlie was taking his beating like he was tied to a post. When Charlie moved at all, he dragged one leg behind him as if it was in a bucket full of concrete. If he'd ever had any spring in his step it was well sprung.

The black fighter was smiling, and I thought I could hear him laughing, a kind of deep gurgle that came up from his chest. When we got closer I saw that Charlie's face looked as if someone had been to work on it with a razor. It was cut and bleeding all over.

"Call me a nigger again, you shit-cracker. Go on, call me one."

Charlie wasn't saying anything, and in fact, he seemed to have trouble breathing. But I had a good idea that the word "nigger" had left his mouth earlier during the fight. It had come out of Roger's mouth too, but that was different. Roger owned it, but people like Charlie used it like a knife. It was like poor folks calling themselves white trash. It was alright for them to say it, but unless you wanted to wake up in a ditch with a fence post up your ass, might be best you didn't call them that unless you were meaner or had a bigger gun.

Finally Charlie went down on one knee and held out a hand, palm forward.

The black fighter quit dancing, smiled with blood-coated teeth.

"Get up, peckerwood. I'm not through with you. Get up and let me knock some of those teeth down your throat. Come on, man. Call me nigger again."

I saw then that Charlie's buddy Kilgore, another of my least favorite people, was coming down the slight rise toward them, carrying an axe handle in his hand. Three other big boys came down from the crowd then, and a kind of cheer went up from the folks gathered there, as if lions had just been released into the arena. I heard Kilgore say, “I’m gonna sort you out, nigger.”

“Bring it,” said the black fighter. “And I hope you brought a sack lunch, motherfucker, ’cause you’re gonna be here all night.”

I checked the two guys knocked out and on the ground, to see how things with them were. Same as before. I hadn’t seen either of them move a muscle since I came up. For all I knew they were dead.

I walked over then, and the black fighter wheeled toward me, saw that I had a shotgun. There was only a moment of hesitation, and then he gave me a look like: Go on and shoot me, and watch the goddamn buckshot bounce off.

I yelled out to the boys coming down the hill.

“This looked to be a fair fight to me. You fuckers ought to go on back up the hill and put your hands back up the dresses of the whores you came with.”

“Hey,” I heard one of the girls say.

I saw it was a girl I knew. I said, “Sorry. Juliet. I’m assuming you’re an independent.”

Kilgore said, “Hap Collins, you cocksucker. You taking up for a nigger?”

I said to the fighter, “You a nigger?”

“In some circles,” he said. “But I like to think of myself as well-tanned.”

“In the circles that count,” I said loud enough the crowd of about twenty could hear me, “this fellow thinks of himself as well-tanned.”

“Oh fuck you,” Kilgore said.

“Nigger lover,” someone in the group yelled down.

“Told you,” Roger said.

I walked around on the other side of the black fighter and looked up the rise at Kilgore, the crowd behind him, the old, tumbling-down saw mill behind all of them.

I said, “Why don’t you come down and see if you can spread my legs for that fucking.”

Kilgore didn’t move, and the others with him had sort of drifted off to the sides, like maybe they just realized they had left something in their cars that they badly needed.

“You’re a big man with a fucking shotgun,” Kilgore said.

“Yeah,” I said. “What if I let Roger here hold it, and then you and me step up to the plate and see who’s the best batter?”

“Nothing would please me more. I’d take great pleasure in that, Collins.”

“He’s pretty big,” the black fighter said, and grinned at me. I could see me and him were about the same age.

"He is, isn't he?" I said.

"Yeah, he is," Roger said.

"If I lose, Roger, you can shoot him with your rifle."

"Oh, nice," Roger said. "Be a nigger lynching come morning. If it takes that long."

"Give me your shotgun," said the black fighter. "I'll hold it for you."

I gave it to him without hesitation and he held it cradled in his arms. He was comfortable with it. I had an idea he knew how to use it quite well.

I took off my shirt and threw it on the ground and stepped up where the two had been fighting. Charlie had half crawled, half stumbled off, and fell down not too far from the tire fire, near the other two. The black fighter was starting a collection.

Kilgore tossed the axe handle aside, and started pulling his tee-shirt over his head. He came down and stood across from me and smiled. He figured it was going to be easy. I figured he might be right. I have been known to shoot off my mouth and regret it later.

"I know you're gonna take him, white boy," the black fighter said. "I know you will."

I didn't say it aloud, but I thought: That makes one of us.

Roger gave me a bit of advice. "Keep your left up, Hap."

"Thanks," I said. But like the black fighter, I fought power side out. I had learned that from my dad who not only taught me boxing and wrestling fundamentals, but had taught me some self-defense. The rest of what I had learned so far came from the Judo and Hapkido I had learned at the Tyler, Texas YMCA.

"You ain't got to fight him for me," the black fighter said. "I just wanted to see you'd do it or not. I can whip him same as the others."

"You've fought three," I said, "I think it's only fair you have a little break between."

"That's awfully white of you . . . What is it? Happy?"

"Hap," I said. "Hap Collins. My friends just call me He Who Has A Massive Dick."

He laughed a little, then said, "I'm Leonard. Leonard Pine."

"Shut up, you fuckers" said Kilgore. "Let's get on with it."

"He's crowing for you to give him his ass beating," Leonard said.

I was glad Leonard was confident.

Leonard moved back and Kilgore moved down, and the crowd above eased down closer, and I saw that one of the boys who had walked away earlier was walking back with a revolver. Leonard yelled up at him, "Put that on the ground right now, or I shoot your kneecap off and piss down your throat. I mean it, motherfucker."

Leonard lifted the shotgun. I feared he might mean it.

The fellow bent over and gently laid the gun down.

Leonard said, “Now walk away, chief.”

Chief walked away. He joined the others and sat at the top of the rise and looked embarrassed.

Me and Kilgore started to move then. And there was something I couldn’t explain. Something in me that was always there, a kind of fire, a burning anger, the source of which I had no idea. It was always there in the background, and though I didn’t hunt because I didn’t want to kill, the primal urge was there, but it had shifted from animals to bullies and assholes and no goods. I could feel that anger warming my muscles.

Kilgore said, “I’m going to kick your ass, and then you, nigger, you’re next. I’m gonna knock the black off of you.”

Leonard pointed at himself. “Okay, which nigger? Me or the other one?”

“I put Collins down, then it’s you two darkies. One at a time, or both together. Count on it.”

Leonard laughed. “Shit, you couldn’t roll me over if I was dead, let alone whip my ass.”

Roger didn’t say anything. He just held tight to his rifle.

Me and Kilgore moved in a circle, and then we moved together, and then Kilgore threw a haymaker from the pits of hell. It brought with it fire and brimstone and lots of power, but it was slow. It was like watching a big truck with no gas being pushed up hill by weak men with hernias.

I leaned back. The punch passed. I stepped in and made a short, front right-handed hook to the side of his jaw. I heard a terrible sound that made me wince. I knew it was bone cracking. Kilgore went down in the dirt and the dirt flew up and made a little cloud that drifted quickly back to earth.

Kilgore didn’t get up.

“Son-of-a-bitch,” Leonard said. “You are the man, goddamnit.”

“Took me a little longer than I anticipated,” I said. “But I been sick.”

Leonard laughed out loud. “You are something, white boy, something.”

“I know,” I said, trying not to show how surprised I was that I had been so successful so quickly. My hand hurt though.

“Anyone else want some of my boy here?” Leonard yelled up. “Anyone. I got money. I’ll lay that money out right now.”

No one wanted any of his boy.

Leonard said, “Alright then. I’m gonna expect all the debts to be paid up. I put down three of your fuckers, and you put down none of me.”

“I forgot to bet on myself,” I said.

"You did," Roger said. "You just hurt your knuckles for nothing."

I sucked on the blood across my knuckles.

"Shit, it was worth it," I said.

Leonard had gone up the hill with my shotgun to collect the bets. He stopped and picked up the revolver that had been dropped and brought it back with him and tossed it in the Sabine.

"Shit, man," said the boy who had dropped it. "That's my old man's."

"He's gets it back," Leonard said, "he's gonna have to be Aquaman."

"Now everybody go home," I said. "Oh, and come down here and get your guys, or we'll dump them in the river."

A few of the guys came down and picked up the two Leonard had knocked out, and one guy helped Charlie stagger up the hill. I looked over at Kilgore. Leonard was standing over him pissing in his face.

"The white don't wash off," Leonard said.

"You know it don't," I heard Roger say.

"That's a surprise to me," Leonard said. "I always thought it was paint."

In a few minutes the fighters were loaded up, including piss-face Kilgore, and at the top of the hill, the guy whose gun Leonard had thrown in the water, said, "I'll get you at school, Collins."

"Sure. Meet you on the playground."

He went over to his car and got inside with a girl, drove away, following a procession of cars, on up and out of the bottoms.

Leonard came over and stuck out his hand. I shook it.

"That was some punch," he said. "Took me longer with these guys."

"I watched you move," I said. "You did alright. Hell, you put down three."

"I did, didn't I?"

"I held my rifle and looked confident," Roger said.

"You did indeed." I said.

"That white boy threatened you," Roger said. "That's Robbie Wayne. He's supposed to be bad."

"He didn't offer to fight," I said. "He's not so bad. He could have had his moment now, but he decided to save it for later. He's a blow hard. He won't bother me."

"I wasn't worried about you," Roger said. "I was thinking about me."

"Shit. Call on Hap here, he'll hit so hard he won't wake up until next July. You know you broke that boy's jaw, don't you?"

"I hope so," I said.

"Man," Leonard said. "You're alright."

"Thanks," I said, buttoning up my shirt.

Leonard gave me my shotgun. He said, "Hey, take some of this money I won. You ought to."

"I don't want it," I said. "You keep it."

"They have fights here regularly," Leonard said. "I had a bunch of black guys coming, but they all faded out at the last minute. I should have gone home, I guess. But I sure wanted to hit somebody. You know the Klan used to whip blacks out here in front of the saw mill? I heard they hung one or two out here by the river. Guy named Mose for one, but there might have been others."

"I've heard that," I said.

"I got my car hid back a piece, off a little road," Leonard said. "I was afraid what they might do to it after I knocked them around."

"Confident, aren't you?" Roger said.

"Hell, yeah," Leonard said. "So long you two. And a special so long to you Hap Collins. I hope we cross paths again."

"It could happen," I said.

Leonard started up and over the rise. He didn't show any sign of exhaustion. Way he moved you would have thought he'd just gotten out of bed after a long night's good rest.

"He was a cat, wasn't he?" Roger said.

"I'll say," I said.

"You two seem a lot alike."

"I know," I said. "I knew that right off."

I looked to see where Leonard was going. He walked along the edge of the saw mill and melted into the woods.

Not Our Kind

We got up and turned on the lights and sparred a little more, but we were pretty worn by then, so we didn't last long.

"Want to get an ice cream cone," I said. "We could go through the drive through at Dairy Queen."

"You and the goddamn ice cream," Leonard said. "You could drop a few pounds, you know?"

"I could also enjoy a very nice chocolate cone, and you, a vanilla."

"Damn," Leonard said. "Vanilla is my kryptonite. They made vanilla pussy I could quit being queer."

"No you couldn't."

We locked up and I drove us to Dairy Queen. It was full dark now and there were quite a few cars on the LaBorde streets. More than usual, I thought, but the ebb and flow of traffic in a small city, or a big town, is sometimes hard to figure. I was beginning to think it was getting too big for me. Everywhere you looked there were people. Our house was on a nice lot, but there were still close neighbors and the traffic on our division street had increased of late. Brett and I had talked about it, but the house we had now we had almost paid off and the idea of moving was a chore.

Leonard said, "I remember when us just being together, a black guy and white guy in East Texas, was a big deal."

"Yeah, everyone would do a double take."

"I used to see black and white couples together, I'd do a double take," Leonard said. "It was so unusual then."

"Especially if there appeared to be anything romantic about it."

"Yeah, interracial couples didn't show up in public much," Leonard said. "Mostly because they didn't want to get their asses beat, or maybe even killed."

"Sometimes I think things are bad, and then I realize how much progress has been made."

"Not enough."

"Nope," I said. "Not enough."

"I'll say this for you, Hap. You hung with me back then, and me being queer didn't help either."

"Gay, Leonard. Gay. That's the term. You see, queer is for the homophobes."

"Gay, queer, bent, what have you," he said. "Besides, we people, as some refer to us, often use the word too. We've claimed it. Can I say nigger?"

"I hate you," I said.

Leonard snickered.

"We are going to need to have you go see someone about how to talk in the modern world," I said.

"Too much bullshit as it is," Leonard said.

"Can't fault that sentiment."

As we pulled up to the drive-through, Leonard said, "Hey, let's go inside. I'd like a burger before that cone."

"Talk about me," I said.

"Yeah, but I'm not fat."

We parked at the Dairy Queen, went inside. We ordered and went to the back and sat at a booth. It was an oddly empty place considering all the traffic, just me and Leonard and the staff.

"You know," I said. "One time I was sitting in the back of another Dairy Queen, one in Marvel Creek, and some fellows came to talk to me about you, and they didn't have anything nice to say about you."

"Few do . . . Oh, wait. That was around the time you and me had our first showdown with someone. Together, I mean."

"That would be it."

When I got out of school that day, I drove over to the Dairy Queen to get a hamburger before I had to go to work at the aluminum chair plant. I had a work permit, so I got off early, and I usually grabbed a burger, and then I drove out to the plant and worked until midnight. A lot of us from high school worked there, making fifty-six dollars and fourteen cents a week, which wasn't even good for 1968.

I was sitting at the back of the Dairy Queen, eating quickly, and was about halfway through the burger when four boys from school came in. I knew one of them pretty well, and the others a little. We all knew each other's names, anyway. I can't say any of them were friends of mine. We ran in different circles.

They saw me and came over. Two of them sat down in my booth, across from me, and the other two sat out to the side at a table and leaned on their elbows and looked at me. I didn't like their attitude.

"What's going on?" I said.

"You're seeing it," the one I knew best said. His name was David. Last time I saw him was at the Swinging Bridge, and there had been a fight there for money. My new friend Leonard was there. He won the fight. It was a friend of David's he fought, and he beat the guy's ass like a tambourine and made some money.

Actually, that fight, lit by a huge tire fire, was the first time I met Leonard, and we hit it off, and we saw each other again in Marvel Creek, running into one another accidentally at first, and then finally on purpose. He lived over in LaBorde with his uncle, but they came to the general store in Marvel Creek to shop, which I didn't understand. Everyone in Marvel Creek goes to the larger city of LaBorde to shop, but his uncle had a store in Marvel Creek he liked, place where he had been buying shoes for a long time. He liked it, Leonard said, because the owner never told him to come around back, even before laws were passed that said he didn't have to.

David said, "We were talking about you the other day."

"Were you?" I said.

"Yeah. Some. We been seeing you around with that nigger."

"Leonard?"

"One name is as good as another for a nigger. 'Boy' will work. We'll call him 'Boy.'"

"I won't. And if I was you, I wouldn't call him that. You might find yourself turned inside out and made into a change purse."

"You think he's tough, don't you?"

"Don't you? You seen him whip some ass at the Swinging Bridge, same as me."

"We seen you whip some too," another of the boys said, "but that don't scare us none, about you or the nigger."

The big guy's real name was Colbert, but everyone called him Dinosaur on account of he was big and not that smart. He was a football player and he thought he was as cool as an igloo. He was said to be the toughest guy in school. That might have been true. He hadn't been at the bridge that night. I didn't know if he'd seen me and Leonard together or not, but he was riled about it, thanks to David.

I didn't like where this was going. I kept eating, but I didn't taste the rest of the burger.

"Way we see it," David said, and bobbed his head a little so as to indicate the others, "you aren't doing yourself any good."

"Oh, how's that?"

"Ought not have to spell it out for you, Hap. Hell, you know. Hanging with a nigger."

"You mean Leonard."

"Yeah. Okay. Leonard the nigger."

I nodded. I didn't realize until that moment that I really liked Leonard, and these guys I had known all my life, if only a little, I didn't care for that much at all.

"Word's getting around you're a nigger-lover," Dinosaur said.

"Is it?"

"Yeah. You don't want that," David said.

"I don't?"

"Are you trying to be a smartass?" Dinosaur said.

"I don't think so," I said. I put one foot out of the booth so I could move if I had to, could get a position to fight or run.

"There's talk, and it could reflect on you," David said.

"In what way?"

"You think girls want to date a nigger-lover? And way we hear it, this guy's queer as a three-dollar bill, and proud of it. A nigger queer, come on, man. You got to be kidding me."

"But he has such a nice personality," I said.

"You aren't going to listen, are you?" David said. "Girls don't want to date no nigger-lover."

"You said that."

"Because it's true."

"So, you have come here to spare me being viewed in a bad way, and to make sure I don't lose my pussy quota? That's what's up?"

"You're making light of something you shouldn't," David said. "We got a way of doing things, and you know it."

"We got to keep it protected," Dinosaur said.

"We?" I said.

"White people," David said. "Now that niggers can vote and eat with us, they think they can act like us."

I nodded, glanced at the two that hadn't spoken. "You guys, you thinking the same?"

They all nodded.

"Civil rights may change how the Yankees live," David said, "but it won't change us."

"That's why I don't like you guys."

This landed on their heads like a rock.

"You don't have to like us, but we can't have one of our own hanging about with niggers. He's not our kind. He's not one of us."

"You know, it's really been nice, but I have to go to work now, so I'll see you."

I got up and eased past Dinosaur, keeping an eye on him, but trying to look like I wasn't concerned.

They all stood up. I was about halfway to the door when they came up behind me. David grabbed at my arm. I popped it free.

"You better take in what we're saying," David said.

"I could throw you through that window glass right now," Dinosaur said.

"You might need yourself a nap and a sack lunch before you're able to throw me through that glass, or anywhere else for that matter," I said.

I was bluffing. I was a badass, and I knew it. But four guys, badass or not, are four guys. And one of them was a fucking freak of nature. I was reminded of how freakish he was with him standing almost as close to me as a coat of paint. He was looking down at me with a head like a bowling ball, shoulders wide enough to set a refrigerator on one side, a stove on the other.

About that time, the manager, Bob came out from behind the counter. An older guy, red-haired, slightly gone to fat, not as big as Dinosaur, but I'd seen him throw out a couple of oil workers once for throwing ketchup-soaked fries against the Dairy Queen glass to see who could make theirs stick and not slide off. They didn't get very far in that game.

What I remember best was one of those guys, after Bob had tossed them out like they were dirty laundry, pulled a knife and held it on Bob when he came outside to make sure they were leaving.

Bob laughed, said to that guy, "Should have brought yourself a peppermint stick, you oil field trash. They're a hell of a lot easier to eat."

This with the tip of the knife pressed to his stomach. The guy with the knife and his buddy believed Bob. Believed him sincerely. They were out of there so fast they practically left a vapor trail. It seemed they were standing there outside the Dairy Queen one moment, and the next their car's taillights were shining red in the distant night.

Bob said to David and the others, "Alright, boys. Take it outside."

I thought, shit. Outside isn't going to be all that better for me.

We all started outside. Even Dinosaur didn't want a piece of Bob.

As we were going, Bob put his hand on my shoulder. "You stay with me."

The others turned and looked at Bob. "Unless I've developed a stutter, you know what I said."

They hesitated about as long as it takes to blink, and went out.

Bob waited until they were outside and looking through the glass. He made a shooing movement with his hand, and they went away. After a moment I saw their car drive by the window and on out to the highway.

"They'll be watching for you, son."

"I know."

"Hanging with niggers is frowned on. I got some nigger friends, but you got to know how to keep them at a distance. I go fishing with a couple of them, but I don't have them around at my house, sitting in my chairs and eating at my table."

"Thanks," I said. "I'll remember that."

"Still, no cause to pick on someone. You or the nigger. They don't get to choose to be niggers. And you can get along with most anyone, and learn from most anyone, even a nigger. I learned how to catch catfish good from one."

Well, Bob was better than the other four.

I bought a bag of chips and a Coca-Cola on ice to go, went out to my car, and drove to work. I was about halfway to the aluminum chair plant when Dinosaur, driving a Ford Mustang, pulled up behind me. The other three guys were in the car with him. They followed me to work. I parked close to the door and got out with my chips and Coca-Cola. I slurped at the Coca-Cola through a straw as I walked. I was saving the chips for dinner break. It was a light dinner, but I'd been trying to drop a few pounds. I was always prone to picking up weight, and I had to watch it.

I turned at the door into the plant and looked at them.

Dinosaur shot me the finger.

I shot him the finger back.

We had really showed each other. Funny how that can make people so mad. It's their finger in the air, and that's it. It has about as much actual effect as a leaf falling from a cherry tree in Japan.

They drove way, screeching tires as they left, and I went to work.

Next few days in school I'd see them in the hall, and I never once avoided them or tried to get out of the way. They were not always together, though sometimes they were, and Dinosaur bumped me a couple of times as he went by. I kept my cool. Once David said to me as he passed, "We'll get you, nigger-lover."

This went on for a while, and now and then they'd follow me to work, but they never did anything. I had a ball bat in my car, and they knew that, because I let them see it by holding it up once while driving, knowing they could see it from their Mustang, as they were so close on my ass. What I feared is they'd hold up a gun or guns in response, but that didn't happen. Everyone wasn't shooting everybody back then.

This went on through the semester, and then the spring came, and one day I went downtown to buy some blue jeans and a union shirt. The old white union shirts had become popular. Everyone was dying them, or tie-dying them, and I guess I didn't want to be left out. What we had there in Marvel Creek was a kind of general store named Jack Woolens, and that's where I went to buy the shirt, couple pairs of jeans, and maybe what we called desert boots, which were tan, low-cut, comfortable shoes. I thought I had enough to afford it all. I was thinking on that, figuring I could skip one pair of pants if I had to, and I'd have enough for sure that way to get the shirt, shoes, and one pair of Lee Riders.

My hair had grown longer, and I had to comb it behind my ears at school and push it up off my forehead into a pompadour so I didn't get sent home. A bunch of us were wearing our hair longer, and there was even talk of a sit-in to protest how we were hassled by the principal, but I was the only one that showed up for the event. I ended up wandering around in the hall for a few minutes and went back to the lunchroom and had some Jell-O before going to math class. I had it washed and combed out this day, and it was bouncing loosely as I walked. I thought I was as cool as a razor edge in winter time.

I parked my junker and was walking along the sidewalk, almost to Jack Woolens. I could see the wooden barrels setting out front—one had walking canes in it and brooms, the other had axe and hoe handles.

As I came along the sidewalk, I saw Leonard coming toward me. He saw me and smiled. We hadn't seen each other in a while, but when I saw him I knew I had missed him. He was like a stray dog that wandered in and out of my life, and I felt like when we were together that something missing was fulfilled. It was an odd combo, him being a homo and me being straight, him being black and me being white, and him being more redneck than I was. He didn't like my long hair and had told me, and I didn't like that he thought we needed a conservative president. He was a stray dog I liked, and I decided right then and there I wanted to keep him, even if he might bite. He probably thought I was the stray dog. I doubt he worried about my bite, however. He came down the sidewalk with one hand in his pants pocket, the other swinging by his side.

That's when David and Dinosaur, and the other two thugs, got out of the Mustang parked across the street, having spotted me and caught me without my ball bat. They came across the street, almost skipping.

They got to me before Leonard.

They came up on the curb and managed their way around me in a half circle. The door to Jack Woolens was at my back. It was open. It was a cool day and air-conditioning wasn't as common then, so it was left that way to let in the breeze as well as too many flies.

"Gotcha now," David said.

"Gotcha what?" Leonard said, as he came up the sidewalk, both hands swinging by his sides now.

"You're the other one we want to see," said Dinosaur. "You and the girl, here."

"Wow," I said. "That bites. You see, Leonard, they're calling me a girl because my hair is long."

"It is too long," Leonard said.

"They are really pushing the wit, calling me a girl, noticing I have long hair. These guys, they ought to be on Johnny Carson."

"Fuck you," Dinosaur said.

"You're looking for us, well, you done found us," Leonard said.

"That's right," I said. "You have."

"We don't like what we see," David said.

"That's because you are a blind motherfucker and don't know a couple pretty fellas when you see them," Leonard said. "I could be on a fucking magazine, I'm so pretty. Shit. You could hang my goddamn dick in the museum of fucking modern art. Damn, Big Pile, you know you want to kiss my black ass, right where the tunnel goes down into the sweet dark depths."

"You gag me," David said.

"Fuck you," Dinosaur said.

"The big man is consistent with those two words," I said.

I didn't know what it was about Leonard, but he brought out the double smartass in me. I figured if I was going to die, I might as well go out with a few good remarks. And with Leonard there, well, I felt I had a chance. That we had a chance.

Leonard looked at me. "Yeah. He repeats himself because it's wishful thinking that slips out. Some of that Freudian stuff. Big white boy wants a piece of my fine, shiny, black ass I tell you, but his little ole dick dropped down there would be like tossing a noodle into a volcano."

"Now I'm starting to get gagged," I said.

"Ah, you'll get over it, Hap," Leonard said.

David said to Leonard, "You're a goddamn dicksucking nigger and he's a nigger-lover."

"Nah," Leonard said. "I mean, yeah. I'm a dicksucker, but me and Hap, we ain't fucking, just hanging. Oh, I should also add, I don't like being called a nigger, you cracker motherfucker."

"You got some sand," David said.

"I'm a whole goddamn beach," Leonard said.

"What we're thinking," David said, "is we're going to knock you two around until your shit mixes, until you get it through your head how things are supposed to be."

"That a fact?" I said.

"Oh yeah," Dinosaur said, "we're gonna do that."

Leonard grinned, said, "I guess you boys ought to get started. It's already midday."

"But the sun stays up for quite a while," I said.

"Yeah, there's that," Leonard said. "We got plenty of time to whip their asses."

"Smartass nigger," David said, and glanced at Dinosaur, who moved forward.

That's when an older black man stepped out of Jack Woolens and reached in one of the barrels and pulled out an axe handle.

"I hear you peckerwoods calling my nephew a nigger?" the man said.

David bowed up a little. "We ain't got a thing against hitting an old nigger, or a lady nigger, or kicking around a dead nigger, which is what you're gonna be, you ancient watermelon fart."

That's when the old man swung the axe handle and clipped David across the jaw and made him stagger. I almost felt sorry for David. Even more so when the handle whistled again and caught him behind the neck and laid him out flat on his face on the cement.

The other three thugs froze, then seemed to come unstuck and started toward the three of us. Me and Leonard took fighting stances. That's when Jack Woolens came out behind us, a slightly paunchy old man with thinning dark hair.

"Stop it, goddamn it," Jack said.

They stopped, but when Dinosaur saw who it was, he said, "You old Jew bastard."

"Old Jew bastard fought Nazis, so he isn't afraid of your kind. You aren't a pimple on a Nazi's ass, but you're made of the same kind of pus."

This stopped them. I don't know why, but they hesitated.

The old Jew bastard pulled an axe handle from the barrel and stepped up beside the black man. "Way I see it," he said, "is we have axe handles, and for now, you have teeth. You see it that way, Chester?"

Chester said, "Yeah. They got some teeth right now."

Dinosaur looked a little nervous. "We ain't even eighteen, and that nigger hit David with an axe handle."

"Hard as he could," Leonard said.

"That's against the law," Dinosaur said. "We're underage. Minors."

"Sometimes, you have extenuating circumstances," Jack Woolens said. "I once strangled a Nazi when I was in the OSS. Look it up, you never heard of it. It wasn't a social group. I strangled him and went back to the farmhouse where I was hiding in Austria, and slept tight. I knocked me off a piece the next day. Young German girl who thought I was German. I can speak it. I had the chance, I'd have strangled another fucking Nazi."

"No shit?" Chester said. "You speak German?"

It was like they forgot the thugs were there.

"Yeah, I was born in Germany."

"No shit?"

"Yeah. I did get a little scratch when I was strangling that Nazi by the way. I don't want to sound like I come out clean. That would be lying."

Jack Woolens put the axe handle back in the barrel, and showed Chester a cut across his elbow by nodding at it. It was a long white line.

"Knife," Jack said. "I had to wear a bandage for a few days."

"That ain't shit," Chester said. "Cracker tried to castrate me once. I got a scar on my thigh I can show you makes that look like hen scratch. I had twenty-five stitches and had to stand when I fucked for a while and reach under and hold my balls up so it didn't slap my stitches. Want to see?"

"You win," Jack said. "Keep your pants on."

"I was moving when the cracker did that, cut me I mean," Chester said. "Cracker didn't turn out so well. They found his lily-white ass in the river, and there wasn't no way of knowing how he got there. Some kind of accident like being beat to death and thrown in the river is my guess. You know, said the wrong thing to someone, tried to cut their balls off, something like that. I ain't saying I know that to be a fact, him being dead in the Sabine River, but I'm going to start a real hard rumor about it right now."

Jack turned back to the barrel and retrieved the axe handle, casual as if he were picking out a toothpick.

The thugs continued to stand there. As if just remembering the thugs were there, Chester thumped Dinosaur's chest with the axe handle. "Pick up this sack of dog shit, and carry him off. Do it now, 'cause you don't, it'll be hard to do with broke legs. You boys carry him now, you won't have to scoot and pull him away with your teeth, ones you got left. Gumming him might be difficult. One way or another, though, it ain't gonna turn out spiffy for you fellows."

Dinosaur looked at me, then Leonard, then the older men. He looked at his friends. Nobody bowed up. No smart remarks were made. Dinosaur seemed small right then. They picked up David like he was a dropped puppet, tried to get him to stand, but they might as well have been trying to teach a fish how to ride a tricycle. They had to drag him across the street and into their car.

When they got David inside, the others got in, and Dinosaur went around to the driver's side. He shot us the finger. He said, "This ain't over."

"Better be," Jack Woolens said.

Dinosaur drove his friends out of there.

"We could have handled it," Leonard said.

"Maybe," I said.

“Shit,” Leonard said. “We could.”

“Now they’re tough guys,” Jack said to Chester. “It’s all over, and now they’re tough.”

“We were tough enough,” Leonard said, “and we could have got tougher.”

“Leonard,” Chester said, pulling car keys out of his pocket. “Bring the car around, and don’t squeal the goddamn tires.”

“Like he can’t walk a few feet,” Jack said. “Like he’s got a lot to carry. A pair of shoes on lay-a-way he bought. He can walk.”

I looked at Leonard and he grinned at me. I loved that grin.

Chester said. “I got the lumbago.”

“Lumbago,” Jack said. “Now the lumbago he gets.”

Chester grunted, said to Leonard, “Get the car, kid.”

Leonard looked at me, smiled, and went away to get it.

Down by the Riverside

We left the Dairy Queen, but neither of us wanted to go home. My gal Brett and my daughter Chance, along with our dog, Buffy, had gone out of town for a weekend, a drive to Houston to see Vince White and Kasey Lansdale perform in a small venue there. Dogs were allowed if they were well behaved and wore a muzzle, so that was part of the draw. They would be home tonight, but not right away, so we didn't feel any urge to rush home.

Me and Leonard wanted to go as well. Kasey Lansdale is one of Leonard's special favorites. We had this deal we were doing at the agency, but then after our girls left for the gig it fell through, the job we were supposed to have following this guy, and so we ended up with nothing special to occupy us. Sometimes, though, that's the best thing in the world there is to do. Nothing.

We needed and liked time to ourselves now and again. It was like old times when it was only the two of us.

As we drove about talking, we left LaBorde, and I guess it was instinct that drove me to my old home town of Marvel Creek. A little burg of four thousand or so, the place where I grew up and where I had a few adventures before graduating high school and leaving. Actually, I came back once and had what I guess you could call an adventure. The end of it was back at Leonard's place outside of LaBorde, and some people died. Badly. Leonard and I almost got a ticket too.

I didn't like thinking about that, because then I thought about my ex-wife, Trudy, and that depressed me. I loved Brett dearly, more than any other woman in my life, but Trudy, she was the first, and though I realized in time (too slow a time actually) she was a manipulative shit, she had a place in my heart, deeply buried there like some kind of inoperable tumor.

Yet, here I was in Marvel Creek, thinking back on things, back on East Texas, back on the rough kind of life that was below the surface, the stuff that the people with money didn't know about, or didn't want to talk about. There were people back in the sixties, during the civil rights era, who said, "Oh, we all just got along fine. Black and white. They stayed over there, and we stayed right here. But I had nigger friends. We waved at each other in town."

We crossed the long Sabine bridge that led into Marvel Creek. The moon was on the water.

I said, "I've had a few experiences on that river. You and me have had a few experiences."

"Oh, yeah," Leonard said.

"I quit a friend one day on the Sabine," I said.

"What's that mean, quit a friend?"

We were coming back from fishing in the river with cane poles, and we were carrying the poles back to our car. We had parked it up away from the river, because down close it was muddy, and we didn't want to bog. We were sixteen, me and my friend Davis, though on that very day I decided I didn't want to be his friend anymore.

When we finished putting minnows on our hooks and stopped trying to catch fish, it was the fisherman's custom to pour the surviving minnows out of the bucket and into the river. I was about to do that when Davis came over and took hold of the handle of the foam bucket, pulled it from me, and poured the minnows on the ground, and then with a kind of savage delight, he stomped the little fish into the mud. I suppose it sounds odd to be sad about fish I would have put on my hook had the day not ran out and the fish been biting, but it always seemed to me that if you weren't going to use something for bait to catch something to eat, then you let it go. That was the way Dad did it and everyone I knew that fished.

But Davis didn't see it that way. He was laughing while he did it, his eyes wide and wet-looking. He even tossed the foam bucket up and kicked it into the river like a football.

"Why the hell did you do that?" I said.

"I don't know," he said. "Fuck those minnows."

In that instant when he looked at me and his eyes latched on mine, I think he knew what I knew right then. We were done. Our friendship was over. I suppose it wasn't that one thing that ended it, but it was the one thing that capped it. I picked up my pole and started walking back to the car, and he carried his and we walked in silence up the trail through the woods and on out to where there were fewer trees.

There was a black car parked where the land rose up, and when we got there we saw two men, and then we could see there was another car, a white one, a little farther up on the hill. The men were standing out by the black car and there was a woman in the backseat and she sat there quietly with the windows open and the daylight fading. She was crying.

The men were hard looking, a little fat, and both had their hair heavily greased with hair oil; they looked a lot alike.

I said to the men, “Is she alright?”

“She’s fine,” one of them said. “Go on and mind your own business.”

“I didn’t mean nothing, mister,” I said.

“Sure you didn’t. It’s okay. Just go on now.”

I stopped and kept looking, feeling uncomfortable about the whole thing, but Davis said, “Come on, man. Let’s go.”

The woman turned and looked at us. She was dark-haired and pretty and her face was streaked with eye make-up and her lips trembled.

“Go on now,” said the man again.

We went on up the hill and to my car which was farther up than the white car. It was parked off the path and under some trees near the long bridge that went over the Sabine. The men probably hadn’t seen it. We had come there with our fishing poles stuck out the right back window and down by the sides of the passenger seat in the front, but when we got ready to go, we decided to toss the poles. They had lines and sinkers and hooks on them, and we had forgotten a small, plastic box of fishing gear down by the river. I thought about going back to get it, but knew I would have to pass by the car again, and the idea of it bothered me, so we just left everything.

“You think that woman’s alright?” I said.

“They’re out here fucking, Hap. Don’t you know a damn thing?”

“Two of them?”

“Could have been ten of them, and they would still be out here fucking. She probably wanted it and then she got it and she didn’t want it anymore. She might be making some money.”

“I don’t know,” I said.

“You go on back down there you want, but I’m staying up here. It’s just some woman that changed her mind too late. If it was me and I brought her all the way out here and she was okay with it and then changed her mind, she’d be in trouble, because if she got me this far with the idea of doing it, and she didn’t, well, she’s going to do it.”

I thought about that, and there was no reason for me to think of it any other way than how Davis said about the men, though I didn’t like what he said he’d do if it had been him and the woman didn’t want to do what he wanted. We got in the car and I drove us out of there.

I dropped Davis off at his house, and though I saw him in school from time to time, we only spoke in a passing manner, and never went anywhere together again, and when I was in a place where he was I was uncomfortable.

I didn’t think any more about the car and the men and the woman until some ten years later when I was home visiting my parents, and in the little town paper was an article about how an old black car had been fished out of the Sabine River the day before, and there was what was left of a body, bone fragments and a skull, in the car and no one knew who it was.

I didn’t know her name. But I knew who it was.

Short Night

In Marvel Creek, in search of another ice cream cone, I drove us out to the Dairy Queen where I used to go, where all us kids used to go, not to eat, but just to have something to do. It was gone. There was a ragged used car lot there now.

"It's gone," I said.

"Just think," Leonard said, "those used cars are leaking oil right where you used to eat burgers."

"I guess it wasn't any kind of shrine," I said. "But it hurts that it's gone. Come back, I sort of think it ought to be there, but it isn't."

"You don't need another ice cream anyway."

I turned alongside where the Dairy Queen use to be and drove a back road. Once upon a time it had been nothing more than a black top and there weren't all the houses then. There were woods and there was swamp, and then you came to the river. The river was still there, but there were houses all along the shore. Most of the trees were gone. Where once their roots went deep concrete covered the earth in shallow slabs. It was hard to realize that the place had been so thick with trees at one time that it was always in shadow, and the mosquitoes were thick in the summer time. You could go down there and hide out, or die, and never be found, and someone standing right next to you might not see you if you didn't want to be seen. Now, you had no place to hide.

"There used to be a place out here, above where we are now, where there used to be a hill with trees on it, and a clearing at the very top of the hill. They called it Humper's Hill. Drive out here on Friday, Saturday night, there'd be a half-dozen cars parked, all of them rocking. Now the trees are gone, and so is the hill. They leveled it. The energy it must have taken to level it, to cut all those trees, and just to put up all these boxes that look just alike."

"I was never part of that culture," Leonard said. "We queers . . . gays, humped in greater privacy because we didn't want straight, religious crackers, god-fearing assholes, to cut our dicks off. Mainly, I figured I'd have ended up killing someone. So the few interludes I had with others of my needs were in motels, or homes, now and again some place we could park, but not a community fuck park."

"It wasn't always dates, your best girl. Sometimes it was just plain old nasty, hormonal driven stuff. Guys would bring some girl, or woman, wanted to make a few bucks and they'd pull the train. Demeaning stuff all around."

"You are so sensitive."

"I guess I am. Even though the lady was doing it of her own free will, it was all so tawdry, someone you didn't know spreading their legs in the back of a car and a bunch of guys standing around in line, waiting their turn."

"You must have been out here to know about it," Leonard said.

"You could know without being here, but yeah, I was here once when that was happening. For some guys it was a weekly thing."

"So tell me about the time you were here."

"Alright, and there's more to this one than just being out here on Humper's Hill. Fact is you're kind of included in this story."

"Alright, it's your turn," Ed said, and lit a cigarette.

"I don't think so," I said.

"Everyone else has done her."

"I can see that."

The back passenger door of the car opened and Jack climbed out pulling up his pants, swinging his dong like the pendulum inside a grandfather clock. He took his time to tuck it into place behind his jeans and fasten his belt. He was pretty proud of his dick, and had the nick name Horse.

"I'm all done," Jack said.

"You was done before you got started," a female voice from inside the car said.

"I did alright," Jack said.

"Sure you did," she said.

Jack coughed and sidled off to the back of the car and leaned on the trunk and looked at the moon as if it were his job to study the arrangement of craters.

Ed put his arm around my shoulders and walked me to the car and the open door.

"You might as well knock some off," Ed said. He was kind of the co-coordinator of the event.

"It's alright, hon," Billie Sue said from inside the car. "I don't mind."

"I can see that," I said.

"Oh come on," she said. "I said I could fuck you all, and you're the last one left."

"Fuck Jack twice," I said.

"Ah come on," she said. "He barely managed it the first time."

"To hell with you, you old whore," Jack said.

"Flattery will get you nowhere," she said.

Jack walked away from the car to the edge of the woods and took his horse dick out again and took a piss.

I looked in the car.

Billie Sue was big and fat and her belly heaved. Her legs were spread and what I could see was less inviting than a leap into the bayou at night. You couldn't be sure what was down there. I looked away and felt ashamed of myself for being out there in the first place.

Billie Sue was married to a Baptist preacher, and she liked to take a break from gospel singing and collecting the Lottie Moon offering to come out in the woods and fuck the senior class. Lottie Moon was a missionary who bothered the Chinese by trying to convert them. She was a kind of Baptist hero, but for me she was a long dead busy body. Billie Sue had been doing her own form of missionary work amongst each year's seniors for some four to five years. It was well known around town that she liked to bump with the boys, but her husband was said to give one damn fine sermon. The Baptists didn't want to lose him. And the knowledge of what his wife did made everyone in the congregation feel good about themselves. A little adultery and hypocrisy was easier to accept in one's self if the preacher's wife was considerably more wicked than they were. I thought that was nice. The Church of Christ had fired their preacher because he got caught dancing at a honky-tonk.

"Come on, kid, hop on," Billie Sue said. "I've got my second wind."

"No disrespect to you," I said. "Know you're trying to break a record, but I just came out here to see the stars."

"The stars?" Billie Sue said, and laughed.

"Well, I didn't come for this," I said.

"Shit," Ed said. "You come for something, and it wasn't any stars. I think you ain't got the wood in your pencil to do it."

"Now that I've seen what I'm supposed to do, and who's gone before me, I'll admit there might be a severe lack of wood."

"You queer?" Billie Sue said, sat up and rested her back against the door on the far side.

"No."

"Free pussy and you ain't taking any?" Jack said. He had wandered back over. "That sounds queer to me."

"Jack's trying to get back on my good side," Billie Sue said.

Mike, a guy I knew a little, moved away from the other boys who were drinking beer near the back of the car, came over to me, said to Jack and Ed, "Leave him be. It wasn't any good anyway."

"Fuck you," Billie Sue said.

"I've had better when I didn't have any," Mike said.

"What's that supposed to mean?" Billie Sue said.

"It means it stunk."

"Well hell," she said, "by the time you was there, there had been eight others."

"That explains it then," Mike said. "Come on, Hap. Let's go."

"I didn't bring a car," I said.

"He came with me," Ed said. "I knew he was going to embarrass me like this, I wouldn't have brought him."

"It's alright," Billie Sue said. "I don't expect to be universally admired."

"You deserve respect," Ed said. "He can walk home, all I care."

"I got a car," Mike said.

I went with Mike and he drove us out of there in his '62 Impala.

We rode down off the hill, out of the night, into the glowing lights of the houses along the way, and then into the brighter lights of the Dairy Queen by the highway. Mike parked in the Dairy Queen lot and we went inside, ordered hamburgers and Cokes. Mike went to the bathroom while the burgers were cooking. I picked us a table at the rear of the place and sat down. There was no one else there but us and the cook and the fellow at the register. Mike came back, sat, and said, "I really needed to wash up. I touched her a little. Not on purpose, but trying to guide it in, you know?"

"Okay," I said.

"I'm not trying to make you feel bad about not doing it," he said.

"I don't feel bad."

"She's okay with it," Mike said. "She likes it fine. It's a hobby."

"I know."

"She did ten guys last year, and this year she was going for twelve. She did eleven."

"Guess I messed up her record."

"She really had her heart set on twelve."

"Life is full of little disappointments," I said.

The burgers and drinks were called. We went up and got them and brought them back to the table.

"That stuff they said, about you being queer out there," Mike said, and turned his head a little when he spoke again. "You know, you're like that, it's okay with me. I've known a few. My uncle Bill was that way. One time I caught him sucking a school teacher's dick in our living room. He thought I was out, but I was in the bedroom reading. My uncle was a teacher too. He taught art. The guy's dick he was sucking, I don't remember what he taught. Speech or something."

"No. I'm not like that," I said.

"You know that colored fella you hang with?"

"Leonard?"

"He's queer."

"I know."

"It bother you?" Mike asked. "Not him being colored, but the queer part."

"Some at first. I guess I didn't know what to make of it. He seems like everyone else to me, except for the dick-sucking part. He doesn't hide it any. I figure he'll get killed on account of it. Hell, I might get killed on account of it, I keep hanging around with him. I like him though. He's one tough sucker. He can be funny."

"I don't think of him as funny."

"He can be."

"I think it would take one tough customer to kill that nigger," Mike said.

"I don't think he likes being called a nigger. I'd stick with colored."

"That's something, ain't it. Don't call him nigger, but queer is alright."

"I think he does say he's queer. Says it plain and simple. I think he wouldn't want someone else to call him that, though. I know I wouldn't advise it."

"About the queer stuff, don't misunderstand me. I don't mind he is. Shit, right circumstances, I'd try it."

"What?"

"Sucking a dick."

"Oh."

"You?" he asked, and buried his face in his hamburger.

"Not on your life," I said. "I'm okay Leonard wants to do it. He's my friend. But I don't want no snapshots of it, diagrams and such. I like pussy just fine. Just didn't like that one tonight. I'm ashamed I went out there. I don't know what the hell I was thinking. I sure wouldn't want my girlfriend to know I went out there."

"You have a girlfriend?"

"Not right now. But if I had one, I wouldn't want her to know."

"Course not," Mike said, and nodded his head. "Understand, I was just posing a possible situation. A what if. I wasn't suggesting you and me might do such a thing. Suck each other's dick, I mean."

I got it then. I said, "But you fucked her."

He cleared his throat a little and took a sip of Coke.

"Yeah," he said. "Sure. It was fine. She was fat and a little sticky, but it was fine. I didn't mean what you think I meant. That wasn't what I was talking about. Not really. I was just talking."

"Sure," I said.

"Don't say anything to anybody," he said. "They might get the wrong idea.”

“No problem.”

“Hey, I’ll drop you off.”

“Thanks,” I said.

We finished our burgers without talking and went out to his car.

He drove us away. He knew where I lived.

“How about the team this year?” he said. “I think we’re going to stomp shit out of Mineola.”

“It could happen,” I said, as if I knew the first thing about football. I’d been to one game and that was so I could watch a girl I liked lead the cheers. She left with a football player and I left with some popcorn.

When Mike pulled up in my yard he cut the headlights so they didn’t shine in the house windows and stir my parents. I opened my door, and that turned on the overhead light. I said, “Thanks for the ride. See you later.”

“Hey, just to be clear,” he said, “I was just kidding earlier, but it might have sounded like, you know—”

“No,” I said. “It’s good. I get it.”

He looked at me there in the glow of the overhead light. He knew I got it alright.

I wanted to say something else to him, but I couldn’t come up with anything. I closed the door and he drove away. It was for a weekend, a short night.

I saw him at school after that. He always smiled and said hi, but he never sat with me at lunch, and he didn’t spend any time with me when we crossed paths. After a while I didn’t see him around anymore and I heard later from Leonard that he moved off to some place up north with his family.

The Boy Who Became Invisible

By the time I finished telling Leonard all about it, I had turned us around and was driving back through town. We passed the old high school. It had been built during the Great Depression by the WPA. It was still solid, with a tall tower. I couldn't remember what was in the tower anymore. Maybe I never knew. It sure wasn't a classroom. Offices maybe.

They had built a new school farther out on the edge of town, but I wasn't sure why. The way this one had been built it was sturdy and could have gone on forever. Maybe the plumbing was bad. It was empty now. I stopped in front of it and we rolled the windows down. A wind was blowing and it blew against the building and made a whistling sound up high around the tower and rattled the leaves on a large hickory tree that still grew out front. I had my picture taken there when I was in high school, something or another for the yearbook.

I started us up again, and we edged around the high school, back to where there used to be a tennis court. There was now a house, and a not a very good one. Poor people house. I had lived in many of them, leaky roofs, slow-flush toilets, interruptions in electrical service due to payment being slow.

"Right back there, under that walk, at the door you see coming out of the old school, something terrible happened. Something I sometimes feel I had a part in."

I pulled over to the curb where we could see the place I was talking about, between the house and an empty space where the phys-ed building once stood. Now it was an empty lot thick with weeds.

"You're all memory lane tonight, aren't you?" Leonard said.

"Sorry."

"Hard to believe there are things you haven't told me about, long as we've known each other."

"Some I haven't mentioned to anyone in years. Some I guess I kind of forgot. Tonight, I remember all kinds of stuff, or maybe I'm letting myself remember."

"I doubt you ever really forgot it," Leonard said. "I know I got a few things tucked away."

"You're right. It's always there."

"I know you want to tell me what happened," Leonard said. "So why don't you?"

The place where I grew up was a little town called Marvel Creek. Not much happened there that is well remembered by anyone outside of the town. But things went on, and what I'm aware of now is how much things really don't change. We just know more than we used to because there are more of us, and we have easier ways to communicate excitement and misery than in the old days.

Marvel Creek was nestled along the edge of the Sabine River, which is not a wide river, and as rivers go, not that deep, except in rare spots, but it is a long river, and it winds all through East Texas. Back then there were more trees than now, and where wild animals ran, concrete and houses shine bright in the sunlight.

Our little school wasn't much, and I hated going. I liked staying home and reading books I wanted to read, and running the then-considerable woods and fishing the creeks for crawdads. Summers and afternoons and weekends I did that with my friend Jesse. I knew Jesse's parents lived differently than we did, and though we didn't have money, and would probably have been called poor by the standards of the early sixties, Jesse's family still lived out on a farm where they used an outhouse and plowed with mules, raised most of the food they ate, drew water from a well, but, curiously, had electricity and a big tall TV antenna that sprouted beside their house and could be adjusted for better reception by reaching through the living room window and turning it with a twist of the hands. Jesse's dad was quick to use the razor strop on Jesse's butt and back for things my parents would have thought unimportant, or at worst an offense that required words, not blows.

Jesse and I liked to play Tarzan, and we took turns at it until we finally both decided to be Tarzan, and ended up being Tarzan twins. It was a great mythology we created and we ran the woods and climbed trees, and on Saturday we watched Jungle Theater at my house, which showed, if we were lucky, Tarzan or Jungle Jim movies, and if not so lucky, Bomba movies.

About fifth grade there was a shift in dynamics. Jesse's poverty began to be an issue for some of the kids at school. He brought his lunch in a sack, since he couldn't afford the cafeteria, and all his clothes came from the Salvation Army. He arrived at history class one morning wearing socks with big S's on them, which stood for nothing related to him, and they immediately became the target of James Willeford and Ronnie Kenn. They made a remark about how the S stood for Sardines, which would account for how Jesse smelled, and sadly, I remember thinking at that age that was a pretty funny crack until I looked at Jesse's slack, white face and saw him tremble beneath that patched Salvation Army shirt.

Our teacher came in then, Mr. Waters, and he caught part of the conversation. He said, "Those are nice socks, you got there, Jesse. Not many people can have monogrammed socks. It's a sign of sophistication, something a few around here lack."

It was a nice try, but I think it only made Jesse feel all the more miserable, and he put his head down on his desk and didn't lift it the entire class, and Mr. Waters didn't say a word to him. When class was over, Jesse was up and out, and as I was leaving, Mr. Waters caught me by the arm. "I saw you laughing when I came in. You been that boy's friend since the two of you were knee-high to a legless grasshopper."

"I didn't mean to," I said. "I didn't think."

"Yeah, well, you ought to."

That hit me pretty hard, but I'm ashamed to say not hard enough.

I don't know when it happened, but it got so when Jesse came over I found things to do. Homework, or some chore around the house, which was silly, because unlike Jesse, I didn't really have any chores. In time he quit stopping by, and I would see him in the halls at school, and we'd nod at each other, but seldom speak.

The relentless picking and nagging from James and Ronnie continued, and as they became interested in girls, it increased. And Marilyn Townsend didn't help either. She was a lovely young thing and as cruel as they were.

One day, Jesse surprised us by coming to the cafeteria with his sack lunch. He usually ate outside on one of the stoops, but he came in this day and sat at a table by himself, and when Marilyn went by he watched her, and when she came back with her tray, he stood up and smiled, politely asked if she would like to sit with him.

She laughed. I remember that laugh to this day. It was as cold as a knife blade in the back and easily as sharp. I saw Jesse's face drain until it was white, and she went on by laughing, not even saying a word, just laughing, and pretty soon everyone in the place was laughing, and Marilyn came by me, and she looked at me, and heaven help me, I saw those eyes of hers and those lips, and whatever made all the other boys jump did the same to me . . . and I laughed.

Jesse gathered up his sack and went out.

It was at this point that James and Ronnie came up with a new approach. They decided to treat Jesse as if he were a ghost, as if he were invisible. We were expected to do the same. So as not to be mean to Jesse, but being careful not to burn my bridges with the in-crowd, I avoided him altogether. But there were times, here and there, when I would see him walking down the hall, and on the rare occasions when he spoke, students pretended not to hear him, or James would respond with some remark like, “Do you hear a duck quacking?”

When Jesse spoke to me, if no one was looking, I would nod.

This went on into the ninth grade, and it became such a habit, it was as if Jesse didn’t exist, as if he really were invisible. I almost forgot about him, though I did note in math class one day there were stripes of blood across his back, seeping through his old worn shirt. His father and the razor strop. Jesse had nowhere to turn.

One afternoon I was in the cafeteria, just about to get in line, when Jesse came in carrying his sack. It was the first time he’d been there since the incident with Marilyn some years before. I saw him come in, his head slightly down, walking as if on a mission. As he came near me, for the first time in a long time, for no reason I can explain, I said, “Hi, Jesse.”

He looked up at me surprised, and nodded, the way I did to him in the hall, and kept walking.

There was a table in the center of the cafeteria, and that was the table James and Ronnie and Marilyn had claimed, and as Jesse came closer, for the first time in a long time, they really saw him. Maybe it was because they were surprised to see him and his paper sack in a place he hadn’t been in ages. Or maybe they sensed something. Jesse pulled a small revolver from his sack and before anyone knew what was happening, he fired three times, knocking all three of them to the floor. The place went nuts, people running in all directions. Me, I froze.

Then, like a soldier, he wheeled and marched back my way. As he passed me, he turned his head, smiled, said, “Hey, Hap,” then he was out the door. I wasn’t thinking clearly, because I turned and went out in the hall behind him, and the history teacher, Mr. Waters, saw him with the gun, said something, and the gun snapped again, and Waters went down. Jesse walked all the way to the double front door, which was flung wide open at that time of day, stepped out into the light, and lifted the revolver. I heard it pop and saw his head jump and he went down. My knees went out from under me and I sat down right there in the hall, unable to move.

When they went out to tell his parents what had happened to him, that Marilyn was disfigured, Ronnie wounded, and James and Mr. Waters were dead, they discovered them in bed where Jesse had shot them in their sleep.

The razor strop lay across them like a dead snake.

Blood and Lemonade

While we drove through Marvel Creek, I thought of my family living here, scraping out a living, my father working long hours, and my mother working part-time, and sometimes full-time, but when I was growing up she was at home with me, turning what might have been a dreary existence into something special. On rainy weekend days she made me glue with flour and water so I could paste my projects, she walked me in the woods and showed me what plants were edible. When there was very little to eat in the house, she could turn having a bowl of corn mush, a pot of pinto beans, a fried squirrel, or even a mayonnaise sandwich into what seemed like a culinary event.

And she was smart, a woman ahead of time, brought up in a sexist environment, a time when if women were disagreeable or hardworking they were bitches, or they were having their period, or it was all about hormones; they were being emotional, hysterical.

She was special.

I was nine years old when this happened, and I had gone to see some kind of monster movie followed by a couple of cowboy shows.

We got there early, me and my mother, and there was already a line of snot-nosed kids yakking it up and chewing gum, ready to give the lady at the ticket window their quarter for Saturday admission. The teenagers were having to drag out a whole thirty-five cents, ’cause you turned thirteen, the cost jumped a dime.

You got there on Saturday for what was called the Kid’s Show, you got to see cartoons and a few old serials, not to mention a kid’s show, usually some kind of monster movie or sword and sandal thing, and when that was over, you wanted to stay, and I always did, you could watch the double feature, and then keep your seat and watch both again. One would be the main feature, and the other a shorter running B-movie.

My mother had dropped me off at the library that morning, and I wandered the stacks and read until she picked me up at eleven-thirty, and I carried my four books I was allowed to check out from the library out to the car and we pretty much drove across the street and parked in front of the drugstore next to the theater. Back then, the drugstore served hamburger and soda drinks, and you could buy a hamburger for fifteen cents, a bag of chips for a nickel, a soft drink for the same—we called all soft drinks Cokes or Coca-Cola then. We'd say, "What kind of Coke do you want?" and you might choose an orange pop or a chocolate drink. It's how we talked.

My mother would buy me a hamburger, chips and soda pop, and then when that was done, she'd walk me next door to the movies. I was getting old enough I preferred to do it myself, but she always insisted, as if by taking me she could slow down my growing up. Or maybe she just wanted to make sure I got safely inside, though where we lived there wasn't exactly a crime wave going on.

Next to the line where we were standing there was another line at the same ticket booth, but at another ticket slot. This was for the black people, who at that time were referred to as colored, when being polite. Now and again, after helping several white kids, or sometimes helping them until the line of whites was down to nearly nothing, the lady in the ticket booth would turn to the other slot and take money and give tickets to the black people.

When they got their ticket they went up a shaky wooden staircase that led to the balcony, what I had been heard called the nigger's nest. I had seen this before, but for some reason, that day, it registered that they were always in the balcony, but never down in the floor seats. I of course knew there was a separation of races and that black people were not looked upon with fondness by alot of white people, but on that day, I suddenly wondered why it was such a big deal.

I remember clearly turning to my mother and saying, "Why are those people going up there?"

It was a totally innocent remark, and when I made it, I saw my mother pause, as if she had realized one of her shoes had been nailed to the floor. A lump was in her throat. She said, "I can't explain it to you, son. But it's not right, and it won't always be that way."

That's all the discussion we had on the matter, because now I had my ticket. I went into the show, as we called it, and had probably forgotten all about it by the time I got to the concession counter. A hamburger, chips and drink hadn't stopped me from wanting popcorn and another soda pop, and maybe some candy. Mom had given me enough money for that, and though I was supposed to wait until during the previews between the kid show and the first movie, the B feature, I bought my stuff right away. Unlike some of the other kids, I really loved movies and I loved previews and going to the show was akin to visiting a religious shrine. I even enjoyed watching the advertisements that encouraged a trip to the concession stand.

The theater was pleasantly air-conditioned and had a sticky aisle carpet that sucked at your shoes, and many of the seats were missing the arm rest, and therefore sometimes your arms rested on bolts. But that air-conditioning made it a great place to be during the summer even if the movie was some kind of love story.

The screen was stained in spots and there was a stage in front of it where sometimes magicians performed kid shows, and occasionally there were jugglers and dog acts.

I made it all the way through the kid show monster movie, the double feature, and was there when it started over, when my mother came down the aisle and tapped me on the shoulder.

I wanted to see the shows again, because back then you didn't have to leave during showings, but she insisted I had to go, and so we went out to the curb where our car was parked. It was dark by then, but the theater lights were bright behind us, and there were lights along the walk, in front of the drugstore and other businesses, so it was easy to see a little black boy, crying in the drugstore doorway. I guess he was about my age.

Mom went over to him, said, "Are you okay, little boy?"

He looked up at her and sucked snot up in his nose, said, "I'm alright."

"You don't sound alright," Mom said.

"I got beat up."

"Who would do a thing like that?"

He shook his head. She bent down and looked at him.

"You're bleeding."

Mama opened her purse and took out a Kleenex and dabbed at the blood on his face. "Who would do such a thing?"

"White boy done it," he said.

"A white boy beat you up?"

He nodded.

"Why would he do that?"

The boy looked at her in a puzzled way, as if she had just parachuted in from Venus.

"'Cause I'm a nigger."

"Don't call yourself that."

"He did."

"Yes. But that isn't right."

"He still called me one."

"Can we take you home?" Mom said.

"No. My mama lives out of town. Supposed to stay with my cousin, but he went off with a girl."

"How old is your cousin?"

"Eighteen."

"And he left you by yourself."

"He don't keep up with time so good."

"I can't believe he left you."

"I can, that's how he do."

"So there's no place we can take you?"

"Cousin's house is all locked up. I'd have to break a window."

"Aren't his parents home."

He shook his head. "They don't live there no more, just him."

"Alright, alright," Mama said. "Well, look, we can't just leave you here in a doorway. Tell you what. Come home with us, and we'll call your mama and have her come get you."

"She ain't got no phone. Got a sister has one."

"Then we'll call her."

"She lives in another town, Overton."

"And your mother lives where?"

"Tyler, but she's gone to Dallas. That's why I was to stay with my cousin."

"Come on, then," Mama said. "You come with us and we'll call someone, figure something out."

Mama got his name out of him, Nathan, and with reluctance he climbed into the backseat of the car and sat there with his hands in his lap. He looked scared and confused, like a dog that had been left beside the road and wasn't sure of those who had found and taken him in.

I sat on the passenger side of the front seat, and tried not to stare over the backseat. When I did glance back, he always seemed to be looking at me, wild-eyed and nervous. In our old black Ford we clattered home. My dad was a mechanic, and a good one, but our car was always on the verge of falling apart. He had time to work on other cars, but when he had time off he wanted to lay down in front of the TV and relax. The car he drove to work was worse than the one Mama drove.

At home our guest came nervously through the front door between Mama and me as if expecting a surprise attack, and when Mama hit the light switch, he jumped a little.

“Why don’t you go to the bathroom and wash up, and I’ll fix you something to eat. Would you like that?”

Nathan didn’t answer, just looked around. Our house wasn’t much, and my mother was not a great housekeeper, but she painted, and she had several of her paintings on the walls. She was a pretty amazing hobby painter, but I didn’t know it at the time. It’s just what she did when she was on a kind of manic high. The high was followed by a lull, and then a drop into a depressed place where the walls around it were for a time too steep for her to climb.

“Those are pretty,” Nathan said, pointing toward the paintings.

“Thank you,” Mama said. “I painted those.”

“You did?” Nathan said.

“I did.”

“I ain’t never known someone could do that. I wish I could.”

“Practice,” Mama said, and she went into the kitchen and left us standing there in the middle of the living room.

“Let me show you where the bathroom is,” I said. “You can get that blood off your face.”

I headed in that direction, and when I turned around in the hall, he wasn’t there. I had to go back to the living room and say, “Nathan. Right here.”

Nathan came unstuck from looking at the paintings, went to the bathroom and closed the door. I stood out in the hall like a hall monitor at school. I didn’t know what else to do. I could hear the water running in there. After a moment the door opened. Nathan said, “Are there any towels for me? I can wipe on my pants.”

I found this curious, not knowing quite yet that anything a black person touched was supposedly contaminated, so I said, “Use the one hanging on the rack.”

“Ain’t that your towel?”

“It’s a towel,” I said.

“I got blood on me.”

“Okay,” he said, went back inside and closed the door. After a few moments he came out again.

“You find the towel?”

He nodded, looked down the hallway. We could see my mama in the kitchen at the end, hustling around at the edge of the stove. She turned from it and came down the hall. She took Nathan’s chin in her hand and gently turned his head from side to side.

“You might ought to have a band aid.”

She got a box of them out of the bathroom cabinet and pulled one out, came out into the hall, and applied it to the small cut on Nathan’s head.

"There now," she said. She went back to the bathroom, washed her hands, dried on a fresh towel, and went back to the kitchen.

"Your mama's nice," Nathan said.

"Yeah, she is. You like funny books?

He looked at me and nodded.

I started for my bedroom. Nathan followed after me, still cautious.

We weren't well off, poor actually, but at this short time in my early life we had it pretty good. My dad was a mechanic. He worked for a butane company repairing their trucks, chasing them when they broke down in other parts of Texas, Oklahoma, and Louisiana. He might go to work in the morning and not be back until late at night, or even the next morning, having gone over to Manny Louisiana, some place in Oklahoma or almost any place in Eastern Texas. Wherever a company truck might break down. Within a year of the time I'm talking about, Daddy would be worn out working for someone other than himself, and would end up opening his own shop. We never had much money after that, but he was happier, and to be honest, I didn't realize the difference much until I was grown and could look back on it. I didn't know we were poor. We always thought of ourselves as broke, but at that moment in time, we were doing as well as we ever did. There were so many others around us doing worse. Black families especially.

Nathan came into my bedroom, leaving the door open as if he might need to beat a hasty retreat. I opened my closet, and there were several large boxes there with comics stacked inside. I pulled one out, opened the box, and dug in. I grabbed a stack of funny books and we sat down on the floor. Nathan and I looked through them, and out of nowhere, he said, "I want to be the Flash. I could run off anywhere and no one would know I was gone, and then I'd be back, and they wouldn't even had known I'd run across the ocean, gone over to some place there, and come back."

"I like that he can run across the water," I said.

"Me too," Nathan said, "but I get to thinking about what if I was him, and I slowed down? I'd be wet all over and a shark might get me."

"Flash runs too fast to get bit," I said, "and he won't slow down, and you was him, you wouldn't either."

"Yeah, but I ain't him. He's white."

I realized I had never seen a black superhero, or for that matter, any black characters in comics. It had never occurred to me a black superhero was possible. I thought of most blacks as maids and short-order cooks, farmers and janitors. That's what they did in Marvel Creek. Those were their jobs.

"You boys come eat," Mama called from the kitchen. Through the open door we could see down the hall and into the kitchen. Mama was wearing an apron and hustling plates of food onto the table.

We went into the kitchen. I sat down immediately, but Nathan remained standing.

“Sit down,” Mama said. “This isn’t at the Dairy Queen or such. You don’t have a special place where you have to be.”

I got it a little more then. Nathan was not only unaccustomed to being with white folks, he was unaccustomed at being allowed to sit at their tables, instead of some designated spot for colored. I was starting to absorb the idea that being colored meant you always had to be on your toes.

Nathan sat down and Mama put a plate in front of him. There were some fried hamburger patties, slices of tomato, some broken up lettuce in bowls. We had plain light bread, as we used to call it, and she had busted open a loaf and laid the bread on a platter. There was a big pitcher of ice tea, a bottle of ketchup, and a jar of mustard.

Mama started making herself a sandwich with the bread, meat and vegetables, and I followed suit. Nathan still hadn’t moved.

“We got mustard and ketchup, you want it,” Mama said.

“No, ma’am,” Nathan said. “Dry is fine.”

Then Nathan came unstuck and poured himself some ice tea, and made a sandwich. He would have gladly eaten in silence, I’m sure, but Mama didn’t play that way.

“You finish eating, Nathan, maybe you got someone we can call?”

Nathan didn’t respond to that.

I should add we had recently gotten a telephone, and for us that was a big deal. It was a party line, which meant we shared it with two others, had our own ring, and that meant, of course, that someone on the party line could listen into your conversations if they took a mind to. Now and again you could hear them breathing on their end. I remember Mama saying, “Mildred, get off the line. This is a private call.”

Still, we had a phone, and it was a step up from where we had been. We also had a new TV, a larger set than the one before, and with two cars, ragged as they were, my parents probably felt they had stepped up in the world. It was a step that would become slippery in short time.

“We ain’t got a phone, and my cousin don’t neither, and I don’t want to go where he stay anyway,” Nathan said. “I’d be by myself if I could get in.”

“I can understand that perfectly,” Mama said. “I get by myself, I turn lonely. I like to at least be able to open a window, look out and see a bird, listen to it sing. Birds singing is a joy to me.”

“Not many out at night,” Nathan said.

Mama laughed. “Well, I don’t mean now.”

“Oh,” Nathan said. “I get it. Some other time.”

“Just something pleasant to see and think about,” Mama said.

I glanced across the table at her, because when she said that, I saw something shift in her face. I had seen it before. She called it feeling blue. That meant a memory, or maybe just a feeling, had come up from some place deep and floated onto her face, wrinkling her brow, accentuating the crow’s feet at the corners of her eyes.

“Sometimes I feel like I don’t fit,” she said.

“I know that,” Nathan said. “I get that same way.”

Mama looked at him, said, “I don’t have anything on you, do I?”

“No ma’am,” Nathan said. He sounded like an old man then, weighted down by memories and a touch of arthritis.

We finished eating, and Mama said, “Surely, you have someone I can call?”

“Mama ain’t got no phone.”

“Your cousin?”

“He don’t got one neither.”

“Surely there’s someone? Didn’t you say you had an aunt in Overton?”

Nathan considered for a long moment.

“She ain’t never home,” he said. “I got an aunt in Baton Rouge.”

“Oh, that’s a long ways,” Mama said. “Still, I think I ought to call her.”

Mama wrangled the aunt’s number out of him and picked up the phone, which was on the kitchen counter under the light switch. She dialed the number and called the aunt.

No one answered. She put the phone down.

“You said your mama was in Dallas?”

“She ought to be back by now,” Nathan said.

I glanced at the clock. It was nearly midnight.

“I’m thinking maybe I could drive you home, then,” Mama said.

“I ain’t sure how to get there,” Nathan said.

“You got an address, something that could help me find her.”

He did have an address. Getting it out of him was like trying to lift a car, but Mama finally managed and wrote it down.

“Tell you what,” she said. “You boys go look at funny books. I’m going to get a Tyler map and see if I can figure out where this address is.”

Back in my bedroom we went back to looking at funny books. Nathan had loosened up. We sat on the floor and talked about funny-book characters, and the movie we had seen that day. He liked the monster movie, and that led us to talking about other monster movies we had seen. It was great to have someone that cared about that stuff as much as me.

After a time, Mama came into the bedroom and said, "I think I got it figured out. We might have to pull over some and have me study the map, but I think we can go now."

"I could stay here tonight," Nathan said.

"I don't know, hon," Mama said.

"Oh, yeah," Nathan said. "I forgot."

"No," Mama said. "It's not that. You should be home. Your mama will be worried."

"She thinks I'm at my cousins."

"But you're not, and she thinks you are," Mama said. "I don't think that's good."

There was an uncomfortable moment, and then Nathan said, "Yeah. I better go home."

"I'm going to pull the car out of the carport, you boys come out and we'll go."

I got up and prowled around in my closet and came up with a stack of comic books, doubles of comics I already had. I gave them to Nathan.

"These for me?"

"Sure. I got some more."

"Thanks," he said. "You been real nice."

We went out to the car, not bothering to turn off the light or lock the door. We didn't lock doors much in those days. They used to say locks were for keeping honest people out, and lights make the bad folks think you're at home.

I sat in the backseat with Nathan. Mama looked back at me when I sat down back there, seemed as if she might say something, then didn't.

We drove out of Marvel Creek, over the Sabine River bridge. We drove past what was then called Hell's Half Mile, a series of honky-tonks. I remember driving by there with Dad at the wheel, and he said, "You see that tree out back of that beer joint? They hung a nigger there once, back in the forties. Reckon he wasn't but twelve years old. Raped some white girl. I used to have a postcard they made from a picture they took."

It was then that I was glad Dad was still at work, on the road somewhere. I couldn't imagine him being mean to Nathan. I had seen him do too many kind things for colored, and I would see more when he opened his own garage, working on their cars for free when they couldn't pay him, giving black kids money when we didn't have any. But still, it was then that I realized my mama and daddy lived in different worlds. When Dad had talked about that hanging, it sounded as if there was a bit of pride in his voice. Mama told me later, when she put me to bed that night, "His bark is worse than his bite. Your daddy's father used to tell your daddy when he went to bed at night, 'You do something wrong, a nigger's going to come get you and chop you up.' I'm just using the word they used, but I don't mean for you to say it. I want you to know how it was."

It was these sorts of things that gradually allowed me to understand how things were different between us and the colored. Mama was of her time, but not in the same way as everyone else. She could see a crack in the cloud cover, a ray of light, when all the others could see was an eternal black night.

That night we were driving Nathan home, we stopped along the way a few times, and Mama sat behind the wheel with the map and a flashlight on it, studying it. I don't know how long we drove, but it was longer than it would have taken had Nathan known how to get there, instead of just knowing the address.

Nathan and I both nodded off in the back seat, it was so comfortable, and when I awoke we had come to a dark part of town where there were no street lights and the houses seemed to tumble out of the dark beside the road.

"I don't see any street numbers," Mama said. "Maybe you ought to wake Nathan."

I touched his shoulder and he came awake quickly.

Mama, who was looking over the backseat, said, "Nathan, honey. I've got this far, but don't see street numbers or signs. Do you recognize this place?"

Nathan sat up and leaned over the seat and looked around. "Yes, ma'am, we about there."

He gave Mama some instructions then, and we proceeded down the street and turned on a narrow dirt street and pulled up at the edge of a dead, brown yard with a graying little house in it. There was a white Ford parked up on the grass near the front door.

Mama got out, and me and Nathan did too, Nathan with the funny books under his arm. He ran ahead of us and knocked on the door. Nothing happened, so he knocked again, louder.

Finally a heavy colored woman came to the door, opened it, stepped out onto the concrete steps. She looked out at us, then down to Nathan.

"What you doing here?" the woman said to Nathan. "You supposed to be at your cousin's house."

"He left me and some white kids beat me up," Nathan said.

"What. Come tomorrow, I'm going to drive over there to your cousin's house and tear his ass up. Who's this white lady?"

"I been at her house. Me and him read comics and she gave me dinner, drove me over here."

"That right?" said the woman.

"It was no trouble," my mama said.

"Ain't no one asking you to do it," Nathan's mother said.

This stunned Mama.

"I know. We were glad to do it."

"He don't need some white folks helping him out, showing him how kind you is. What's that under your arm, boy?"

"Funny books," Nathan said.

"Where you get them?"

"He gave them to me."

"Let me see those."

Nathan slowly handed the stack to her.

"Come here white boy. Take these back."

"I gave them to him," I said.

"I don't care you did or didn't, come take them, or I'll tear them up."

I went over and took the stack from her and went back quickly to stand by Mama. We were still back a ways from the steps, and I was starting to feel really uncomfortable.

A colored man came to the door. He was big and stout and didn't have on a shirt.

"What's going on here?" he said.

"These white folks done brought Nathan home and was trying to give him some funny books."

"Johnny left me," Nathan said.

"He did," said the man. Then he looked out at us. "This is nice of you folks."

"No," said Nathan's mother. "It's just them showing us they got good ways. I tell you about y'all's good ways. Why don't you come on up in here tonight, spend the night with us, not drive back. Tomorrow, we can all go down to the sto' and shop for some groceries. We could then go to your house and have a tea party. You think that would be good? We can go to your church together this Sunday, and then you can come over here and we'll sit on the couch and watch TV. Maybe we'll go to the picture show, and you can sit up in the balcony with us."

Mama said, "We better go."

"Yeah, you better," the woman said.

"Now don't talk like that," the man said to the woman.

"I talk like I talk," she said.

"Thank y'all for bringing him home," he said to us.

"Yeah, y'all such do-gooders," said the woman. Then to Nathan. "Get your ass up in that house."

"Come on, son," Mama said, touched my shoulder, and headed to the car, walking fast.

"You come on back when you want that tea party," said the woman.

We got in the car. I sat in the front this time.

As we drove off, Mama started crying.

"Damn niggers," I said.

"Don't say that," she said, and pulled the car over. "Don't say that ever again. Never use that word about colored people. Colored or Negro. Don't you never say that."

"Daddy does," I said.

Mama was heaving a little, still crying. "Listen here. I've told you about that. Your daddy don't know any better, but you do. Hear me?"

"But she was mean."

"You walk a mile in her shoes, then you can judge. You got to see it from her side."

I didn't understand that at all.

"She was mean," I said again.

"She's got her burden," Mama said.

She pulled the car back onto the street. It was a long time before she spoke. When we got to Hell's Half Mile, Mama said, "When I was a girl my mama made me some lemonade, put it in a big pitcher, put it on a table out under a tree. She said I should sit there and enjoy it, listen to the birds. So I did. I sat there in a chair in front of the little table and drank my lemonade. I drank it fast. It was sweet. It had so much sugar in it, you had to stir it between glasses, 'cause you didn't, it all settled to the bottom of the pitcher, like sand under water. I drank that pitcher of lemonade so fast because it was so sweet and so good, and then when I got up to go in the house, I was dizzy. It was drinking all that lemonade so fast and it being so sweet. I got real dizzy. I fell when I got to the porch and hit my head on the steps. I still got the scar, just under my hairline. It knocked me out.

"When I come to, Mama had me in the house, stretched out on the couch, and she had bandaged my head. I sat up on the couch when I felt I could, and Mama came in, said, 'You got to learn to take your pleasures slowly, girl. Enjoy them, 'cause there's a lot that isn't pleasurable. And if something is good, and then things go wrong, don't blame the good part if you didn't spend the right kind of time enjoying it."

She stopped talking. I thought that was an odd story, considering what had happened that night. As we drove across the Sabine bridge, into Marvel Creek, Mama said, "You see, son, life has got its good and its bad. It's got its lemonade, and it's got blood. Tonight, we had a bit of both. And you can't let the good we did, the lemonade, get outweighed by something that went bad. You got to think slowly on the good, not get caught up in the bad. Got to see the whole picture."

I wasn’t sure back then what she was talking about, and by the time we arrived at the house, I had fallen asleep against the car door and had to be shook awake.

In the River of the Dead

As we crossed the long Sabine River bridge going out of Marvel Creek, we both turned our heads toward the river, the left side of the bridge. Even from that side we could see the river way out and winding.

I heard Leonard sigh.

I knew what he was remembering. We couldn't drive over the bridge without thinking about it. It was of our first moments together that wasn't just threatening and dangerous, it was deadly.

"That was something," Leonard said, not even bothering to explain what he meant.

"Yeah," I said.

"That's when we were really getting to know each other," he said.

"That's right."

"You did something for me that was damn foolish."

"I did, and I wouldn't do it again."

"Yes, you would. I still have it."

"I know that. By the way, I think it makes a lousy key fob."

"It reminds me of a lot of things, not all of them good," he said. "Sometimes you got to remember the ugly, look it in the eye."

We were across the bridge and out of there, but my memory of what happened wasn't gone, and we sat in silence for a while, both of us remembering it our own way, I guess.

We were seventeen when this happened, out fishing on the Sabine River.

What we learned was if we went fishing, sat in a boat and dragged some lines in the water, we might catch dinner for our night camp, but mostly we found out about each other. That's how I learned about Leonard's family, his feelings about being black and gay, and he learned about my family and me.

We drifted all day, had our camping supplies in the boat, and the plan was we would find a place to stop before nightfall. The boat was pretty good sized, an open boat. The outboard motor wasn't strong on horse power, but it puttered us along as fast as we needed to go.

The river smelled sour because the day was warm. After we motored down a ways, we killed the engine and let the boat drift beneath the shade of the overhanging trees in the narrow part of the river. It was cooler there. The wind finally picked up, which was nice, because it blew the stink and the mosquitoes away from us.

It wasn't quite dark when Leonard snagged his line. Where we were, the Sabine was surprisingly clear. The water ran fast enough we had to drop anchor to keep from floating away. The deep water was so clear, that when Leonard looked to see what his line was snagged on, he saw all the way to the bottom.

"Take a look," he said.

I learned over the side and looked. There was a boat on the bottom.

It wasn't a boat with an outboard. It was one those boats with a top and front and side glasses in the cabin, and it had a real engine. Except for being on the bottom of the river, it looked like a nice boat. Leonard's line had caught up in a side rail, and we could see it clearly. Leonard pulled at the line, but it wouldn't come loose.

"I could swim down there and get it," he said.

"That's deeper than it looks," I said.

"I can swim good," he said. "I'm like fucking Aquaman."

"Just cut the line and go on. Re-rig your tackle."

"I want that sinker," he said.

"A goddamn lead sinker, that's your worry? Shit, I got lead sinkers in my tackle box. Help yourself, and when we get back to shore I'll buy you some more, maybe get you an anvil to tie on your line."

"My uncle gave it to me," he said. "It's made out of lead. It's a little figurine, an old black mammy from some kind of advertisement."

I hadn't noticed he had it. I said, "And you want that?"

"You might not understand it, Hap, but it belongs to my uncle, or did. He gave it to me. It's what we call a keep-sake."

"A humiliating little statue made of lead that's a black mammy, and you won't be able to sleep nights if you don't get it? You're jerking my dick?"

"He took it off a man once. A man tried to fight him, made fun of him, and waved that thing under his nose."

"Some guy was carrying it around in his pocket?" I said.

"Story is, my uncle whipped his ass and took that thing and made it his own. Then he gave it to me."

"Try shaking it loose again."

"I've tried," Leonard said. "The hook is under the railing somehow. I'm going to swim down and get it."

"I'll be right here," I said.

Leonard pulled his shirt over his head, slipped off his shoes and pants until he was in his boxer shorts.

Leonard, who had probably seen the same episodes of Sea Hunt I had, sat on the edge of the boat and back-flipped into the water. I moved from where I sat and took his former spot, and looked down.

Leonard swam with hard strokes. My guess was right, it was deeper than it looked. I saw him reach the deck and land on it and pull himself along the railing to where his hook was hung, and I saw his head turn toward the open back door of the boat's cabin. Leonard froze there. He stood there on the deck underwater for a few seconds, and then he forgot the sinker, let go of the railing, and came swimming up hard. I watched him surface like a porpoise and grab the side of the boat. I helped him inside the boat.

"What the fuck?" I said. "You forgot the sinker."

For a black guy he looked a little pale.

"There are bodies down there. Naked bodies."

"What?"

"Bodies."

"What do you mean, bodies?"

"What the fuck do you think I mean, a squirrel and a moose? Fucking bodies. People. I saw a woman and a man floating in there, and they ain't testing the temperature of the water."

"Jesus," I said.

"Yeah, Jesus."

"What do you think happened?"

"They fucking drowned, I guess. God, Hap. I don't know."

I thought about it for a moment, stripped off my clothes, and went over the side. The water was cold. When I swam to the deck, I looked through the open door and saw what Leonard had seen. Two bodies. I looked in there, and when I did a child's corpse brushed up against me, made me shoot up to our boat and clamor over the side, almost tipping it.

"There's a child too," I said.

"Shit," Leonard said.

"Yeah. I panicked."

"Me too," Leonard said. "Maybe we should learn not to panic."

"I guess the boat sank fast and they drowned, but damn, couldn't they swim up from that depth? It's deep, but it's not that deep, and the mother or the father could have brought the child up."

"Not if it was so quick they were down there and full of water before they knew it."

"It would have to have had a real blow out to sink that fast," I said. "I didn't see any rips, so it has to be a hole in the cabin."

"We ought to get someone down here to get them out," Leonard said.

"Yeah," I said. "We got to do that. Look, I'm going down one more time to get your sinker."

"Oh, the hell with it," he said.

"It was everything a few minutes ago, and now it's to hell with it?"

"I hadn't found three dead bodies in a boat then."

I didn't say anything. I was still in my shorts, so I got my pocket knife out of my jeans, opened the knife, and went over the side and swam down. I cut the fishing line loose and got the little lead statue Leonard was using for a sinker and clutched it in my fist. The water was starting to stir and grow dirty, and the sun was going down, laying a strange rust-colored sheen over the water.

I made myself go into the cabin again. It was creepy to see them floating in there, and there was blood too, but it was in odd little strings that floated in the water inside the cabin like odd party confetti.

That kid must have been about four or five years old, and that was a hard thing to see, because when he rolled in the water, which was becoming agitated, I could see there was a hole in his head right over his ear, and when he rolled over, I could see the other side, and there was a larger hole there, one that pretty much replaced that side of his head.

The man and woman were young, and I could see there were burns on their body, and something was stuck up their asses and broken off. Liquor bottles, I thought. There were dark bruises on their necks, and the man's penis had been split down the middle like a banana, and the woman's breasts had burn marks on them. River mud stirred by something washed in and everything turned dark. I panicked and lost my pocket knife and swam up with the lead statue in my fist.

When I topped out of the water darkness had fallen on the river like a curtain, and it was raining. You couldn't see very far down the river, but you could see a line of rain crossing it and coming in our direction, a rain more fierce than the current one. It was coming in waves and the next wave was going to be rough. The moon wasn't up yet and the stars weren't visible, and with the rain like that, and the clouds, you might not be able to see them anyway.

Leonard pulled me into the boat, and then he got a flashlight and turned it on me. I held out my hand with the statue in it.

"You didn't need to do that, Hap."

"Hell, I know that. Those people, they've been murdered. It's not just a boat drowning."

I told him what I saw.

"Jesus. Well, one thing's for sure. They didn't come out here and do that to themselves, drown their kid and stick bottles up their asses and break them off."

"What I'm saying."

Leonard had already slipped into his clothes, and now I slipped back into mine. They were damp from the rain.

I went to crank the motor, and it wouldn't crank.

Leonard said, "Let me give that a pull."

Any other time I would have turned that line into a joke, but right then I didn't feel too humorous.

He came over and took the rope, and jerked real hard. The rope broke.

"Nice work," I said. "We got to paddle back."

"Tonight? It would take hours. With this rain we won't even be able to see where we're going, and we'll spend all night bailing out the boat."

"But those people," I said.

"Listen, Hap. We got to get the boat on shore, maybe I can screw off the casing on the outboard and figure how to get it going without the rope, or maybe I can tie the rope back together and start it, but it will still be dark and wet as shit. We can dock the boat, spend the night with our camping gear, like we planned to do, and in the morning we can paddle the boat, provided it's not raining like a son-of-a-bitch. And speaking of that."

The rain really hit then. It was heavy and cold and it splattered into the boat and within instants water was starting to rise inside of it.

"So," Leonard said. "A better idea?"

"Let's paddle for shore."

We took the paddles from the bottom of the boat and did just that.

On shore we pulled our supplies from the boat. Our stuff was wrapped in water proof material inside our packs, so we had that going for us. We placed the packs under a large willow tree that was grouped up with some smaller struggling willows. We tipped the boat to get what water was in it out, and then Leonard used a spare shirt from his pack to rub the boat as dry as he could while I stood over him with a ground cloth stretched over our heads. He didn't completely get out the water, but it helped. I pulled the ground cloth over the top of the boat and tied it around the edges with some fishing line, running the line through gaps in the edges of the boat. The plan was we would sleep in the boat. The idea of sleeping on the ground with water moccasins was highly unappealing.

We needed to eat first, though. We had rain slickers, so we put those on and got up under the willow and used Leonard's ground cloth to stretch above us and tie off to limbs to make a kind of rough canopy. Under that we sat against the tree and broke out a can opener and some canned Vienna sausages and Beanie Weenies and ate them with the utensils we had brought, a fork and knife a piece.

"What do you think happened?" I said.

"Well, someone was mad at them for something."

"What could the child have done?"

"Not a thing, I'm sure."

"Maybe the cops can figure it out," I said.

"Maybe they can."

We talked for a long while about it, and then about other things, and then about the boat again. We drank from our canteens. I had some apples in my pack, and got one for both of us. We sat under the tree eating the apples, the rain running off of the ground cloth we had rigged. It was hard to stay dry. It wasn't really a cold night, but with the rain there was a chill, and I wished we had a fire, but the dead wood lying about would be wet, and we decided it wasn't worth gathering it and decided to keep a cold camp.

Our plan was to get under the canopy in the boat, and with our flashlights, read. We had brought books for just that plan, but the truth was neither of us felt like reading or going to sleep. Every time we stopped talking, I saw in my head that poor child and those people, brutalized, down there in the water with fish swimming amongst them, not to mention snakes and what have you. It wasn't a good image.

"What about our motor?" I said.

"In the morning. I can't see shit in this rain."

"Those poor people," I said.

"They won't get any deader," Leonard said. "We'll head back in the morning."

"Sure," I said.

"We ought to go to bed."

"Yeah."

But we didn't.

"In the morning, we'll find enough dry wood to make some coffee," Leonard said.

"If you brought coffee. I got a pot we can cook it in, strain the grounds through something, but I don't have any coffee."

"I thought you said you would bring the coffee?"

"No. I said we needed coffee."

"You said that, I thought you meant you better get some."

"Nope. I just wanted some. I thought you were going to bring it."

"Perfect."

That's when we heard a motor on the river and saw a boat with a strong forward light coming up river. We sat silent and watched it slow down, then go by where we were. A little later we heard it turning back and saw the light again as the boat came back in our direction.

"I think they're looking for the boat?" Leonard said.

"You think they know where it is?"

"Yeah."

"Why?"

"A guess."

The boat passed our camp again, but didn't go far before it turned around and they brought the boat alongside the bank and not far from the tree where we were. Leonard took out his pocket knife and opened it. I had lost my knife. I sat there with wishful thinking and no weapon.

The boat on the water was not too unlike the boat on the bottom of the river, and there were at least three men on it. I could hear them talking, though I couldn't hear what they were saying. They were still inside the cabin, but the door to the cabin was open, and their voices came out along with some light. In a little while they walked out on deck.

They had on hooded rain slickers. They were on the far side of their boat, away from shore, leaning over with their lights pointed at the water.

"Can't see a damn thing," one of the men said. He was the largest of the three.

"This is the place," said another, who was a shorter version of the biggest man.

"You sure?" said the big man.

"Pretty sure."

The third man, a thin guy, said, "You better be sure. That water is going to be cold, and it's going to be you going in."

The shorter stocky man at the side of the boat, leaning over the railing, stood up, said, "I'm not the only one going in, not in this dark water. I go, we all go, or we wait until morning."

There was a silence on the boat, and then the biggest of the three, a fellow who seemed in charge, said, "Alright. We stay until morning, then we go in. Maybe the rain will be done."

"It will be," said the thinner man.

"How the hell would you know?" said the short stocky one.

"You get so you know one kind of rain from another. This one is hard for a while, and then it'll move on. Might be some light rain later, but when this is gone, it'll gradually start to clear."

"Listen to Farmer Brown," said the short stocky man. "We grew up with him, but he's got some special skills given to him by the angels or some such."

"We'll stay in the cabin until daylight," said the big man, "then we go in."

They were all standing together now, looking at the shore line. The one that knew about farming said, "There's a boat on shore."

"So what," said the big man. "People leave them here all the time to go fishing. Lots of niggers live on this stretch, back beyond the tree stand. Probably one of their boats."

Without saying a thing to one another, me and Leonard both stretched out and lay flat on the ground behind the big willow and the scrubs. We tried to make ourselves as small as possible.

The head man studied where we were for a while, then shined his light on us. He could pick up on Leonard real good.

He said, "There's a nigger lying down there."

"Run for it, to the left. I'll go right," Leonard said, lying in the pool of light. "They ain't seen you yet."

By this time the short stocky man had slipped into the cabin, and he came out with a rifle. He pointed it at the shore where Leonard lay. He had it lined in the big man's flashlight beam.

"Better come out of there, nigger, or I'm gonna pop you," said the short stocky man. "You can't run faster than a bullet."

Leonard stood up and dropped his knife on the ground. "I'm just out here fishing."

"Are you now?"

The thinner's man's flashlight came on and the beam fell on me. "There's another one on the other side. White boy."

I stood up slowly. I thought I probably could make a run for it, as the grass and brush was high on my side, and there were some trees a little farther down, and it would be hard for them to get a clear shot. But I couldn't leave Leonard.

Since their boat was close to shore, the man with the rifle jumped down and came over. He walked on the edge of the flashlight beam that was shining on Leonard. The other man kept his light on me. It was a strong light. I felt like I was part of a floor show.

When they were all three on shore, the big man said, "Fishing, huh?"

"That's right," I said. "Our motor broke down, and there came a rain storm, so we put in for the night."

"Cheap ass motor is my guess," said the one with the gun.

"I reckon that's true," Leonard said.

"You seen us looking over the side of our boat, didn't you?" said the head man.

"Sure, we seen you," Leonard said. "What you looking for?"

"Nothing that concerns you, nigger. Both of you, come down here closer on the bank."

Leonard led the way and I followed up. I was starting to regret the both of us not trying to make a break for it.

The big man put his light in our faces, stared at us while we blinked.

"You know what's down there, don't you?" he said. "I can tell when someone has a secret, and I can guess at it damn good, know what that secret is. Been able to do that all my life."

"Another one of us with special powers," said the man with the rifle.

"What are you talking about?" I said.

"The boat," the big man said.

"Shit, August, don't tell him?" said the man with the gun.

"Hell, they already know. I can tell by looking at them. They know why we're here."

"Haven't a clue," Leonard said.

"I know a liar when I hear one," the big man said, the one called August.

"We'll have to kill them," said the one with the rifle. "They didn't know, they know now, way you've run your mouth."

The big man glanced at the one with the rifle, and the rifle man went silent. I think he knew there was a line he shouldn't cross with the big man.

I thought: Shit, this is it. I'm going to die on the banks of the Sabine River, and here I was close to graduation and hoping I was going out into a wider world away from all these crackers, but instead I was going to die at their hands.

Typical.

"Can you boys swim?" August said.

"Like a goddamn eel," Leonard said.

"You?" he said, indicating me, of course.

"Yes."

August contemplated for a few moments, said, "What I'm thinking, is we have them swim down for us, have them get it, and we don't have to get cold and wet and take a chance down there. Just the thought of my balls in that cold water makes me ill."

"Only need one of them," the man with the rifle said. "We could pop the nigger."

"Naw, it's heavy," August said. "We need them both."

I knew another sentence had stayed inside his head.

And it went like this: "And then we pop them both."

They brought us on the boat and had us sit down on the deck. The deck was wet and I could feel it through my pants. It made my ass cold. Now that they weren't shining the lights right on us, I could actually see them better. August was the biggest, and I took him for the planner. He had a way of leaning forward all the time, as if he was about to take off in a sprint. He was too big a man to get far that way, I judged, but he was certainly the right size for twisting your head off. The man with the rifle, the leanest of the three, had a nervousness that made me nervous. I didn't like the way he handled the gun. His hair was cut short like the other two, so short I figured they might as well just go on and shave their heads. All three looked kin. Brothers or cousins perhaps, the thin one being the most different in size, but not in facial features.

"There's some dead people down there in a boat," said August, "but you know that. I can tell by looking at you. But what you might not know is they're there for a reason. They been hauling off stuff that isn't theirs."

"Yeah," said the one with the rifle. "They fucked up."

"What kind of stuff?" I asked.

"They don't need to know shit," said the one with the rifle.

"It's alright, Tom. I want to tell them. Besides, they knew the bodies were there, I promise you. Come on, admit, you knew they were there."

We said nothing.

"That's alright," August said. "I'm going to tell you all about it."

"Why the hell should you?" Tom said.

"Know what they're looking for, that's why."

"You don't have to tell them why, just what it looks like," Tom said.

"I know that," August said.

I could tell August was the kind of guy that wanted to brag on himself, thought he was a real top cat and wanted everyone to know it. I thought of a line Tony Curtis had in movie, a line about wanting to be Charlie Potatoes, meaning the big man. That was this guy. He knew too it didn't matter what he told us. Later on we'd be in the river with the other three.

"What do you think it is down there?" August asked us.

"Your mother's china," Leonard said.

"Oh, nigger, you are not in a position to crack wise," August said.

"Just making a guess," Leonard said.

I had learned that Leonard, under the direst of times, couldn't help himself with the smart remark. I'm not much better. I think it was the way we coped with intense stress, and maybe in Leonard's case he just didn't give a shit. I, on the other hand, gave a big shit, and didn't want to end up with a bullet in my head with my body absorbing river water.

“That isn’t any guess. Them three down there, that’s the Smiths. What they called themselves anyway. You can call them dead now. Thought they were going to be clever. Said they’d buy some smack from us, that they’d come to our place by boat, on account of we live on the river.”

“Best reason to come by boat,” Leonard said.

“What?” said August.

“If you didn’t live on the river, then they’d come by car, maybe airplane.”

“Keep it up, coon. Keep it up.”

“Shut up,” Tom said. “They don’t need to know any of this shit.”

“I like telling it,” August said.

August picked up where he left off. It was easy to see that telling us what a smart and bad motherfucker he was gave him great pleasure. The other two could care less, and we were a new audience. It gave him a reason to hear himself talk.

“Smiths had it in their mind they were going to rob us and take the dope, sell it to hippies some place. Dallas. Austin. Shit, I don’t know, San Francisco. They talked like Yankees, so I don’t know. But they been in this area for a while, and they been buying, a bit here and there, and I guess they were storing it up, going to resell it up north, and they heard about us. We met them at the feed store, and they said they had the money and we said we had the dope. So we made a deal.

“Know what they did?”

“You already told us,” Leonard said. “They robbed you.”

This didn’t deter August.

“They came down the river in their boat. They had guns. We did too, but they surprised us. Nice looking couple, and they had that kid with them. Quiet kid. Either trained to keep his mouth shut or quiet by nature.”

“Would have been nice had you been that way,” Tom said.

August ignored him.

“I figure they thought it made them look normal going down the road in a van pulling a boat loaded with dope, ’cause no one would think to look at them for such a thing. Shit, we were going to rob them and they outfoxed us and got the jump on us. So they got our stash. It’s wrapped in plastic and duct taped and in a cooler that’s taped, and they took off with it. They had us open it up, show what was in it while they held guns on us, then they had us tape and fasten it all up, load it on their boat, but, you see, they fucked up. They should have wrecked our boat, ’cause soon as they left we went after them. We got a better and faster boat. We caught up with them back river a ways. You know what we did to really hurt them. We shot that fucking kid right in the head. First thing. Bam. That made them scream, it truly did, didn't it, Tom?"

Tom nodded, said, "They shouldn't have put us in that position."

"That's right," August said. "They put us there. Then we had some fun with the woman and we gave them a bit of a lesson with fire and such, shot them in the head. But you know what happened? I don't even think they knew it. They had gone over some shallows and hit some rocks, and it took the bottom of their boat out, and it sunk with them on it, and us having to swim back to our boat right when we were about to bring the dope out. When it started going down, it went down fast as a fucking torpedo."

"It was already going down," said Tom, "but no one noticed. We were all busy."

"That's right," August said. "But then we're done with them and there's water on our feet, and down the boat goes, and by this time it's night, and we decided we'd wait until the morning. You see, we got their money back, but they had our dope. We figured going down in that water at night . . . Well, we didn't know how deep it was, but we knew that boat sunk like a fucking stone. We knew too, come the next day we could check it out. We marked the place and went on home. Next day the sheriff, who I might add is running for election, which means he needs a good drug bust or catching someone peddling pussy to raise his profile, came around. We got a kind of rep for things the cops don't like, so he chooses us, comes sniffing around our place with a warrant, having heard something from somebody about this or that. Thin evidence."

"But they were right," said Tom. "We were selling dope. It's bigger money than pussy. Guy gets dope, likes it, pretty soon he can't think about pussy anymore. He thinks about dope. And women, they like that dope just fine too. Like it good as anybody."

"Tom, shut up, I'm telling this. So there we were all day while the county turned over row boats, looked through this boat, searched our house and the sheds. They looked everywhere but up the dog's ass. It took them some time to do it, but they didn't find anything. All our dope was in that boat at the bottom of the river. Our family business with that goddamn family, and in a way they done us a favor. They took with them what would have gotten our dicks in a crack. We had just put it out for show, to get their money, and then they took it, and it worked out fine.

"So here were are, come to get the dope, and guess the fuck what? After all that shit with the cops, us waiting until they had their hands out of our pants, well, it's night again. We brought some good lights, some underwater lights, and we thought we might go down and get it, but decided to just stay here until morning. Then we found you two.

You're like an answer to a fucking prayer, that's what you are. You know what I'm thinking?"

"Yeah," Leonard said. "With us here, why wait until daybreak?"

"Now you got it. You know, you're a pretty smart nigger."

"I'll tell my teachers," Leonard said.

"What's it look like, Jaret?" August asked, and now we knew the other guy's name.

"Like water," Jaret said.

"Come on, goddamnit," August said.

"It ain't as muddy as a bit ago," Jaret said. "It ain't clear, but it ain't all that muddy either."

"So you're going to send us down there to get something out of a boat we can't even see?" Leonard said.

Tom looked out at the water. "It's stopped raining and the water is running fast. My guess is it'll clear up some more in an hour or so."

August studied us. "Well, boys, you got some time to sit there and think. You want to pulls your dicks, or one another's dick, then now's the time."

He laughed at his own joke.

I studied the man with the gun. He was our main worry, but those other two were big guys, especially August, and from the looks of them, they'd been in a few brawls.

We kept sitting, and August kept talking. He was like a chatter box on speed. He just wouldn't shut up. And then I got it. He was on speed.

August talked about himself. He talked about his family, and during the conversation it was made certain that those two guys were his brothers. He talked about his old man, and how he was working under a car on a creeper, just his legs sticking out, and how he had gotten killed when the jack holding up the car slipped and the car dropped and crushed him. Tom laughed when August told that story. It got funnier for Tom when August talked about the reason the jack slipped. August said he kicked the jack loose holding up the car and when it fell on his father it made a squishing sound and shit ran out of his father's pants leg. Then there was a pool of piss and blood that oozed out from under the car along with the shit.

"Ah hell, we don't know you actually kicked that jack," Jaret said. "It could have slipped."

"I kicked it," said August.

"If you say so," said Jaret. "I don't think you have the balls for that."

"You think what you want," August said.

This bothered August enough for him to go quiet for a while, but alas, it didn't last. He started talking again.

"Old man disrespected our mother once too often," August said. "I had to take him out. Also, he beat our asses all the time. Mine especially. I think he liked how that belt sounded against my back or upside my head. I got a scar over my right ear where he hit me with the buckle. Had more light, I'd show it to you."

"I don't care to see your scars," Leonard said.

August by now was ignoring Leonard. He had stories to tell and he was going to tell them if we were interested or not. He told us about a calf he used to get behind, climb up on a stump, and fuck. He talked about that calf like it was a long lost girlfriend. I kept thinking a prom story would come up next. He told how the calf became a cow and he had to take a step stool out to the pasture to fuck it after a time because its ass got tall. Told us how once when he was laying the meat into it, his words, the cow shit and filled his pants, and how this happened one morning right before school and the school bus was coming, and there he was with pants full of shit.

He seemed to think that was a natural and funny thing.

Later, he and the family ate the girlfriend.

"Old man, before he was crushed, of course," August said, as if we might not put that together, "used to say you got to break them calves in early on account of once the bull gets to them they get stretched out like sweat pants."

And so it went. We learned everything about August but his shoe size, and I think that was coming, but Jaret said, "It's pretty clear now. With a light, I think they can see what they're doing."

"Yeah," Tom said. "We got some divers' masks in there and you can wear them. We were going to."

"You still can," Leonard said.

"No," Tom said, "we got you. You drown or a gator eats you or a snake bites you, it don't mean shit to us. But if we drown, that means a big shit."

"Not to us," Leonard said.

"I figure that's right," said Tom

"But no diver's gear other than a mask?" I said, as if I had any idea how to use diver's gear, but the idea of air tanks was appealing.

"The masks," said Tom. "That's it. Hope you can hold your breath good."

"Let me get this straight," Leonard said. "We go down there and get your dope, come back up, you're going to let us go?"

"Sure," August said.

"I don't know that I believe that," Leonard said.

"It don't matter what you believe," August said. "We plan to kill you, at least this way you got a little longer to stay alive, and you come up with our goods, who the fuck knows? Might feel happy enough to let you go. If not, well, you had a refreshing swim, didn't you?"

They washed the masks in the water so they would stick to our faces better and gave them to us. We put them on and went over and stood by the side of the boat like they said. We took off our clothes, like they said, stripped down to our shorts. We stood near naked in the chill night air and the harsh light that August was pointing at us.

"Here's what you do," Tom said. "You swim down there, and you go in the cabin, where the bodies are, and you look to the right, and there's a built-in wall chest there. They had the dope there, and we left it there while we did what we did with them, and then the goddamn boat sunk. You get it out of that and bring it up. Probably take both of you. Swim it up and give it to us and we'll let you go. You don't even have to get back in the boat. We'll let you swim off."

"And take this with you," August said.

He went inside the cabin and came out with a big handheld underwater light. "Use this, you can see better."

He handed me the light.

"And if it's too muddy to see even with the light?" Leonard said.

"You better hope you can feel your way, because you come up without that dope, we're going to shoot a hole in you."

"They might have to go down a couple times, find it, come back for a breath and get it," Jaret said. "We could tie a rope off here, let them take it down and tie it to the boat. That would give them a line to follow when they come up, make things quicker and easier."

"Guess that's right," August said, and rubbed under his nose. "So, okay. You get to come up once, maybe twice, but third time better be the fucking charm, or just stay down there and drown."

August looped one end of the rope through the boat's railing and gave the length of rope to Leonard.

I glanced at Leonard. He gave me a smile thin as the edge of a switchblade.

We took deep breaths and went over the side.

It was like being inside a cloud, the mud was so thick, but we kept swimming down, close together because I had the light. Finally we swam under the mud and it was a lot clearer. Not like it had been before when we first found them, but you could make out things pretty good.

Something heavy bumped into me, and I twisted away from it, and even in the grimy underwater light, I could see it was the child. He had come free of the open cabin door and was floating about in the river. It was eerie seeing him swirling around there, and the water kept shoving him at me, and when he touched me it felt like rubber. I pushed the little body away from me and that's when Leonard grabbed my shoulder.

I turned and looked at him. He was right in front of my face. He raised his hand and pointed down. I got it together and shined the light down and swam after the beam. Below we saw the boat, the cabin rising up, and the grasses and vines on the bottom of the river were swirling around. It wasn't like when we were down there in daytime. It was like an underwater haunted house.

The river was running fast and it was hard to swim in it, but it was easier the lower we got, another couple of feet down and it was totally different, calm almost. I was glad we got to the boat, but I was starting to lose my breath and knew I had to pop up pretty soon.

Leonard looked as if he was doing okay. He tied his end of the rope off on the boat's railing, and then he was swimming inside the cabin, and I swam after him. The man and woman were twisting about in the murky light, bumping against one another and against the walls and the glass of the cabin, like they were doing some kind of macabre dance.

It was all I could do to not focus on them.

We found the built-in chest, and Leonard tugged at it, but it was staying in place. I went over and hung the light on a wall hook for jackets. The light shone down on the chest. I helped Leonard tug at it. We fought at it, trying to open it for a while, and then I patted him on the shoulder and pointed up.

Leonard nodded.

I took the light off the hook, went out of the cabin, and started following the rope up. When we broke the surface, all three of them were leaning over looking at us. I let the line shine in their eyes a moment until one of them cursed, and then I pulled it away from them and held onto it. I pushed my mask up.

"Well, where the fuck is it?" August said.

"Still down there," I said.

"Why is that?"

"Because we ran out of breath, and opening the chest underwater isn't that easy."

"That sounds like a personal problem," Tom said.

"Be that as it may, it's fastened tight," I said.

"We need a hatchet, or a knife, or something to pry up the chest, or break it open," Leonard said.

"Why would I give you assholes a hatchet?" August said.

"I just told you," Leonard said.

"Hell, give it to them," Jaret said. "Tom's got the rifle."

August stood there looking at us hanging on the rope, then went away and came back with a machete that had a little leather loop for hanging on the wrist or on a belt. It was in a green, canvas scabbard, and he pulled it out of the scabbard and handed it to Leonard.

"Take this, and goddamn it, don't cut the cooler open. Don't break it apart or the water will ruin it."

"Got it," I said.

"It gets ruined, you get shot," August said.

"We might need to come up once more for air," Leonard said. "It takes it out of you. The current is strong and it wears you out to tug on that goddamn chest lid."

"You come up a third time and you don't have that chest," August said, "I shoot you, and we wait until morning and clear water and get it ourselves."

Tom pointed the rifle at us. "I'm thinking one of you, with a little work, could pull that chest up. I don't like there's two of you out there."

"It takes two," Leonard said. "Listen fellows, all we want to do is swim down and get it and bring it up so you can let us go."

Tom pulled a face, said, "Alright. Get on with it."

Down we went again, this time following the rope Leonard had fastened, me with the light and Leonard with the machete. It was a lot quicker using the rope as a guide, pulling ourselves down it instead of swimming all the way.

We got to the boat and with a lot of work we worked the wall chest open, and there was the ice chest inside, wrapped up in duct tape. First thing Leonard did was he took the machete and cut the tape loose with a few slices, and then he got the lid open by prying it with the machete, and then he stabbed into the wrapped bags inside. The dope came out in a white cloud, and I figured fish would be dying, or a week from now begging another hit. Water moccasins would be swimming in formation, conducting a water ballet. I pushed back from the stuff. It all went up to the top of the cabin and floated there, then slowly the cloud spread and it eased out of the open doorway as if it were a living thing.

Leonard let the machete dangle off his wrist by the thong, and then we swam out of the cabin, Leonard taking the lead. We kept swimming close to the bottom, kept at it until I thought my lungs would burst and I was starting to feel dizzy. Leonard got up close to me and took the light from me and pointed it and we swam where he pointed the beam. Finally we started rising up because we needed air. As we rose through a cloud of silt, Leonard cut the light and let go of it. I felt it bump my leg as it went down.

Sudden loss of the light turned the river black as compost, but we kept rising up, and then there was a pattern in the water made by moonlight and tree shadow. It was like a camouflage netting had been tossed over the surface of the river. We broke the water lightly, just our heads above it, pushed our masks up, and looked back. We could see the boat sitting in its spot, the three dumb asses leaning over the side, looking down. The boat lights gave us a view of the heroin rising to the surface in a white foam all around the boat, and then the foam subsided and the river began to darken again.

I heard August scream, “Goddamn it.”

I was hoping they thought we had drowned, dropped the ice chest and it had busted open. Leonard touched my shoulder, nodded toward the riverbank.

We swam as silently as we could and came to a series of old stumps in the water. The land and its dead tree stumps had been claimed by the river over time, but it was shallow there, and as we made our way to shore it was hard to be silent. I expected them to hear us splashing about and bullets would crash into us before we made the riverbank.

The clouds were gone now and the moon was bright. Tendrils of light twisted in through the trees like silver gauze. With our skin still wet it was cool out of the water, and though it was not a winter night, there was a breeze, and it was steady. We worked our way deeper into the tree line.

My feet hurt from all the pokes it got from forest debris, and I figured what might be an end to a perfect night was to be snake bit or scorpion stung, if not shot in the back of the head, but we managed to finally get deep into the trees. The wind was less cool there. We tossed the face masks and started moving more quickly. Once we surprised a possum. It hissed and made me jump three feet back, but it rustled into the greenery and out of sight, looking there in the mottled moonlight like a giant rat.

We stopped to whisper to one another for a while, figuring what to do next, decided we would find a spot in the trees where we could see the river and their boat. When we made that spot, we saw Tom hand his rifle to August, and then he started taking his clothes off. He stripped completely naked and eased over the side where the rope was, and then we couldn't see him anymore.

Squatting there in the woods, looking through gaps in low-hanging limbs and splits in thick-leafed brush, a lot of time passed. We trembled in the cool breeze. It was obvious August and Jaret were starting to get worried. They paced the deck. Finally, Jaret stripped down and went over the side.

I don't know how much time passed, couple of minutes maybe, before Jaret came up. His head rose over the edge of the boat as he pulled himself inside, then he and August started pulling on the rope. After some time they bent down over the side and hoisted Tom's body into the boat. It flopped on the deck like a big, white fish.

I got it then. Tom had gone down to see if there was some dope to be saved. He followed the rope, but we had the big light, and he got confused, trapped in the cabin and couldn't get out. Something like that. Jaret had groped around down there and found him and found the rope again, unfastened it and tied Tom's body to it, and came up by the rope. Then he and August had pulled Tom up.

There came a sob so loud and sad from August, that even under the circumstances I felt his pain. Jaret kept saying over and over, "Those goddamn bastards. Goddamn it. We should have shot them soon as we seen them."

Leonard said, "Ha, the fucker drowned."

I was learning Leonard was short on sympathy for assholes.

They were there for a while, crying and bawling like children, and all that did was make Leonard snicker. I on the other hand felt damn bad about it, but wasn't sure why. They would have killed us as easily as looking at us if we had brought that dope chest up. Maybe even tortured us like they did the family, just because they could. All in all, we had turned out alright, not dead, not in the depths of the river with bottles stuck up our asses.

I don't know how long we shivered there, but eventually August went inside the cabin with Jaret. The boat motor fired up, lights came on, and the boat made a loop in the river and started back the way it came.

We eased down to our camp site then, got spare clothes out of our packs and got dressed. Neither of us had spare shoes. The only way back to Marvel Creek was by river, and that meant we had to go the way they had gone.

I don’t know how long we waited, but it was a long time. We didn’t want to wait until daylight, because if we came upon them they would be sure to see us, but we were hoping to give them enough time to get off the river and pass wherever they were in the night. From the way they talked, they lived right along the bank.

Leonard had me hold the flashlight while he took the little tool kit he had, and slipped the motor cover off. He messed with it awhile, but couldn’t do anything with it. If we went back to Marvel Creek we’d be paddling up river for hours, and I wasn’t sure we could do it, fight the current all night. And still there was that whole thing about maybe being seen passing wherever they lived. Hell, they might even be looking for us.

We put our supplies back in the boat, slid the boat down to the river. The river carried us along with its flow, away from the way we had come, and we let it, using our paddles to speed up the process. It was a safer way to go, but it was going to be a while before we came to any place that was worth stopping.

Day eased away the night, and the water lit up with sunrise and was rust-colored, then within minutes, it turned dark brown. The air was cool with wind for a while, but it wasn’t long before it turned still and hot. We paddled onward.

There were fishing camps along the way, but we didn’t stop to talk to anyone there, as we couldn’t be certain who those three knew along the river. At some point someone took a shot at us, and we paddled really hard. No more shots came.

Eventually we came to a clearing off to our left, and we paddled for that, pulled the boat on shore, then sat back down in it to rest. We hadn’t been there long when we heard an engine groaning, and all of a sudden a black pickup barreled up beside us. It was going so fast I thought it would go into the river, but it didn’t. The truck braked and the doors slammed and two young men got out. I thought, okay, now what the fuck?

They came down and saw us sitting there in the boat.

“You have to put it in the water, you want to go anywhere,” said one of the boys. He was blond and stocky and had a little bit of blond fuzz on his chin that looked so thin you got the impression he could have wiped it off with a rag. The other was a darker-haired boy with a five o’clock shadow at the break of day.

“We’ve just stopped for a while,” I said.

The blond boy nodded. “Fishing?”

“Have been,” Leonard said. “Didn’t catch a thing.”

“You ain’t got no shoes?” said the dark-haired boy.

“We just ain’t wearing any,” Leonard said.

The dark-haired boy nodded. “I got some nigger friends” he said.

“That’s nice,” Leonard said. “I got some cracker buddies.” He pointed at me. “There’s one now.”

This made them laugh out loud. I was glad for that. I wasn’t sure they were the humorous type, but turned out they were. I had yet to determine which direction that humor could go.

The blond said, “Shit, man, I took a shot at you guys earlier.”

“Oh,” I said. “That was you?”

I thought it was about to all go south, end up with us being shot and butt-fucked while dead.

“Yeah,” said the blond. “I thought you was my brother.”

“Ah,” I said. I didn’t examine that comment any further. I merely said, “Is there a town nearby. Our boat motor played out, and we thought we might get it fixed.”

“What’s wrong with it?” the blond said.

“It don’t work,” Leonard said.

The blond laughed. “You’re a hoot. I always say, you want to laugh, hang with niggers.”

“That’s why we black folks are here, to make you laugh,” Leonard said.

The blond boy studied Leonard for a moment. “I like you.”

“I’m glad,” Leonard said.

“Let’s look at that motor,” the blond said. “Leroy, look at the fucker.” Then to us, “Leroy could fix the dead Jesus.”

Leroy went back to the pickup, leaned into the bed and pulled out a tool box. We got out of the boat and he got in. He popped the sheath off the motor and pottered around a bit, poking it with a screw driver, and after a while he popped it with a hammer a bit, then took a wrench to it. Within fifteen minutes he had pulled the rope out of where it had disappeared, and he managed to get enough of it to go back through the gap in the sheath after he put that back on. He tied the end of the rope over the handle of the hammer, and let that clamp up against the gap. Then he used the bit of rope with the pull handle lying in the boat to fasten it back together with the rope he had saved, freeing his hammer and making a big knot so it wouldn’t slip back through the gap.

“You ain’t got as much pull room,” said the dark-haired boy, “but it ought to go now.”

“Thanks,” I said. “I haven’t got any money to give you, but if you want my fishing tackle, you can have that.”

“Naw,” said the blond boy. “You’ll need that. We don’t fish much anyway. We come down here to shoot turtles mostly. We can help you push the boat in the water, you’re ready to go.”

“We are,” I said.

They helped us get the boat back in the water, and as we were climbing in, the dark-haired boy said, "You fellows want a beer? We got some cold ones."

"I'm going to pass," I said.

"Sure," Leonard said. "I'll have a beer, and I wouldn't fight you off if you offered me a pretzel."

The blond laughed. "You niggers are funny."

"What we black folk tell ourselves all the time," Leonard said.

"Y'all really do that?" said the blond boy.

"Naw," Leonard said. "I'm just fucking with you."

That made both boys laugh. The dark-haired one brought Leonard a beer from the truck, handed it to him without him having to get out of the boat. I used my paddle to push off.

"Thanks again," I said.

"Sure," said the blond.

"Don't shoot at us no more," I said.

"Naw. I thought I was fucking with my brother."

Leonard pulled the rope on the motor and the motor caught and away we went.

Eventually we turned the boat around and headed to Marvel Creek. We weren't as scared with a motor to speed us on. Nobody shot at us again, and we didn't see August and Jaret. When we got back to Leonard's truck and fastened the boat on the boat rack, I used the pay phone outside the feed store to call the cops. I told them about what we had found. I told them about August, Jaret, and Tom. I told them about the bodies in the boat and about the dope. I gave them a kind of overview of all that had happened, and did my best to indicate where the sunken boat was. I didn't give our names. I didn't want to be pulled into it. I didn't trust how the law would take our presence. They might think we were a part of the whole thing.

We went home after that, and the next day I read in the local paper how the Robbie family, which was the first time I'd heard their last name, had been arrested for murder, and how the law found Tom's body on their property. They were digging a hole out behind the house to bury him when the law came up with a search warrant. Eventually the Robbie boys, perhaps with the persuasion of rubber hoses and phone books upside the head, admitted they had killed the family, and showed the law where the sunken boat was. Of course, there was no more dope. The man's and the woman's bodies were claimed, but they didn't find the child.

About a week before Christmas I read in the paper that the kid's remains were found caught up in some stumps and brush. There wasn't much left of him by then, of course, but it was the child alright.

The little black mammy figurine, which was about the size of a chest piece, quit being one of Leonard's fishing sinkers. He fastened it to his key chain, and when he gets a new ride, he always moves the figurine to his latest set of keys.

Sometimes, I lay down at night, and there, in the dark of my dreams, swirling around and around, is that poor unfortunate child, his head blown apart. It's a dream that's been with me so long, I can from time to time wish him back into a swirling cloud of shadow, push him and the knowledge of what some people can do to others, far away from me.

Stopping for Coffee

We finished up out at Marvel Creek and tooled back to my house. Brett and Chance and Buffy were home. The car was parked in its spot in the car port.

When we came in Brett was at the table playing checkers with Chance. Our shepard, Buffy, was lying under the table, her head on Chance's foot.

"Who's winning?"

"Brett is," Chance said. "I thought I had her a couple of times, but she blindsided me."

"She cheats a little," I said.

"Do not," Brett said, lifting her head so quick her thick mane of red hair snapped up and the clasp on it came loose and her hair cascaded over her shoulders like a fiery water fall. "Now look what you made me do."

"This," Leonard said, "is when you grab a checker, when she's picking up a hair tie, or push one closer."

"Not likely," Brett said. "I memorize the board."

"She does, you know," Chance said.

Chance, my daughter, was just the opposite of Brett. She was dark-skinned, with dark-eyes and hair as deeply dark as the bottom of a coal mine. They were both lovely. They were both wearing footy pajamas and had cups of hot chocolate near the board.

"How was the club?"

"Kasey was good," Chance said. "We hung out a little after she got off stage. I got my CD signed. The food there was lousy."

"How was Buffy?" I said.

"She was okay. I think toward the end she just wanted a place to crap and then lie down," Brett said. "The noise and the crowd made her nervous."

"Were there a lot of dogs?" Leonard said.

"A few. It doesn't work as well as you might think. The dogs get nervous with all the noise. I give it another six months, and then that place closes."

"Is there any more hot chocolate?" I said.

"If you make it," Brett said.

"Oh," I said.

"Vanilla cookies?" Leonard asked.

"Nope," Brett said.

"Animal crackers, though," Chance said. "In the cabinet by the sink."

I opened the cabinet and got out a large canister of animal crackers. My mouth was already watering.

"Those would be nice with chocolate," Leonard said. "I mean, if any was made."

"Wouldn't they?" I said. "Oh, okay. I'll make us some. But stay out of the animal crackers until I do."

I heated up some chocolate and poured us cups and we sat at the table with the ladies. They had wrapped up their game and Brett was folding up the checker board and gathering up the checkers and slipping them into the box.

"So, you boys been playing?" Brett said.

"Some," I said. "We punched each other and rode around for a while."

"Did you and Leonard do this when you were kids?" Chance said. "Drink chocolate and eat animal crackers?"

"We didn't meet until we were seventeen," I said. "And had we met before then, might not have been so easy to hang out."

"Oh, yeah, of course," Chance said. "I forgot. My history is shorter. How bad was it then?" she asked.

"Darling," Leonard said. "You don't want to know."

"I don't know things are all that better," Brett said.

"Oh hell, sure they are," Leonard said. "They got a ways to go, but they are nothing like they used to be. Let me tell you, those times blew. Me and Hap grew up in a racist, mean-spirited time, and I have never been one to say race has held me back, nor has being a homo, but it was worse then, at least in those respects."

"Still a lot underground, though," I said.

"Shit," Brett said. "It's not all that underground. Last few years, they're surfacing like dead bodies floating up. It's actually the change that's scaring the mean-spirited. The idea that it won't be like it used to be, even if it was never like they think it was, drives them crazy."

"On the same page," I said.

"Yeah, you're right," Leonard said. "But now I get to go in a store and buy a Coke and not have people looking at me. I can sit down in a restaurant and eat. I was a boy, couldn't do that. Neither could my uncle, and he wasn't happy about it. He caused a few scenes. Amazing he lived long as he did. He bucked that system. Being a homo wasn't all that easy for me either. For the dumb asses, being gay was the same as being a child molester. Didn't matter that child molesters come from both sides of the fence, you got labeled that, like all we did was hang around bus stop restrooms waiting to snatch a child and carry them into a stall in the toilet. I pushed forward no matter what. I think it made me stronger, it being like that and me going up against it."

"I think it was an unnecessary barrier and a burden," I said. "But you're right. It was worse, though if some people have their way, it'll go back to the dark ages."

"Sounds horrible," Chance said.

"Give Chance a history lesson," Leonard said. "Tell her about the café."

It was something Leonard knew about, but neither Brett nor Chance did. I didn't like talking about it. Didn't like thinking about it. But . . .

"Yeah," I said, "you ought to know. Ought to understand how things were, how they've changed, and how we don't want them to slip back into that old groove. Not in any kind of way."

Chance gained a serious look. "What happened, Daddy?"

On that afternoon I was out driving. I was sixteen and had owned my license for only a short time. I was going from LaBorde to Tyler, not for any reason, but just because I could. I had tried to find someone to ride with me, a girl hopefully, but I hadn't had any luck, so I went on my own.

It was a nice day at first, but then it got cloudy and started to rain. I hadn't planned to stop at the café, but the rain seemed to have come out of nowhere and it was very serious. By the time I reached No Enterprise, a place about a third of the way between LaBorde and Tyler, the wipers on my '64 Chevy Impala were working hard and accomplishing little. The ditches and gullies in the town were rolling with water and the water was flooding over them and into the street. I could barely see what was in front of me. I did manage to see some lights through the rain, off to the left, and when I felt I could safely cross the road, I did, and pulled in where the lights were. It was a café.

I decided to wait out the rain. I sat in the car to do it, and then I thought, well, if I'm going to wait I might as well go inside and have some coffee. The idea of being able to go inside and do that somehow made me feel like an adult. I had never really done that before, driven along by myself and stopped somewhere to have coffee on my own. It sounds like a little thing, but right then I thought it was a swell and amazing idea.

Jumping out of the car, I ran inside, shedding water and wiping my feet at the door. The place smelled of hamburgers, the way they only could smell back then when I was a kid and they were cooked on old black grills that were never truly cleaned by anything other than heat and scraping off the grease with a spatula.

I went in and sat down at a booth on the side and waited for my waitress. There were three older men sitting at a table, and two guys I judged to be in their thirties at a booth near the kitchen.

The waitress, an older woman with a slight limp and badly dyed hair that made it look blue, came over and asked me what I wanted. I told her coffee, but by then I had added a hamburger to the order and some French fries. Those burgers cooking really smelled good.

"I think they should bomb the whole country and come home," said one of the older men at his table. He was talking loud and so were the men with him. "Bunch of yellow niggers is all they are, ought to bomb the whole damn country into sticks and mud holes, is what I think."

"We just fought them yellow savages, didn't we. Goddamn Japs," said one of the other men. He was a fat little guy with a face like a jack-o-lantern.

"Well, it's been a while since then," said the third man at the table. He wore glasses and had on a business suit. The other two were wearing khaki shirts and pants and work boots, and had their hats hanging on the tops of their chairs. The suited man had his hat in a chair beside him. It was a very nice fedora.

"They're still Japs," said the man who had been talking the most. "I say the only good Jap is a dead Jap."

"Actually, they're Vietnamese," said the man in the suit.

"You can call them Siamese or Vietnamese, Chinese, or whatever, but they're all slopes to me."

"China was on our side during the war," the well-dressed man said.

"I don't give a shit," said the loud man. "I don't give a good goddamn one way or another."

"There are women in here," said the waitress from behind the counter where she was standing and eating potato chips out of a bag. "Watch your language and taking the Lord's name in vain."

"What ladies?" said the loudmouth.

"Me, Charles. Me. I'm a lady."

This revelation appeared to startle the loudmouth.

"Yeah, well, sorry, Louise. I got a bit het up."

"Yes you did," she said.

I glanced at the younger men in the booth. They had been talking when I came in, but now they were merely sitting quietly, eating hamburgers and drinking Co-colas out of the bottle.

Right then, a sharp-dressed black man came out of the kitchen and partway into the café. He looked about thirty, in good shape, with his hair cut close to his head. He was holding open the kitchen door, which was on a spring.

"I don't mean to bother," he said, "but we been waiting a long time."

"You got to go back to your place," Louise said. "You got a place back there. You know that."

"I'm just saying we been waiting a long time, and I don't think the cook has even started ours."

"He may not have. We serve white people first. You don't like it, you go on down the road a piece. You might find something there."

"I was just checking," he said.

"You ought not come through the kitchen like that. You go on back now."

The black man seemed to let his thoughts linger in front of him for a moment, and then he went back into the kitchen letting the swinging door swing shut on its spring.

"Damn niggers," Louise said. "They been listening too much to that Martin Luther Coon."

"It's alright if a woman says damn, but I can't say what I said," the loudmouth said.

"It's my place. I can say what I want, and I can serve who I want, and I'm thinking I might not serve those niggers at all. And I didn't use the Lord's name in vain."

She let her face crease, and then she let it un-crease and came around to my table with more coffee. She poured my cup full.

"You doing okay, Sugar?"

"I am," I said. "You want to feed that man first, I'm in no hurry."

"Niggers wait their turn," she said.

"Isn't it his turn?"

"It's his turn when I say it is," she said. "Don't go feeling sorry for niggers. You do, next thing you know they're up on your porch and trying to get their nose in your house. You can't be good to them, they take advantage."

She went around to the table with the older men and filled their coffee cups. They were talking about something or another, but I had tuned them out by then. I kept thinking about that poor man waiting on his food out back and the waitress and the cook not getting it fixed for him.

While I was waiting, Louise went behind the counter and the black man came back through the swinging doors. He said, "Really, we just need three hamburgers and some chips, some Co-colas. We been waiting near an hour."

"Didn't I tell you not to come through the kitchen," Louise said.

"Colored got the porch out there."

"The screened porch with the holes in the screen that flies come through?" said the black man. I could tell he was starting to lose patience.

"You can't come through the kitchen," Louise said.

"There's a black cook in there, he comes through the kitchen."

"When he goes home, he goes out the back way. I ain't going to ask you again. You go on now. Fact is, you pack that nigger family of yours up and get on down the road."

The black man stood there. He was holding the swinging door. "Let me buy some chips and some Cocolas and we'll go on."

"You'll go on, and without chips or Co-colas," Louise said.

The one called Charles, the loudmouth, got up and came to the edge of the counter where it was open and you could go behind it. He was looking right at the black man. He said, "In my day we tarred and feathered smart niggers."

"Your day is still here," the black man said.

This made the older man turn red.

"Yeah," he said, "it is, and sometimes niggers come to the wrong places and talk the wrong kind of talk."

"I'm talking alright," said the black man.

The other khaki dressed man at Charles' table stood up and came over to stand by the loudmouth.

The older man in the suit didn't move from the table. He said, "Hey, it's alright. Just go on back and wait. They'll get you those burgers."

"No we won't," Louise said. "Get on down the road, coon."

"Look, we been traveling all night. We been traveling a few days now, all the way from New Jersey. We got family in LaBorde. We just want something to eat."

"You can get it somewhere else," Louise said.

"You heard," said Charles the loudmouth.

"I fought for my country," the black man said. "I was in Korea."

This jumped out of his mouth as if it had been hiding behind his teeth, waiting to pounce.

"I was in Korea too." It was one of the younger men at the other booth. They had been so quiet, I had almost forgotten they were there. "Hell, lady, give the man some chips and some Co-colas."

"I'm not doing that." She reached under the counter and pulled out a sawed-off baseball bat and shook it at the black man.

"I was in Chosen Reservoir, so that bat doesn't scare me," said the black man.

"Give me the bat," said the loudmouth. "I can scare him with it."

The black man didn't move. He stood there holding the door to the kitchen open.

"That's enough," said the younger man, and he got up and went over and reached over the counter and snatched the bat from Louise. He tossed it to his buddy in the booth. His buddy caught it, stood up and leaned against the wall by the booth and held the bat against his leg.

"We're done with this stuff," said the younger man. He pulled half a dozen chips loose from the rack and walked past the old man, went behind the counter, and gave them to the black man at the door. He went over and got four Co-colas out of the Coke box, opened them with the opener in the box, walked over to the black man with them, holding the drinks between the fingers of his two hands.

"You better not do that," said Charles the loudmouth.

"Stop me," said the younger man.

Charles did nothing. He remained where he was and boiled.

The black man put the sodas between his fingers, pressing them in tight against the rims of the drinks. He had the bags of chips pinched between his thumbs and fore fingers. Both hands were full of all he was going to get that day in that café.

The younger man said, "You ought to go on now."

"Thank you," said the black man.

"I was at Chosen," said the younger man.

"It was hell," said the black man.

"It was more than hell. Now go on. I've done what I can."

The black man went through the kitchen and disappeared with the door swinging shut behind him.

The young man pulled out his wallet and put some bills on the counter, went around it and back to where he had been eating.

"You ought to go on," Louise said. "We don't know you two, and you ought to go on."

"You heard the lady," Charles said.

"Now she's a lady," the other young man said. It was the first time he had spoken.

Their hamburgers were only partially eaten. The young man who had given the black man the food put some bills on the table and he and his buddy started for the door.

"Nigger lover," said the loudmouth.

"It's alright," said the man in the suit. "You boys are alright. But go on now."

"They ain't alright," said the other man in khakis. "Nigger lovers. Not a damn thing worse. I hate them more than the niggers. Nigger is what he is, but you boys are what you are by choice. One's scum by birth, but you two are the way you want to be."

The young man with the bat dropped it on the floor and he and his companion went out together. There was a window at my booth. I looked out of it. I watched them drive away in a shiny brown Buick.

Louise went to the phone on the wall and dialed someone and spoke soft and I didn't hear it. I could tell she was mad though.

"Tell them they probably took the main road," said Charles. "I doubt that coon is smart enough to keep out of sight, and them other two, they don't figure how bad they've stepped in it. Goddamn niggers. Goddamn nigger lovers."

"Don't call anyone, Louise," the older man in the suit said. "Don't do that. It's not worth it for some chips and Co-colas. That fellow paid you."

"You're sounding like a nigger lover yourself," Charles said. "Don't come around here no more."

"You don't own this café," the man in the suit said.

"But I do," Louise said. "Don't come around anymore. Eat somewhere else. I can't abide a nigger lover."

The older man in the suit got up and opened his wallet and put bills on the table. He was trembling. He put on his hat and went out.

I put money on the table for what I would have eaten, and went on out behind him. I watched the man in the suit walk toward his car. I walked over to him.

"Who would they call?" I said.

"It's best not to know," he said. "It's even best not to think about it."

He got in his car and slammed the door and drove off.

I got in mine and did the same. I tooled on toward Tyler, but after about twenty minutes I turned around and headed home. The air had gone out of my adventure.

I stopped for gas when I came back through No Enterprise, and when I got on down the road, I passed the car the two young men had been in. Their brown Buick was partially off the road and both the front doors were open, but I didn't see them anywhere.

Apollo Red

"Alright, let me ask this?" Leonard said. "Would your father have stood up for that black man in the café?

"Probably not," I said. "He may have been too much of his time. I hate to say that, but that might be the truth."

"I don't know," Leonard said. "He seems to me to have been a pretty straight shooter."

"In most ways I think he was, but when it came to race, I can't say completely. I mean, yeah, he had his moments. He used to do a lot of things to help black people. I think when it was just him and them, he could be kind and generous. I think the whole thing with whites looking on, well, maybe he could go the other way."

"He was brave, though, and that often says something about a man."

"Bad people can be brave, Leonard. Not that I think he was bad. But, hey, he was brave."

"I know the stories," Leonard said.

"Tell me one, Daddy," Chance said.

I looked at Brett. She was holding her face up with a hand under her chin and an elbow on the table. She had heard all these stories.

"Okay," I said. "There's the one about a guy I call Apollo Red."

"Oh, I love this one," Leonard said.

"Even I feel a bit more alert," Brett said. "I like this one too. And just for the record, I know more stories than I'm going to let you tell about your dad tonight, but I want to put my two cents in and say he has always sounded like a hell of a man to me."

"I guess he was," I said. "He was my hero, flaws and all."

"Tell the story, Daddy."

Summer this happened, I must have been about seventeen, give or take a few months. I was down at the garage with my dad. He was washing tools in gasoline, cleaning them up, getting ready for me and him to drive to the café and get some lunch, though in that day and time we called the noon meal dinner, and the later meal supper. Yankees had lunch. We had dinner.

Dad was always greasy because he always worked. He cleaned up when he was home, but he was the kind of guy that could put on freshly cleaned and ironed khakis, and within an hour at the garage, look as if he had been living inside an oil drum. He worked hard and was good at it. He could fix any kind of car and make it hum. Odd thing was, we always drove junk. I guess it's like the barber who needs a haircut, the dentist who needs his teeth cleaned, the carpenter whose porch is sagging. Dad spent his time working on other people's cars, trying to put food on the table and a roof over our heads.

When he was eight his mother died, and his fondest memory of her was that once for Christmas she had given him an orange and a peppermint stick. He talked about it like it had happened yesterday, like the gift was as important as a new car. For him it was.

His father was a mean-spirited jackass that made Dad work in the cotton fields when he was eight. At that time and place this was acceptable behavior. Once, on the way to the fields, Dad fell off the pinto pony he rode and busted his ear drum. He rode the horse back home, hanging on its back, limp as a blanket.

His father took a horse whip to him, sent him back to work with blood running out of his ear. You'd think with an upbringing like that Dad would have passed it down the line, but he didn't. I never got one whipping, spanking, whatever you want to call it. And I'll tell you, I'm not altogether opposed to a slap on the ass over doing something that is going to get you killed, but that's a far cry from a beating. I never got either from him, though my mother once took a flyswatter to me for something I well deserved. It embarrassed me more than it hurt me.

For a poor kid I was what they called spoiled in those days, and what my mother called loved. Spoiled was going to work at fifteen instead of eight. At the time this happened I was working a night shift at Imperial Aluminum and going to school during the day, but this was the summer, so I was free until three thirty. I got off at midnight. If there were child labor laws against that, neither the boys I worked with or the aluminum chair company we worked for was aware of it.

So there I was, waiting on Dad to clean up a bit, and this guy comes driving up in this shiny gold Cadillac with a golden swan ornament on the hood, kind that was made mostly of plastic. When you turned on the lights the swan lit up. Coming down the road at night you saw the headlights, and dead center of the hood, a golden swan floating across the night, seemingly pulling the car along with stiff-winged elegance. During the day it was just a gold-plastic bird with a wire and a bulb inside of it.

The Caddy drove up as we were about to leave, and this raw-boned, redheaded guy with his short shirt sleeves rolled up to display his sizable biceps, got out. His hair was well oiled and slicked back on the sides and he had a bit of a duck tail in the back. He looked as if he were wearing a copper helmet.

He got out and stuck a cigarette in his mouth, walked about halfway up to the wide open garage doors, paused, lit his smoke carefully with a gold lighter, doing it for dramatic effect, like he was posing for a photo, and then he snapped the lighter closed with a metallic clap, stuffed it in his tight pants pocket, and strutted into the garage, his black boots with red explosions on the toe flashing before him. The toes on those things were so long and pointed he could have kicked a cockroach to death in a corner.

The man kind of glowed. It was as if a white trash Apollo had descended from heaven in his golden chariot, down from the sun to get his oil checked, have a chicken-fried steak with white gravy, and screw a mortal before ascending back to the heavens. In my mind I nicknamed him Apollo Red.

There was a lemon-colored Buick parked inside the garage, and it was the car my father had been working on that morning. Dad was drying his hands on a shop rag when this guy swaggered in, leaned a large hand on the Buick, said, “This car fixed yet?”

Dad studied Apollo Red the way a snake studies a frog.

“Yep,” Dad said.

“My girlfriend’s got to have it.”

“Alright,” Dad said. And he told the guy what the charge was.

“She’ll have to owe you,” said Apollo Red.

“Owes me for the last time I fixed it.”

“You didn’t fix it good enough.”

“That was the transmission, this here was a leak in the carburetor. I rebuilt it so she don’t have to buy a new one. I saved her about thirty dollars.”

“Did, did you?”

Dad just looked at him.

The fellow strayed an eyeball my way. “That your boy?”

“Yeah,” Dad said.

“Needs a haircut.”

“Yeah, he does.”

“I’d hold him down and trim it with a pocket knife.”

I had heard this shit a million times, and sometimes it seemed a million times a day. Lot of the kids then had long hair. The girls liked it and so did I. I thought this hair remark was an odd statement coming from a man that wore his hair the way he did. Probably as long as mine, but tamed with hair oil and spray and a lot of mirror examination and a fine-toothed comb. I started to say something smart, but somehow I didn't want to get into Dad's bubble. And something about that guy made me cautious, like knowing to avoid a dark alley at night in a strange city.

"He might need it, but it won't be you cutting it, or two more just like you," Daddy said.

That caused Apollo Red to purse his lips and knit his brows. His gray eyes became slits. Apollo Red thought a moment, almost loud enough to hear his thoughts running about in his head like mice on gravel, and then he turned his attention back to Dad.

"Girlfriend needs the car. She sent me to get it. She can't pay you nothing right now, but she's good for it, and I'm going to take it."

"Naw, she ain't taking it, and neither are you," Dad said. "Shouldn't have worked on it, knowing she don't pay her bills."

"Is that right?"

"Know she works at the beauty parlor and has a long walk to work without a car. Wanted to help her out, but I need at least half what she owes me for the last job. You got that, you can take it, though how you're going to drive two cars is a puzzle."

"I'll pull it out, park it in the lot, bring her to get it when she gets off work. She needs it tonight."

"Tell her to get the money," Dad said, and he was through talking. He walked by Red toward the garage doors. The doors were two wide metal sections you pulled closed and linked with a chain that ran through a hole in the doors, then you padlocked them together. Dad was about to pull the doors when Red said, "Wait a minute, old man."

Now at this time, Dad was pushing sixty, and that was back when sixty was old. He had gained a lot of weight and was tired looking, but back in his younger days he had been a boxer and a carnival wrestler. He had a kind of strength, especially when he was younger, that was almost startling. It wasn't built-up gym stuff, it was working-man muscle, compacted and stretched and flexed by hard work from the time he was a child. He didn't look like much, but neither does a stick of dynamite.

That said, this guy was young and well formed, and he moved like a cat. Just looking at him I knew he had done bad things and wanted to do more. I could feel a crackle in the air when he talked. It's that strange feeling you get when things aren't right, a sensation of something mean and nasty on the other side of some kind of dimensional barrier, waiting to get through a slit in time and space, enter into one of us humans and ignite our most evil traits, send us flailing with fist, snapping with teeth, slashing with knives, slinging clubs and tossing rocks.

Apollo Red, obviously annoyed, came outside and put his butt to the fender of his car, said, “You ain’t going nowhere till you give me that car.”

“Going to get something to eat,” Dad said.

Apollo Red reached down and took hold of his belt with both hands and hitched it up, like maybe he was making room for a set of testicles the size of bowling balls, and said, “You ain’t going nowhere, Greasy, less’n you give me that car.”

“Soon as I lock these doors you can watch me and my boy and my greasy clothes drive away, ’cause I’m done talking to you.”

This was like tossing gasoline on a fire for Apollo Red. “Tell you what, old man, I’ll sort your shit out right now, that’s what I’ll do.”

Dad looked at him. I had seen that gaze before, and let me tell you, you had to be a fucking idiot not to know there was something feral behind those near-black eyes, and that this was a man who had seen the devil and kicked his ass. But the devil had taken his beating twenty years earlier, not of recent from an overweight, old man pushing sixty.

Apollo Red bounced himself off of the car fender, cocked his hand back as he came forward, and I thought, well, I’m stepping in. Dad’s getting old, and I better help. But even though I was no slouch when it came to fighting, I was afraid. Apollo Red wasn’t merely a smart-ass kid that wanted to tussle a bit. He was a bad man and you could sense it.

All of these thoughts came quickly, of course, and as I prepared to jump into the fray, Dad lunged forward. He was standing still one moment, and in the next he was covering ground like a bullet.

And then it came. It was an impossibly fast and short uppercut, but it was still a punch from hell. Before Apollo Red’s punch could reach him, the upper cut rose, almost touching Red’s chest as it tracked toward his chin. To this day I imagine flames coming off of it, Dad was moving so fast. His shot hit while Apollo Red was still bringing his punch around. Dad’s flat fat fist caught Apollo Red solid under the chin, and it’s the only time in my life I have actually seen someone lifted that high off the ground from a punch. That loudmouth was launched like a space rocket, and the only thing missing was a monkey on board and radio contact with NASA.

The blow made a sickening sound, and that upper cut lifted him onto the fender of his car. He rolled then, caught his shirt in the flying bird hood ornament; tore it half off, and rolled onto the concrete drive. One leg started kicking, like maybe he was trying to stomp a bug in a ditch, and then Apollo Red’s head cocked back and he let out with a wheeze similar to steam hissing from a teapot. His eyes rolled up in his head like cherries in a slot machine. I almost expected him to spit coins.

And then he was still.

Corpse still.

I wouldn't have been surprised if vultures were already passing the word.

I went over, leaned down, and looked. Apollo Red's lips were blue. He may have been the sun god where he came from, but the god of lightning and thunder had just knocked the sunlight out of his ass.

I said, "Dad, I think you killed him."

Dad always carried a stub of a cigar in his shirt pocket, and as he walked over he pinched it from his pocket and poked it in his mouth. He scratched around in his pants pockets for a box of matches. When he found them, he took a match out slowly, struck it on the strike-strip on the side of the box, held the flame to that foul-smelling cigar. He shook the match and threw it down. He looked down at Red, turned his head from side to side like a curious dog, said, "Nah. He'll come around."

I wasn't so sure.

"You hit him hard, Daddy."

"Man's punch is the last thing to go."

I guess Dad might actually have been a little concerned, because we didn't go to dinner. He stood near the guy's car for a bit, then went inside and picked up a comic book. He couldn't actually read, but he was learning a bit with Western comics. He liked Billy The Kid . I helped him with the words.

"Go get us some hamburgers, Baby Man," he said.

I had anything but dinner on my mind, but in a kind of daze I drove to the café and got hamburgers, fries, couple of Cokes, and drove back.

This took about thirty minutes or so. Dad was still attempting to read his comic, moving his lips over the words he was learning. Apollo Red still hadn't moved. It had grown really hot.

Dad ate his hamburger and fries, then went back to work on a car at the rear of the garage, his head under the hood, whistling like one of the dwarves from Snow White. Apollo Red, lying on the summer-hot concrete, still had not wiggled a muscle.

I tried to eat, but couldn't. I stood and looked at Red. About an hour after he had taken a ride on the rocket from hell, he twitched.

Like the Frankenstein monster testing his nerves and muscles, starting to recognize shapes and shadows, he writhed against the concrete. His jaw on one side had swollen to about the size of an eggplant and his chin had blackened like a two-day beard. The flesh around the eye on the side of the swelling had gone black as well. There was blood at the corners of his mouth.

Apollo Red stirred a little more. He rolled to one side with no more trouble than a beached whale. He lay there for a while pulling in ultra-violet rays. Birds flew over and dropped their shadows on him. Apollo Red finally got a knee under him, but his head hung low, as if heavy. The position he was in, it looked as if he were about to attempt an impromptu head stand. A tooth fell out of his mouth. He laid back down for a while.

I looked at Dad. He was still doping out the comic book.

Another fifteen or twenty minutes passed, and then Apollo Red moved again. He went through all the formations he had managed before, but this time, when it came to the knee position, he pushed up to his feet, wobbled a bit, and then forgetting he had come by car, started slowly zig-zagging away, as if practicing evasive maneuvers against a slow-moving, heat-seeking missile.

He staggered across the street, over the dead grass next to the oil well bit shop, fell down, got up with excruciating slowness, continued to zig-zag until he stumbled out of sight behind a high stack of tires at the rear of a filling station.

I finally ate my hamburger. Dad went back to work. I sat around for another hour. I had planned to eat dinner with Dad, go home and go to work, but I decided the hell with it. I was too shook up. I walked across to the bit shop, borrowed their phone, called my boss, said I would be in late, if at all.

There was only one old man there that day, and he grinned what teeth he had at me. “I seen him hit that sucker,” he said, and pointed to a window in the side of the aluminum building to show me the exact spot where he had stood. “Damn. Bud’s still got the punch, ain’t he?”

“Yes, sir,” I said. “Appears he does.”

By the time I crossed back to the garage, a police car pulled up alongside Apollo Red’s golden chariot. There with a young policeman on the passenger side, an older hand I recognized behind the wheel. He had once pulled me in for throwing water balloons. I nodded at him, like an experienced criminal acknowledging a foe.

The one on the passenger side, the younger one, got out as Dad came wandering out of the shop. Dad leaned against the hood of Red’s car, which bore part of Red’s shirt on the broken hood ornament like some sort of surrender flag. I came over and stood by Dad.

The young cop said, “Mr. Collins. There’s been a complaint that you hit a man here.”

“Hard as I could,” Dad said.

“He has a broken jaw and is at the hospital and is a little confused.”

“He was confused when he got here,” Dad said.

The young cop nodded. “Well, sir, why’d you do it?”

“Threatened me.”

"How?"

"Tried to hit me?"

"Did he?"

"Too slow."

The young cop computed this, said, "Sir, you have to come with us downtown. There's been a complaint. His girlfriend filed it."

"I don't think so," Dad said.

"You don't think what?" said the young cop.

"I don't think I'm coming."

The older cop behind the steering wheel leaned across the seat, and said through the open door, "Bud, you really got to come."

Dad turned his head in that curious dog way. "That you, Clyde?"

"Yes, sir."

"You know me," Dad said.

"Yes, sir," Clyde said.

"You know I'm not coming."

Clyde cleared his throat. "We're supposed to bring you in."

"Folks make plans."

The young cop, feeling the drift of things, stepped back and put his hand on his gun.

Dad reached out and gently pushed me away from him.

The older cop said, "Dean. Get back in the car."

Dean stood there with his hand on the butt of his revolver. He was sweating. The cop cap on his head seemed too big all of a sudden. I noted that the distance between him and Dad was not a lot different from the distance between Dad and Apollo Red when he had leaped forward and hit him.

"Dean," Clyde said. "Get back in the car."

After a long moment, Dean uncoiled and moved his hand from the gun.

Dad had not so much as changed his expression.

Dean got back in the car and closed the door.

They drove away and never came back.

Next day, when Dad went back to work, Red's car was gone, and about two weeks later the woman who owned the Buick came in and paid him all she owed, saying only, "How much?"

I was there that day, having dropped by to go to dinner with Dad again. The woman was a nice-looking blonde with a lot of hairspray on her hair; it formed a little blue cloud around her head when the sunlight hit it. I wanted to ask her if Apollo Red knew his own name and still remembered how to drive a car. I knew for sure he wasn't the one who had come for it. Apollo Red had descended, and would not be ascending for quite some time.

"It was the carburetor this time," Dad told her. "You might ought to think on getting some tires, too. These are may-pops."

"Yes, sir," said the lady.

Dad gave her the keys.

As she was slipping behind the wheel of her car, starting it up, Dad said, "Come on back, it gives you any trouble."

Coach Whip

"But you don't know anything happened to them," Chance said.

"I think I do."

"It did, baby girl," Leonard said. "Those were the times. In East Texas, you were expected to take one side or another, and if you were black you knew your place, and if you were white you were worried about your place. That's how it was. Not that everyone stuck to that, thank goodness. Me and Hap here, we ought to have hated one another, but we didn't, and we bearded the lions in their dens so much, it's amazing we have survived."

"Yeah, some people never learn that things aren't as they appear to be, or they aren't as they should be. I got a lesson in that when I was little. I guess you can call it a true story with a parable attached. My dad was responsible for the latter part."

When I was young, my dad's job played out, so we decided to drive from East Texas to Arizona, where some of our family lived. They said there were jobs there, and Dad needed a job, so away we went.

It was hot on the road in that old, black car of ours, and there wasn't any air-conditioning in it, so we had the windows rolled down to bring in the breeze. I loved it when we drove at night. I would lie on my back and stuff my pillow behind my head and watch the stars through the back window. The air would blow in so that the inside of the car was quite cool. I'd pull a blanket over me and dream that I was in a space ship flying amongst the stars. I had my dog with me, my faithful space hound Blackie, who was small and fuzzy with a heart like a water buffalo. He would snuggle close to me, the wind fluttering his ears, and we would soon be asleep.

I loved that dream, and sometimes now, when I can't sleep, I have the same one. That I have had a great adventure, and that I'm recovering in my little space craft the size of my bed, and I have my battle-ready friend at the controls. Sometimes in my dreams the battle-ready friend is my fine redheaded woman, Brett, and she's dressed like Dale Arden from Flash Gordon, and she is guiding us carefully through the solar system in our swift space/bed machine. Sometimes it is an unknown driver, a comrade in arms. I feel safe and it helps me sleep.

But back then I was just a kid, and I never felt safer than when I was with my parents, especially my father who could bend coins with his hands and crush an apple in his palm, expand his chest and break belts, or bend metal bars, so he was at the controls, sliding our little black space ship through the infinite blackness, sprinkled with stars.

At night we would stop at tourist courts, as they were called then, the forerunners of modern motels, and we would spend the night. Sometimes we didn't have the money, and we slept in the car, but if my dad could find day work, and it was easier in some ways to find it then than now, he would be able to make enough to buy us food and a place to stay for the night and put gas in the car. He also had his shotgun with him, and there were a few times when we stopped along the way and he went out into the woods to hunt squirrels, which after shooting he cleaned quickly and expertly with a pocket knife, then we cooked the meat on a hot plate in tourist court rooms. My dog ate the scraps of our meals.

Once in a town in Arizona we made a wrong turn and ended up in a downtown parade. I don't know what it was for, perhaps a local celebration, but once we were in the parade with floats and other cars and young ladies in truck beds wearing bathing suits and waving at the crowd, we couldn't get out. Every time my dad tried to turn out of the parade there seemed to be a policeman there with a whistle and gestures pointing him back into position. We rode like members of the parade, our windows down, my little dog rearing up and looking out one of them, barking. Somewhere along the line, when no policeman was around and there was a clear exit, Dad broke for it and drove us away from the parade and back on track. I missed the parade. It was a fun thing to have happen.

We drove during the day looking for work, and the sun beat down and the wind blew through the windows. I had no idea we were poor and were sort of doing our own Joad moment on the road. My parents picked vegetables and fruit and cotton on the way, day laborers. Sometimes if the work was good we would stay a few days and build up our cash supply. I helped do some of the work since no one was keeping children from working, but all I remember about that was trying to pick cotton and getting so hot I ended up with heat exhaustion and had to lay out under a tree in the shade for most of the day, sipping water from what we called a jug that had once been an old pickle jar.

When we arrived at our relatives' home, we stayed with them for a few days while my dad found work somewhere. Perhaps it was mechanic work, more likely some kind of farm work as a field hand. I remember him doing both along the way, and after we arrived, he went daily to some job or another, came home at night tired and hungry.

We ended up renting a ramshackle place not far from where the relatives lived. It was a house that had settled down until it touched the ground. The porch itself lay flat against the dirt and the wooden steps in front of it stood higher. We never used those, and finally my dad pried them apart with a crow bar and moved the wood away from the porch. That way all we had to do was step about two inches higher than the ground. There was a chicken coop there, and if we cared for the chickens, it cost us less, so therefore we cared for the chickens. I remember my mother in the dirt yard calling, "Chick, chick, chick, here chick, chick."

This mass of chickens would come darting and clucking out of the open hen house and into the yard, where my mother stood with a pail of dried corn, tossing it to them by the handfuls, as they came pecking at it across the sun-hardened ground.

We ate a lot of pinto beans and cornbread. On Sunday we went to our better-off relatives for Sunday dinner. Dinner is what folks call lunch these days. We called the late meal supper. At the relatives we had fried chicken and biscuits, and all manner of delights, including homemade apple pie. Everything was home grown and homemade. One night I remember us being so in need of food my mother cooked up some of the hen scratch, as she called it, meaning the thick corn kernels used as chicken feed, and we ate that. I don't remember it tasting too bad. She cooked it the consistency of mush, and that's what she called it as well. Mush. When I was growing up, when we had more money to buy cornmeal, she made me that for breakfast, pouring milk onto it and stirring butter in.

As I said, the place we rented came with a chicken house and chickens, and part of our rent was gathering eggs for the owner, and being allowed to keep some. We were also allowed to eat some of the chickens, and besides the Sunday dinner of fried chicken we had at the relatives' house, once a week we ate one or two of the chickens, ones that weren't good layers, or older roosters who were past their time. New chicks were being born constantly and they grew swiftly. My dad, when he killed chickens, wrung their necks. He would grasp one by the head, sometimes one in each hand, clamp tight, and with a twist and a swinging motion, break their necks. Sometimes he could pop the heads completely off, and other times the necks stretched out long and they looked like short hoses with chicken bodies swinging on them. He would toss the chicken on the ground, and dead, or near death, it would get up and run around. This happened sometimes when you chopped a chicken's head off, hence the phrase run around like a chicken with its head cut off. It was terrifying to see either a headless chicken, or a neck wrung chicken with its dangling neck and head, running about until it finally fell over.

Me and my dog Blackie went out to collect eggs in the hen house, and there was a chicken snake in it. We surprised one another. I lifted up a hen's ass to grab an egg for Mom to cook for my breakfast, and found the snake curled beneath the hen. Me and the snake were traumatized, and when the chicken realized that somehow from below the snake had found its way into her nest and was under her ass, she too was traumatized. She leaped off her perch and went batting her wings around the chicken house and squawking wildly, stirring up all the other chickens, causing a cacophony of squawks. The snake lay still in the nest, its body swollen with eggs. Sulfur and cayenne pepper mixtures, moth balls, and other things of that sort, were placed around the outside of the hen house, as they were supposed to discourage snakes, but the chicken snake had ignored them. To it, a keep out sign would have been about as efficient.

I know this. I was through with that hen house, never went back into one until I was in my early teens. And even then, I was nervous. Snakes are something country people grow up with, and fear of them is hard-wired into our brain, and more often than not, for no real reason.

I remember seeing a sidewinder moving along a hot, red sand path near where we were staying back then, slipping along in that peculiar S fashion they have. The manner of locomotion itself terrified me. Just didn't seem right. Snakes back home could be scary, and we had rattlers too, and the sidewinder is a rattler, but the ones back home didn't move like that. Not only could they scare you and bite you, they moved creepy.

Not far from where we were was an old quarry. I'm not sure what they had mined there, but it was played out by this time. It was a big place and it was full of water. I wasn't supposed to go anywhere near it, but its mystery drew me to it as simply and profoundly as the proverbial moth to a flame. I would sneak off from time to time and go there. I would stand on the edge of it and stare at the still water. My older cousins would come over and they would go swimming in it, but I wouldn't. It was too deep. And besides, I couldn't swim. My father had lost a friend in the Sabine River once, when he was a kid. He and his buddy got pulled into a whirlpool. My dad was able to swim out, as he was strong even as a child, but his friend was pulled into the suck hole and drowned. He never forgot it, of course, and that story stuck with me, and my mother was afraid of water, electricity, gas, just about everything, including snakes, so you can bet I had my fears, especially back then. I've made a point over the years to either get rid of all of them, or to find a way to confront them. One of those fears was that great quarry full of water. Still, I was drawn to it, to stand near the edge of it and look out at the water and wonder at the depths of it; the fear of falling into it had a hypnotic draw.

I hated being there in that Arizona heat, out there in a place that made me feel blue, the air so dry it made my skin itch. I don't like places where there isn't greenery, and I don't enjoy seeing for long distances. Empty expanses make me sad. East Texas had lots of tall trees and water, creeks and ponds, and man-made lakes. I don't know how much of that I understood back then, but I knew this wasn't where I had been living, and I didn't care for it.

It was still bright and hot and the sun was just beginning to dip. I stood on the edge of the quarry and watched the water in it turning purple with shadow. Blackie wasn't with me. For some reason he had stayed back at the house. The heat maybe. Or maybe I had ditched him on purpose. It was hard to sneak off and go some place I wasn't supposed to be because he would actually run back to the house barking, and my mother, who would figure out I was where I wasn't supposed to be, would come after me. I loved my dog, but he was a snitch.

Kids, including my two cousins, swam in the quarry. There was a path where the rocks had tumbled down and some of the older kids and my cousins would skinny dip. I didn't know any of them, and it made me nervous to see them going down there, stripping off their clothes, boys and girls, and I kept thinking they might want to pull my pants down and throw me in. I was very modest in those days, and still am when it gets right down to it, and I had a fear not only of that, but that they would throw me into the water and make me swim, which I couldn't. I don't know why I felt that way, but I did. Actually, I don't think they even noticed me. I remember watching the kids swim for a while, amazed at their white skin in the darkening water.

Eventually they climbed out, dressed and went home, and I watched them go along the far side of the quarry, then I started home. The sun dipped even more and the sky bled over the earth and gathered up in the handful of scrub trees along the way home. I walked swiftly, wanting to be home before the sun went down and my mother started calling for me. I had already pushed my time, and my guess was she thought I was still in the yard playing.

The path was red and sun-bleak. There were some mountains in the distance, and the mountains held the shadows to them like possessions, and the darkness in their crags and crannies gave me a feeling of unease that is impossible to explain.

I was really missing those East Texas trees and all the creeks and ponds and sandy trails. When the sun went down in East Texas the woods and the greenery turned emerald, and the shadows between the trees were mysterious and lovely. This place turned red and sad and the shadows began to look like oil stains.

I walked along the hardened dirt road with red sand on either side, and even at the dying of the day, it made everything hot. It was so hot I could feel it through my tennis shoes. I still remember that. I remember that in East Texas as well, but there always seemed there was shade to be had, and when it was night the ground cooled quickly. There is much that is embraced and loved about dry heat compared to humidity, but when I sweat I know I'm hot, and I don't keep moving about and end up falling out. The East Texas sweat cools me when I find shade and be still, but in that dry heat of Arizona I think I'm fine until I'm not.

Bake or fry, when you get right down to it, doesn't matter, I suppose.

In time I came to where there was dead grass growing on either side of the trail. The grass was the color of crackers and there was no wind to move it, but I saw that in one spot it was moving, rustling ever so gently. I stopped and looked. I didn't see anything at first. The grass stopped swaying. A moment later it began to move again, and a dark head rose up from the grass.

The head swayed first to one side and then the other, and there was a little forked tongue that came out of its mouth, blue-looking, and it snapped at the red-shaded air, and then the head went down and the grass began to move again. It was coming right for me.

I came unstuck and started running, sure I would get away from the snake quickly, but when I looked back I saw it coming along the trail now, moving briskly, squirming its way after me, all three or four feet of it, its head lifted like a periscope as it moved speedily along.

I ran faster. Glancing back, I saw that it was still coming, and it was closing on me, and I didn't have one doubt in the world that it was pursuing me and perhaps wanted to bite me in the ass on general principles. When I saw the rent house was in sight, I began to yell for my mother.

I was a short ways from the house when my mother came out on the porch and saw me running. I don't think she saw the snake right away, but as I came up on the porch she did. Grabbing at me, she pulled me inside and shut the door.

My dog had stirred by now, though he wasn't supposed to be inside the house, as in those days that was thought of as bad housekeeping. But, my parents loved that dog as much as I did, and that's where he stayed. We looked out one of the porch windows, me, Mom, and

Blackie. That snake was on the porch, and it raised its head and looked in the window at us, swaying from side to side. I jumped back and I think I started screaming, because I had no doubt in my mind that it was me it wanted. Blackie, due to my screaming, began to run around me in circles, barking.

My mother said, “You stay here,” and went out the back door. After a moment she appeared on the front porch with a hoe in her hand. The hoe flashed out, missed the snake, and the snake turned away from the window and went along the porch away from my mother, but she chased after it. I positioned myself to see out the window, and the last thing I saw of the snake was its tail whipping off the porch and out of sight, and then my mother chasing after it, the hoe raised above her head like a cartoon character.

I don’t know how long my mom was gone, but finally I saw her through the window. She came up on the porch and put the hoe against the wall, and came inside. She was always dramatic, and she leaned against the door frame as if she had just been in a great battle that she had only marginally survived.

“I killed it,” she said. “I chopped its head off.”

Late afternoon, suppertime, my father came home.

Mother related our snake adventure, and how she had killed it, and protected us, because that snake wanted in, and when she was through telling her story that snake could have been an army of snakes.

My dad went outside to look at the snake. I went out with him. Even though it was dead, I wouldn’t get near it. I could see that its head had been chopped off, but I had heard even a headless snake didn’t die until sundown. I had heard a lot of mythical stories about snakes, including the one about the hoop snake which grabbed its tail in its mouth and rolled down hill like a tire. There was also the snake that was said to slip under cows, attaching itself to one of their udders, and sucking out the milk, which was a reason some farmers said a milk cow went dry. I had known plenty of grown-ups to tell those stories for the truth, as absurd as they were.

My dad looked at the snake, then looked at me.

“Come here, son,” he said.

I eased closer, but still a goodly distance away from the dead snake.

He said, “See the way it looks. It don’t have a triangle head. It ain’t poisonous. It’s not a copperhead, rattler, or water moccasin, and it sure ain’t no corral snake. It gets cornered, it’ll beat its tail so it sounds like a rattlesnake, but it’s not even close. It’s a coach whip. They’ll chase you sometimes, but they ain’t gonna hurt you. Had you stopped running, it would have stopped, and had you ran toward it, it would have run in the other direction. Get it cornered, it’ll bite, but ain't no poison in it, but you get anything cornered, it'll fight back. Thing is, boy, not everything that looks scary is. You got to know something well enough before you decide on it as being one way or another."

I wasn't convinced, but that was all he had to say. He went inside, and I went inside after him. For a few days when I woke up at night and turned toward the bedroom window, I imagined I saw that snake rising up in the moonlight to look in at me. I didn't care if all it wanted was to play chase. I didn't care that it didn't have a triangular head or that it wasn't poison. The idea of it terrified me.

Much to my pleasure, we didn't stay in Arizona long. None of us liked it and the jobs weren't that good. We drove up into Colorado, and my dad found work there, and then we drove back through New Mexico and West Texas, Central Texas, Dad and Mom finding field work along the way, and then finally we were back in East Texas, back in Marvel Creek where I had been born, and the air seemed right and the sky seemed right and the woods were dark and green and it rained a lot. I was home.

Some years later, when I was a teenager, I was out walking in the woods behind our house, down near the creek, and I saw the grass rustle. My skin crawled. I stopped and looked. I started walking away, fast, and whatever it was started moving toward me through the grass, and pretty soon I was overcome with what I had felt as a child. I started running like a gazelle.

At some point I remembered what Dad had said, and I found the courage to stop and turn and run back toward where the grass was moving, expecting the snake to run. It didn't. The grass was still moving, and finally the grass parted, and the snake squirmed onto the sandy trial. It wasn't a coach whip. It was a short, stubby water moccasin, one of the poisonous snakes that are partial to East Texas. I have had many people tell me since they won't do that, chase you, I mean, but that one did; it not having read the recent literature. I think a snake in the wild is not a snake in captivity. Maybe snakes make decisions that are not only based on instinct. Maybe now and then they just like messing with you, because that one was certainly chasing me, and I was running as fast as I could go, and it was making easy time toward me.

I glanced back again, and all of a sudden the snake slithered off the trail and into the grass on the other side, and away through it.

That snake had fooled me. I got a lesson out of it, though I don't think I really understood it until years later. Sometimes you can think something is going to hurt you and it isn't, but you can also think something isn't, and it will. I don't know the snake was dead set on catching up with me, because if it had wanted to, it would have.

Maybe it was merely waiting to reach its turnoff. But still, I had convinced myself this time that I was being silly and the snake wasn’t poisonous, was a coach whip, but it wasn’t. Had I chased into the grass after it, and stepped on it, it might have bitten me.

That may have been what Dad was trying to tell me. It’s the same way with people. You might see them coming from a long distance off, but you don’t know what kind of snake they are just by sight, and they don’t have a triangular head to judge by.

The Bottom of the World

"My father damn sure had his moments, like telling me about that snake, but telling me something else in the process, teaching me a lesson. He could be contradictory, and there's no doubt he was racist. He hated blacks as a race but tended to like them as individuals. I think he couldn't quite understand if a black person could do better than him, because that didn't seem right. He had grown up with nothing, and the idea that there were people making fantastic amounts of money always seemed like a lie to him, or if it was true, he felt it was undeserved. I guess you grow up with nothing, ignorant and uneducated, it's hard to wrap your head around that. It didn't seem right to him that anybody ought to make the kind of money they did in sports, for example. Especially black athletes. On the other hand, he had a way of telling me things that mattered through moments like the one with that snake. Now and again he did it through stories."

"I think I'd have liked your dad, me being black or not," Leonard said.

"I don't think he would have liked you," I said. "But, you two are actually a lot alike. In the tough and straightforward department."

"I'm charming," Leonard said. "He'd have come around."

"You're not only black, but gay, so, I don't know."

"What kind of stories did he tell you?" Chance asked.

"All kinds. Sometimes things that happened to him. Sometimes even a ghost story now and again."

"Oh, I like scary stories," Chance said. "Can you tell me one of his ghost stories?" I glanced at Brett.

Brett smiled. "She's a grown woman, Hap. She can take a ghost story. If not, she and Buffy can cuddle on the couch afterwards."

"See," Chance said, "I'm all grown up." She smiled her dazzling smile. She did that, it was near impossible to deny her anything.

"Alright," I said.

The little electric heater buzzed like a bee and its grillwork glowed cherry red. Hap Collins, ten years old, sat on the floor with his arms clutching his knees, which he had pulled up close to his chest to create warmth. The house was dark except for the heater light. Outside, rain pecked at the glass and the wind howled as if it were a wolf in misery.

There was a scratching sound, and Hap nearly jumped to his feet. But then he remembered what it was. It was the branch of a magnolia tree near the window and when the wind blew hard, the branch moved and touched the window, making that sound. It reminded him of a cat scratching in gravel. Still, familiar as it had become in the last couple of months, it never failed to startle him.

Hap was glad he had his own bedroom though. He had hoped for one. They had been living in tourist courts for the last few months, traveling across Arizona and West Texas so his parents could work the fields and orchards. They picked fruit, cotton, dug potatoes, whatever job was available, until they ended up back in East Texas. But now his dad had a job at a propane company as a trouble shooter, a mechanic. That's what his dad loved doing, fixing cars, and he was good at it. Hap would be in a new school in a few days, in January after the Christmas holidays, and it would be 1960. He thought, new year, new house, and he liked both changes. It was nice to have a house of their own, even if it was cold and a little scary and he was behind in school for having been out for a while until they got settled. Another thing was he didn't know any of the kids in the neighborhood. Yet, it was all exciting to think about.

The bedroom door cracked, and a large man-shaped shadow fell through it, the hall light at its back.

"Son?" said the shadow. "You okay?"

"Yeah," Hap said. "Daddy. Would you tell me a story?"

"A story? Do you know what time it is?"

"No."

"It's . . . Well, it's late."

"You're up, Daddy."

"Came to check on you."

The shadow came into the room wearing boxer shorts and sat down on the floor near him. The heater spread its light on the shadow, and the shape was a shadow no longer. The light glowed on a stocky man with thinning hair with forearms as big as baseball bats. His chest was thick. His hands were thick and the fingers were short and blunt at the tips. One time his dad had torn a phone book in half to win a bet with his brother-in-law. It wasn't a very big phone book, actually, but the brother-in-law couldn't do it. He couldn't lift up the back of a car long enough to pull a flat tire off the rim either, but Hap knew his dad could. He'd seen him do it. He didn't know it was a big thing until he started hearing about it from others who had seen it with him. When they spoke of his dad's physical strength they spoke of it in awe.

"Can you tell me a story? A scary one?"

"You look like you might be a little scared now, let alone me tell you some kind of story like that. You ain't got a thing to worry on, Baby Man. The wind is just the wind and the rain is just the rain, and that ole tree is just a tree. In the summer you'll be able to play under it, though that magnolia tree will bring in the bees. You got to watch for them bees."

Hap remembered his mom saying the only thing in the world his dad was afraid of were wasps and bees. A sting from one of them could lay him low for days. He could take a punch thrown by a man twice his size and give him one back three times harder, and he might even be able to out wrestle an alligator and feed it to a bear and make him like it, but a bee or wasp made him nervous.

"I like scary stories," Hap said.

"Yeah. I know. I seen all them comic books you read."

"Tell me, please?"

"Alright. Well, you know we live not far from the river bottoms. All that rich bottom land and the river rolling down through them trees, them trees thick, and it all dark down there. There's all kinds of stories go with it. But they're just stories. And you want to stay away from that river. I was a boy, about your age, my friend Ronnie, me and him went swimming down there, and a whirlpool got him. It almost got me."

"Really?"

"Yeah. We lived not far from where we are now. Whirlpool sucked Ronnie right under, and I was near pulled in too, but I was a stronger swimmer, and I come out of it, but that water felt like it was pulling at my legs, trying to drag me under with him. I guess I kicked free of the thing down there."

"What kind of thing?"

"They say there was this woman lived down there on the banks of the Sabine, and she was young and pretty, and she had a lot of men wanted to marry her. But she didn't never let that happen. She was looking for the right one, and wasn't none of them suited her, you see.

"Well now, one day she sees a man near her cabin, and he's fishing with a cane pole, waiting patiently for a fish, sitting under an old willow tree. Now the woman, near girl really, she looks out and sees this man, and she thinks he's the best-looking fellow she's ever seen, including some in the Sears and Roebuck catalogue."

"Like them that just got on underwear and stuff?"

"Like any of them. So she looks out and sees him, and she thinks, he's the man I want, and she is bold, and goes down there to meet him. He likes her too, right away, and they become . . . friends. Close friends. So the days go by, and finally this young man decides that another young woman he saw in town might be better suited to him, 'cause not only is she pretty, but she has some money too. But the thing is, the river woman, she don't want to let him go, 'cause they done gone and got married, and she ain't gonna let him get shed of her. Arguing goes on for a while, but he can't get her to agree to a divorce, and all this sets heavy on him.

"Then one summer night he does a foolish thing. Wearing nothing but his undershorts, he takes her down to the river, drags her down there by her hair, and her wearing nothing but a flimsy old night gown. He throws her in and goes in after her, pushes her out to the middle of the river. It's not fast moving there, but it's deep, and though she's done spent most of her life on that river all by herself, she never has learned to swim good, and it don't help this fellow is holding her by the hair, and is pushing her under, and it don't take long before she's drowned.

"Now he's got a problem. He's done gone and killed her and now he's got a body. He leaves her in the river she's just gonna float, and though he could say she drowned out there swimming, or slipped on the bank fishing and ended up in the water, he knows ain't no one going to believe that, because she never did swim, and everyone knew she was right afraid of water, and everyone knew too she didn't like to do no fishing, and in fact, she didn't like to eat fish.

"This fellow he figures thing for him to do is get an old tow sack and put it over her head, and in another sack put an old anvil, tie it to her feet, and drop her out there in the middle of the river where it's deep, where there's a hole there so far down some say it ain't got no bottom. He took her out there in a row boat and dumped her over the side in that bottomless hole in the river. He put her in first with that bag over her head, and he was about to toss the anvil and the chain it was linked up to over the side, when the woman started moving in the water. She wasn't dead. He thought she was dead, but she wasn't.

"He took the boat paddle and went to hitting on her head in that bag. He beat it with everything he had and finally it wasn't moving. Just floating there, her feet was lifted up out of the water on the chain that was fixed onto the anvil in the boat, so she hasn't gone nowhere yet. When he figures he's finally got her settled, he throws that anvil into the water, nearly turning the boat over along with it. Well, that anvil hits the water and it jerks that woman straight down, way down there in that bottomless hole, and this fellow, he's got some relief now, 'cause he figures he's good and quit of her.

"That night he goes back to the house, thinking on how he'll say she run off with another man, and how after a time he'll get a divorce, saying she's run off from him."

"What's a divorce, Daddy?"

"It's a thing some people do when they can't get along, or are just too damn selfish to try and make a thing work. Anyway, this fellow, he's thinking in a while he'll get with that good-looking woman in town that he's been sneaking around and seeing, and with her will come all her money. But back in the house, the wife drowned now, he starts feeling lonely. He starts thinking on her, seeing strands of her hair in her brush on the dresser, a photograph or two around the house with him and her in it. Time he goes to bed, he's upset with himself some, tossing and turning, seeing in his head her tumbling down and down and down in that dark, old, night water, just a twisting around in circles, her hair swaying in the river, her body swirling in that watery hole that ain't got no bottom.

Finally he goes to sleep, and then he wakes 'cause he hears something. Like someone calling his name, and he knows that voice, or thinks he does, but it don't sound just right. You see, it's got this gurgle about it, like someone is trying to talk with a mouthful of water.

"He thinks, now that can't be her. She's in that river in that bottomless hole, going down, down, down, that anvil tugging at her toes. But then he hears something that makes his blood grow cold. There's a rattling noise, like the way a plow chain will shake when you're hooking up a mule to plow, and then there's another sound, a dragging sound, like maybe that chain is hooked up to something heavy, and someone has hold of that chain and is dragging that something heavy."

"It's her, ain't it, Daddy?"

"So he gets up and he gets his old shotgun out of the closet, one of them double barrels, and he sits on the edge of his bed, thinking maybe he's dreaming, and he's still lying there under the sheet, and that he didn't hear nothing for real, and didn't get up and get his shotgun. But that sounds just keeps a coming. A little louder now, that chain rattling, that dragging sound, and then . . . It stops. He don't really know where it stops, but he feels like he does. He feels like he knows it's outside the front door, and then there's a calling sudden-like, and it's that same voice with the gurgle in it. It's his wife's voice, like the way it would sound if she was full of water and trying to talk. She's calling his name. Ain't nothing else she's saying other than his name, over and over and over.

"He don't move. He just keeps on sitting there on the edge of the bed, shivering now, and it ain't cold a bit, but he feels wet as if he was in that river again. The voice calls and calls, and then it stops. It stops for a long time, but he don't move none, not a bit. And you know what happens next?"

"Something starts a knocking at the door. Slow and steady, and then the knocking stops, and there's a scratching, like a cat, but still he don't move. And then that stops, and he hears that sound again, the chain and something heavy as it goes dragging around the house and comes to the window by the bed. He has his back to that window, but he's heard that sound moving around to it, and he knows without looking that someone or some kind of thing is at that window. So slowly he turns and looks. And damn if there ain't a water-fat face pushed up against the window pane, starring in at him.

He jumps up then, whirls and fires that shotgun, blasting a load through the glass and into that face, but that face don't do nothing but come apart some, and not much. And he knows it's just who he expected it was. It's his wife, and she's done come for him. She gets hold of the window sill and starts climbing through that window, that broken glass all around it not bothering her none. Hell, he's done shot her right in the face with one load from that double barrel, and she's still a coming, and only looking as bad as she looked before, which is bad enough. Though now she's got little buckshot holes all in her face and head and throat. And she's so white. So white. And there's no blood on her, just them holes, black and small as seed ticks. In she comes, the nightgown torn and ragged around her from her rising up from the river and walking through the close brush, and she's got that chain fastened to her foot, and she bends down and takes hold of that chain, and goes to tugging, pulling that anvil toward her, causing it to drag loud on the ground until it comes scraping up the side of the house and bumps over the open window and falls to the floor with a sound like a big tree falling.

"He can't run. He ain't got the legs for it. His knees is knocking together, and he is stuck there like his feet are nailed to the floor. He does open up on her with that other barrel, but he might as well have tried to tickle her ass with a feather, for all the hurt it does her.

Closer she comes, holding the chain in her hands, dragging that anvil across the floor. And still he's frozen. Step by wet step she comes, that heavy anvil making groove marks in the wood, and about the time he's come unstuck and is going to run, she moves faster than she ought to be able to, than anyone ought to be able to, and she's done let go of the chain and has grabbed him by the neck. She winds fingers in his hair and pulls him as she turns, and now she's dragging him by the hair, through the house, and to the front door, and when she come to it she just kicks it and it flies off its hinges and out into the yard, and still she comes, dragging him by the hair, her foot pulling the chain and what's hooked up to it.

"Out she goes, slow and steady, dragging him over the ground by the hair to the river. And then she goes into it, floating out to the center of the river where there's that deep old hole, the chain coming after her, that anvil swinging down below her, but still she keeps atop the water, doing what she couldn't do in life, swim, or at least float. When she's right in the center, she tugs him up and looks right at him, plants her water-thick lips on his in a sloppy wet kiss, and then she just lets that anvil pull her down. And away they go, whirling faster and faster, down, down, down in that deep dark hole filled with water, and now with them two lost souls.

"You'd think that'd be the end of it, but it ain't. She's still out there in the river, and where she went down, it's not only deep enough to flow somewhere out of China, the water is spinning around and around on the top of the river, the way it did when she and that man of hers was going down, pulled by that chain and anvil. That water ain't never stopped spinning there since, and that old suck hole don't like men at all, or boys. That's why it took Ronnie. That's why it tried to take me, and that's why over the years it's pulled down many a good boy that's tried to swim it. It's even tugged down row boats, tugged them down in that deep, bottomless hole where's she got her a big old bunch of men and boys, just a spinning around and around in that deep, dark, water hole. Which is why you don't never want to go out in that river to swim, 'specially not in that fast, deep water over the hole. 'Cause that Water Witch, which is what she's come to be called, she's waiting."

Hap sat silent a moment.

"That's near here?"

"It is."

"Is she real?"

"It's a story."

"If it was real, could she come back out of that water?"

"I don't think so. Not anymore. She's stuck there now. She got the man done what he did to her, and now she's got that spot that's hers, and hell to the fellow that tries to swim or fish there. But she can't come out no more. She's stuck right there with that husband of hers, Ronnie, and all them others. Now, you need to get in bed."

Hap slipped under the covers. The covers were warm. His dad tucked them in around him.

"I hate I told you that story," his dad said.

"I liked it."

"But you'll have nightmares, and not only is that bad for you, but Mama will know if you do, and that's bad for both of us."

"I like stories, Daddy."

“Good. I can sleep here beside you if you’re scared.”

“I’m okay.”

“Alright, then,” his dad said, and eased out of the room, once again becoming a shadow.

The heater hummed. The wind blew. The rain splattered. The house creaked. Hap envisioned that woman, all swollen up from the water, that chain on her foot, that heavy anvil at the end of the chain, and her spinning around and around just beneath the water, ready to grab a foot and pull you under. He found the story scary, but he found it comforting too. His dad had told him a story like he asked, and the kind of story he asked for, and he loved him for it.

Hap closed his eyes.

Around and around that woman spun. Her hair flowing about like spilled ink, waving in the current, dragging fellows deep down into the wet dark with her, all the way to the bottom of the world.

Squirrel Hunt

“You know, Leonard, now that I think about it. I believe he would have stood up for that black man. I really do. He was a man of his time, but he was an honorable man, and had a true sense of fair play.”

“I don’t doubt that. My uncle never got over me being gay, but honestly, I think he and your dad were a lot alike. Had they known each other in a later time, they might have been friends, like us, thick as thieves.”

“You’re probably right,” I said. “Dad, in spite of his background, had a kind of wisdom about him, and a way of imparting it to you.”

“What kind of way?” Chance said.

“A backwoods kind of way,” I said.

“See,” Brett said. “Backwoods. Like your own father. You can take the boy out of the woods and pick the ticks off of him, but you can’t take the woods out of the boy . .. Or something like that.”

“I was reaching for something there.”

“And didn’t quite get it,” Leonard said.

“You like those vanilla cookies I keep here?” Brett said.

“You are wise, and you have great ways of using old clichés,” Leonard said.

“Like when you said thick as thieves?” Brett said.

“Just like that.”

Chance laughed. It was soft and short and throaty, and that made me smile. “Come on, Dad,” she said. “Give me an example of your dad’s wisdom.”

“Alright. I can tell you an incident that shows that, and his sense of justice.”

I was twelve then, and the country was not like it is now. There were still plenty of tall and ancient hardwoods on either side of the road, mixed with pines and sweet gums and all manner of other trees, and the squirrels were thick in the hardwoods, and the birds when nested in them were so many they looked like colorful blooms.

Daddy drove up a hill in our old black car, and at the top of the hill we coasted down a ways, and then turned left onto a red clay road so narrow the limbs of trees brushed lightly against the windows and whispered over the hood and the roof of the car. It was a cool early winter day and the trees cast shadows across the little road we were on.

After a while, we turned off, and ended up at the end of a sandy rutted road even more narrow than the clay one. There was a car parked there, right next to the woods. A white Chevrolet. Daddy parked next to it, and we got out. Daddy pulled two shotguns from the back seat, a twelve gauge for him, and a four/ten for me.

Both guns were single shot and broken open and unloaded, and Daddy left them that way. He handed me the four/ten, placed his shotgun on the hood of our car, and looked at the Chevy as he pulled on a red vest that had our ammunition in it and some jerky he had brought.

“Hank Jenner’s car,” he said.

I knew Hank Jenner only faintly. He was a burly guy with tobacco-stained teeth and he wore a greasy fedora, the brim of which was turned down to canopy his eyes. He spent a lot of time at the feed store talking to other men who, like him, seemed to have little to do. I would see him when I went to buy comic books next door, and when I came by the open doorway of the feed store, walking along the sidewalk, he always said something or another. I never understood exactly what it was he was getting at, and he said things to my mother too, leaning out of the doorway to do it, but she ignored him. The men in the store laughed.

One time she told me, “Don’t say anything about Mr. Jenner to your Daddy, about anything he said.”

“Because if you do, Mrs. Jenner, who is a very nice lady, will be sleeping alone.”

I didn’t understand that exactly, not then. I did know Mama and Daddy didn’t like Mr. Jenner. Other than his crowd down at the feed store, not many did. No one could figure out what he did for a living, but he always had a bit of money. Most of it went for chewing tobacco, and according to Daddy, lots of alcohol.

I liked Mr. Jenner’s wife. She was my fourth grade teacher. She was sweet and funny and had kids of her own, some younger, some older than me. None were in my classes.

If I saw her out of school, with her husband, she seemed different. Not as tall as in the classroom, never smiling, and she never stopped to talk to anyone. She never wore one of the three or four nice dresses she wore to class, but instead old, gray things. Her kids were dressed poorly as well. At school they had a few good clothes, but away from there they wore old stuff. I understood that. My mother sewed my clothes mostly, and there were hand-me-downs from my cousins that I wore as they outgrew them. When I wasn't at school, or being made to go to church, I wore older clothes with patched knees and elbows. This was, and still is, a poor part of the country.

Sometimes Mr. Jenner would be waiting on Mrs. Jenner when school was over. He would park at the curb, get out and cross his arms, lean on his car, and wait for her to come out. You could see her grow smaller as she walked toward the car. They never spoke. She just got in.

On this hunting day I was excited, and the sight of Mr. Jenner's car meant little to me. A lot of people hunted those woods. I suppose the property belonged to somebody, but back then there was an understood rule that you could hunt on other people's property as long as you didn't shoot everything in sight, cut fences, or build unattended fires. I liked to shoot squirrels, and had gone hunting several times, and we had eaten what I killed like Daddy said we had to do. If we didn't kill anything, I knew we'd be having corn meal mush for dinner.

We went into the woods along an animal path, doing what was called "still" hunting. We didn't have a hunting dog, we just walked and looked up and watched for a squirrel's tail to blow in the wind, and then we shot it. We had a strict number of squirrels we killed, and then two more for a poor colored family. That was what African-Americans were called then. Colored

They lived not far from us. The man of the house had a bad foot injury and could only do light work, so they always needed food and money. His wife did cleaning and the children worked part-time jobs and went to the colored school beyond Marvel Creek at a place called Sand Ridge. A lot of coloreds lived there.

I existed in a state of confusion because Daddy cussed "the niggers and the burr-heads and the jigs," but was always giving them extra squirrels he shot, or extra fish he caught. When we didn't catch many fish or killed only a few squirrels, he would give them all away, and corn meal mush would be in the offing.

Yet, at home, way he talked about colored people in general was pretty tough and made me kind of sick to my stomach, even though I wasn't exactly sure why.

Mama saw the good in people, no matter their color.

She and Daddy talked very different about the colored folks, though they both seemed kind and generous with everyone, and Daddy, oddly, considering how he talked, seemed even more that way with the colored. The best I ever came to understanding him, was when he once said he knew what it was like to be hungry.

Out in the woods, carrying our shotguns, me and Daddy walked along for a while. It was fall and the oaks had shed their leaves. The pines were eternally green unless dying. The air smelled of trees and dirt and nearby water from the Sabine River.

After a bit, I saw a squirrel and Daddy let me shoot him. It was a good shot, and the squirrel fell. I grabbed it by the tail and tied it off to my belt with a piece of twine, and we carried on.

It was about midday when we stopped to eat something. I had killed two squirrels and Daddy had killed two. Daddy pulled out the jerky inside his vest, unwrapped the wax paper it was in, and gave me a piece.

“Eat slow, we might be a while before supper,” Daddy said.

I chewed slowly, pretending I was Davy Crockett on a hunt for bears.

Daddy said, “You like shooting those squirrels, don’t you?”

“Yes, sir.”

“Well, them squirrels are food. Okay to be glad about food, but you start shooting to watch something fall, start thinking killing is good, you need to sit down on a log like this and have a little talk with yourself. Killing ain’t no good thing, son, unless it’s to eat or protect yourself. And you ought never to delight in it.”

That’s how Daddy was. He said things kind of off to the side sometimes, and then you’d think on it and understand it. But I certainly had been delighting in killing those squirrels. Guns and killing made you feel powerful.

When we finished eating, hunting continued, and we killed one more a piece. We were about to start back to the car, when Daddy saw something bright red on the ground between some sycamore trees, and there was something black on the red and it moved and shimmered in the strips of sunlight that fell between the boughs of the trees. We went over to it.

Daddy took me by the shoulders and told me to go stand by a big elm he pointed at, and I did. I could see what was lying on the ground, though, and I had seen it close up. A man with most of his head missing. I had shot a squirrel earlier and most of its head was gone, but I hadn’t felt the same way then. Flies had risen up in a cloud when we came upon the body, and now the cloud was descending again. The body was soon covered in them, and when they moved it was in mass, as if they were all part of one kind of creature. You could see bits of his red shirt between the mass of flies, and then for some reason or another, they would rise up in a blast and then come down again. The air smelled sour.

Something, a wild dog or coyote or red wolf, perhaps, had pulled off one of the body's cowboy boots which lay nearby, and had gnawed at a socked foot. It didn't even look like a foot anymore, and most of the sock was missing and part of it had been pulled out in a long strand. A greasy fedora lay nearby, on its crown, and by the body was a rifle.

"Jenner," Dad said.

You couldn't tell that by the face, but we knew it was him, way he was dressed, shape of his body, his car being parked at the edge of the woods.

Daddy leaned over the body and gave it a closer look. He glanced at Jenner's 30/30 on the ground beside him. He stood up and walked around Jenner and bent down and looked at the leafy ground. He ran his finger into something in the dirt. I couldn't help myself. I moved away from the elm just enough to see it was a footprint, and there were others. They were small footprints and they led off toward the river, which at that point you could hear it gurgling along not far from us.

Even at that age, it came to me those prints were out of place. Jenner was a big man with big feet. Those prints were much smaller and had been made the day before. I knew that, because they were dried now, and they had been impacted in the earth when it was wet. It had rained yesterday.

Daddy came over and pulled a big pack of chewing tobacco out of his pocket and stuck a wad in his cheek. He didn't say anything, just cradled his shotgun in his arms.

"We gonna tell the sheriff?" I said.

"In good time. He ain't gonna get no deader."

We started back for the car. It took about an hour to make our way out of the woods. Dad stopped by the Chevy, and did a curious thing. He took a handkerchief out of his pocket and used it to open the front passenger-side door. He stuck his head inside, and then he picked up a black purse off the front seat, shoved the door shut with his knee.

"Get in the car, Baby Man."

I opened the back door to our car and snapped open my shotgun. The shell had already been fired, and it popped out and onto the ground. I picked it up and put it in my pocket with the other empties, and placed the four/ten on the backseat. I got in the car, and Dad placed his shotgun on the back seat as well, and dropped the purse onto the front seat.

When he was sitting behind the wheel, I said, "What happened to Mr. Jenner?"

"I'm going to say an accident."

"We telling the sheriff?"

I had already asked this, but it was on my mind. I had seen a lot of TV shows and movies, and something like this happened, you told the sheriff, the cops, the law.

“Shortly,” he said.

I looked down at the purse. It looked familiar.

After driving out of the woods, when we turned off onto the main road we didn’t go toward our house. We went the other way.

“Where we going, Daddy?”

“Little thing to do,” he said.

I guess we drove for about twenty minutes or so before we came to a house set off the road. It was at the back of about an acre of property. Great trees grew in the front yard, and the grass was dead as most grass was dead that time of year; it had turned brown as toast. The house was big, but it was old too, one of those that had a porch around it and a dog run right through the middle. The paint was peeling off the house in strips that reminded me of the way skin peels off of you when you’ve had a sunburn and it’s a few days after. There was woods behind the house, and I realized the river was close as well. As the crow flew, where we had found Mr. Jenner was a short distance from the back of the Jenner house, much closer than by car.

“You sit right here, alright?” Daddy said.

“Yes, sir.”

He took the purse and got out of the car.

Even though it was winter, it wasn’t cold, just cool. I had my window rolled down, and I rested my elbow on the window frame and thought about the body in the woods, but I didn’t think on it long. I don’t know if it was because I disliked Mr. Jenner, or because my mind didn’t want to keep thinking on that, his head blown off and the rising and lowering of that cloud of flies.

Instead, after a few moments I thought of supper. I was starting to think about fried squirrel. I hoped Mama had pulled some dandelion greens or some such to go with it. First though, when we got home, I had to skin and clean the squirrels. That was my job. To skin them by cutting the fur loose at the back legs near the feet, peeling it back from there, and pulling it over the squirrel’s head, like a night shirt. Then I would cut the head off and gut the squirrel, careful not to drag my knife through the squirrel’s ass first, but instead I would cut down from its stomach to the ass, pull out the guts for the dog. I would hose the squirrel off then, wash out its empty belly, and give it to Mama to cut up and cook.

That was what was on my mind while I sat there, but those thoughts went away when Mrs. Jenner appeared. She opened the door and stood at the screen for a moment, then pushed the screen door open and came out. She closed the screen gently behind her, crossed the porch and came down the steps. This took her a long while to do. She had on a very old dress, so faded it was nearly white, and if the sun had been bright, you could have seen through it. Mrs. Jenner's skin was almost as pale as her dress, and sunlight might not only have shown through the dress, it occurred to me that it might even show through her, though there was one dark spot on her: her left eye was black and swollen. It was then that Mr. Jenner's image came back to me, that blown-away head and the hard, dried blood spread out on the ground like paint. Something was churning around in my young head, but I couldn't quite get hold of what it was.

Daddy handed Mrs. Jenner the purse. I could hear him clearly.

"Found this."

"Oh," she said, and took it.

She stood looking at Daddy, as if she wasn't sure if he was really there or not. I thought she didn't seem sure she was there. At the front door one of the kids looked out through the screen, and then went back inside.

"Your husband," I heard Daddy say, "I found him in the woods where we hunt."

"Oh," she said.

"He's dead."

"Is he?"

It was as if she had been told he had a flat tire and would be home late.

"He was shot with a shotgun."

"I see," she said.

"Could be a hunting accident. Tripped on a limb, the gun went off and killed him. It happens."

"It does, doesn't it?" She crossed her arms and put her elbows in her palms.

"But only a 30/30 was on the ground. I think since he was shot with a shotgun, he should have had a shotgun there. He's not far back there behind the house. His car is parked off the road."

"Yeah, he never liked crossing the rickety old river bridge."

"It's not a good bridge for a big man to test," Daddy said. "But someone smaller, and lighter, it would be a good way to go."

She nodded. "He made me go hunting with him sometimes."

It was Daddy's turn to nod.

"I didn't really like it, but he made me go."

Daddy nodded again.

"I think he's been there a day, and I'm going to report it. But it will take me time to go to town, because I drive pretty slow."

She studied Daddy's face.

"I think since he was shot with a shotgun, that's what should be there. It’s hard to explain that 30/30, but I may have looked at it wrong. It might have been a shotgun lying there. It sure could be. It ought to be, you know, considering what happened. The accident and all. “

“Of course.”

“Sorry to bring the bad news.”

“No problem,” she said. “Someone had to tell me.”

“Lucky we came across him, so you’d know.”

“Yeah. It is.”

“We’re going to go now, and I’m sorry about your husband.”

“You said you were going to tell the sheriff.”

“I am, but like I said, I drive slow, and I may stop off at the store to buy some milk and bread. Yeah. I’m going to do that first, then I’m going to tell the sheriff. It might take a while.”

“Please do take your time,” she said.

Daddy nodded at her. “I’ll go then.”

Daddy climbed into the car and started the engine, but he didn’t put the car in gear. He just sat there. We sat there for a while.

I said, “Daddy, what are you doing?”

“Sitting on a log.”

“What?”

“Having a talk with myself.”

“Sir?”

Dad put the car in reverse and backed around, put it in drive, and drove us out of there. I looked back and saw that Mrs. Jenner had come out the back door and was crossing the backyard. She was wearing men’s pants and had on boots and was carrying something, but we had reached the edge of the woods along the road near her house, and I only got a glimpse of her, and then I couldn’t see her anymore.

When we were on the road, Daddy said, “What kind of gun did you see lying by Mr. Jenner?”

“A rifle,” I said.

“No, son. It was a shotgun. Anyone asks you, it was a shotgun. I thought it was a 30/30 too, but it wasn’t.”

I knew what I had seen, but in that moment, I understood, or at least understood enough.

“Yes, sir,” I said. “A shotgun.”

Mrs. Jenner taught the rest of the semester, and she dressed well all the time and smiled outside of class, and then when the semester ended, she and her children moved off and I never saw or heard of her again.

The Oak and the Pond

When I finished with the story, Chance said, "I love that.

Can you tell me more?"

I saw Brett glance at the clock.

"Nope, not tonight," I said. "I have to take Uncle Leonard home."

"He could sleep on the couch," Chance said. "We could stay up awhile, like a slumber party."

"Nope," Leonard said, "it's been a long day and a hard workout, time for me to go to my place and crash."

"Dang it," Chance said.

"Next time we do pizza, sit and tell stories," I said.

"Promise?" Chance said. She seemed so much like a little girl then, and I guess, when you get older, someone in their twenties, even thirties, seems like a kid to you.

"Promise," I said.

I drove Leonard home, and on the way he nodded off. When I stopped at his place he came wide awake. "Damn, you could have just drove around with me in the car and let me sleep."

"That's how they do babies," I said. "You are not a baby."

"I might be someone's baby."

"Not mine, though."

Leonard reached out and tapped me on the shoulder with his fist. "Tomorrow, bro."

"You bet."

He got out and I drove off. Thing was, though, I wasn't that tired. All the talk had made me nostalgic. I drove out to where Leonard used to live, where Trudy died and other bad things happened. There were good memories there too, and I tried to concentrate on those. I drove out here now and again, sometimes with Leonard, and each time I told myself I wouldn't do it again, but I did. It was like an alcoholic that says he won't take another drink, then goes to the cabinet immediately after the thought and pulls down the bottle.

But it wasn't Trudy I was thinking about now, not really, it was the place where Leonard had lived and the woods behind it and the Robin Hood tree.

At one time there was a great oak tree behind the house where Leonard was living then, and the oak was deep in the woods, and it was one of the last of the great oaks. It stood tall and thick and ancient. It had great limbs you could crawl up on and stretch out on and sleep without real fear of rolling off.

We called it the Robin Hood tree, like the great tree where Robin and his merry band of men gathered to talk and feast. I also thought of it as the Tarzan tree, imagined how you could build a treehouse on its massive limbs and have plenty of room to live with a lithe, blonde Jane and do more than call elephants and swing on vines.

Leonard and I would meet at the oak, me having hiked through the woods from my place. My place wasn't all that far if you came by wooded path, then broke off the path and took a deer trail, and finally a winding trace through a series of tall black jack oaks until you arrived at Fisherman's Creek. Across the creek the trees thinned in number but not in magnificence. There were sweet gums and hickory trees, and of course pines.

The Robin Hood tree was the granddaddy of them all. The oak rose higher and spread its limbs wider than all the others. Its bark was healthy and dark, and in the spring its leaves were green as Ireland. To stand beneath it when it rained was a miracle, because the limbs were so thick and the leaves so plush that during the spring, and much of the summer, if not the fall when the leaves were brown and yellow and falling, you would hardly get wet. When it stormed the limbs shook like angry soldiers rattling their weapons, but the limbs didn't break, just old dead leaves and little branches dribbled down. The soil beneath the oak was thick and dark with many years of dropped and composted leaves. There were acorns on the ground, and sometimes when you came to the tree, squirrels were beneath it, rare black squirrels that made this part of the woods their home. They were in the tree too, chattering and fussing as you arrived.

Leonard and I met there many mornings, usually having a breakfast of boiled eggs we had brought in sacks, drinking coffee from our thermoses, carrying fishing gear and small coolers with our lunches in them.

We would sometimes sit there beneath the tree and talk, and finally we would go away from there, carrying our coolers, through the trees, and then along the creek line to where the pond was. It was a big pond, and at one point in time there had been a house near it. Now the house was a pile of gray lumber and rusty nails and a few bricks that showed where the fireplace had been. Beyond that was a clapboard barn that still stood, the great wide doors gone, probably taken for lumber for someone's project. Trees crowded it, and one sweet gum had grown up and under the roof and was pushing it loose on one side.

The pond had been dug maybe fifty years before and had been filled with fish, and we were fishing their descendants. There was a boat down there, one we had tediously carried there along the creek bank, and we left it for when we wanted to fish. No one bothered it, because no one came there anymore but us. The land was owned by someone up north who had mostly forgotten about it. The pond was always muddy, but the fish were thick. We caught them and generally threw them back, unless they were good-sized enough and fat. Then they went home with us and became our supper.

We fished there with cane poles, not rods and reels. It wasn't a place for rods and reels. It was a place for fishing in an old and simple way. We put lines on the poles, sinkers, corks, hooks, and bait, usually worms. Out in the boat we would dangle lines and watch the fish jump, the dragonflies dip down on the water, see the shadows of birds flying over, now and again there was the sight of a leaping frog or a wiggling water moccasin. Turtle heads rose like periscopes, then fell beneath the water with a delicate splash and a small ripple.

In the spring it was cool for a long time, and in the summer it grew hot, but with wide-brimmed hats on, we still fished, and we lazed, and sometimes we talked, softly, fearing we might frighten the fish. We talked about all manner of things we believed in, and how we differed from one another. I told Leonard about my women, and he told me about his men. We talked about brotherhood without speaking of it directly. I told bad jokes and Leonard grumbled.

When Leonard moved from the house next to the woods, and I later moved from where I lived, we lost that spot.

Some years later the people up north remembered the land, and they brought in pulp crews and cut the woods down, even the great and ancient oak, which must have fought the saws with its old, hard wood. But the saws won, and it tumbled down and was coated in gasoline and set on fire. They didn't even bother to make it into lumber. The land where it stood was a black spot for a long time.

They planted rows and rows of soft lumber pines to be cut and replanted every fifteen or twenty years, a crop. People claim there are more trees now than before, but they are wrong. Once you could drive all through East Texas and there were trees as far as you could see, and not just pines either. The trees grew close to the roads and covered them in shadow. You don't have to go out in the woods and count trees one by one to know that the statements being made about there being more trees than ever before is a bald-faced lie. The pines they planted where the oak grew didn't shield you from rain or rattle in the wind the way the Robin Hood tree did.

Eventually, they filled in the pond, killing the fish. They dammed up the creek and made another, larger pond farther up, but it lacked charm, and finally scrummed over. Nothing lived in it.

A company that raised chickens for a supermarket chain bought the land, and a series of long, commercial chicken houses took the place of the original pond and the woods that had surrounded it, even the pulp trees, which they also cut down and didn't replant. Now there is a wide gravel road that leads out of where the trees once grew, on to the highway. It's odd. Looking down that gravel road, you can see the highway so easy. It seemed farther away in the years before the road was there and the trees were cut.

Leonard wouldn't even look in the direction of the old place when we drove by. I look, but I don't like what I see. The rain still falls and the wind still blows, but the oak and the pond are gone.

Afterword

So I bring you something different.

The Mosaic Novel. I didn't invent that term. I don't know who did, but the idea is that it's a novel that is not in order of the events, nor are all the events designed to roll precisely into the other. It is like a notebook where someone has been randomly recording events of their life and it's been found by a passerby. Some pages might even be missing, but the stories, in order, or out of order, constitute a portion of a young man's life.

The early life of one Hap Collins.

Leonard Pine, his close friend, and eventually his brother, appears as well. I know what this is like, to make your own family. I have a good family by blood, thank goodness, but I have some true brothers and sisters out there, like Andrew Vachss for example. Nick Damici. We just know, and there's no other way to explain it.

When I was growing up it was not unusual for there to be books connected loosely by this sort of tissue, and for the stories to gradually give you an overall view of a character's life, or a thematic overview of a town, or even something science fictional, like Ray Bradbury's version of Mars in The Martian Chronicles, or something far more earthbound as in Hemingway's Nick Adams Stories.

Those are merely two examples of many books of that nature. This is a modern example of that. I love the stories here. They are not all heroic or adventurous, but they do fill in a lot of reader gaps. Here you get some background you might not have gotten from the books. Most of it about Hap. Leonard is not in all the stories, and not all the stories are about Hap, even if he narrates. There is even a third person approach to some of the material. It felt right.

Hap and Leonard have become brothers by the time my first novel in the series, Savage Season, occurs, but before that they were two guys feeling out a friendship, finding it good, but it was not quite at the level of what it would eventually be. They would become family.

I love these guys. They have been with me a long time. I have had a lot of time to visit with them, and lately more than usual. New books, new novellas, a TV show, and now these stories. Some of them are brand new, some of them are rare, and only a couple have had much life outside of small presentations. "The Boy Who Became Invisible" appeared in a previous collection from the same publisher, but somehow it would have left too big a gap in this series of events had we restricted its presence merely because it appeared before. Here it becomes a valuable part of this mosaic construction. Same with “Not Our Kind,” though it has only appeared in the aforementioned book, which by the way is titled Hap and Leonard.

I am proud of these stories. I am proud of Hap and Leonard. They may even have broken a bit of new ground in their day. I won’t go into all of that, as I have written about their odd couple differences before.

I am also proud of Hap and Leonard’s influence on other writers, and I am happy to have those writers write and tell me how much the books meant to them, and how much they helped them create their own characters. And all you readers, Hap and Leonard fans, thank you.

As a side note, these stories may in fact violate some of the material in the novels, but not by much. These are the true stories, the true past. In the novels Hap dropped a step now and then, not revealing things, hinting at things, and in a couple of small cases they were just wrong. The TV show, soon to go into its second season, has borrowed some of the ideas in some of these stories, some true events from my life, and they have given Hap and Leonard a slightly different past than the one here, but as they say in the movie business, it is “in the spirit of,” which generally means bend over, no time to grease up, here it comes. But in my case I have been treated very well by the series, and so have my characters. I appreciate that. Thanks Sundance for not screwing it up. Still, there are differences in the TV version and my version. The record is set straight here. This is the official version.

Enjoy your visit with Hap and Leonard in the early days. I certainly enjoyed finding out about them myself. Hap has not always been as open with me about his past as I would have liked.

Praise for Hap and Leonard

—Kirkus

«“Last seen in the novel Honky Tonk Samurai, Lansdale’s incomparable East Texas crime fighting duo show their chops in this remarkable story collection. Readers can also look forward to the debut of the TV show Hap and Leonard on the Sundance Channel in March.
—Publishers Weekly, starred review

“An essential Hap and Leonard addition”
—The Novel Pursuit

“. . . it’s great to have all of these wonderful stories together in one nifty volume”
—Horror Drive-In

“A perfect introduction”
—Booklist

“East Texas charm, profane wit, and strong characterization, with enough snappy dialogue to keep a smile on your face . . . excellent entertainment, edge-of-your-seat action one minute, gut-busting humor”
—Adventures in Genre Fiction

“This collection is crime/pulp fiction at its best and most captivating.”
—Risingshadow

“If you find yourself on the wrong side of Hap and Leonard, be cautious, because they are quicker than a rattlesnake, and their bite is just as bad. If you find yourself an innocent bystander looking for a great book to read, you've come to the right place."

—Killer Nashville

"For those new to either Lansdale or the series, this latest collection is an excellent introduction to the kind of trouble these two often find themselves in; all the while exchanging some of the funniest, lovingly antagonistic, and memorial dialogue of any crime series."
—Bookgasm

Praise for Joe R. Lansdale's Hap and Leonard series

"Hap and Leonard function as a sort of Holmes and Watson—if Holmes and Watson had had more lusty appetites and less refined educations and spent their lives in East Texas. . . . Not only funny, but also slyly offers acute commentary on matters of race, friendship andlove in small-town America."
—New York Times

"Lansdale reveals the human condition—our darkest secrets and our proudest moments, all within the unlikely confines of an East Texas adventure featuring the two scruffiest protagonists in modern crime fiction."
—Booklist

"Hilarious. . . . Addictively scarfable. . . . Lansdale excels at dialogue, especially Hap and Leonard's lewd insult-a-thons. . . . Two thumbs-up, and pardon the barbecue smears."
—Texas Monthly

"Joe R. Lansdale is one of a kind. His Hap and Leonard novels should be read and treasured."
—James Swain, author of Take Down

"As usual, the dialogue is deadpan tart and the actio extreme but convincing. . . . Lansdale once again prove he's the East Texas master of redneck noir."

—Publishers Weekly (on Hyenas)

Praise for Joe R. Lansdale

"There's no bullshit in a Joe Lansdale book. There's everything a good story needs, and nothing it doesn't."
—Christopher Moore, author of Secondhand Souls

"[Joe Lansdale has] a folklorist's eye for telling detail and a front-porch raconteur's sense of pace . . . a considerable literary intelligence at work."
—New York Times Book Review

"Joe Lansdale is a born storyteller."
—Robert Bloch, author of Psycho

"Joe Lansdale simply must be read."
—Robert Crais, author of the Elvis Cole and Joe Pike novels

"Read Joe Lansdale and see the true writer's gift."
—Andrew Vachss, author of Shockwave

"Among the best fiction writers in America today, Joe Lansdale turns on the juice and cuts the damn thing loose. Enjoy the ride!"
—Kinky Friedman, author of Ten Little New Yorkers

"Hunter S. Thompson meets Stephen King."
—Charles de Lint, author of The Onion Girl

"A master at taking a simple everyday event and turning reality upside down."

—Mystery Scene

"A folklorist's eye for telling detail and a front-porch raconteur's sense of pace." — NEW YORK TIMES BOOK REVIEW

About The Author
BOOKS BY JOE R. LANSDALE

To the memory of friend, fine actor, photographer, artist, and filmmaker Bill Paxton, who was taken way too soon

It is wiser to find out than to suppose.

—Mark Twain

Question with boldness even the existence of a god; because, if there be one, he must more approve the homage of reason, than that of blindfolded fear.

—Thomas Jefferson

Even when I'm doing something enjoyable, it seems death and destruction lurk nearby. I might not recognize those dual demons right away, but they're out there.

They might arrive in a pickup truck, and those in it may seem at first like a lot of people I might see. Just folks going about their business.

But they may be carriers of a repulsive kind of disease, and there are many symptoms. Hate and prejudice, ignorance and a profound pride in what they don't know. They are those who go with their gut, which is about as accurate as throwing chicken bones or reading signs in frog entrails.

I don't know they're coming until they're there, and even then, I might not understand exactly what has walked into my life. I may think, considering my experience, that I'll know right away if something is going to go dark and wet, but I still get fooled, and their kind of disease can have a ripple effect; it's not just their viewpoint, it's how their viewpoint affects others—they spread their germs without even being aware of it.

I was in the side yard with Brett, enjoying our Saturday, and a fine April afternoon, cooking up burgers, bratwurst, and weenies on the grill. Their aroma in the air was thick enough, if you smacked your lips you could taste them.

We were celebrating. Three hours before, me and Brett had gotten married by the LaBorde justice of the peace. No Bible, no preacher, just the law. Me and her had talked about pulling that trigger for some years, and finally we had gone and done it. I couldn't have been happier.

When we got married we had a small crowd there at the JP's office, close friends and a few strays we had taken in, and they were coming over in a little while to enjoy our wedding picnic. We had a long folding-leg table laid out with paper plates and cups, and an ice chest with a bag of ice in it. We had folding chairs stacked on the ground, ready for use.

I was scraping a burger off the grill, flipping it.

"I thought we might go to Paris for a honeymoon," Brett said, "but then I got to thinking about a cookout in the yard and nixed it."

"Yeah. French cooking can kiss my ass, baby. I'm doing burgers and dogs."

"Don't burn them this time," Brett said.

"Nope. I'm on it. And you know what, everything goes well, we can play horseshoes after lunch, and later tonight you can play with my ass."

"Oh, you charmer."

"That's right, baby. Stick with me and you'll be farting through silk."

A white pickup coasted to the curb in front of our house and parked next to the oak tree that grew near the street. It wasn't a truck that belonged to one of our guests. It wasn't a truck that belonged to anybody I knew.

The tires on the truck were so high that when the door opened, the driver, a thin, thirtyish man with wiry muscles and sandy-blond hair, practically had to dangle himself down to the curb. On the other side a woman worked her way out of the passenger seat and came around the front of the truck. She had lowered some kind of step stool to make her exit. I caught a glimpse of it from under the truck. Both of them probably had nosebleeds from sitting so high.

They started across the yard. It made me a little nervous, especially when I saw the T-shirt the man was wearing. It was white with blue lettering on the front that read WHITE IS RIGHT. Not one of my sentiments, even though my skin is as pale as milk when it isn't tanned or sunburned.

The young man had on black jeans and lace-up boots and so many tattoos visible on his arms and neck that, from a distance, I thought he was wearing long sleeves. Close up I could see more tattoos through the thin fabric of his T-shirt. I assumed he might have others in places less interesting to see, and a box of stick-on tattoos at home along with a pointed white hood for those special evenings out with the Klan. That may sound judgmental, but hey, that T-shirt told me a lot.

The woman was probably in her late fifties, garbed up in what I think of as traditional Pentecostal style, meaning her brown hair was in a bun so tall and wide she could have hidden an electric mixer under it, and she was wearing a blue-jean dress that fell almost to her ankles and was capped off by clunky black boots that looked one grade up from orthopedic shoes. She didn't have on any makeup, not even lipstick or eyeliner. From certain religious points of view, God and Jesus get all worked up about hairdos and makeup but couldn't seem to end a war anywhere or kill a disease. I thought maybe God had his priorities out of whack.

Those two looked so much like stereotypes it wouldn't have surprised me to discover they had venomous snakes in their pockets and could speak in tongues.

The man slowed and let the woman take the lead. She came right to me, stuck out her hand, and I shook it. She didn't offer it to Brett. The man didn't offer his hand to either of us. He stood there with his hands in his pockets. One eyelid spasmed from time to time, as if being periodically electrocuted. I could have sworn I saw one of his neck tattoos crawl under his shirt, but I suppose it was a shifting of the light.

Up close I could see some of the tattoos were professional and some were the sort you do yourself or get in prison, or perhaps a three-year-old with a carving knife and a bottle of ink had been hired to mark him up.

"You're the one's got that private detective agency, aren't you?" the woman said.

"She does," I said, nodding at Brett. "I work for her."

"Oh, I thought you owned it and had her and that…colored fellow working for you. What's he do there?"

"Eats cookies and drinks coffee, from what I can tell," I said.

"He works there, same as this man, who, by the way, is my husband."

I liked the way Brett said that. I felt like a big dog. I was so happy I wanted to wag my tail.

"You work for your wife?" the man said. It was like his mind had just snapped to attention.

"It's either that or she doesn't let me eat."

"Sometimes, when he's sassy or acting a little hysterical, I make him stand in the yard and hold a heavy rock over his head," Brett said.

The woman grinned a little, but the young man looked at me as if he were concerned I not only didn't wear the pants in the family but might have accidentally cooked my dick on the grill in place of a sausage.

"We looked you up in the phone book. Drove by your office a few times," the woman said. "We asked around about y'all, trying to decide."

"Decide what?" Brett said.

"We got this problem, and truth is, everyone else turned us down."

"Who's everyone else?" I said.

"The other private detective in town."

"There's another one?" I said.

"And all them over in Tyler and Longview too. Ain't none over in Marvel Creek, which is where we've got the problem, so there wasn't no one to ask there. Cops here can't do nothing. It's out of their jurisdiction."

"Thing is, we heard you had that nig…colored man working there," the young man said, "and that put us off some. At first we thought he just cleaned up the office."

I thought: Bless your little ignorant heart.

"Here's something might put you off even more," I said, and pointed.

Marvin Hanson's car pulled up at the curb, and he and Officer Carroll, as we always called Curt, got out.

Hanson was carrying a twelve-pack of diet sodas under his arm, and Officer Carroll had a twelve-pack of beer under his. The sodas were mostly for me, the beers were for some of the others.

From the backseat came the niece of Leonard's ex-boyfriend John. Her name was Felicity, and she was just out of her teens and had her hair in pigtails today, tied up on both sides with bright blue ribbons.

Finally, there was Reba, the little girl Leonard called the Four-Hundred-Year-Old Vampire Midget. Truth was, twelve years old or not, Reba could be a bitch. She had a mouth like a sailor's and a mind as sharp as a butcher's knife. I had to make sure she didn't get in the beer when no one was watching.

All of them except Officer Carroll were black as black could be, and you could see the man and the woman taking that in, the way soldiers might count their enemies' artillery mounted on a hill. Officer Carroll was Leonard's boyfriend. I kind of figured same-sex relationships were probably on the pair's no-no list as well.

"What's all them colored people showing up for?" the young man said. The way he said that, you could tell he didn't go out and about among those who held different beliefs than his own.

"We're filming a Tarzan movie after lunch," Brett said. "Need a lot of them colored folks for that. Cannibal scenes, you know."

"Yeah, I get to play Tarzan," I said.

“No. You get to be Tarzan’s monkey,” Brett said.

I made a soft chattering sound. I thought it sounded like a monkey, and a damn sexy monkey.

“By the way,” I said, motioning to Marvin and Officer Carroll, “this gentleman is the police chief, and this white fellow works for him.”

No hands were shook. Everyone merely looked at one another for a moment as if all fingers had been dipped in shit.

Marvin said, “We’ll put these in the ice chest,” and he and Officer Carroll went to do just that.

I heard the screen door slam and looked up to see Chance step out on the porch with a large bag of potato chips in either hand. She wasn’t going to please them either. Physically, she was not only made up of whatever I was made up of, but she had her mother’s coloring, her dark skin, fine American Indian and Hispanic features, black hair tied back in a ponytail long enough to use for a lariat. She was beautiful.

Right behind her came Leonard, in charge of a box of vanilla cookies, his black face split with a bright white smile.

I watched the young man fold his arms across his chest, obscuring the writing on his shirt.

Everyone came over and wished us congratulations again—everyone except our surprise guests, of course.

It was then a second wave of guests arrived. Our friend Manuela Martinez got out of her car carrying a large paper bag. She was looking fine and petite in tight jeans and an equally tight orange top, her black hair cut to the shoulders; the white scar that ran from below her left ear to the tip of her chin gave her near-model features a kind of rugged class. I watched her walk toward us. I watched very carefully.

Brett elbowed me. “Watch it, mister.”

“Hey, what was that for?” I said.

“You know,” she said.

On the other side of the car, Cason Statler got out. He too had a paper bag with something in it. We were going to have enough food to feed the proverbial army. I had introduced him to Manny, as we called Manuela, and since that time they had become as tight as superglue in a gnat’s ass.

Cason was one of those guys that got better looking as he got older. White guy with thick, dark hair and a cock-of-the-walk stride, always in shape.

Brett said, “Now I got something to look at.”

“Then we’re even,” I said.

"Not exactly," she said.

The woman and the man from the two-story pickup truck stood stiff, like trees growing in the yard. We had sidelined them. And realizing we were being dicks, even though I thought they deserved it, I said, "Look, you want to talk, we can. On the porch."

They pulled roots and went to the porch and sat down on the glider and waited for us.

Leonard walked up to me, said, "Who are those crackers?"

"Why, those are racists who are a little worried we might have a colored boy working for us."

"Ah, now, Massa Hap, you know I'm one of the good ones."

"Yes, but don't forget your place."

"You mean with my foot up your ass?" he said.

Chance listened to us and smiled. She carried the chips to the table. Me and Brett greeted everybody while Leonard went on over to the porch to make the honkies nervous. He smelled blood in the water.

I gave the spatula to Manny, said, "Don't let the food burn."

"I warn you," Manny said, "what I cook best are kitchens. I've burned down two of them."

"No worries," Brett said. "We're outdoors. If the meat starts to smoke, use the spatula and take them off the grill. If they catch fire, use the spatula to beat out the flames."

"Gotcha," Manny said.

Me and Brett went over to the porch. As we were walking up, I heard Leonard say, “And I had me four of them fat white women in that barn. Lined ’em up against the wall, said, ‘Strip off and bend over and call me Daddy.’ Whole thing only cost me three dollars, and they let me brand them with a hot tire iron for free.”

“Ignore him,” I said.

The woman and the young man looked as if they had just survived a home invasion. The man especially appeared confused, and maybe a little angry, and yet at the same time there was a hesitation. I think he was afraid to say anything directly to Leonard, fearing his mouth might be writing a check his ass couldn’t cash.

All of us were on the porch now, our guests in the glider, me and Brett sitting on the steps, and Leonard leaning against the front door.

“Them two, the colored and the white man, they really law?” the white guy asked.

“Naw,” Leonard said. “We just let Marvin wear a badge and the other one got a cop suit for Christmas. Only reason he isn’t wearing it now is for fear of mustard stains.”

That got a blank look, an expression those two did especially well.

I said, “Yes. They are the real deal. First things first. I sense a disturbance in the color barrier. If you have trouble with black people, brown people, highly attractive redheads like my wife, or exceptional people like myself, then there’s no use in us talking.”

“All except that part about Hap being exceptional is real,” Leonard said.

The man looked at his mother. His eye was twitching a little more frequently now.

His mother said, “I guess we’re okay.”

"I don't know," the man said. "I'm not sure a colored is up to the job. So we need to know how much he'll be involved."

"As much as any of us will," Brett said.

"Though during the middle of the day, I might have to have me a nap," Leonard said.

The man and woman looked at each other, didn't speak, but when they turned back to us, the woman said, "All right, then. Beggars can't be choosers."

"That's the spirit," Leonard said. He was talking cool, but the anger was coming off him like a high fever.

Brett reached out and gently touched Leonard's arm. He calmed beneath her hand.

"Okay, tell us who you are, what you want," Brett said.

"My name is Judith Mulhaney. This is my son, Thomas. What we want is to hire you to find my missing daughter. His sister, Jackie."

"We called her Jackrabbit," Thomas said. "She has these big front teeth. Looked good on her, though. That's how we got to calling her a jackrabbit, saying she had a jackrabbit smile."

"She's been gone from home five years," Judith said. "Be honest, I don't think she's alive. Not to say she's been dead for five years. She was alive during most of that time, we know that. People saw her, but we didn't, just heard how she was doing here and there. Thought eventually, things would work out, that she'd come back to see us, but in the past few months, no one has seen her that we're aware of. Got to say we don't know many people over there well enough to be sure if we're getting the correct news. We kind of keep to ourselves. But I got a bad feeling. A mother knows."

"If anything was done to her," Thomas said, "I got an idea who might have done it."

"We want her back," Judith said, "be it flesh, or be it bones."

"All right," Brett said. "Before we know if we can be of any help, we need to hear the whole story. Need to know if you got money. Investigations don't come cheap."

"You get right to it, don't you?" Judith said.

"I do," Brett said. "You want us to do this, put us to work, you got to understand I don't like you or your son. You've insulted Leonard here several times and are too dense to know it or too insensitive to care. You've done everything but call him the N-word."

"I can say 'nigger,'" Leonard said. "It's okay I do. 'Nigger, nigger, nigger.'"

"Goddamn it, Leonard," Brett said.

"Just saying," Leonard said.

"That's what I don't get," Thomas said. "You can say it, but I can't."

"Oh, you can say it," Leonard said, "but say it with me standing here, next time you say it, it might be through a gap in your teeth. I say 'nigger,' we call it ironic, don't we, Hap?"

"Ironic," I said.

"You say it, and we knock your teeth out."

"It don't seem fair," Thomas said.

"It's on account of things having been so damn fair for us dark-skinned folks all these years. That too is irony, if you're wondering. And that doesn't mean something you do with starch and an ironing board."

"I know what 'irony' means," Thomas said. I didn't think he sounded all that convincing.

"Look here," I said. "Me and Brett, we're celebrating, and I don't want to deal with this. I'm sorry, but Jackie's been gone five years, she can wait a day. This is our day. Meet us at our office tomorrow at ten a.m., if you're serious. You know where the office is, I take it?"

Judith and Thomas both nodded in concert.

"And by the way. How did you find our house?" I said.

"Address is in the phone book," Thomas said.

"We looked up Brett Sawyer, like on the agency listing, and there's a house address for Brett Sawyer," Judith said. "We just drove over."

"Oh," I said.

So much for our Fortress of Solitude.

Me and Brett lay in bed breathing hard, our bodies covered in sweat. I was holding her in my arms and the air was beginning to cool. She reached over and grabbed the sheet and pulled it over us.

"Ah," I said, "you're blocking my view."

"You've seen enough for one night. My ass hurts."

"That was our first sex as a happily married couple," I said.

"Not to look a gift horse in the mouth, but it was a whole lot like the sex we had before we were married."

"This is true," I said. "But good, nonetheless."

"Absolutely. I'm glad we finally did it, Hap. Married, not had sex. Well, that came out wrong. I'm glad we did both. I don't know why being married matters, but it does. I didn't think it would. I knew you wanted to, and then I wanted to because you did, and now that we're married, I do feel different. I like it. Of course, I had a couple beers at lunch."

"It's a solid commitment, and I think it helps on our taxes."

"Married people break up all the time," she said.

"Not this time."

"Right answer," she said. "Do you think we were kind of mean to those people today?"

"I do. And they had it coming."

"Maybe we just fulfilled their idea of what liberal-minded folks are supposed to be like. Well, you're the most liberal-minded, and Leonard, he's not liberal, so maybe I don't know shit."

"Leonard was a real asshole," I said. "Talking about lining women up against the wall. He should have said men if he really wanted to get to them. Women aren't his attraction."

"I understand the sentiment," Brett said, and rubbed my thigh under the sheet.

“I don’t know if I want to help those two,” I said. “I really don’t like them.”

“Jackrabbit.”

“I bet she hated that name.”

“Probably didn’t use it with the general public,” I said.

“Thinking it over,” Brett said, “I think Leonard showed tremendous restraint.”

“Yeah, couple years back he would have set their truck on fire with them in it.”

“Think they’ll show up at the office in the morning?”

“I don’t know. But if you keep rubbing my thigh, I can tell you what will show up.”

“That’s kind of the idea,” she said. “Question? You mind I’m keeping my last name, not taking yours?”

“Of course not. I’m keeping mine. I don’t want to be Hap Sawyer any more than you want to be Brett Collins. I have thought about changing my name to Swinging Dick, though. Think that suits me better.”

“Oh, baby. Name like that, wouldn’t you need enough to swing, to give it meaning?”

“Oh, that hurt.”

Brett laughed that throaty laugh she has and took hold of my head and pulled me to her and kissed me.

In the morning, we got up and had coffee and buttered toast, then showered together. It felt funny having the house all to ourselves again. First Leonard had moved in for a while, then he was gone, then Chance came in, and then she got an apartment and was out, then Reba the Four-Hundred-Year-Old Vampire Midget stayed with us for a couple of nightmarish weeks, then Reba moved in with Chance, who could stand her best, and then Buffy, the dog Leonard had rescued but who lived with us, moved in with Chance as well. Buffy and Reba had the least bit of luggage, unless you counted all that was packed up in their pasts. Mistreated girl, mistreated dog.

After showering, we ended up having sex on the couch, just because we could, then we got dressed, and Brett drove us to the office in her car. The bike shop under our office was opening up. I always tried to take a glance at the owner, a beautiful blond lady who wore shorts most of the time, even in cool weather, and in cold weather she wore yoga pants that didn't do her any harm either. I didn't see her this morning, but I looked anyway. I love my redheaded woman, but I won't lie: I enjoy examining the female form. I like to think it's the potential artist in me. But it's probably hormones. I think I got an extra share.

Leonard was already in the office making coffee and eating from a bag of vanilla cookies. There was a large watermelon on the desk next to a stack of moon pies and a can of malt liquor. On the wall, his fedora hung on a nail, and beside it, on another nail, was a straw cowboy hat about the size of a bird feeder. He wore hats from time to time, these and another one he kept at home, an actual deerstalker cap, like Sherlock Holmes in the movies, but he was going through a hatless period and had taken to shaving his head. I think this was due to his hair thinning.

As we came in, Leonard said, “And how are the newlyweds?”

“About like we were before we were newlyweds,” Brett said. “Except, oh my God, the sex was amazing. We saw little stars.”

“Really, we did,” I said. “We bumped our heads on the headboard.”

“I don’t want to hear about it,” Leonard said. “The idea of heterosexual sex always makes me queasy.”

“Now that we’ve got that out of the way,” I said, “why is there a watermelon, moon pies, and a can of malt liquor on the desk?”

“I was hoping, those two showed up, I would fit the stereotype. Just love jacking with them.”

“Not today,” Brett said. “Put that stuff out of sight. I thought about it all night. They may be assholes, but if they hire us, they’re our assholes, so let’s treat them like clients. We can dislike them on our off-hours.”

“You’re no fun,” Leonard said, but he started moving the stuff off the desk and into the closet. He said, “I actually did bring all this stuff from home, except the malt liquor. That’s Officer Carroll’s. Had time, I’d have bought a bucket of chicken to go with this stuff.”

“Just finish putting it away,” Brett said. Then to me: “And you, mister. You can stop grinning. There’s sweeping up needed around here.”

“Yes, ma’am,” I said.

I got the broom and dustpan and went at it, especially under the desk, where dirt was inclined to mound up from our shoes.

“Ha-ha,” Leonard said, watching me sweep. “You missed a spot.”

I finished up sweeping, checked the clock, saw it was a minute before ten.

Right then Brett said, “Here they are.”

She was standing by the window looking out at the parking lot. Leonard and I went over to look out with her. The same truck on big high tires was there, and the side we could see was the passenger side this time, and when Judith opened the door, she pushed a button and a series of steps folded out of the truck and down to the ground. She came down them, hit another button, and they folded up. Smaller tires could have eliminated the steps and the money required for them, but I guess their version of Jesus liked white people to have plain hair and clothes and an expensive, big-ass, gas-guzzling truck.

Judith closed the door and started toward our office with her son, Thomas, who came around the front of the truck and joined her.

“I was hoping they wouldn’t show up,” Leonard said. “Hit by a car or something.”

“That’s not nice,” Brett said.

“Like I don’t know,” Leonard said.

Brett sat down behind the desk, Leonard leaned against the wall, and I took a seat on the edge of the desk, near enough so I could bask in Brett’s glow.

We listened to them climbing the stairs, and after a pause, they came in. The woman was dressed the same as yesterday, but Thomas had traded in his WHITE IS RIGHT T-shirt for a black one that had HARLEY-DAVIDSON written on it above the company’s logo.

“Would y’all like some watermelon?” Leonard said. “I got one in the closet. I like to keep them around. I always got one at the ready. Moon pies too. Or maybe you’d like to wet your whistle with some malt liquor.”

They looked at Leonard but didn’t respond. Sometimes that’s all you can do, ignore him. He’s kind of like a dangerous wild animal; responses only encourage them.

Brett glared at him. Leonard gave them a little smile, like a farmer who had been caught with his finger in a duck’s ass.

I offered them the client chairs, and they took their seats. When they were comfortable, Brett said, “Listen. We were rude to you yesterday. I don’t apologize for why I was rude, but I apologize for being rude. We take your case on, you can be assured you’ll get our best service.”

“You won’t just take our money,” Thomas said.

“No,” Brett said. “We won’t. First, you have a photo of Jackie?”

Judith produced a couple from her purse and handed them to Brett. Brett looked at them, handed them to me. I had expected to see a girl with prominent teeth so extended she could eat an ear of corn through a split-rail fence, but Jackie was actually quite attractive, long, dark hair, the teeth even and white, but large. It made her kind of sexy-looking, I thought. She was probably in her early twenties in that shot, and it was obviously taken in a photo booth. The other was a picture of her and an older man, both leaning on a pickup truck. In that one she was younger, late teens, maybe, a little lost-looking, her face having yet to grow into her teeth. The guy was perhaps ten years older, or had lived a rugged life. He was big and dressed in camouflage pants and a white T-shirt. Guess a deer saw him from the belt down, he’d be invisible out there in the woods. There was about him a redneck air I always despise, a look on his face like a man that embraced ignorance as truth and lack of interest in education as a reward.

I gave the photos to Leonard. While he looked at them, Judith began to explain about Jackie's disappearance.

"Fellow that's with her," she said, "that's George Jeeter, over in Marvel Creek. He took up with her when she was sixteen. He's thirty in that picture. He'd be right on thirty-five or so now. Owns a junkyard. Jackie was always good with numbers, made good grades in school. She did George's books, or computer records, whatever it was. She wanted to be an accountant. George kicked her out, or she left him. Not clear on that, but they quit being together, we know that much."

"I'm presuming you went to Marvel Creek for a peek?" Brett said.

"Did," Thomas said. "Went over there and found Jeeter, but he claimed he hadn't seen her, not since he let her go. Said he didn't want to stay with her because she nagged him. I thought right then he'd done something to her."

"But you don't know that for a fact?" I said.

"No," Thomas said. "Guess I don't, but he's that kind of man. He don't go to church none, even though he's got the right way of seeing things on certain issues."

"You mean he's a racist, like you two?" Leonard said.

"Segregationist," Thomas said. "I ain't got a thing against niggers—sorry. Habit."

"I bet," Leonard said, and the look on his face might have made Thomas pee himself a little.

Thomas rushed to doctor the wound. "Ain't got nothing against you or your kind, long as we all stay in our place, same as birds do. You don't see no mockingbird mating with a blue jay, now, do you?"

"People aren't birds," I said.

"Tommy, you are seriously stupid," Leonard said.

Thomas's response to this was "No one calls me Tommy."

"But they must call you stupid," Leonard said.

Thomas edged off his chair a little, but just a little. Leonard didn't blink. Tension in the room grew thick as cold molasses.

"Let's forget all that for now," Brett said. "Judith. Give us anything you think we should know. Leonard, tuck it back in, baby. We all know who's the man here. You're manly too, Hap."

"Thanks," I said. "I wasn't having any doubts."

"Well, I don't know how to say this," Judith said, "and I ain't proud of it, but now and again, when her and George would split up, 'cause they did that often, she'd run with colored boys."

"Was she a fast runner?" Leonard said.

"I don't mean like track," Judith said.

“I know what you meant,” Leonard said.

Brett said, “Ground rules. We will all be polite. Especially you, Leonard.”

“She ran with colored because she knew that would bother George,” Judith said. “Or that’s what I think. She wasn’t as particular as the rest of us. She liked life a little on the trashy side.”

I heard Leonard sigh like air going out of a punctured tire. Brett shot him a look. He twisted his mouth as if to knot it and stayed quiet.

Brett turned her attention back to our potential clients.

“So, you’re thinking it might not be George did her in but these colored boys, as you call them? And you, Thomas, you think it was George?”

“We don’t know nothing for sure,” Thomas said. “Did, we wouldn’t need you people. But yeah, my guess is George did her in. I’d like to kill who did it myself, but I don’t want to get cross with the law. Already done that. Spent a little time in Huntsville. Another strike, I’ll be doing prison laundry for the rest of my life.”

“You know the names of the black men she dated?” I asked.

“Only know of one, the main one, goes by the name Ace,” Thomas said. “Me and Mom went asking around, and we didn’t find out much but that. It wasn’t like we were hanging with the same people she was hanging with.”

“You mean the black people,” Leonard said.

“Yeah, that’s right,” Thomas said. “On the other hand, George might have done something for his honor, and maybe that’s all right, maybe I can understand that some, but still—”

“It’s your sister,” I said, finishing his thought.

“That’s right,” Thomas said. “Thing I want to know is if he done it. And for what reason. Hell, I’ve thought about killing her myself for breaking sacred bonds. Some things are about honor and blood.”

“You mean she shouldn’t have crossed the color line?” I said.

“That’s right,” Thomas said. “It’s in the Bible. You don’t do that. I got a twenty-two at the house, and I might be inclined to use it on her. I sure thought about it.”

“It’s also in the Bible not to eat pork,” I said, “but you look like a bacon-and-eggs kind of guy to me.”

“It was okay for Jesus to eat what he wanted,” Thomas said. “And I said I thought about it, but she was all right, except for not knowing where the boundary lines ought to be. Me and her had fun as kids. We got along good then.”

I thought him saying how she was all right sounded about as sincere as a lion trying to talk an antelope into cuddling.

“They did have fun,” Judith said. “They were little scamps.”

“Tell you what,” Brett said. “I’m going to give you a pen and a tablet, and I want you to write down any information you have about Jackie and people she might know, black or white, the connections they had with her. Close friends, relatives, you name it. Not just people you might think could have done something to her but even those you feel certain wouldn’t do anything to her. Write it all down, and if you have a stray thought about this or that, something pertaining to Jackie, put that down too.”

Brett opened the desk drawer, pulled out a couple of yellow-paper tablets and slid them across the desk, gave them a pen apiece.

They took the tablets and started writing. We all sat in silence while they did. The only sounds in the room were the ball-point pens scratching on paper.

When they finished, they slid the tablets and pens back. Brett picked up Judith’s tablet, and I picked up Thomas’s. I had a pang of sadness when I saw he’d misspelled every other word and couldn’t write a sentence that was a complete thought. He had some ideas he wanted to express, and they were pretty much the same thing he had said before, about Jackie maybe being dishonorable for running with colored. He spelled “honor” as “oner.” I felt sorry for him right then. I wished I had never said a harsh word to him or her. I felt like a bully, picking on a mentally deficient mark.

It was a feeling I knew would soon pass. Sometimes there are people who deserve to be treated like assholes. I know I’ve had it coming more than once.

“How about Jackie’s father?” Brett asked. “What’s his story?”

“Sebastian. His name’s on there. I pretty much raised the kids alone,” Judith said. “He went another way, lost his religion, joined the Presbyterians or some such.”

“Also Christians,” I said.

“Not according to the Bible,” Judith said. It was as if she were trying to explain to us that red wasn’t green. It was obvious to her.

“Tomayto, tomahto,” Leonard said.

“The true word of the Lord will be known to those who wish to accept it,” Judith said. “Presbyterians are infidels.”

“Tomayto, tomahto,” Leonard said again.

“So he doesn’t have any connection to the children?” Brett said.

“He let them go a long time ago, and we let him go. He said he had to search for his feelings or some such. Started preaching false doctrine. He had some odd ideas about dying and about how he wanted to die. I don’t really talk about that ’cause I don’t understand it much.”

“Where does he live?” Brett said.

“Marvel Creek,” Judith said, “but you don’t need to talk to him. He doesn’t know a thing about the children after Thomas was twelve and Jackrabbit was thirteen. Didn’t deal with them at all. Besides, we don’t really know where he lives over there.”

“Christianity sure holds the family together, don’t it?” Leonard said.

I saw Thomas move as if he might get out of the chair, which was exactly what Leonard wanted. He gave Leonard a hard look that melted fast as a snowflake on a hot stove, and he suddenly found more comfort in the chair than before, located a spot on the window behind Brett and concentrated on that. My guess was being here with us was his idea of hell turned true.

After a few more questions from Brett, they gave her a fistful of money that was mostly ones and fives and would cover about two days’ work. They promised more just as soon as Thomas got paid over at the chicken plant, a place where I had worked briefly. I didn’t tell him we had the same alma mater.

They got up and left. Brett picked up Judith’s tablet and stared at it.

“There goes the fucking Madonna on earth and one of her little fucking shit-ass scamps,” Leonard said.

“Truth is, I feel sorry for them,” Brett said.

“Me too,” I said. “For a minute.”

For lunch, we went to an El Salvadorean place that had only been open a short time and had been built inside of what was once a tire-and-lube business. They had rickety tables and rickety chairs and really good food there. The tires had long been vacated, in case you were curious, and I presumed there was no lube business going on in any manner, shape, or form.

I had my favorite meal, jalapeños and cheese wrapped in grilled bacon with a side of rice and charro beans and a chicken tamale wrapped in a plantain husk, along with plantain chips for the table. Brett had chicken quesadillas, and Leonard had an enchilada about the size of a pontoon boat. I don't know what the people at the table near us had, but they seemed to be enjoying it.

"The father," Brett said. "They didn't say much about him, but I think we ought to start there, find out who he is. He's in the same town where Jackie disappeared. That's quite a coincidence. He could be hiding her. She could have gone there looking for him, and in fact, that makes a lot of sense."

"Their dislike of him kind of shuts off their thinking," I said.

"I don't believe they had a lot of thinking to shut off," Leonard said. "I'm surprised they got the brain cells to remind their bodies to breathe."

"Our dislike of them might shut off our thinking, now that I consider it," I said.

"Sucks to be them," Leonard said. "But, yeah, dear old Dad might have seen Jackrabbit last. For all we know she's living in Marvel Creek selling antiques, is married to a Klan Grand Wizard, and has four kids and a pet goat, all with bodies covered in tattoos and their own nine-millimeter pistols, including the goat."

“Goats prefer something lighter,” I said. “Maybe a twenty-five-caliber. Goes with their outfit.”

“Boys, that’s enough,” Brett said. “What I’m thinking is you and Leonard go to Marvel Creek. I’ll see if I can find some of the others on this list. Chance comes in this afternoon, and I’ll get her to help me. The Internet ought to be for something other than me looking up photos of men with huge dicks.”

“Zing,” Leonard said.

I ignored both of them.

“Well, we got his name, so we can get started,” Leonard said. “Sebastian Mulhaney. What a name.”

“Beats Jackrabbit,” I said. “Drop us off at my car, hon, and we’ll go. You can make phone calls and find addresses. Me and Leonard are people persons.”

“You, maybe. Leonard, not so much,” Brett said. “And I’m not that sure about you.”

“This is true,” Leonard said. “Nobody likes me and I don’t like nobody. I hope they all get ants in their ass.”

I rolled us into Marvel Creek about three o'clock in the afternoon on a warm day with a dry wind blowing. Way to the west, clouds were brewing like darkened beer suds, bundling up raindrops, rolling them slowly in our direction.

I grew up in Marvel Creek. Before I was born it had been a rough but thriving oil town, back in the thirties, then it became a rough played-out oil town in the fifties. It was made up of the descendants of oil-field trash, as they sometimes called themselves, thugs, prostitutes, pimps and gamblers, a few lucky oil tycoons. Back then, unless you were one of the lucky ones who struck it rich and stayed rich, it was a town where broken dreams got even more broken and crawled off to die in the river bottoms.

You were on the poor end of things, the blue-collar end of things, you saw stuff the better-off folks didn't see and sometimes refused to admit existed. Things the cops didn't always report and were actually sometimes responsible for. Black bodies, wrapped in chains, slipped off into the muddy Sabine; women and wives who wore black eyes so often they might have been part raccoon. Fights and bad deeds, enough to fill a thousand books, things done in the dark, and on the river, and in the deep green woods, even deeper back then, before lumber mills became pulp-wood serial killers and ravaged trees in the name of progress and the almighty dollar.

That muddy brown river winds along at one end of town, crawling under a long bridge, pushing mud and snakes and fish and debris all the way to the Gulf of Mexico. I spent a lot of time along that river and on it in rowboats and motorboats and even inner tubes. Once, long ago when we were young, me and Leonard even found a sunken boat out there with bodies in it.

Another time my ex-wife got us into some bad business searching for treasure in the river. We found the treasure, but in the end, it brought more pain than satisfaction.

Back then, when you crossed the bridge on your way out, you came to Hell's Half Mile, a line of honky-tonks full of drunken patrons trying to wash down poverty, bad marriages, and gone-to-hell children. Whores worked there, taking customers to little trailers out back. There was no family night.

Knives and guns came out on many occasions, mostly on Saturday nights. The altercation might have to do with some whore's attentions or with patrons' differing political views or their disagreements on the finer points of religion ("Love thy neighbor" with a load of lead or a sharp knife), but mostly it had to do with bottled-up rage from being poor and knowing full well there had to be something better than a life of hard work, hot nights, and empty bottles, and knowing too that if there was, you weren't going to get a taste of it. Mix it all with alcohol, and it was like trying to blend fire with gasoline.

In time, to the delight of churchgoing women and to the disappointment of beer drinkers and whoremongers, the tonks went out of business. The whores and the pimps and the shooters and knife fighters went with them or ended up on the school board, and the former patrons drank at home. The old buildings were burned down for the insurance money or turned weather-beaten and vacant.

Not so many people ran the river and the woods like before. A great used-book store had grown up in the town. It nearly took up an entire block, giving way on one corner to a Mexican restaurant. The restaurant's site had been a bank when I was a kid. The town was now known for antiques. It had become respectable.

Respectable place or not, driving around it always made me tremble a bit, like the past was blowing a cold wind over my heart. Always got the impression that the old world I had known was still out there, just one bloody scratch below the surface, and all it took was the right incantation to release it.

Or merely the arrival of good ole us, Hap and Leonard.

Brett sent to my phone the address she found for Jackrabbit's daddy. We put the address into the GPS and drove over there.

To our surprise, it was a church. When I was young it had been a theater. I had watched many a movie there, had seen cowboys and Indians ride, vampires suck blood, monsters jump out of the shadows, and I had seen crime shows, musicals, and stories of romance. Those days were gone.

There were white crosses painted on the old glass doors, the ticket booth had a wooden barrier over the ticket slot, and the door that led into the booth from inside the theater was now a solid piece of wall. Where garish movie posters had once filled frames on either side of the outside theater archway were now posters of a different sort of garishness, one with Jesus on the cross. The crown of thorns on his forehead had thorns the size of tenpenny nails stuck into his flesh, causing blood to leak down his face and drip over his lips. Beneath Jesus, a Roman soldier who looked a lot like John Wayne was holding a spear and was looking up at him on the cross with an expression of either satisfaction, boredom, or wonder. Maybe they were discussing the weather.

"Hey, you're going to get wet up there," says the soldier.

"Hell, don't I know it," says Jesus back.

On the other side of the building, there was a less dramatic poster with Jesus standing on a high place looking up to the heavens. People sat on the ground near him, looking where he was looking, and there were sheep and lambs looking up as well, unaware that they might soon be decorating a plate with some fig jelly.

We pulled on the front door, but it was locked, so we went around back, down an alley composed of cracked bricks, and found a door there that was wide open.

“Way I heard it,” I said.

For a moment we stood there, considering, then finally went inside. It was deep dark in there and I used the flashlight on my phone to guide us down a space where odds and ends had been kept, and were still kept, but now those odds and ends were not movie-related. There were hymnbooks and Bibles, some of them quite ragged, and a number of cardboard boxes containing who knew what.

After a few moments, the hallway terminated at a door, one of those you push against. We pushed and came into the theater itself. It was lit up as bright as a visit to the sun, and it was cold with air-conditioning, the way a theater ought to be. I turned off my phone light.

The old theater seats were still there, but they had been reupholstered, and the carpet between the seats no longer sucked at your shoes due to sticky soda spills. It was bright red again and soft.

There was a guy on his knee, leaning into an aisle seat, his head out of sight. An elbow appeared from time to time, moving back and forth. We heard a soft clicking sound.

“Hello, the theater,” Leonard said.

The man stopped doing what he was doing and came to his feet. He had a staple gun in his hand.

“Sorry to barge in,” I said. “The door was open.”

“Quite all right,” the man said. “I opened it to bring some stuff in, forgot to close it.”

The man was about six five, broad-shouldered, with a bit of belly that anyone with any sense and experience would know wouldn’t slow him down if he decided to pull your head off and shit down your neck. He had a well-trimmed black beard and longish black hair that fell down his neck and over his ears. I guess he was about my age, give or take a year or two.

We walked up to him.

“Can I help you gentlemen?” he said.

“Hope so,” I said, and stuck out my hand. He placed the stapler on the closest theater seat, shook my hand, then shook Leonard’s.

“I was stapling upholstery on some of the seats.”

“I used to come here to watch movies,” I said.

“Ah, me too,” he said. “Wait a minute. Aren’t you Hap Collins?”

“I am.”

“You remember me?”

“Sorry.”

“Gary Jamesway.”

“You played football. I think you were a year behind me.”

“It was baseball, and I wasn’t very good at it.”

“Not the way I remember it,” I said. I had never really kept up with baseball, but there was talk about Jamesway all the time. I remembered it now. Yeah. Baseball, not football. “You went pro, right?”

“I was okay when we played who we played in high school. Graduated, got a chance with the Astros, but it turned out that against someone who could really throw, I couldn’t hit, and against someone who could really hit, I couldn’t catch, and I couldn’t run fast enough to match anybody. I was a high-school whiz and a professional dud. I warmed a bench for a couple of seasons, then they let me go, and I was glad of it. Haven’t picked up a baseball since.”

“At least you got to the show,” Leonard said.

“Yeah,” Jamesway said, “there was that.”

“You’re not actually who we’re looking for,” I said, “but glad to see you.”

“Who are you looking for?”

I told him.

“Oh my, Sebastian. May the Lord watch over his confused and tortured soul.”

“I’m thinking Sebastian’s story isn’t a happy one,” Leonard said.

“Might say it has a weird ending.”

“I thought he lived here,” I said. “Or preached here.”

“He did, once. I own the place now. I’m the preacher. Actually, I was the preacher a year before he left. He stopped showing up to preach, and when I started, I lost most of his flock, but in a short time I got a new one. It’s growing all the time. New people are coming in. The things he taught, they couldn’t stand the bright of the light.”

“That so,” Leonard said.

“Some years back I came here and heard him preach, and I didn’t like him. Stayed after one of his sermons and talked to him about, how shall I say, being more Christ-like and less Joshua-like, since being Christians, we weren’t supposed to be worshipping the old ways, but the new ways of Jesus. You see, he talked the Old Testament and tossed in lizard men from time to time.”

“Say what?” Leonard said.

“He and a large portion of his flock were what you might call conspiracy theorists. They didn’t require proof, only a need they wanted to fulfill. Something in their lives that was more interesting than braces on their kids' teeth, nursing a hangover, or paying bills while navigating a changing world. They weren't up to it. But if they could believe lizard men were out there, messing everything up for the rest of us, they could have a satisfying creepy feeling that was preferable to an unsatisfying feeling of boredom and routine and unimportance."

"His wife said he was a Presbyterian," I said.

"Hardly," Jamesway said, and laughed.

"So you told him he was full of it," I said, "and that lizard men had yet to show up, and he said, 'How about you preach?'"

"He was starting to fall apart. Had a lot of hate and disappointment in him. Didn't really seem to care about much at that point. He surprised me by offering me a chance to give a sermon the next Sunday. I didn't know it then, but he was looking for a way to get out of his responsibilities, and I came at the right time. His crowd was not my crowd. They left, and I stayed, and Sebastian stayed. But in the back. Drinking most of the time. Then a young woman came around for a while, and then she stopped coming, and he went away. Short time after that they found his remains in Davy Crockett National Forest. A hiker came across it. His corpse was in bad shape, but they could tell his chest had been split open, his ribs separated with a hammer. His heart and some other organs were missing, and they didn't think it was decay or animals that got to them."

"Damn lizard men," Leonard said.

Jamesway smiled.

"The grave he was in was deep and wide, but it had eroded. He had that wound in his chest and a jump rope around his neck. They concluded he was strangled with that, which considering they found it wrapped around his neck a couple of times doesn't sound like great police deduction to me. A cocker spaniel could have figured that out. He had his hands in the pockets of his pants, like he was relaxing. The bones of his hands, actually. Like he'd stuck them in there and held them there while he was strangled."

I was surprised Brett hadn't found Sebastian's death notice on the Internet, and I said so to Jamesway.

"It was just this week he was confirmed dead, but they figured he'd been dead for a couple weeks, give or take a weekend. No one went to the trouble to put an obituary in the paper. I didn't bother with it either, I'm ashamed to say. I don't know why I even came to this church. I like to think God had plans for me."

“What I want to know, is there any money in it?” Leonard said.

Jamesway laughed a little. It wasn’t something that would turn contagious, but there was humor there.

“Not that much. Not unless you want to be a giant blowhard like some evangelists are, always assuring you of a place in heaven if you’ll send them money. People can be easily conned out of their possessions and their common sense if you use religion as a lever. I don’t believe like that. Sebastian made a deal with me to buy the place. I got a loan, and I’m paying it off. Got it for a song. He had my money when we left the real estate agent’s office, or the check, anyway. When they found him, he didn’t have a check, or any money at all. Hey, let’s go up front to the office. I got coffee there, and I’m ready for some.”

We tagged along through the side door that led out of the main part of the theater and into a lobby that seemed so much smaller to me than in my memory. Fact was, the whole theater seemed a miniature of how I recalled it. I missed the smell of hot buttered popcorn and the way drinks fizzed in paper cups and made your nose hairs twitch. I missed being ten years old.

In Jamesway's office, which was a bit tight, we sat on some foldout chairs, and he settled in behind a cheap desk after he started the coffeemaker. The desk shook a little when he put his arms on it.

"This place, Hap, remember the black folks had to go up into the balcony, weren't allowed on the bottom floor?" Jamesway said.

"Of course I remember," I said.

"Black people wanted to go to the restroom," Jamesway said, "they had to leave the theater, walk across the street to a concrete bunker with a sign painted over it that said COLORED.

"In high school, I heard from a guy, older than both of us, Hap, that had been a part-time usher here, back when they had ushers, and he said the carpet in the balcony stank of urine. He was angry about it, people peeing on the carpet. He said, 'That's how those people are. Animals.' But he didn't have to cross the street to pee. Didn't have to miss a big chunk of the movie."

"Suppose all this nostalgia you're giving out is because Sebastian wasn't as forward-thinking as you," Leonard said. "We got the idea he left his family because his views had become more mainstream, but you say that ain't so."

"If he was more mainstream than they liked, then they must be way on the far edge of the cliff."

"Right there at the very edge," Leonard said, "looking into the abyss.

And I'm wishing they'd fall in, except we gave our word we'd work for them."

"That means something to you, giving your word?" Jamesway asked.

"It means a lot," Leonard said. "I keep my word until the people who I gave my word to break theirs."

"Fair enough," Jamesway said. "Let me tell you, Sebastian was crazy, talking about lizard men and the apocalypse on the horizon. Worse, he had folks listening to him. For a time, this was a kind of place where people who hated anything different in the social order since 1950 could come and say things they might be reluctant to say out in the open. They hated immigrants, black people, and anyone they considered liberal or progressive. They thought women were deemed by God to be of service to them."

Jamesway got up and grabbed some cups out of a cabinet, poured us some of the coffee, asked how we liked it. We told him. He used artificial creamer and artificial sweetener to fix it up. The coffee tasted like someone had steeped a dead gerbil in it. I drank more than I wanted so as to be polite. I hoped the gerbil had clean feet.

"And what exactly is your denomination?" I said.

"Church of Jesus," he said. "It's new."

"You mean you made it up?" Leonard said.

"Pretty much," he said. "All religions are made up, or they're modifications of what's gone before. I try and teach what some might call a progressive view of the Bible, what others might call blasphemy. There are more people moving in a positive direction than a negative, and I founded my church on that."

"You must not pay attention to elections," I said.

"I believe in people."

"That must take a real job of work, plus overtime," Leonard said.

"It's kind of what my job is," Jamesway said. "Believing and hope. I don't think Noah sailed around with an ark full of animals or that Moses parted the Red Sea, and I'm not even sure Jesus was divine, but I like his message. That's what I believe in."

"And that works for your congregation?" I said.

"I leave out that part about not being sure of Jesus being divine because I think the rest of it is worth it. I don't teach from the Old Testament at all, only the New. But you want to know about Sebastian?"

"Only so we can look for someone else," Leonard said. "His daughter."

"Ah, Jackie," he said. "Called her Jackrabbit."

"That's the one," Leonard said.

"She's the girl I mentioned who came around—well, woman. Interesting character, Jackie. Grew up with Sebastian and her mother and her brother, who, and I shouldn't say such a thing as a servant of God, but if he was a lightbulb he wouldn't light up the inside of a frog's ass. I'm basing this mostly on what Jackie told me, of course, but he and his mother came here asking about Jackie, Sebastian too. I told them a lot less than I'm telling you. I got bad vibes from the brother. Felt what Jackie'd told me, he confirmed. He was really irked she had been with black men. He felt the family honor had been diminished."

"Their honor was diminished when they were born," Leonard said.

"Well, mother and son have their heads firmly up their asses, but in their own way, they have a code they live by," Jamesway said.

"Hitler lived by a code," Leonard said. "But that didn't keep it from being a bad one."

"Point taken," Jamesway said.

"You didn't say you knew Jackie all that well before, but now you're saying you did," I said. "Before she was just a girl that came around."

"I didn't say I didn't know her," Jamesway said. "I was trying to say I didn't know her when she was first coming around to see Sebastian. She came back later, after he left. Ended up confiding in me soon as she figured out I wasn't someone who was supporting the nonsense Sebastian had been preaching. Jackie was different from her people. She was smart as a whip with numbers, helped me with some tax returns and the like a few times.

"As far as her father was concerned, she could have been a stray dog with the mange. He ignored her, wouldn't pay attention to her. Me and her went out a few times. Nothing serious. Grabbed a burger, went to a movie. I learned she had been with a man named Ace, and she said there was another fellow had a serious crush on her, and she kind of liked him. He had money. I hate to make Jackie sound like a gold digger, but I think she was looking for security. She didn't grow up with much of that. That's why it was best she gave up on Sebastian as a father, if for no other reason than he became obsessed with death."

"How so?" I said.

"You can fix this idea up with roast nuts and fill the air with incense, and it will still seem messed up and stinky. He wanted someone to murder him. Wanted it done in a specific way. And considering how his body was found, how it was worked over, he certainly convinced someone to help him out. That's what I meant earlier when I said I had some idea.”

“A form of assisted suicide,” I said.

“I really don’t know how to split that hair,” he said. “Helping someone buy the rope isn’t quite the same thing as putting it around that person’s neck and then cutting him open and busting his ribs out of the way to take his heart and a key.”

“That’s what he asked you to do?” I said.

“That’s what he asked. Said he’d pay me to do it. Told me what he wanted to do and said he was going to have a grave ready in Davy Crockett National Forest, wanted to put his hands in his pockets while I strangled him to make him weak, and then he wanted me to cut him open while he was still alive, use a hammer to break his ribs so I could get to his stomach. He was going to swallow a key right before he was to be strangled. He kept talking about how he wanted to see his guts steam in the air. He was obsessed with that. Seeing his intestines. Wanted them laid out on his chest so he could see them as he died. Said the key in his stomach would go to a bank box, and the box would contain half the money he promised; other half would be given to me before killing him in the manner he asked. Craziest thing I ever heard of. I didn’t take the bait and tried to counsel him, but he wasn’t having any of that. His mind was made up. Still, I never thought he’d find someone who’d go through with it. I thought he would drop it in time.”

“Tell the police this?” I said.

“And?”

“Chief didn’t think anyone would pay someone to murder them. But they were curious about how I would know about the body, how it was found. Had their eye on me for a while, since I knew things that hadn’t been released to the news. I think they’ve given up on me now. I don’t even own a car, so how would I get out there to kill and bury him?”

“I don’t understand why he didn’t just kill himself,” Leonard said.

“Isn’t merely about suicide,” Jamesway said. “There’s a name for it, but I don’t know what it is. People like him are looking for someone to make them suffer. They get off on it sexually. Suppose it has something to do with self-loathing. I don’t know. No expert on that kind of thing.”

“How much did he offer you?” Leonard said.

“Ten thousand dollars. Said he’d give me five up-front, the rest would be in the bank box at the bank here. There’s only one. He was offering me some of the money I had used to pay for this place. Maybe he thought that would be an incentive. Getting part of my money back.

"I told him, 'What if you give your killer the first half and they don't do it? Or what if they just shoot you in the head and ignore the ritual?' That didn't deter him. He was willing to chance it. I think the fantasy was so intense he couldn't shake it. That was his idea of the ultimate orgasm."

"Damn," Leonard said.

"Was a key found inside of Sebastian?" I asked.

Jamesway shrugged. "Don't know."

"Did they check the bank box?" I asked.

"I don't know that either, but my guess is yes. Maybe the police chief has five thousand dollars in his bank account now, or maybe whoever did it got the key like they were supposed to."

"That's some messed-up shit," Leonard said. "Jackrabbit, do you know where she is?"

Jamesway shook his head. "Not anymore. Last time I saw her, she was in deep despair. Tried to talk to me about it. I tried to listen. But she could never get it out. It was as if she were trying to cough up an anvil. She sat right where you're sitting, Hap. She opened her mouth but nothing would come out. I suggested therapy, told her I might know someone. Haven't heard from her since. She was an odd duck, but I like odd ducks, unless they're as odd as her father. He was less like a duck and more like a vulture."

"What was Jackie's job?" I asked.

"She kept books for a local company," he said. "New Paradise. I think she did accounting, but she wasn't an accountant. Just good with numbers. She told me once her mother thought she might be a witch, way she could figure things with numbers. Math, like gravity, is hard for those kinds of folks to grasp as reality."

"Do you happen to have a recent photo of Jackie?" I said.

"No…wait. There's a photo we took of the congregation at Christmas. She was here, trying to get in with her dad, trying to find some connection, you know. You think something happened to her?"

"We don't have any opinions right now," I said.

He opened his desk drawer and took out a stack of photos. He thumbed through them. "Here it is."

He handed the photo to Leonard, who looked at it, then leaned over and showed it to me.

There were a dozen people in it. I spotted Jackie right off. She was on the left side of the photo. It wasn't a great picture, and she might have been a little too thin, but she looked quite pretty. She was dressed up, high heels. Her hair was longer, falling below her shoulders. She was smiling. I could see those jackrabbit teeth for sure, but they fit her somehow.

"Pretty, isn't she," Jamesway said. "Unusual-looking. Believe me, I was hoping for more for us than there was. She was so worried about her father, about connecting to him, we couldn't find solid ground to stand on together. She wanted friendship, and I wanted something else. That said, there was always something about Jackie that made me think if you stood on ground too close to her, it would shift."

All the faces in the photo were white except one. A big black man with a shaved head and a smile so forced, all that was missing was a gun to his head.

I put the photo on Jamesway's desk and tapped a finger on it. "Who's this?" I had an idea what the answer might be.

"Ah, that's Ace. An old boyfriend of hers. Wouldn't have been in Sebastian's congregation, I can promise you that. Ace and Jackie had a thing once, when this was picture was taken. She outgrew him. She was outgrowing everyone she knew from the old days. Was about to start at Tyler Junior College, go on to the University of Texas branch there. Least that's what she said. Thing holding her back a little was a connection she wanted with her father. My guess is that's what she wanted to talk about the day she was here and couldn't do it. That and the baby."

"Baby?" I said.

"Yeah. She didn't want to stay with the father. Guess it was Ace's kid. I held Jackie while she cried about it all, and then she went away, and later she wasn't pregnant, but there wasn't any kid. I don't know what happened there. False alarm, maybe. Miscarriage."

"Could she already be in Tyler, for college?" I said.

"Said she was registering this fall, but that doesn't mean she isn't there already. Could be anywhere, I guess."

"Do you know about someone named George?"

"Nope, can't say I do."

"She lived with him for a while," I said.

"Never mentioned him to me," he said.

"Could we get an address where she lived?"

"I suppose that would be all right," Jamesway said. "I can tell you where she lived. I don't even know if the landlord knows she's gone yet. It's near here. I walked by her place, just in case she might still be around, knocked on the door, but she didn't answer. Truck wasn't there.

I peeked through a window. Looked abandoned.”

“Could she have just been out?” I said.

“I doubt it. I went by a couple times after that. No one was there. I think her rent is still paid up.”

He wrote her old address down for us, the make and color of her truck as well.

“Thanks for your time,” I said, and me and Leonard stood up.

“We have services during the week,” Jamesway said, “if you want to sample my style of preaching.”

“Nope,” Leonard said. “I got enough misery in my life without adding religion to it.”

As we left the church and drove to Jackrabbit's address, Leonard said, "What do you think?"

"About Jamesway?"

"No, about the price of wedding dresses. Yes. Jamesway."

"He seems all right, and that story about Sebastian is so wild, I believe it. Who'd make up shit like that? But I don't know if everything he said was true. Guy walks into a racist church, and next thing you know he's running it, minus the racism and lizard men? I don't know. As for Jackie, yeah, I think he had a crush on her, but where is she? How much did he really know about her?"

"Here's what I got to consider, Hap. What if Jamesway did take Sebastian up on his offer? That money would be a real boon to a fellow who is obviously living on a shoestring. Doesn't even own a car. That coffee we had, it had been run through the filter more than once."

"Maybe he likes it that way," I said. "And if he had the money, don't you think he'd buy him a fresh batch of coffee?"

"What about Jackrabbit? Where is she? Maybe she and her dad weren't so far apart on things. Maybe she's the one did him in for the money, and to please her crazy papa. Might be why she was upset when Jamesway spoke to her last, upset over what she'd done."

"Could be," I said.

"Shit, man. I don't recognize the world anymore."

The place where Jackie had been living was a little blue house on a clean street with simple houses of varying sizes and colors. The blue house was a nice enough house. The cobblestoned walk was lined with untrimmed shrubs, and a fat black cat was squatting in between a couple of them, taking a dump. The cat didn't bother to scamper as we came up. It gave us the cold eye as we moved along the walk past it, like we were the royal wipers falling down on the job.

We stopped under the porch overhang and I knocked. No one answered.

Leonard walked over and looked in the empty carport, knocked on the door that led from it to the house. No one answered that knock either.

We walked to the back of the house and found another door, knocked there. Nothing.

Looking around, we saw there was a backyard fence. It was the neighbor's fence, not one that belonged to Jackie's rental, but it blocked easy sight of us at the rear of the house. To the left were shrubs and another house. On the other side was a grassy section, and beyond you could see a street, and beyond that the old red-brick Piggly Wiggly that had closed down when I was in high school. No other business had replaced it. An old car motored by on that street, coughed around a corner, and moved out of sight.

"How fast can you pick a lock?" I said.

"Fast enough," Leonard said. He pulled his lock-picking kit out of his pocket but hesitated. He tried the door. It was unlocked.

"Fast enough for you?" Leonard said.

"Plenty fast," I said, and we slipped inside and shut the door.

The air was thick and warm and a little sticky, had that musty odor a house gets that's been closed up for a while with no one living there. There was furniture in the room, most of it of the bargain-basement variety.

We went past a kitchen table and some cheap kitchen chairs with plastic seats and backs with butterfly designs on the plastic. Very festive. We entered the bedroom, and because I am an ace detective, I noticed it was empty. No bed. No end tables. Nothing. The closet door was thrown open, and all that was in there was some dust.

Leonard said, "You hear that?"

"What?"

He put a finger to his mouth and became very still. When he spoke, it was softly. "Someone just came in the back door."

Before we could move out of the bedroom, the doorway filled with a shape about the size of a grizzly bear in platform shoes. The bear had on a red-and-white knit cap with ears on it, bear ears, of course, and he was carrying one of the kitchen chairs. Bear or no bear, he had entered the house and the room with no more noise than a polite lady folding a Kleenex. Before I could say a word or do a thing, he hit me with the chair.

He hit me a good lick. Even cheap chairs are surprisingly sturdy. It knocked me down. I tried to get up, but the floor wouldn't let me. It was holding me back. My shoulder, which had taken the brunt of the blow, felt as if it were missing, and my reflexes had taken a vacation. My forehead had intercepted a bit of the chair as well. It ached.

As Leonard charged him, the chair swung through the air again, but Leonard ducked low. The chair passed over him, and he rushed the bear, caught his legs near the ankles, and hit him in the groin with his head, which knocked him back on his ass, causing him to lose his bear-ear hat and his grip on the chair. The chair slid across the floor, hit the far wall with its legs, and bounced back toward us. That chair was aggressive.

The bear had enough savvy and experience, or had watched enough mixed martial arts, to wrap his legs around Leonard and squeeze him between them.

Before the bear could go for a move of some sort, Leonard snapped both of his elbows back and into the bear's inner thighs, causing him to grunt and drop his legs. Leonard got a knee up and in the bear's balls, grabbed the bear's left leg, and passed it quickly over his head, rolling the beast onto his belly. Then Leonard was on the bear's back, slamming a right and then a left hook into his head.

"That's for Hap," Leonard said.

I felt that was very thoughtful.

"Damn, that hurt," the bear said.

"You ought to try being hit by a chair," I said.

By that time the floor was nice enough to relinquish some gravity so I could sit with my legs crossed. The room was still moving a bit.

The bear had his hands over the back of his head, trying to protect himself.

“You done, shit-ass?” Leonard said.

“I’m done,” the bear said. “Done.” He sounded like a kid who had just been whipped by his mother for playing in the mud while wearing his Sunday go-to-meeting clothes.

I was considerably better by that point. My head hurt, but I was in control of my legs. The room wasn’t spinning anymore. I got up, went over, and squatted down near the bear. He couldn’t raise his head comfortably with Leonard on his back, but with me in my squatting position, he could hear me quite well.

“I got a question, Ace.”

“How do you know my name?”

“I’ll do the questions, you do the answers. Why the fuck did you hit me with a goddamn chair?”

“This ain’t your house,” Ace said.

“Isn’t yours either,” I said.

“You don’t know that,” Ace said.

“I’m a pretty good guesser. Were you looking for Jackie?”

“You know her?”

“We do,” I said. “Kind of. And we know who you are.”

“Yeah, calling me by my name sort of gave me the idea you might. But how do you know me?”

“You look as ugly as you did in the shitty photograph we saw,” Leonard said.

Ace said to me, “Can you get this gorilla off my back?”

“Is that racist?” I asked Leonard. “Calling you a gorilla?”

“No one would ever think a man as handsome as me might resemble a gorilla,” Leonard said. “But you know, sometimes that is an insult for black folk.”

“Why I’m asking,” I said.

“What the fuck?” Ace said. “I’m black too.”

“Damn, Leonard. He is black.”

“Then we got to say it wasn’t meant racist,” Leonard said.

“Shall you get off his back?” I said.

“Ace,” Leonard said. “I’m going to get up, and if you try to move and get frisky, I’m going to beat your ass flat as my line of credit.”

Leonard stood up, then bent and frisked Ace for weapons, didn’t find any. Ace remained on the floor.

Leonard stepped away from Ace, looked at me, said, “Hap, you all right?”

“Close enough to it,” I said.

“You want me to hit him with the chair?” Leonard said. “Would that make you feel better?”

“Naw, it’s cool,” I said.

Ace remained on his stomach. Leonard righted the chair, pulled it up close to Ace, and sat down on it.

“Now,” I said, “why-for-how-come did you hit me with a goddamn chair? And let’s keep our answers to the point, because I’m in a bad mood, and you put me there.”

“I thought y’all was thieves, coming up in here.”

“What are we going to steal?” I said. “Those nice kitchen chairs, the shitty table? Couple dust motes out of the closet?”

“I don’t know,” Ace said. “I was hoping it was Jackrabbit, then I seen you two.”

“You could have said howdy,” I said. “Where I come from, it’s a nicer greeting than hitting someone with a fucking chair.”

“All right, then, I’m sorry.”

“My head hurts anyway.”

Leonard hummed a few bars of Kasey Lansdale’s song “Sorry Ain’t Enough.”

“I hear that,” I said. “And agree.”

“What?” Ace said.

Leonard tapped Ace on the ribs with the toe of his boot. “I can tell you’re no music lover.”

“Hadn’t knocked me down,” Ace said, “I’d have whipped both your asses.”

“Yeah,” I said. “So you’re saying if Leonard hadn’t whipped your ass you’d have whipped his, and mine too? Well, hell, dumbass. If the world wasn’t turning we could all get off. You can sit up now.”

“But do it easy and don’t get cute,” Leonard said. “You might not be as big and able as you like to imagine.”

We ended up in the kitchen. I took the chair that had been used to whack me and placed it at the table and sat on it as a kind of vengeance. Leonard stood with his arms crossed and leaned against the wall near where Ace sat.

Ace had retrieved that ridiculous hat and it was resting on his knee. I knew from the way Leonard eyed it, he wanted one. It had a tie on either side that could be used to bind it under the chin.

“You hit me hard,” he said to Leonard.

“Yep,” Leonard said. “And I can do it again.”

“I’m starting to think I should have let Leonard hit you with this chair,” I said.

“Look here, Ace,” Leonard said. “Let’s bury the hatchet. Door was open when we came. We’re here looking for Jackie—Jackrabbit—on account we were hired by her mother and brother to find her.”

“Well, that’s something,” Ace said, looking at Leonard. “Was you wearing whiteface when her family showed up?”

“They wanted me to,” Leonard said.

“What the fuck, then, man?” Ace said. “Why would you work for them fucking peckerwoods?”

“Money spends either way, no account for color,” Leonard said.

“And they wanted to know about their daughter,” I said. “I thought if she was missing and something was wrong, we ought to find out. Seemed like the right thing to do.”

“One of you works for money, and the other one is some kind of knight?”

“We both spend the money,” Leonard said. “You came here looking for her, so you expected her to be here.”

Ace shook his head gently. I figured it hurt too much for him to shake it hard.

“I came by here even though I knew she was gone, but then I seen your car at the curb. I tried the doors, and the back one was unlocked. I came in and found y’all, and I thought maybe you had something to do with her missing.”

“And your immediate solution was to hit me with a chair,” I said.

“I didn’t know if you had guns or not,” Ace said. “I didn’t know if you was all right or not.”

“You’ll have to take our word,” I said. “We’re all right. All we want to do is find Jackie.”

“Still don’t like the idea of that brother of hers seeing her again,” Ace said, “and neither does she. You ought to keep that in mind while you’re looking for her. He’s dangerous. Got some old ideas.”

“We find her, we won’t make her go home,” I said. “We’ll just make sure she’s okay and tell our clients she’s fine or she isn’t, and then Jackie can do what she wants. I think it’s fair enough that even a couple of racist assholes ought to know what happened to their loved one. And if you know something about where she is or what happened to her, and you don’t tell us, we might have to think you got something to do with her not being around. That could look bad for you. We got some friends in LaBorde who are cops, and they got friends all over the place. We tell some kind of story that includes you in a starring role, some people might believe it.”

“He means you might go to jail, you did something or not,” Leonard said. “No charge for the translation.”

“I ain’t done nothing with her, man. I been looking for her. I come by here just like I said. Seen your car, thought she might be with someone else. Don’t know exactly what I thought. I came in and heard y’all, picked up a chair, and hit Whitey with it.”

“And Whitey didn’t like it,” I said.

“When did you see her last?” Leonard said.

“I don’t mark it on the calendar. Me and her, we had a thing going, you know, and her mother and that fucked-up brother didn’t like it. He threatened me once and pulled a knife. I hit him with a chair.”

“Seriously,” I said.

“You like chairs,” I said.

“Thomas never mentioned you two had a confrontation,” Leonard said. “That didn’t come up.”

“Still happened,” Ace said. “Bet he didn’t mention getting his ass handed to him."

"But really," I said, "a chair? You go around hitting everyone with a chair?"

"It was handy. Me and her, we done all right, even had a kid. I think that fucking preacher might have talked her out of staying with me."

"That's not his story," Leonard said.

"He's probably got a lot of stories," Ace said.

"We heard about the kid and the miscarriage," I said. "Sorry."

"Shit, there wasn't any miscarriage," Ace said. "Kid got born. I didn't see it much, and I don't even know what she named it. She went back to Junkyard George for a while. Found out he was the same asshole he was when she left him the first time. She wouldn't tell me nothing about the baby. Said that wasn't my concern no more."

None of this fit anything we had been told so far.

"Take it you weren't hanging with the white folks when her dad was preaching at the old picture show," Leonard said.

"I couldn't get in that church then. Jackrabbit's father would have shot my ass and told how a wild nigger come up in there to rob him, and he'd most likely been believed. Folks in this town ain't entirely civilized, you know what I mean?"

"You knew Sebastian, though?" I said.

"Knew who he was," Ace said. "I came to the church after he sold it to that other fellow, Jamesway. Listened to a couple of Jamesway's sermons, but I wasn't thinking Jesus. I was trying to get back with Jackrabbit. And they had free cookies on Wednesday, and some really bad coffee. I tell you this, and I'm serious, don't drink the fucking coffee over there."

"Too late," Leonard said.

"Ain't it bad?" Ace said.

"The worst," Leonard said.

"Sebastian ever threaten you, say anything to you about being with Jackie?" I said.

"Like I said, didn't go up in there when he was running the show. Went later, when Jamesway came in. Her father still lived in the back then but didn't have no say about who came and went anymore. Spent his time drinking, until one day he's gone. Then there's stories about what happened to him, and then Jackie's gone."

"Stories?" Leonard said, knowing full well what Ace meant. But we wanted to hear him say it.

"Stories about how he was killed. Talk about how he had himself killed in a fucked-up kind of way. Never heard of nobody doing something like that. Don't know I believe it. Course, he'd offered money to have it done, so a person might make an exception. Fucker wasn't exactly lovable. Before it went down, when me and Jackrabbit was together, she told me how her father's favorite part of the Bible was where Jesus got whipped, nailed on the cross, and stuck with a spear. He told her with Jesus on the cross like that, had to have pissed and shit himself, 'cause that's what would happen. He liked all that pain and death, piss and shit. He wanted to have something like it, to die slow and in pain."

"How'd Jackie take what happened to her dad?" I said.

"Pretty well, actually. By then, think she was glad he was gone. She tried to get this daughter-and-daddy thing going, but she might as well have been invisible. Her being pregnant didn't move him off the dime either, it being a black baby. Never did find out what happened to my kid, but I will. Hell, I think I'd do better than Jackie raising a kid."

"You don't look like the dedicated-father type to me," I said.

"Shit. You don't know me none at all. Jackrabbit had some fucked-up ideas. All she thought about was numbers and diagrams and shit. She was always saying how numbers and diagrams could explain anything except emotions. That's the way she put it. Something would come up now and again, and she'd say something about this or that, and I'd think, Damn, that gal has stripped a gear. She'd say how she could move between dimensions or some such shit and how in one of them she was happy as a pig in shit, and in this one, not so much. She'd go to the good one when she needed to be happy, but she came back to this one to be mad. Claimed you could do that 'cause it could be explained by numbers, but I don't see it. How does that add up or subtract into living in dimensions and shit? Hell, I still have trouble with the times tables, so what do I know? Didn't matter none. Just wrote it off as part of the bill I had to pay to get that pussy. Let me tell you, in the sack, that name of hers wasn't just about teeth."

"Possible you liked being with her so much," I said, "that when she quit being with you and started skinning someone else's banana, you got jealous and did her in? That possible?"

"Don't be ridiculous. I loved that woman. Loved her like only an idiot could love her."

"Bet that's right," Leonard said.

Ace looked wounded.

Leonard said, "Where'd you get that hat?"

“What?”

“The hat. Where’d you get it?”

Ace told him.

“How much did it cost?”

Ace told him.

“That ain’t bad,” Leonard said.

I figured we had out of him all we were going to get, at least under the circumstances. Combined with the fact that we were all guilty of breaking and entering a home that didn't belong to any of us, even if the door was left unlocked, we decided to play it quiet and decamp.

We left out of the house, turning the inside lock behind us, so that when we closed the door it clicked solid shut. Ace stepped on ahead of us and was around the side of the house before we were.

As me and Leonard reached the walk, the black cat came out from between the shrubs, where perhaps it had still been shitting, and crossed in front of us.

"Oh, good, that's par for the course," Leonard said. "Black cat crosses our path."

When we got in the car, I saw in the rearview mirror that Ace was climbing into a junky black truck parked across the street and back from us. Leonard turned and wrote its license plate down on a notepad for good measure.

No one seemed to be watching us besides Ace. There was no one out in the yards or peeking through house windows. No spy drones buzzed overhead, and there were no street cameras. Ace didn't drive by us shooting a tommy gun.

As we cruised away from there, I said to Leonard, "What do you think?"

"I think everybody's lying."

"Maybe Ace was lying a little," I said, "but I don't think he was lying a lot."

"You seem in the mood to believe everybody. Let me sell you a sack of shit, 'cause in the morning it's going to turn into a bag of gold."

We found a dollar store where I could get something for my chairinduced headache, and then we drove to the Mexican restaurant on the block next to the bookstore and ate. They served damn good chili there and I took my headache cure with a glass of iced tea.

After we ate, I decided to let Jackrabbit stay missing a few minutes more, having by this point concluded she had split the country or was lying dead in a ditch somewhere and was not all that worried about our timing or anyone else's. I didn't have good feelings about the baby either.

We went to the used-book store and prowled around for a few minutes while I waited for the headache medicine to kick in.

Leonard bought some Western novels and I bought a book by a guy named Rocky Hawkins. It was He Ain't Heavy, He's My Brother: Guns, Girls and Gambling in East Texas, a memoir. It was about growing up in East Texas, and it looked interesting. His father had been a gangster.

The day had mostly eased away from us by that time, and frankly we didn't know what else to do outside of finding George, and to be honest, my headache was so bad by then I wasn't up to it. Leonard drove my car while I closed my eyes and nursed my pain. He hauled us out of Marvel Creek to the nearby city of Longview where we could find a hotel.

We ended up in one that sat near the highway and was as big and soulless as an abandoned aircraft hangar. We got a room on the second floor overlooking the highway. I took my headache medicine again and went to look in the bathroom mirror at where the chair had hit me. A knot had come up that was no bigger than a cantaloupe, and my skin had turned bruise-blue.

I stripped down to my underwear and lay down on my bed, and Leonard lay on his bed with his head propped up with pillows and read. I wasn't up to reading. I thought I'd shut my eyes for a moment, but when I woke up I'd been asleep for a lot more than a moment. It had been hours. I had dreamed of Sebastian having his stomach cut open while he was alive, his hands stuck deep in his pockets, steam rising up from his belly as his innards were exposed to the air. He was smiling and his teeth were covered with blood.

By this time, it was dead dark and the air-conditioning was constantly cutting on and off. Leonard lay on his bed with his hands behind his head. I could tell he was awake, lying in the dark, thinking.

I still felt bad and decided I might as well stay in bed, but I had a hard time getting back to sleep. I would close my eyes and lie there awhile, and then the air conditioner would act up again, and once I sort of got used to that, a rainstorm came through with a sound like an army dragging chains. The lightning cracked and the thunder pealed; the wind that pushed it coiled around the hotel like an invisible constrictor.

I sat up and saw Leonard sitting on the edge of his bed, looking out the window. The curtains were pulled back and he was watching lightning stitch across the sky. When the thunder rolled, the hotel shook. The nightstand clock was flashing red bars instead of numbers. The electricity had been off for a bit.

I went over and sat on the side of Leonard's bed, said, "Pretty big storm."

"Yep. Makes you feel small. Head any better?"

"A little. That son of a bitch could swing a chair."

We watched the lightning some more, listened to the rain come down in jagged sheets, fade away, and come back hard again. I got up and stood by the window, looked out at the highway. I liked the way the rain hit it and the way the streetlights rippled in the water and the way headlights wavered on the concrete when cars came along. I liked how the tires splashed through the streaming rain and the droplets rose up and the light filled them so that they looked momentarily like molten beads of gold.

Leonard got up and stood by me. "I like to pretend it's washing away all the bad shit in the world. Sometimes, when the thunder isn't too loud, and there's just the rain and no lightning, I lay down thinking that way, and I can sleep better."

"Not a bad thing to imagine."

"Yeah, but when it stops, and I get up and go outside again, the same shit is there. I kind of hate everybody. Except you. And sometimes I'm not so sure about you."

13

We ate the free hotel breakfast and went to work.

The address for George was a junkyard on the outskirts of Marvel Creek. On the way there, we passed the ruins of the old drive-in theater where I had made love to girlfriends in the backseat of my car. Once monsters and cowboys, gangsters and such, had roamed across those screens, but now those days were gone, and it made me a little sad.

The junkyard was almost to the top of a large red-clay hill that looked as bleak as an Orc's wet dream, the junkyard cars resembling the husks of ravaged insects. Some were in rows, and some were in heaps, and there were platters of metal that had once been cars in stacks, like fat pancakes.

There was a greasy white sign pinned against a tin privacy fence that said GEORGE'S JUNKYARD, and there was a gap in the fence where the chain-link gate was open. We coasted through and got out. Somewhere inside, a dog was barking. There was a lot of bass in that bark.

A whining and metal screeching noise led us to a large man sitting high up in a car crusher's saddle, working the levers, smashing up an old Dodge truck, turning it from a truck into one of the large metal pancakes. I recognized him from his photo with Jackie, the one Judith had shown us. It was George. He had weathered a lot since the photo, like life had held him down and slapped him, but he was still easy to recognize. In person, he had a threatening air about him, like a thunderstorm building on the horizon.

Nearby, on a chain big enough for tugboat use, was a squatting, blue-skinned, scarred-looking pit bull. The chain was about ten feet long and was attached to a big dog house. The dog was barking nonstop, just in case we might not have noticed him.

George saw us, looked at us with an expression akin to an eagle considering swooping down on a couple of mice. He killed the machine and hoisted himself down. He looked bigger on the ground, bigger than Ace. Certainly bigger than either of us.

“Yeah,” he said.

“You George?” I said.

I knew he was, of course.

I stuck out my hand. George glanced at it but didn’t shake it. I dropped it to my side. Leonard was looking at the dog.

“He don’t like black people,” George said.

Leonard walked over to the dog.

“Better get away from there,” George said. “He’ll tear your ass up.”

Leonard squatted, started speaking in a soothing manner. The dog kept barking. He was showing his teeth and the teeth were foam-flecked.

“He’s gonna eat that nigger,” George said.

“Might want to come back, Leonard,” I said.

Leonard eased his hand closer, palm down, kept talking softly. “It’s okay, boy. It’s all right. I’m a friend.”

“Gonna tear your arm off, nigger,” George said.

“You and me will talk in a moment,” Leonard said. He eased his hand toward the dog some more. The dog quit barking. “Good boy.”

The dog lunged, snapped at Leonard’s hand, but Leonard moved it just in time.

“Told you,” said George. “Rex will get you good.”

Leonard tried again, continuing with the soothing talk. “Rex. It’s all right.”

The dog sat down.

I saw George’s face grow even more rigid than it already was.

Leonard patted the dog on the head and the dog let him.

“Goddamn it,” George said. “Rex has gone to seed.”

“No,” Leonard said. “He’s tired of being on a chain.”

“I let him loose at night in the yard to discourage light-fingered visitors.”

“But there’s no one here then, is there?” Leonard said. “He gets lonely.” Leonard was hugging the dog’s neck now.

“Get away from my dog.”

Leonard took his time, patted the dog some more, then came over to stand where me and George stood.

“You got a way with dogs,” George said.

“Yeah, it’s people I don’t like. Ought not keep him chained up like that," Leonard said.

"Who are you two? Fucking ASPCA? You come here to give me freelance dog advice, or you got a real reason for being here? Buy some junk or take a hike. I got cars to crush."

I knew Leonard, and I knew he had not dismissed that whole "nigger" business, but as of late, he seemed to be a little calmer. These days he was more likely to cripple you than kill you. But it could be a passing phase.

A man about my height and build but ten to fifteen years younger came out from behind the crusher. He was a nice-looking man with dark brown, cut-close hair and a face as smoothly shaved as a model's pussy. He was wearing a crisp bright smile that looked only a little less sincere than the one they paint on ventriloquist dummies. He had on a black T-shirt and black slacks and shoes to match. His nose appeared to have been broken at one time, giving his face a look of both boyish geniality and rakish menace.

"What's up?" he said. He said that like he had sensed a disturbance in the force, à la Star Wars, and was trying to calm it.

"Couple of dog lovers have come to visit Rex," George said.

Leonard still had his eyes locked on George. He seemed to have hardly noticed the other man, but I knew better. One he was trying to intimidate, and the other he was watching without seeming to. There was this thing about the man in the black T-shirt that made you think he wanted you to notice him, and I think that's why Leonard wasn't.

"Ah," the man in black said. "Yes, and I hope you have asked him to give the dog more priority, something better than a short chain and a long life to live on it. I have suggested it, but so far, no response."

"Who says Rex gets a long life," George said. "Hell, he's happy. He's a dog. He gets to fight other dogs from time to time, and he hasn't lost yet. He likes that. That, and eating and fucking and cat-killing, that's his pleasure."

"You fight dogs?" Leonard said.

"When the law doesn't catch me," George said. He smiled. He was missing a top back tooth. I hoped it had been knocked out with a two-by-four. I know Leonard was considering knocking the rest out with his fists, and it had certainly crossed my mind. Dogfighting is next to child abuse in my book.

"Horrid business," the other man said. "They call me Professor." He came forward and shook our hands. "George here, he's a friend, and he's all right, but he's not, shall we say, refined."

"Oh, hell, Professor," George said.

That's when I noticed two men drifting out from a row of cars and moving in our direction. They were dressed alike in clothes that looked too heavy for the climate. Long-sleeved white shirts and black vests that I knew were designed to cover holstered guns. They had thick hair that was black as death combed tight against their heads, and whatever they used to hold it in place glimmered in the sunlight like a waxed car. They were both tall and lean, alabaster faces and thick lips, and the same features. Twins. They came over and stood by George, and I have to tell you, I have never seen deader faces than those, eyes as black and empty as tunnels to nowhere.

Professor said, "Oh, that's the Fairview twins. They work for me, but I won't introduce you to them. They don't make friends all that well."

"They don't look to me like they could make change," Leonard said. He was studying them like they were specimens in a petri dish.

The twins seemed not to blink, and now they were no longer moving.

I turned my attention to George, said, "What we're here for is we're looking for Jackie Mulhaney, sometimes known as Jackrabbit. You know her, don't you?"

"Knew her," George said. "Bitch was crazy. Always going on about numbers and dimensions or some such shit. Ran around with the wrong kind of people. I finally had enough of her. I've already had enough of you, for that matter. I don't know you from a sack of rocks, coming in here fucking with my dog."

"Be friendly," Professor said.

"You don't make them be friendly," George said, nodding at the twins.

"They are something else," Professor said. "You run a business."

"Not like they want any of this business," George said, nodding at us this time. "I think they're giving me the business, that's what I think."

"Answer their questions, George," Professor said. "Go on."

"You said she was running with the wrong kind of people," I said. "What do you mean by 'wrong kind of people'?"

"Ran around with people outside her place in life," George said. "She took a step down."

"You mean she was hanging with the brothers, huh?" Leonard said.

"Ain't my brothers."

"Reason she changed up like that is the dicks," Leonard said. "We black men all got enormous dicks. Mine is so big and heavy I keep it in the car."

“You’re not all that funny,” George said.

“Hey,” Leonard said. “Who’s joking.”

Professor chuckled a little, but it didn’t sound all that sincere to me. The twins hadn’t so much as moved.

“I’ve talked all I’m going to talk, coming in here telling me how to raise my dog, asking me questions ain’t none of your business. Ought to bust your heads.”

Leonard smiled, but there was nothing friendly about it.

“I think you only think you’re bad,” Leonard said. “Pushing us around, that won’t be like shoving some cracker that owes you money, chaining up some trusting dog. It might take a little more work. You might need an overnight bag. And I hope you got room up your ass for them twins, ’cause that’s where I’m going to shove them.”

George moved forward slightly. Leonard didn’t move at all. Neither did the twins.

“Here now, George,” Professor said, and he touched George on the shoulder.

George glared at Leonard, but he had stopped moving.

“Get out of my junkyard,” George said.

“All right,” I said.

The twins finally moved. Almost in unison they slipped dark sunglasses from their pockets and put them on. That was it. When they had them on, they let their hands hang by their sides again.

“Let me walk you gentlemen out,” Professor said. He looked back at the twins and George. “I’ll be fine. Stay here.”

“Where’d you get the bookends?” Leonard said, nodding at the twins.

“Best not to antagonize them,” Professor said.

Leonard stared at them a little longer, then we turned and started out, Professor walking with us.

As we went, Professor said, “George isn’t really a bad man, just a little unrefined.”

“That so?” Leonard said.

When we got to the car Professor said, “Let me explain it as best I can, keeping it brief. Once there were a lot of folks in this part of the country that felt they were superior to people that weren’t like them.”

“You mean people who weren’t white?” Leonard said.

“Correct,” Professor said, and nodded. “They were pretty foolish about the idea. Hated people with darker skin, led to them doing some very nasty things to them. Lynching, for example. It was our way or the highway. That was the white view.”

"I remember it unfondly," Leonard said.

"I suppose so," Professor said. "Me, I'm not like that. I'm not filled with that kind of hate. But I am a segregationist. Not a racist."

"Segregationist is just another way to spell racist," Leonard said. "Only difference is the long word wears a hat and tie."

"No," Professor said. "There is a difference. I can talk to you and work with you and generally get along with you, but I believe the races are supposed to be separated. I think it's God's word and nature's law. You over there, me over here. We can see each other on the street, can speak, even call ourselves friends, but when we part ways, you go to where you belong, and I go to where I belong. I believe Negroes should have their own section, if you will."

"Nigger Town," Leonard said.

"You said it, I didn't. I try not to use that word. I know it's offensive, but I don't believe in the absolute mixing of the races and certainly not dating and marrying. You come to my house, that's my castle. I might ask you in. I might give you a cup of coffee and not do what they did of old, which was break the cup after you drank out of it."

"Wow, you are just a beacon of contemporary thinking," Leonard said.

Professor didn't blink, just plowed ahead.

"You work for me or I know you, Negro or not, you got yourself in trouble, I'd be there to bail you out, help you out. Up to a point."

"You're assuming black people get in trouble on a regular basis?" I said.

"Not at all. I think there are good and bad on both sides of the fence. I merely believe in a fence with a gate, so we can cross over to either side for certain things, work, a bit of this, a bit of that, but I think sometimes we need to lock that gate. I wouldn't want the sun to go down with a black person in the house, nor, on the other hand, do I believe you should want a white person to be in yours. The mixing of races is not intended, and that is why we have different colors of skin. Tribal identification. It's a natural law, if not currently a legal one. Some believe we can't change that, can't have separate but equal, but I think we can, and will. We have to return to a more balanced life. Bar the Hispanics from crossing the border. Put up a wall. Keep other religions and races out of America. Our country can only hold so many comfortably. That's common sense. Is that racist?"

"I'm going to go with the idea that it is," I said. "Leonard lived at our house. Never ended up missing one piece of silverware while he was there. Vanilla cookies, however, you have to watch out for. Comes to those, he's without a conscience."

"They call my name," Leonard said.

"You can do as you please," Professor said. "But I believe there is a place for us all, and—"

"Is this where you talk about each kind of bird knows its place and doesn't mate with the other?"

"Perhaps," Professor said.

"What about dogs and wolves, donkeys and horses?" Leonard said. He looked at me. "Will a squirrel fuck a rabbit, Hap?"

"I think they have trouble catching them," I said.

Professor let a sagging grin hang on his face. I liked that grin only a little better than the ventriloquist-dummy version.

"And I don't use that kind of language. That's what's wrong with the world today. Not enough standards. I think we need to return to standards, courtesy, decent language, and a kind separation of races."

"You talk about keeping people in their place due to race, but you're worried about someone saying 'fuck'?" I said.

"Forget it," Professor said. "This will go nowhere."

"I got a question for you," Leonard said. "What you doing here with George at the junkyard? You work here?"

"I'm sort of an adviser," Professor said. "I was up at his house getting a drink, saw you fellows. I sometimes use the forklift to poke cars into the crusher for him. I enjoy the work."

"Do the twins hold your coat while you do that?" Leonard asked.

"If I want them to, but I'm not wearing a coat."

"In hot weather, maybe they sweat for you," Leonard said.

"If I ask them to."

"On what do you advise?" I said.

"Race relations, you might say."

"You need an adviser for that?" Leonard said.

"Also, I own a piece of the junkyard. Own a piece of a number of businesses in town. Completely own some of them. I make my living through investments. I advise on how to run successful businesses, here and elsewhere. I try to lay out nonviolent plans for a return to segregation. If I own a place, or a part of it, I have more power and can make recommendations."

"Like separate water fountains," I said.

"Heavens, no," Professor said. "That's ridiculous. Recommendations on how to actually live apart in harmony."

“Now that we’ve got your philosophy, can we ask you something else?” I said.

“Of course,” he said. He was so congenial I wanted to punch him in the mouth.

“What did you know of Jackie Mulhaney, also called Jackrabbit?”

“She was with George for a while,” Professor said. “He found it uncomfortable that she crossed racial lines, as he should. She was all right, though. Beautiful woman. But he did the right thing. As I said, there have to be boundaries. She was too smart for him as well. Is that all, gentlemen?”

I nodded. “Suppose it is.”

“You have quite a knot on your head there, Mr. Collins.”

“I do indeed,” I said.

“Might want to put some ice on that,” he said, then turned and walked briskly in the direction of the crushing machine, which we could hear hungrily munching on cars, making them squeak and scream.

Professor creeped me out more than George," I said.

"I hear that," Leonard said. "It's just the same old thing wearing a clean set of clothes, speaking in a polite voice. Guy like that, he's got more of an agenda than he's letting on."

"I have a feeling, you scratch Professor deep enough, you get George."

"And you send George to school and give him a haircut and a good bath, you get Professor, provided George could work his way through third grade first."

"Yep," I said. "Professor has got this insane mission to go back in time to Jim Crow days."

"Like I said last night, Hap. Just when you think the river is flowing nice and clean, along comes the sewage. I still believe in the American dream, but I also got to admit that the honey has a lot of flies on it."

"You can pick out the flies if you got the patience."

"I don't have it. And how about those fucking twins, man? They really creeped me out."

"They're like the walking dead," I said.

"But they ain't got as good a personality."

While I drove, Leonard called our buddy Chief Marvin Hanson in LaBorde, gave him Ace's license plate, asked him if he could run it for us, find a home location.

Leonard got off the phone, said, "He's going to do it, hit us back later. Said he had real police work to do first. How dare he?"

"Very rude," I said.

I looked in my rearview mirror. There was a black pickup behind us. For a moment, I thought it was Ace, but it was a truck in far better condition.

“You know,” I said, “that pickup started following us pretty quick after we left the junkyard. I thought it might be coincidence, but I’m beginning to wonder.”

“Do some turns,” Leonard said.

I took a side road, then another, cruised through a neighborhood of old but nice houses, took another turn, hit Main Street, and drove down it all the way out to the Sabine River Bridge in the direction of Tyler.

The truck stayed with us.

I drove over the bridge and kept going, right on out of Marvel Creek. The truck crossed the bridge behind us, but when I looked in my rearview mirror, it was turning around.

“I think we were just ran out of town,” I said.

“No, we left of our own free will. Separate but equal. I’m going to draw a line between these seats, Hap. You stay over there, and I’ll stay over here.”

“Yeah, massa, I done forgot that. Maybe I shine yo’ shoes or lick yo’ ass, Massa Hap, and won’t be no need to set me ’side the road.”

“We’ll see how you act,” I said.

“You know how I might act?”

“How?”

“Spending about twenty minutes kicking your ass up under your ears.”

“Better bring yourself a picnic lunch and a thermos of coffee, ’cause it’s going to take you more than twenty minutes.”

“Shit, all I got to do is hit you with a chair.”

“Don’t mention a chair,” I said. “The word makes my head hurt.”

Leonard's cell rang.

"Yeah. Sure. Let me write that down."

He got his pad and pen and scribbled.

"Thanks. We owe you one. Yeah. You're right. We've kind of got a long list of owes. Catch up to you later."

"Marvin, I assume."

"Yeah. I got Ace's address, his place of work too."

"That was actually pretty quick," I said.

"Technology," Leonard said. "Next thing is we're going to have cameras up our ass."

"They call that a colonoscopy, and that wouldn't be a recording I'd like to see," I said. "We got nothing more to say to Ace right now, though, do we?"

"Guess not, but let's locate Ace's crib in case we need that information for later, see where he works."

This meant we had to go back to the far side of Marvel Creek. I turned the car around and crossed the bridge again.

We found his house on a dirt road with three or four other houses nearby. The house was small and weathered and looked about three years from needing to be held up with a sturdy stick. It looked like some places Leonard and I had lived in once upon a time. These days we were more prosperous.

We didn't try to visit. Figured he was at work anyway, and right then we had nothing new to ask, but knowing where he hung out seemed like something we might need later.

As we drove away, I realized the black pickup was with us again. It had probably joined us not long after we came back through Marvel Creek on our way to locate Ace's house. I had been so focused on the address, I hadn’t noticed it right away.

I told Leonard they were back.

“I’m tired of this shit,” Leonard said.

He opened the glove box and got out the little automatic I kept in there. It was small caliber and could probably knock over a cardboard target if a high wind was helping.

We were still out in the country and were now far away from the little grouping of houses. There was only the blacktop road we were on and the trees on either side of it. We did pass a pasture with a few cows in it. None of them waved.

“Pull it over, and let’s get this done with,” Leonard said.

“Might be best to wait until we’re around more people,” I said. “They might be less inclined to shoot us.”

“I don’t give a shit, pull over.”

I gave a shit, but I pulled over. Truth to tell, I was tired of them too.

I found a spread of gravel beside the road that had a concrete picnic table with benches attached, and next to it was a historical marker. I pulled over and got out, and so did Leonard.

I reached back inside the car and took a sawed-off ball bat out from under the front seat, held it against my leg, and walked to the back of my car. Leonard had the little handgun in his front pocket, his shirttail over it.

The two guys got out. They were big guys. One was a little fat and walked with a limp, held his head to one side. He had scraggly brown hair and a scragglier mustache. He came toward me carrying an ax handle, and then he slowed down, and a smile cut across his face.

“Hap Collins, you old fucker,” he said.

“Jimmy Hems,” I said.

“You remember Lou here, don’t you?” he said, and he jerked a thumb at his companion.

Lou looked a lot like Jimmy, only not as fat and minus the limp and the head held to one side. They both had the same hair-and-mustache stylist. Lou was Jimmy’s younger brother.

“Hi, Lou,” I said.

Lou nodded.

“You lose the head goes on that ax handle?” I said to Jimmy.

“Naw, not at all.” He tossed the ax handle to the side of the road. “Lou, pack your shit up.”

That’s when I saw Lou had brass knuckles on his fists. He took them off and put one set in his right pants pocket, the other set in his left.

“What the fuck is this?” Leonard said.

“You don’t remember me, do you, Leonard?” Jimmy said.

“Nope.”

“You whipped my ass down by the river once at a tire-fire fight.”

“Remember the fights, don’t remember you,” Leonard said.

“You knocked me out.”

“I’ve knocked a lot of people out,” Leonard said.

Jimmy smiled at Leonard, turned to me. “Listen here, Hap. I got this problem, and I think we ought to discuss it.”

“I’m not a psychiatrist, Jimmy,” I said. “Even a town like Marvel Creek might have a therapist in it. You could maybe trade some chickens for therapy. Didn’t your family used to raise them?”

“I’m all out of chickens, Hap. Look, let’s cut the cute shit. Let’s talk.”

“Where?” I said. “Coffee shop?”

“Picnic table seems private enough,” he said.

Jimmy and Lou were nearer the back of my car now, having come up on little cat feet, like the poet said. They were standing a couple of yards from us. Leonard and I were leaning against the trunk of my car. Leonard had his hand in his pocket. I held my friend the sawed-off ball bat in front of me, the heavy end resting in the palm of one hand. I patted it now and again, just as a reminder.

“You remember that time at the Dairy Bob when Bob run them fellows out of there for acting fools, and they set a car on fire out back, thought it was Bob’s?” Jimmy said.

“I do. Burned down their own cousin’s car instead, as I recall. He had a car similar to Bob’s and had parked there while he and some friends went riding around in someone else’s car. If I could remember who all was in that car, or was supposed to be, it would take a real burden off of me, Jimmy.”

“I know, doesn’t matter,” Jimmy said. “You remember the cousin who owned the car, Taylor Atkins?”

“A little,” I said. “Thought it didn’t matter.”

“Taylor found out it was his cousins done it, burned it down to the fucking frame, and he and some of his buddies took his cousins down to the river bottoms and beat the dog shit out of ’em.”

“I remember the story,” I said.

“Taylor was close to his cousins, more like brothers, but he didn’t have money to replace his car, so he had to have some satisfaction out of it, even if what they did was an accident, mistaken car identity. Main one involved with starting the fire, Phil, you remember Phil Atkins?

Well, he lost an eye over that. I think Taylor hit him with a plank or something."

"I heard a bottle."

"Whatever, an eye was lost. They were a year out of high school, still hanging around Marvel Creek, scraping by, and you know what? They'd still be here if it weren't for prison. They live there now. They got a comfortable regimen. Taylor killed somebody, and the rest of them are in for this and that. All of the cousins, two or three of the friends. They got some serious stretches to do, and Taylor won't be coming out under his own power."

"You seem to have lost the point to your story," I said. "If there was one."

"So, Phil loses an eye, and it wasn't personal," Jimmy said.

"The hell it wasn't," I said.

"Okay. It was personal in that the cousins couldn't pay for the car, but they were still cousins, and they went on and got along together after that, even married sisters. Not their own, but another family with sisters. They're divorced now, and of course, the cousins are all in the hoosegow."

"Listen, Jimmy," I said, "you got some moral to this story you're trying to get across, I kind of wish it would show up. I'm starting to feel the effects of old age here."

"You and me, we were friends in high school—"

"We knew each other," I said. "We got along because we didn't know each other enough not to get along."

"That's right. We got along. Well, the cousins got along too, but there had to be retribution for that car, and it was a point of honor, even if in the end, all was forgiven."

"Is this shoe ever going to drop?" Leonard said.

"What I'm saying is Taylor didn't want to do what he did, but he had to make sure he kept his honor intact. That's what it was all about. What we got here isn't exactly the same situation, but it's something like it. We got hired to follow you, didn't we, Lou?"

Lou nodded.

"We are supposed to see that you leave town and help you leave if you don't choose to do it on your own. Thought you were gone for a bit there, and nothing needed doing, and I was happy about that, and then damn if you didn't come back. Saw you again, followed you out here, and now, here we are."

"Yep, here we are."

“Wait a minute,” Leonard said. “So that story you told is a kind of fucking parable about you doing the honorable thing, keeping your word, but you don’t have to if we leave? My suggestion to you is work up another story that’s more on point. But what I’m getting here from that fucked-up story, and believe me, it’s like a crow sorting through cow shit to find a corn kernel, you’re saying you been hired by someone to check us up and light us up if need be. Could the asshole hired you be George, or Professor Asshole?”

“Professor,” Jimmy said. “Pays good wages for little jobs. It’s a living.”

“Let’s sit at the picnic table,” I said. “Your story kind of wore me out.”

Jimmy said, “I got some beer in a cooler of ice in the back of the truck. Want one?”

“No, thanks,” I said.

“I’ll have one,” Leonard said.

“Lou, get this man a beer.”

“I’ll walk with you, just in case one of the beers shoots bullets,” Leonard said.

When Leonard and Lou came back, Leonard was carrying a beer. Lou was carrying two. I could see water dripping off their hands from reaching into the cooler. Lou gave Jimmy a beer, kept one for himself.

I put the shortened ball bat on the back of the car trunk and we all walked over to the picnic table and sat down, but before Leonard sat, he took the gun out of his pocket and laid it on the table next to his beer.

“Do you need that?” Jimmy said.

“I don’t know yet,” Leonard said.

The rain of the night before had left dampness in the trees, and being close to them we could feel the humidity. The heat oozed out of the greenery and made us sticky as sugar doughnuts. A light, almost transparent mist floated a few inches above a run of water near the trees, and the mist clung between the trees like a fallen cloud. I could see insects wiggling in the water.

“I want you to understand, fellows, that I don’t cotton to Professor’s beliefs,” Jimmy said. “I cotton to his money. Lou here, he’s on the fence.”

Lou nodded.

“Has he got something in his throat?” I said.

“Ah, that’s right. You didn’t really know Lou.”

“I didn’t really know you,” I said.

“Lou doesn’t talk much,” Jimmy said. “Bottom line is this. I don’t care one way or the other what the truth is, what someone’s beliefs are, if I’m getting paid to do a thing. And I’m getting paid.”

“Does your job have to come with a lecture?” I said. “Because I’m starting to get bored.”

“Always a smart mouth,” Jimmy said. “Even in school.”

“How would you know?” I said. “We didn’t hang.”

“Reputation, Hap, reputation. You had one. But listen here, man. I’m trying to reach what we might call a goddamn fucking compromise, and I’m trying to get there for your own good, the both of you, and maybe mine and Lou’s good. Shit can go sideways for any of us, so I want to avoid conflict.”

“That’s big of you,” Leonard said.

“Professor, he’s a solid sort, just has some, well, how do we say it, old-style beliefs in a fresh package. I don’t know how much he believes his own bullshit or how much he’s just playing to a certain type, but the thing is, from time to time he needs someone to help him out on certain matters. And the matter he wants help with is he wants you and Leonard to leave town.”

“Does his wanting us to leave have anything to do with Jackie Mulhaney?” I asked.

“It may, it might not. I didn’t ask. Don’t care.”

“Did you know Jackie?”

“Who didn’t? She was pretty wild, and maybe a little crazy. But beyond that, I know very little, like she had been with George, and this black guy…can’t remember his name.”

Lou said, “Ace.”

“Damn,” Leonard said. “He speaks.”

Lou smiled like a baby that had just passed gas.

“Professor kind of liked her, I think,” Jimmy said. “Thought she was hot enough to burn down a barn. Said as much. But thing is, I don’t care if Professor is fucking a duck on Wednesdays and a pig on Thursdays. I don’t want to do something bad to you two, and that’s why I seek a compromise. Just leave town.”

“I was thinking,” Leonard said, “we might do something bad to you two.”

“Leave, don’t come back,” Jimmy said. “I don’t want to get rough. I hate that kind of business, but it’s the business we got. We’re willing to give you until tomorrow morning. And that’s stretching it. But we see you in town again after that, we got to, you know, make plans for you to leave. I should also ask, do you remember my brother Delf?"

"He was in my grade," I said.

"He's police chief here," Jimmy said. "Just so you know. Have I made my position clear?"

"I think so," I said.

"Next time, we'll be a little more vigorous."

"Don't think we haven't got some vigor ourselves," Leonard said.

"Oh, I know you do. This is merely a polite warning and a desire for it not to go any farther. It was the twins, and I understand you met them, because if you met Professor, you met them, they aren't as affable as we are, and I'll tell you, frankly, they scare me a little."

"It's us you ought to be afraid of," Leonard said.

"I admit a bit of nervousness about tangling with you two, and that's another reason I'd rather avoid it. But I'm nervous, not afraid. Lou here, I don't think he's given it much thought."

"Yeah," Leonard said. "He don't look like he's thinking about much."

Lou smiled.

"But Professor calls out the twins, all discussion is off. I'm giving you a chance here to go your way. I mean, really, does finding a woman you don't even know mean that much to you?"

"We got honor too," I said. "We gave our word."

Jimmy nodded. I thought he sincerely looked a little sad.

"Think we'll head out now. Remember that time line."

"Remember I already whipped you once," Leonard said. "Meant so little to me, I'd forgotten it until you mentioned it, and frankly, I still don't remember you but I'm glad I did it."

Jimmy smiled a smile that made him look a lot more like Lou.

They got up from the table.

"Jimmy," I said. "One thing I have to ask, man: What the fuck happened to your neck?"

It was a mean thing to ask, but I was feeling mean right then.

"Car accident," Jimmy said. "Some kind of misalignment when it healed. But don't think that has any effect on how I get things done. Been nice seeing you boys. Just don't let me see you after tomorrow morning."

"Yeah, well, keep your head up," Leonard said.

Jimmy snorted, then he and Lou walked back to the pickup, got in it, and drove off.

I cruised us slowly back into town, and rolling back in, the bad things that had happened here when I was younger came down on me fat and heavy. Memory has weight.

To lift the weight, I thought about a time here when it had not been all bad, back when I practically lived in the woods, along the creeks and along the river, back when I would fish and the world seemed all right, and I believed in the code of the Lone Ranger, about how good always won over bad, and that things were constantly set straight by honor and daylight.

I remembered the fishing hole that was just off the Sabine River, where the water ran in and filled it, and willows grew thick all around it. It was deep there, though the hole was not wide. You could easily throw a rock across it. You could drop a line in the water and always catch a fish, always have your dinner. The sky was wonderful to see through the limbs and leaves of the trees that shaded the hole, especially as the day died and the night rose up, and the sky turned a strange purple because of the way the sunlight bled through the trees. Then there was the night, and the night wasn't bad either, because it seemed soft, and there were the stars to be seen between the limbs and leaves, and the crickets would make their sounds, and the bullfrogs theirs. If it was a moonlit night, it was like traveling by spaceship, lying there on the banks of the blue hole on a blanket, heading into the moonlight, hating to walk back to the car carrying my gear, hating to go away from there, trying to hold on to that moment forever.

I was musing on that when Leonard said, "That beer was like horse piss. Got to think Lou picked it out at the store, must have been some kind of bargain shit. Oh, hell, think he poisoned me?"

"It was sealed," I said. "No. He didn't poison you. Stuff Jimmy said about his older brother, Delf, being police chief, that was a way of telling us they could kill us and no one would look for us even if we were lying on the steps of the Marvel Creek Police Department wearing tutus. Only thing is, I remember Delf as an all-right guy. Kind of a blowhard, but all right."

"Maybe he's had a hangnail or two since then and it's turned him bitter."

"That's possible. And Jimmy, what I remember of him, he seemed all right too."

"He's not all right, Hap. Neither is his goofy brother. One thing for sure, we've somehow stirred the soup."

"Always do," I said.

"Question is, what have we stirred up? Came here asking about Jackrabbit, and we meet a preacher who liked her, find out her father was a weird masochist, next you get hit by a chair and have to be rescued by me."

"That's how you saw it?"

"Yep. Then George threatens us, and we meet a very nice man called the Professor who thought Jackie was pretty hot, but he doesn't like birds trying to mix. He introduces us to the twins, who also seemed very nice, and then he threatens us in a quiet way, and then he sends two goons to warn us to be out of town by tomorrow morning. It's been a big day."

"It has."

"And for the record, I don't cotton to threats from anyone," Leonard said.

"I, on the other hand, might be a little more prone to cotton a little, at least until I figure out why we're being threatened. Is this about Jackie or is it about black and white relations, and exactly why have we become the target for an ass whipping when we're merely asking about a missing lady who turns out to be good at math and is a little kooky?"

"Always the questions, never the answers," Leonard said.

"Know what, I say we visit Delf and say howdy."

"What else we got to do?"

The police station was a large stone building that looked more suitable for a library.

Leonard pulled the automatic pistol out from under his shirt, returned it to the glove box, and we went into the station like we owned it.

There was a pretty-faced plump lady at the desk. It was the kind of plumpness you wanted to roll in. Her cheeks were apple red and it didn't appear to be makeup. Her desk was behind a long glass wall with a little mouse-hole slot at the center bottom of it, and a metal fixture for speaking was positioned in the glass at mouth height.

She smiled at me, nodded at Leonard.

I stepped closer to the glass and put the smile on my face I used for seduction. It had worked at least twice in my lifetime.

"Can I help you, honey?" she said.

I missed really small towns right then, the casual sweetness they could have. "Honey" and "baby" and "child" and "sweetie" and so on. The sign on her desk said her name was Eula Jean Craig.

"You can," I said. "I'm wondering if the chief, Delf, is in. I'm an old classmate and wanted to say howdy, speak to him a minute."

"May I ask who's asking, sugar?" she said.

She was so unprofessional and sweet and sexy, I think I loved her a little. "Well, dear," I said, "tell him that an old classmate, Hap Collins, is here to see him, and I have a friend with me, Leonard Pine."

Eula Jean touched a button somewhere and there was a buzzing sound, and then "Yes, Eula," came a voice.

"Chief, there's a very nice-looking couple of gentlemen here would like to see you. One says his name is Hap Collins, and his friend is…" She leaned toward the metal fixture in the glass. "Sorry. What was it again?"

Leonard bent forward, said, “Leonard Pine.”

She told the speaker that, and then we heard a voice say, “Well, send them back.”

“That door is right there, gentlemen. And Hap, didn’t you used to date my sister, Paulette?”

The last name clicked then. Paulette Craig.

“I did indeed.”

“She’s married now and has four kids, but I’m available.”

“It’s a lovely thought,” I said, “but I’m with someone, and frankly, I’m too old for you.”

“Oh, honey, don’t let that scare you. If you die, you die.” She grinned and pointed at the door, said, “I’ll buzz you in.”

We went through the door, and it led into a tiled hallway that looked as if it had just been polished by the heavenly angels.

Delf stepped out of a door and into the hallway. He had gained weight and his belly strained his shirt and made it gap in a spot, and that made his white T-shirt visible underneath his uniform. He had lost all his hair except for a graying ring around his head, but he had all his teeth and was smiling them at us.

“Damn, boy, I darn near forgot about you.”

It was the kind of friendliness that comes with a certain amount of common history more than with true friendship.

“And Leonard, you might not know it,” he said, “but I know you too.”

“Say you do?” Leonard said.

We had walked up to him by then. He shook our hands and waved us into his office, which was as clean as the hallway.

He collapsed in a rolling chair behind his desk as if he were falling off the edge of a pier into deep water. He gestured at a couple of chairs arranged in front of the desk, and we sat down in those.

“You look just the same,” he said, “except older, grayer, and heavier.”

“Let me return that compliment,” I said.

“And you, Leonard. I’ve heard of you. Word gets around, you know. I think you knocked my brother out once. You boys, you’re kind of known as troubleshooters. Or is it troublemakers?”

“We’re actually private detectives,” I said.

“Whatever you are, word sure has got here, and some of it comes from my brother Jimmy.”

“Ah,” I said. “Native drums.”

“Yeah, well, not drums. He called me a few minutes ago.”

“Did he tell you he told us to get out of town by morning light?”

"No. Just said you had become a troublemaker, and he knew Leonard here, and he thought he was the same. Let me tell you something, Hap. Jimmy, he likes to think he has clout through me, and he's my brother, and I love him, Lou too, bless his dull little head, but the only clout I sling around is the law. Him telling me you're troublemakers, well, that remains to be seen, don't it? And if you're here to complain about him, you'll be getting in a long fucking line. But I promise you this. I'm going to uphold the law."

"That's good to hear," I said.

"How you like my receptionist?" he said. "You remember her sister? Dated her awhile, didn't you?"

"I did."

"She was a pretty one, and Eula out there, she is too. She might be packing more meat than she needs during a hot summer, but she's got it going on, don't she?"

"I agree."

"I'm fucking her, you know that?"

"It wasn't something she mentioned," I said. "She did kind of ask me out, though."

"I'm going to get her some sort of sign to wear that reads I'M FUCKING THE CHIEF, AND JUST THE CHIEF."

"It would clear matters up right away," I said.

He laughed at his own humor. I had a feeling if anything was going on between them, it wasn't true love, and maybe nothing was going on other than Delf trying to be his old blowhard, macho self.

"Did you agree to see us," Leonard said, "so you could tell us you're laying the pork to Chubby out there?"

I saw Delf's eyes darken a little, but then they cheered up equally fast.

"No. I agreed to see you because Hap and I went to school together."

"I'm not trying to fuck up y'alls reunion," Leonard said, "but Hap actually came to see you for a purpose other than reminiscing."

"That right, Hap?"

"Complaining about your brothers was part of it," I said.

"Jimmy was trying to blow hot smoke up your ass, and then he tried to blow some up mine."

"A little of it might have got in the hole," I said. "Why I'm here, I took them seriously, and I'd rather not have to defend myself, because I might hurt someone."

"And I might kill someone," Leonard said.

"Are those threats?" Delf said.

"They're cautions," Leonard said.

"Break the law, either of you, and I'm coming after you. Same for my brothers. After Mama died, I didn't have much to do with them. You might remember my old man died back when I was in high school. Got cancer of the dick or some such, maybe it was the stomach or the liver. I don't know. But he got it, and it killed him."

I didn't remember, but I didn't say anything.

"Being the older brother, I raised them two best I could, played the father to them, tried to bring them up right, but it didn't stick. I became a cop, they became assholes. Jimmy, he's always blaming this or that for his station in life. He wouldn't have his neck leaning out to the side if he hadn't been drinking. Hit a deer one night, car went flying through the air. He didn't have his seat belt on, so he took a trip through the windshield. Surprisingly, it didn't cut him up as bad as you'd think, but it gave him that permanent nod after they got through fixing him up. Thought that might sober him, put him on another path, but nope. Kept walking between the briars, tangling up in them now and again. Hate to say it, but for Jimmy, and probably Lou, it's a matter of time."

"For the record," I said, "he was drinking and driving today."

"Noted. Not surprised."

"Got a question for you," Leonard said. "We're hired to find Jackie Mulhaney, called Jackrabbit. You got any way to help us on that?"

Delf put his feet on his desk, looked at the ceiling. "That crazy bitch. She had a dad crazier than her."

"You say that because of the way he died?" I said.

He removed his feet from the desk and let the chair settle.

"You know about that?"

"Heard from the preacher at the old theater," Leonard said.

"Damn good waste of a theater. And let me tell you something. I think that nice-talking preacher over there killed Sebastian to take over his church. Made up this fucked-up story about Sebastian wanting his guts put on his chest and some such. And by the way, that is how we found him. How would Jamesway know about that if he didn't do it?"

"He claims Sebastian tried to hire him to do it," I said. "But he turned him down."

"Didn't say shit about it until the body was found, then he tried to work his way out of being a suspect."

"Wouldn't have been a suspect had he not told that story," I said. "He could have just been quiet."

"I thought about that, but really. The guy wanted to suffer? Be cut open? Swallowed a key so it had to be cut out of him? Come on. And this ten-thousand-dollar shit. Where would he get that kind of money? Motherfucker probably had to wipe his ass on his shirttail because he couldn't afford toilet paper."

"I presume you looked in the bank vault?" I said.

"You know about that too? Well, isn't Jamesway the little chatterbox? I went to the bank and had them open Sebastian's box. Empty. Either there was never anything there, and Jamesway is lying through his sanctimonious teeth, or whoever killed Sebastian Mulhaney got the key and got the money. Then there's this whole thing with Jackrabbit. I think she and Jamesway worked this out together, did the deed, then she took half, he took half, and she took a hike. Or maybe even more likely, she's somewhere out in the woods, and she ain't there enjoying nature. She's part of it, courtesy of Church Boy."

"Yet you haven't arrested him," Leonard said.

Delf nodded. "Thinking something is true and proving it's true are two different things."

"You obviously knew Jackie," I said.

"Everyone in town did. She was a good-looking woman, in an odd kind of way. But there was something about her. My cop instincts tingled. I wouldn't have trusted that gal as far as I could throw her."

"Appreciate the information," I said.

"I didn't tell you a damn thing you didn't already know," Delf said. "You boys leaving town like my brother suggested? Not forcing you to, but I'd go if I was you. Jimmy and Lou aren't the only ones working for this fellow called Professor. My brothers don't give you trouble, others might."

"Like the twins," Leonard said.

"Like them. I tell you, those fuckers make my skin crawl. See them in the café, they just drink coffee. Never seen them eat, never heard them say a word. I think they live off coffee in the day, suck blood at night. I think they're Yankees."

"Got to be," Leonard said.

"Who are they?" I said.

"Professor calls them the Fairview twins."

"What he told us," Leonard said.

"But thing is, I haven't found any records on any twins named Fairview, so I doubt that's their name. I got nothing on them."

"What's Professor's story?" I said.

"I've pulled him in before for this and that. But nothing sticks. He's a pig farmer. Between here and Longview he's got a lot of land and a lot of pigs on it, raises them on concrete. Who the hell raises pigs on concrete?"

"Gonna guess he does," Leonard said.

"Got drains to wash away the pig shit. There's constant feeding. Makes a mint selling hogs and butchering hogs. Has a small packing plant of his own. Drive down the road that runs by it during the day, you can hear them hogs grunting and squealing. I heard him say when they're butchered, when they scream, it sounds like money. Professor owns all kinds of things, or at least has his finger in them. The café, gas stations, lots of property. He's got the money to get things done his way, and he's got the gift of gab."

"And George?" I asked.

"On paper George owns the junkyard, but he doesn't really. There's a kind of deal between him and Professor. He owes Professor for helping keep him afloat, orchestrating dogfights for him. This and that."

"Professor said he was against dogfights," I said.

"Only time he's against them is if the dog he's betting on loses," Delf said.

"Pit bull out there looks as if he's been chewed on a little," Leonard said.

"Don't think I condone that stuff, or fighting chickens either, but there's a whole bunch of those folks out and around here who do. Goes on no matter how much I try and stop it. They call it part of their culture, as if that makes it okay. Professor, he works under the table on a lot of things, out in the open on others. Dogfights, junkyards, the café. This and that. His idea is to buy up as much of the town as possible, control what he can't buy, and make this a haven for folks like himself. Thinks people of his ilk will flock here. Next thing is, they'll push me out and put in a puppet. Maybe even Jimmy. They'll have their own society, and believe me, it'll be lily-ass white. Truthfully, I don't know how much Professor believes his own bullshit, but if you talk it and promote it, even if your goal is power and money, far as I'm concerned, you believe it."

"In other words, he wants to run all the black people out to make a certain segment here happy," Leonard said.

"Mostly it's about immigrants these days."

"They're the new nigger," Leonard said.

"Oh, he hasn't forgotten the old hatreds. If there's a bell he can ring, a whistle he can blow, he does it. He's hitting heavy on anyone that doesn't fit the pattern he's cut. Pattern he knows will appeal to a lot of people. You know, I got a black police officer. Johnny Williams. Nice man, good cop. A friend. Couple of new recruits, also black. Hired them myself. Came from bigger cities, came with fine recommendations. Lots of experience. Next thing I plan to do is ease a woman in. Can you believe that? This day and time, and I have to ease a woman into a position, can't just go on and do it? Got some backwoods thinking here, guys."

"Sounds like you might have some of that concerning Eula," I said.

"Shit, me and Eula got our own program, and we handle it how we handle it. I may not get all the talk right, and I still like pussy and think about it and don't apologize for it, but I'm fair, boys. These officers I got, they moved here thinking it would be an easier lifestyle, but with Professor out there, those fucking twins, who we think are responsible for a lot of things that aren't good around here, well, my men, they got to be cautious every time they pull someone over for speeding. Lot of people think the Professor gave them a free pass to do as they please, long as who they do it to isn't white."

"Jimmy seemed apologetic about his current position," I said. "His heart didn't seem all in."

"Don't get fooled, Hap."

"What I tell him," Leonard said. "He's still thinking everyone is going to live in teepees and share each other's goods."

"Listen to your pal here," Delf said. "Don't underestimate Jimmy or the Professor, and watch out for Lou. He follows as close as shit on an ass hair when it comes to Jimmy. They're both like Mom said our old man was. 'People of opportunity,' she called them. And then Professor has others in his employment, and I don't mean the creepy twins. There's nothing solid on them, but there are rumors, some of them fairly sound and none of them about humanitarian deeds. Frankly, you might want to leave town. Not because you have to, not because I won't try and protect you, but because I might not be able to. Leonard here is just the sort that upsets Professor the most."

"He pretty much upsets everyone," I said.

I turned a corner and drifted us toward the café where we had eaten our breakfast and where we were planning on having lunch. The idea of going there had a new feel about it, knowing Professor had some ownership in it.

In the café, you got to choose where you wanted to sit, so we took a booth near the large plate-glass window at the front where we could see the street. The sky had turned as gray as an oyster shell, but what it contained was rain, not pearls. I figured within the next few hours the clouds would let the water loose.

The Coffee Spoon was a place where if you wanted to eat healthy you were shit out of luck. I feared even the salad might be deep-fried with a side of fried coffee.

I asked the waitress if they served omelets at lunch.

She was a sassy lady with a face tanned by cigarette smoke and framed by dark brown hair. You could see beauty had once been in that face, and when she turned a certain way, it pushed itself to the fore, and then it went away again. Once upon a time men most likely lined up around the block for her, but eventually, time had carried her out to sea and tried to drown her.

“Is it on the menu?” she said.

“No,” I said.

“We don’t have it.”

“So nothing off the menu?”

“That’s why we have a menu. Goddamn it. Are you Hap Collins?”

“I used to be,” I said, “but lately I’m not so sure.”

“Sharon Young. You remember me?”

I did. And in fact, men had indeed lined up for her attention. I had been one of them. I had been unsuccessful.

"Sorry," she said to Leonard. "What's your name, hon?"

"Leonard Wants a Cheeseburger," he said. "My friends call me Had a Cheeseburger."

She laughed. "Sure. I'll get to it."

But she didn't move, just smiled at me. She had good teeth, and when she smiled it caused wrinkles to appear at the edges of her eyes, but even still, that smile peeled ten years off her face. That light she had once had came back for a moment.

"I remember you in school," she said. "I had such a crush."

"On what?"

"You, silly."

"Really?"

"Yeah."

"I asked you out," I said. "I remember you, and I remember you said no."

"I was playing hard to get, way we were supposed to back then. Or way I thought we were supposed to. I thought you'd ask again. You didn't."

"I wanted to," I said.

"Isn't high school funny."

"I laugh every day, between the tears."

"I hear that. Best time of our lives. Bullshit. Come to think of it, though, for me, it might have been, and that's a sad statement. You doing okay?"

"I am."

"Wife?"

"Yep."

"Kids?"

"One girl."

"Me, I had three husbands and one got up one morning and said he was going to look for a job, tried to rob the bank that was across the street from where you fellows sit. They give out enchiladas now instead of loans."

"I know," I said. "We ate there last night. My first bank account was there. First State Bank. I'm assuming your husband's life of crime didn't turn out well."

"Everyone recognized him, of course. He hadn't thought about that problem. Andy Coleman, remember him?"

"Oh, hell. Really? Andy? You married Andy? Sorry, I'm just thinking —"

“Keep thinking it,” she said, “he was a piece of”—she leaned in close to me—“shit. So, my John Dillinger tripped going down the steps prancing out to his getaway car. Dropped the money. Got up and ran off to his car without it, and then, know what? Car wouldn’t start. Piece-of-crap Gremlin. Cops nabbed him, of course. Me and him got divorced while he was in prison. If he’s getting any now, it’s butt hole in cell block C. But to hell with all that. You want an omelet, I’ll fix you an omelet. And you, Leon. What would you like?”

“Leonard,” he said, “and still a cheeseburger, and double the onions and heap the fries.”

“No, don’t double the onions,” I said. “I have to ride with him all day.”

“Customer’s always right, sugar,” she said.

A redheaded man, tall and bony, wearing a khaki shirt and pants, guy who looked like you would imagine an oil-field worker would look, took a seat near the kitchen. Sharon noted his arrival.

“Back to work,” she said. “Order coming up.”

I watched her head to the kitchen. The girl she had once been moved under her waitress outfit, but there was more of her than before. I thought, Men are pigs, we really are, because that’s the first thing I noticed, her being heavy, as if I had ever been a Greek god and had a right to judge.

She stopped at the booth near the kitchen, talked to the redheaded guy, wrote something on her pad, then went on about her business.

Later, when Sharon brought our food, I said, “Let me ask you a question, Sharon. Did you know a young woman named Jackie Mulhaney?”

“A little. Came in from time to time. Daddy was a weirdo that used to run the nut church that was once the picture show. Now some other nut runs it, but he’s more pleasant. Me, I’m a Methodist.”

“Dancing Baptist,” Leonard said.

“That’s the one,” she said.

“Is there anything you can tell us about her?” I said.

Sharon thought a moment. “Not much that will amount to anything. Always had a salad with extra croutons. Had big teeth. Way men acted around her, I think those teeth must have looked good on her. Little horsy-looking, you ask me. I need to hit another lick. Got to look busy. Jobs don’t get handed out in this town, especially the ones I’m good to do, and you need your coffee.”

She went away for a moment, came back with a shiny coffeepot. She poured us coffee. I remembered that coffee from breakfast. It was still better than the Reverend Jamesway's coffee, but nothing so good you wanted a can of it.

"Know what she used to do?" Sharon said as she set the pot on the table. "She'd come in, bring her laptop, sit in that booth over there, on the side against the wall. That way she could type on her laptop while she noodled with her salad and drank a glass of tea. Bet she held down that booth an hour or two at a time. Tough on me when we had a big crowd and I didn't have that booth free to get fresh tips. Jackie always left a small tip, even though she held that space long as she did. If she left me over a dollar, I think she might have cried herself to sleep about it. Cheap as she could be. Ah, maybe I'm catty 'cause all the men liked her. I remember when I used to be something on a stick, and now I've just got the stick, so being honest, you got to measure that against what I say about her. That's all I got, Hap."

She eased away. Leonard said, "No one has thrown us out for being a black-and-white pair yet."

"Don't think they will. Don't think Professor has that kind of power. He wants it to be subtler, under the table. Where the Klan burned crosses and wore hoods, he wants to seem like a businessman. He'll take your money no matter what color you are, but try and buy a home in this town, set up a business, and your skin is black, he wants to keep that from happening. That's what he's working on. Separate but equal, he calls it."

Sharon brought the check and left. I was about to give the check to Leonard, remind him it was his turn, when I noticed there was a folded note with it.

I palmed it flat on the table and read it.

Come by at midnight and I can tell you something about Jackie. Can't now. The wrong ears might hear. Like the redhead in the booth near the kitchen. I really do wish you'd asked me out a second time. Come alone, please.

There was an address below that.

I slipped Leonard the note and glanced toward the booth Sharon had indicated.

The redheaded fellow seemed to be woolgathering as he sipped his coffee. Me and Leonard might as well have been on Mars, the way he acted. Had he been following us? Maybe Jimmy and Lou had traded off because we knew their truck, would recognize them. Could it be like that?

“We could just go over and ask Red there if he’d like his meal jammed up his ass, get this over with,” Leonard said.

“We could, but to me that seems like a bad approach to investigation, as well as a waste of mediocre food.”

“Might be,” Leonard said. “I can tell you clearly, though, you aren’t going over there by yourself tonight.”

We had nothing else to do for a while, so I drove us out across the Sabine River Bridge again.

“I think we should get a hotel in Tyler for tonight, come back when it’s dark,” I said.

“Yeah, all right. I got an idea or two I want to chase. But before I work those ideas, I want to canoodle with them, think them over.”

“That is so sweet,” I said. “Canoodling with your ideas.”

We ended up in Tyler at a Holiday Inn. We hauled our overnight bags up to the third floor, made coffee in the room, sipped and sat on our beds opposite one another, and talked.

“I told you I had some ideas,” Leonard said.

“You were canoodling with them,” I said.

“Yes, and after much hugging and kissing them, I kind of came up with a thing or two, and then that thing or two gave me another idea or two.”

“All that canoodling has caused your ideas to multiply,” I said.

“Other night, we’re in the house where Jackie used to live, and Ace shows up. I’m thinking he must have known she was long gone from there, and why would he think our car was Jackie’s car? He would know her car.”

“Could have thought she got a different car,” I said.

“Considered that. What are the odds Ace drives by where Jackrabbit used to live, decides our car might be her car, a car he doesn’t know? Maybe he came there looking for something, and then he saw us and thought we were looking for the same something.”

“Something hid in the house?” I said.

“Couldn’t Ace easily have come back since we last saw him, got whatever was there? Provided something was there."

"Could have, no doubt," Leonard said, "but maybe after he found us there, got his ass handed to him, he decided to stay away."

"Actually, if you count him hitting me with a chair, he came out all right."

"I was talking about me. I whipped his ass while you were stretched out on the floor. But if I'm right, and he wants what's there, he can't be cautious for long. Place might get rented out, and if there's something hidden there, it'll be harder for him to get to it then."

"Didn't look to be a place riddled with secret hiding places," I said.

"No," Leonard said, "it didn't, but I'm thinking something could be there just the same. Good chance he did go back and get it, but I think we ought to take a peek."

"Sounds reasonable," I said.

"I got another idea too, but for that one I'm going to need some gloves and a pair of bolt cutters, and if I get the chance, I'm going to order me one of those hats like Ace has."

After we left the hotel and shopped for some gloves and a nice pair of bolt cutters for Leonard, we came back there and holed up for a few hours, waiting for dark. I read the book by Rocky Hawkins about growing up in Gladewater, Texas. He knew his business. I had grown up in nearby Marvel Creek, and Gladewater seemed almost exactly the same. His father had been a gangster, one of the East Texas kind, and he knew a lot of the same people I had met in passing or knew of through story and perhaps legend. It was a short book and Rocky liked religion a lot better than I did, but he wrote simply and with heart. I came away from the book liking him and finding the book fascinating and honest as a dead hog.

Leonard read too, and about an hour before the sun sank, we put on the darkest clothes we had, fixed another cup of coffee to fortify ourselves, loaded up the gloves and bolt cutters, and away we went.

By the time we arrived back in Marvel Creek, it was solid dark and a light rain had started and the lights of the town gave the wet streets an eerie quality.

We drove as many back streets as possible, since with the town not being all that big, we didn't want to chance an encounter with Jimmy and Lou or for that matter the redheaded guy, who we figured also worked for the Professor. There was even a chance Professor or George might be in town for a big fandango at the Mexican restaurant, a fandango that would have consisted of some tinny Mexican music and some good food.

There was, of course, the twins to think about. They had said not a word and done nothing but walk and stop and stand, and from experience, I knew they were the ones to truly fear.

We parked at the side of the street where the movie-theater-now-church was, put on the gloves we had bought, and took a short walk over to the house, trying not to look as conspicuous as we were. What worked in our favor was most of the town had already rolled up their sidewalks and were at home having dinner, visiting with family.

The thought of that made me wish I was home doing the same. I missed Brett. We may have been together for years, but we had only been married a couple days, and though nothing was actually any different than before, I felt we should be basking in our recent decision together.

The rain was a mist now and the air was cool. The house was dark and it still looked empty. We went along the walk as if we owned the place and could shit anywhere. At the back of the house we found it still locked, way we had left it. I held a penlight while Leonard worked the lock and got us inside.

We didn't try to turn on lights, of course. There may not have been any electricity anyway, but if there was, we didn't want to try it. The house had a very bad smell, and we knew that smell, and as soon as we closed the back door, Leonard said, "Aw, hell."

"Yep," I said.

We followed the smell trail, which grew stronger as we came to the bedroom we hadn't gone into last time. There was nothing of Jackie there in view. No pieces of paper with a new address on it. No cryptic messages written in chicken blood on the wall or whatever it is the detectives find in cozy mystery novels.

The bedroom with the stink looked a lot like the bedroom that didn't stink. There was no furniture. We could see dust circulating in front of the windows without curtains, spinning in the bit of golden glow that came from the backyard light of the house with the fence.

And we could see a body splayed out on the floor.

The body was on its back. The mouth and eyes were open, as if the corpse were trying to mime excitement. One hand rested on his thigh, the other arm was thrown wide; one leg had a knee lifted, the other was stretched out with its boot turned to the side. There was blood coming out from under the body. It had made a pool around the man's head, had dried dark and thick, as if he had lain down in a mass of spilled molasses.

As we neared the body, flies that had found their way in through some crack or another rose up from the corpse with a buzz, out of the body's mouth and off of its eyes. They were thick enough that the next-door neighbor's light shining through the window made them momentarily appear like a little black cloud or a misshapen and alien creature. They buzzed up and into one corner of the room and blended with the shadows there.

Nearby, covered in blood, lay Ace's silly hat, Leonard's most recent craving.

"Gonna take a flier here," Leonard said, "and guess this motherfucker is dead."

We held our noses and I used my free hand to shine the light on him. It was Ace, of course. He had been dead for a while, probably had come back to the house shortly after we left it.

There was more blood near the closet, and it had flowed under the door, and there was a footprint in the blood. It had dried. It was average in size.

I could see a partial footprint, the heel, visible just outside the closed closet door. I gave Leonard my flash, and he held the light on the footprints while I used my cell to snap some photos, though I feared they wouldn't come out as well as I wanted, the light being weak. I was hoping we might match the print to someone's boots.

Being careful not to step in the blood, I opened the closet and Leonard shone the light around for me while I took a look. There was nothing there but more bloody prints.

There wasn't an attic entrance in the closet ceiling. No one had climbed inside the attic through the closet. There was a bit of masking tape dangling from the edge of the door frame inside the closet. The masking tape was painted over the same color as the inside of the closet. I mentioned that to Leonard. It didn't mean anything to him either.

I made an effort to search Ace's body without stepping in blood. The odor he put off was terrible. Damn dead folks. I went through his pockets with my nose scrunched up.

"Goddamn hat's ruined," Leonard said.

"Yeah. That's a shame."

Ace had a wallet with five dollars in it, a package of rubbers, and a picture of three black kids, all boys, with a goat. I figured it was from his childhood. One of the kids looked like the guy Ace would grow up to be, though he appeared a lot happier in the photo than he did now. In fact, everyone in that photo, including the goat, looked pretty content.

The blood on the floor had all come from Ace's head. Someone had parted his hair with a hatchet. His skull was split down the center to the bridge of his nose, and some of his brain had oozed out like puke. That had been some lick.

In his pockets, I found some lint and thirty-five cents. I put the wallet and the thirty-five cents back, let the lint fend for itself.

I stood up and stepped off a way. That helped a little with the odor. Another minute close to the body and I would have thrown up. I could see from the next-door neighbor's light that the flies had moved from the corner of the ceiling and had gathered on the windowpane like some kind of decoration.

"Whatever he was looking for," I said, "he didn't seem to find it, or if he did, whoever whacked him took it, or maybe afterwards they looked around and found it. Or there was nothing here to begin with."

"Ace thought there was, and whoever whacked him upside the noggin thought so too," Leonard said. "Guess they could have come in with him, pretended to be a friend, and took him out. My guess, though, someone sneaked up on him. I mean, hell, someone carrying a fucking ax or hatchet would make a man suspicious, not to mention nervous. You'd pretty quick guess he wasn't your friend."

"See the way the sleeves of his shirt are bunched up at the elbows, pulled up on the wrist," I said. "He may have fought with them, stretching his shirt, or someone grabbed his arms from behind and someone else gave him the death stroke."

"That is so cute. A detective-type deduction."

"I thought it was pretty good," I said. "I mean, wearing long sleeves this time of year doesn't seem smart, but I won't get the chance to discuss that with him now."

"He was stylish-minded," Leonard said.

"You know, this happens to us a lot. Dead bodies, I mean."

"Yep. Just lucky, I guess. Long as we're here, let's look the place over. Maybe we'll find a serious clue."

"That would be too handy," I said.

"Well, now and then a fart don't stink too bad," Leonard said.

"What? That doesn't make any sense."

"It's over your head, Hap. Let it go."

Leonard had been flashing the light around the bedroom, and now he had the light pooled in a corner. There was something small and dark in the center of the bright pool, up against the wall.

I went over and picked it up.

"So, their hiding place was they put this in a corner of the house?" I said.

I was holding it up now and Leonard had the light on it. It was a thumb drive designed to look like a little man in a tuxedo, but his head was missing.

"I don't think so," Leonard said.

He flashed the light around some more, went over to a spot along the wall and picked something else up. He came back and gave it to me. I saw that it was the top of the thumb drive, a man's head wearing a top hat.

"What I think," Leonard said, "is Ace did find it, but the guys who killed him didn't know that. It was taped inside the closet wall with some masking tape, which explains that. But before he found it, it would have blended in pretty good. Whoever gave him the chop came in on him right after he found the drive. They surprised him, and when they hit him—"

"He reflexively tossed his hand out and away went the drive, only they didn't see that."

"Another thought is they might have been following Ace, wanted to take him out for some reason we don't know, didn't know there was anything to look for. Followed him to the house, killed him, and left.

More I think about it, more I like that idea. They didn’t know what he was looking for, didn’t know he had found it, and didn’t care. It was him they wanted, and they got him.”

The rain had picked up and the streets were running with water. The rain was silver in the thin light from houses and it was cold as a wet eel as it slipped down my collar.

We walked carefully and quickly to our car, took off our gloves, sat in the car, and gathered our wits, which is a pretty short process most of the time. I turned on the heater for a few moments to cut the chill, and then it was too hot. I turned it off. We continued to sit there.

“I can still smell him,” Leonard said. “I’d rather stick my head face-first into a bucket of horse shit than smell another dead body.”

I agreed. I knew from experience that even when we were well away from the body, that stench would live inside of our nostrils for a time, and then after that, the memory of the smell would come back to us now and again as if we were still standing in that bedroom, looking down on his body.

We drove around looking for an old-style phone booth to drop a word to the police about the body, but we didn’t find one. In this town, phone booths had gone the way of the magazine stand.

We knew better than to call from our cells, so we finally decided to let the whole thing go for the time being. It wasn’t like Ace was going to have a resurrection if found.

Leonard said, “I don’t want to be insensitive, but fuck Ace. He hit you with a chair.”

“That chair did hurt.”

“I want to let him lay for now, and you know where I want to go.”

“Yeah,” I said. “I certainly do. But there’s no Dairy Queen here.”

“I don’t want ice cream, Hap. Remember the bolt cutters?”

“Oh yeah.”

I cruised us on out to George’s junkyard, and before long we were gliding over the top of the hill, looking down on the yard, which was spotted with booger lights and the rain gave the cars and the flattened stacks of them a kind of shimmer.

We were bold about it. Drove right up to the double gate. Leonard got out with the bolt cutters, snipped the chain that held the gates together, and pushed one of the gates open.

I drove inside and parked the car and stayed inside of it, watched as Leonard walked ahead. That's when I heard Rex. He was loose in the yard, as George said he would be, barking and growling, raising a ruckus. I could hear him running too, sounded like a herd of elephants stampeding between the cars. There was a stronger light near the gate, and it spilled wide over the ground, and soon Rex appeared in that light. He was demonic-looking, and I could almost imagine him with two more heads, Cerberus, serving as the guardian to the gates of Hell. He was charging right at Leonard.

Leonard bent down on one knee and dropped the cutters and held out both hands, palms down. I reached over and got the pistol out of the glove box and cracked the driver's door but didn't get out. I didn't want to get bit. I had already experienced rabid-squirrel trouble, and I didn't want to add a savage dog bite to my experiences.

Leonard said, "Rex, good boy," and I swear to you, that powerful dog quit barking and growling and slowed and came with his tongue hanging out of his wide mouth and ran right into Leonard's arms. I had never seen anything like it, and with Leonard I've seen a lot. He was like the dog whisperer right then. He cooed and talked to the dog and the dog licked his face and swabbed his ears with a tongue that seemed long enough and thick enough to use for a beach towel.

Leonard stood up slowly, bent and patted the dog, went over and opened the back door. Rex jumped in without hesitation. It was like he was making an escape from prison and we were his accomplices.

Rex leaned over the seat and licked me from the back of my neck to the top of my head.

"Yuck," I said.

Leonard was climbing in on the passenger side with the bolt cutters.

"That was impressive," I said.

"Learned it from our old friend Veil."

"I thought you guys hated each other."

"Only when we see each other. I talk to him on the phone now and again."

"Really? You guys talk?"

“Yep, that works best. No actual face-to-face contact. He knows dogs. He knows I love them, and I think that’s where we bond. He told me how to make a dog feel safe. A happy dog would have bit me.”

“Thought it was more unlikely a happy dog would bite.”

“A happy dog cares about his master, but an unhappy dog can be swayed.”

“I’m not sure I would have trusted that idea,” I said.

“It may be mostly bullshit when you get right down to it, but he didn’t bite me.”

“Yeah, you got that going for you.”

“Asshole like George, he don’t need to own a dog. Needs to own a coffin with himself in it, his black heart cut out and burned to ashes and poured in a ditch.”

“That’s your justification for dog theft?”

It was still early and there was really no place to go and for the moment nothing to do in Marvel Creek, so I drove us back across the Sabine River Bridge, wheeled us to Tyler and our hotel.

We walked Rex inside with Leonard using his belt like a leash, and Rex came along like he was the hotel manager. The kid behind the desk didn't say a word. I figured he didn't want to argue with two rough-looking customers and a pit bull that was possibly the manager.

We sat in our room for a while and didn't talk much, which wasn't like us. I always hear how men don't talk, and maybe that's true of some, but you normally couldn't shut me and Leonard up, and right then we had nothing to say, and if we did, no way to say it. The shared experience of finding Ace was enough to hold us for a bit.

Rex climbed up on the bed with Leonard and lay his head in Leonard's lap. I had some jerky sticks in my bag. I got up and gave a couple of those to Rex. He ate them with about two smacks apiece. When he was finished eating, he looked at me hopefully. I spread my fingers to show him I was all out. He understood and lay his head back in Leonard's lap. I sat on my bed and watched Leonard stroke Rex's scarred head. The dog closed its eyes and pretty soon I could hear him snoring.

I don't know when I came undone from it all, but I finally got up, fixed us more coffee, and got Rex another jerky stick. He was awake by then. I think he heard me rustling in the package that held the jerky. Sleep came second to eating for dogs.

We had our coffee and Rex had his stick, and then we sat around for a while longer and finally started talking.

"What are we going to do with the thumb drive?" Leonard said.

"Stick it in a computer, of course," I said.

"I'm thinking something hidden like that might not be easy to crack, unless we know the code. We can try just poking it in the computer, but I don't think it's going to be that easy. If it isn't, you know who we need?"

I did. Mercury. He was a computer wizard, among other things. He used to work at the Camp Rapture newspaper, but recently they decided they didn't need him to do what they'd had him doing, which was transferring all the old records and newspaper articles, which went back about fifty years, to modern computer storage. News and facts had lost prominence to glossy ads and bullshit.

They gave Mercury a party and a plaque and two weeks' severance pay, and sent him home. He had worked there for a large part of his life, but in the end, it was only a little different than him having wandered in off the streets. That's company dedication for you.

Mercury worked out of his home now, mostly computer repair and a bit of consulting, but he was still the best there was when it came to deciphering difficult data, and if Leonard was right, we might have some for him to decipher.

It could turn out to be nothing, might contain photos of Jackie in Disney World wearing a Minnie Mouse hat. Maybe just the hat.

We put the thumb drive in Leonard's overnight bag. Leonard put the belt on Rex again, took him outside for a walk while I waited upstairs. About fifteen minutes later Leonard and Rex came back.

"Manager said something about Rex this time," Leonard said. "He's not welcome."

"Well, shit."

"Let's take our bags and go. We've been thrown out of better places than this."

"And frequently."

The three of us left the hotel. The rain had stopped and the air tasted good and it had a slight chill. As Tyler was much bigger than Marvel Creek, we were able to find an all-night place for coffee fairly easy.

The café had some tables outside, and we could have Rex with us out there. He was still on Leonard's belt leash. Rex lay at our feet under the café awning and quivered from time to time in his sleep, made noises that almost sounded like a chuckle. I think he was delighting in his assisted escape from the junkyard, dreaming of better days eating jerky and humping lady dogs.

"I got this feeling maybe there's something about all this that isn't what we think it is," I said. "Like looking in a fun-house mirror and seeing a distorted image. That’s what I think we’re looking at. The distortion.”

“Fair enough,” Leonard said. “Always is a little of that, I suppose. Distortion, I mean.”

“Might be more of it this time than usual,” I said.

That was it for profundity. We sipped coffee. It was the last cup I intended to have for a while. One more and I’d be dancing down the highway juggling my nuts.

There was a surviving phone booth next to the café, and I used it to drop a call to the Marvel Creek Police Department. It had been so long, I had almost forgotten how the damn thing worked. Turned out Eula was not only the receptionist, she was also what served as a dispatcher in a small town like Marvel Creek. Add to that part-time mistress to Delf, and I wondered when she slept. Maybe while she and Delf were having sex.

I tried to disguise my voice by putting my hand over my mouth and talking between my fingers. I don’t know if that did anything at all. I told her there was a dead body in an empty house and gave the address. I told her there was a funny hat there as well, and it wasn’t salvageable. She didn’t seem to recognize my voice and made no comment about the hat.

I bought Rex a hamburger, hold the lettuce and tomato, and he woke up long enough to eat it. We all got in the car and started slowly making our way back to Marvel Creek, Rex sitting behind us, licking the backs of our heads. When we were about halfway to Marvel Creek, Rex lay down, rolled onto his back, and, with his paws in the air, went to sleep.

“Poor baby,” Leonard said, looking over the seat. “Eating that hamburger tired him out.”

“I think it was licking our heads that wore him out,” I said. “I feel like I need a hair dryer.”

“Or, better yet, more hair,” Leonard said.

“Says the man who has started cutting his short.”

“Yeah. That’s it.”

When we crossed the Sabine River Bridge we were the only car out there. A high mist was rising off the water and it was entangling itself in the trees on both sides of the riverbank and blowing across the road in slow motion.

I pulled over and put the address my former schoolmate Sharon had given me into the GPS, then continued onward.

It was eleven thirty.

The house wasn't in town but on the outskirts near what we used to call the Gilmer Highway. It sat off the highway a goodly distance but could be seen from there. There were houses behind Sharon's house, and they went back a way and were separated only by small yards.

There were a few well-cared-for trees in the yard, and there were lights on behind the windows of one large room. A car was parked under a carport.

"She said come alone," I said, "so that's what I want her to think I've done."

"That's all right," Leonard said. "I'll sit with Rex and the gun. Something looks or sounds fishy, I'll be there like a shot."

I cruised past her house, turned around, and parked in her driveway. Leonard slid down in the seat and waited there with the gun from the glove box in his hand.

As I made my way up the walk, I saw through the trees that there was a white pickup parked out to the side of her house, behind some hedges. It wasn't exactly hidden, and it might not mean anything. Maybe the truck had got up in the middle of the night and drove itself there, perhaps liking the view. Maybe the truck belonged to the owners of the house behind Sharon's house.

But in for a penny, in for a pound, the motto of the dedicated investigator, the mantra of a fool.

I knocked gently on the door. Hardly any time went by before Sharon opened it. She was still wearing her waitress outfit. She smiled at me. It was another of those moments when she was a girl again, back in high school, with a line of suitors.

"Come in," she said.

I did. I stood near the door and waited. "You have something more to tell me?"

"I do. Something to show you. Wait one minute."

She went down a hall and turned into a room and out of sight. I rocked on my heels. It was a nice house. Too many knickknacks for me, but nice. I could see into the kitchen from where I stood. There was a large clock on the wall with a white background. It was an old-style clock, not digital. The black hands really stood out. I watched the second hand swing around in a circle a few times.

Perhaps Sharon didn't have any information, and she was changing into a negligee, hoping to rekindle that old school spirit. That would be awkward. Brett didn't let me date.

After a moment I heard movement, looked up. Sharon was coming out of the room at the back and she wasn't wearing a negligee. The redheaded man from the café was with her. He wasn't wearing a negligee either. He had a gun held down against his leg. I would have preferred the negligee.

Sharon looked wimpy. She stepped to the side so that the redhead was directly in line with me. He patted his thigh with the gun. He smiled the kind of smile a shark does right before biting the head off a tuna.

I said, "I wasn't expecting a threesome. But before we start, I don't do anal. Or anything that involves rubber dicks and lube oil."

Redhead kept smiling. It wasn't because he liked my humor. "You try and run, I'll pop you. I can shoot quick as a cat can jump."

"But can you hit anything?" I said.

"That too. Don't believe me, try me."

"Sorry, Hap," Sharon said. "Professor, he says for you to do something in this town, you do it, even if you don't agree with it. For the record, I don't, but he said, so I did."

"That's all there is to it?" I said. "You're a Judas because Professor says you ought to be?"

"Red here made me an offer. I need the money. And he said he'd break one of my arms if I didn't."

"I let her choose which one," Red said.

"Well, damn, that sure makes me feel a sight better," I said.

"I am sorry. Really, Hap. I meant what I said today. I wished you'd asked me out a second time."

"You're just making it sweeter," I said. "So, they really call you Red?" I said.

"Sometimes. Where's the nigger?"

“She said to come alone.”

“But where is he?”

“A hotel in Tyler,” I said.

“Which one?”

I told him where we had been but didn’t mention we had checked out. I told it convincingly, I thought.

“Bet you figured you were going to get you some nooky, didn’t you?” Red said. “Sorry you’re going to miss out. She’s got some good stuff. This is done, I might be coming back to see her.”

Red reached out and patted Sharon’s ass with the gun.

Sharon turned bright red. I thought that was swell. That was sweet. She turned red because she got her ass patted, but she was fine with giving me to the wolves. It doesn’t take all that much to go to the cops. She could have done that.

“I’ve dipped my wick there a few times, haven’t I, honey?” Red said.

Sharon didn’t answer, just looked straight ahead, sad and still blushing.

“What I’m going to want you to do,” Red said, “is go out the door there and then out to your car. You’re going to drive me and you where I tell you to drive. Later, I’m going to get the nigger. Divide and conquer. Always the best way to do it. Coming alone, that was stupid, boy.”

“So, Professor has all this power, but he just sends you?” I said.

“One town, one ranger,” he said.

“You’re no Texas Ranger,” I said.

“Easy-peasy. You get popped, then I’ll have to give the nigger some attention.”

“Might not like the attention you get back,” I said. “You’re going to need you, the twins, and maybe a pet alligator.”

“Sure,” Red said. “Go. Out the door.”

I went out. Red prodded me with the pistol in my back, pushed me toward my car. I couldn’t see Leonard in it.

When we got to the driver’s side, Red said, “You drive where I tell you to drive, and you live longer. I might have you drive out somewhere far away and let you out and take your car. George pays for cars to be mashed up by that fucking machine. He gets through, don’t matter who owned it. What’s left you could slip under a door. Course, way it might work is I could leave you in the car when he mashes it. I could do that. I’ll let you worry about which I’m going to do. And drive carefully and slow. I get carsick when I’m not driving.”

“Like I give a shit,” I said.

He popped me one in the back of the head with the barrel of the pistol. It wasn’t too hard, but it wasn’t a love tap either.

I opened the car door, looked for Leonard. He wasn’t in the car.

Red said, “Wait a minute. I want to check.”

He pushed me aside, had me stand back about four feet. He leaned inside the car, over the front seat, and took a look at the backseat, and that’s when Rex hit him. I had forgotten about him.

It was like a shark attack. Rex’s wide jaws clamped on Red’s face, right over his nose and mouth. The impact of it was like a punch, knocking Red back and onto the ground, the dog coming out after him, close as a natural appendage, his body a mass of coiled muscle.

I stepped on Red’s gun hand while Rex tore a large chunk of Red’s face off and then grabbed him by the throat and bit deep, making a sound like someone snapping a crisp celery stick. Blood gurgled like coffee in a pot.

Red’s hand went limp. He let go of the gun. I kicked it under the car.

Leonard came out from the bushes holding the automatic. He stood where he was, across the way from me, watching Rex work.

Sharon came to the door, put a hand to her mouth, and let out some air. Red was being whipped around by Rex as if he were wet laundry. I felt drops of blood land on my face. Red tried to scream, only managed to make a sound like someone gargling peanuts, and then he didn’t make any more noise besides what his swinging body made on the gravel in the driveway. After a moment, I could hear bones cracking in Red’s face.

I had no idea a dog could be that strong. Red had to weigh two hundred pounds, but he might as well have been a feather the way Rex manhandled him.

“Bad dog bite,” Leonard said.

“I’ll say.”

Leonard walked over to me. “Shall we call Rex off?”

Rex had quit shaking Red, was just holding him to the ground by the neck with his jaws.

“Don’t think it matters much now.”

I looked to Sharon. She stood in the doorway. She was gray as ash in the porch light. She had one hand against her throat, as if to protect it from a dog attack.

I said, “Rex doesn’t like people pushing his friends around.”

“Oh Jesus,” she said.

“You should have asked for him a little earlier,” I said. “I think he shows up now, it’ll be too late. Jesus couldn’t resurrect that motherfucker. Only way he gets up is with a forklift.”

The interrogation room was much nicer than the one in LaBorde or, for that matter, any I had ever been in, and I have experience.

It was small, but it was very neat, and you could smell the freshness of the wood paneling. There was a nice long table with no scratches on it, and Leonard and I were sitting on one side of it with our hands on the table. Our hands were free now, but we had worn handcuffs earlier, when Delf had us picked up by a very nice big black policeman with a very big gun.

That was all right. I was the one that called the cops to come out.

Delf came in. He wasn't as friendly this time. He looked at us like a housewife spying rot in store cabbage. He sat down. He had a notepad in his hand. He placed that carefully on the table. He glared at us the way Marvin looks at us. It made me feel homey.

"This is a nice room," Leonard said.

Delf ignored him.

"Sharon, she backs up your story. Said she had no choice but to set you up. She was under threat of death."

"I believe that," I said, "but that doesn't mean I like it."

"How's Rex?" Leonard asked.

"Animal control," Delf said. "They're considering putting him down."

"Don't do that," Leonard said. "He was in our car, minding his own business, when Red tried to look inside. Red had a gun, I might add."

"You had a gun too," Delf said. "And it's not registered to you."

"It's Hap's. I could see a man with a gun through Sharon's windows. I got the gun and got out of the car. Also, I had to pee. Rex hadn't got him, I would have. Rex isn't at fault here. He's my dog and he was protecting the car we were in while I was pissing in the shrubs."

"What's funny," Delf said, "is that dog looks exactly like the dog Junkyard George owns, and here's another coincidence. That dog's name is Rex too."

"Do tell," Leonard said. "Pretty popular dog name, huh?"

Delf took a deep breath and let out a tubercular-sounding sigh.

"Red set me up," I said. "He planned to get rid of me, and Leonard was next. He wanted us divided to make it easy. Sharon said to come alone. I didn't. I had Leonard and Rex."

"Yeah, well, as I said, Sharon tells pretty much the same story," Delf said. "Let me tell you something. I believe you guys. I believe her, for the most part. I could make a big deal out of this, but we're going to call it self-defense by use of dog. I'm not going to put in my report you stole the dog."

"That's very nice of you," Leonard said.

"Is, isn't it?" Delf said. "I don't like Professor, don't like what he had in mind for you. Don't care much for Sharon either. Red wasn't with her the whole time. She said he came over about ten, waited. She knew he was coming. She could have called and told me. I could have set him up. She likes the money they were going to pay her more than she liked you not being killed. I believe she was threatened, but she had a way out and she didn't take it."

"My sentiments exactly," Leonard said. "And that cheeseburger, at the place where she works. They use funky cheese."

"You know," Delf said, "they do. Kind of, I don't know, chewy, and not in a good way."

"Exactly," Leonard said. "What about Rex? Can I have him back?"

"I don't think George needs him. I'll have him brought over to you. They got him all muzzled and shit. Pit bulls, they can be dangerous."

"Only if you make them that way," I said. "Rex, he did what he did because Red pushed me. He likes me. He didn't care for Red. He loves Leonard. He ought not to be blamed for defending me and the car. He hadn't, me and my car might be flat and in a pile out at George's junkyard."

"Did Red say George wanted it done?" Delf asked. "Getting rid of you two, though, I'm beginning to understand why someone would want to."

"He said Professor wanted us taken care of, and he talked about having George crush my car with me in it," I said.

"That's thin," Delf said. "You say it, but Red can't say now that he said it. Professor and George can deny it. It's nothing, really."

"But Sharon backs it up," I said.

"She does, but some lawyer wants to play it cute, they could say she's covering her ass. Could say Professor wasn't in on this shit, just her and Red for some reason. They'll find a reason. Still, I'm talking to Professor and George. One of them might drop a ball and not mean to."

Delf sat there for a long while saying nothing.

We said nothing.

The air conditioner made a peculiar sound. It was kind of cold in there.

"Now, here's something else," Delf said, "and I just throw it out there, because I don't believe in this being just one of those things, since all manner of shit has been happening since you two came to town. But does the name Ace mean anything to you?"

We both shook our heads.

Delf studied us as if the word LIE was stamped on our foreheads.

"Big black guy, about the size of a tree, wore a bear-ear hat and used to date Jackie, the missing girl whose father turned up dead? I know you know some of this story. Jackie used to live with George until she got some kind of Martian mind-meld and got smarter and figured out George and her whole family and the whole fucked-up religion they belonged to was bogus…the name Ace still doesn't ring a bell?"

"Oh," Leonard said. "That brother. Yeah. We know who he is, but dead? Wow. That's some shit."

"Ain't it?" Delf said. "I didn't say he was dead, now, did I?"

"I'm a good guesser," Leonard said.

"Then you do know him?"

"Jackie's mother told us about him," I said, "and not happily."

"That whole nigger-in-the-woodpile business made her nervous," Leonard said.

"Did it now?" Delf said.

"And Jackrabbit's brother, Thomas," Leonard said, "he kind of gave us a vibe like he might think Jackrabbit ought to be killed for riding a brother's dick. Didn't you get that vibe, Hap?"

"I did."

"Someone took what was probably an ax to his head and left him in the house where Jackie used to live," Delf said. "I got to wonder why he was there, and who killed him, and who called in that he was murdered. Call turned out to be from a phone booth in Tyler, Texas. Where were you guys holed up?"

"Tyler," I said.

"Pretty coincidental," Delf said.

"Naw," Leonard said, "lots of people stay in Tyler."

“Uh-huh,” Delf said, but he left that line of questioning alone. He turned to another. “Was Jimmy or Lou mentioned in any of this business by Red? You know, them being involved.”

“Nope,” I said.

“The twins?”

“Nope.”

“Know what? I’ll be glad when I can let you two go home. Or to prison. Or to a home for the demented. Someplace other than here.”

“Lot of people feel that way,” I said.

26

We spent the night in a jail cell. It's cheaper than a Holiday Inn. It was a small room with bars and the door was locked. We had one shitter and a bunk bed. I got the bottom bunk, Leonard got the top. Unlike Holiday Inn, the cell had room service of a sort. They fed us sandwiches. That's a plus.

Delf said us being in jail for the night was all for show.

It seemed real enough, though.

During the night, I dreamed of Rex and Red, how Rex's teeth ripped Red's face, how his jaws clamped on Red's head and crushed it like a Chinese paper lantern. The memory of it was so intense, I awoke several times. I glanced at Leonard's bunk. He was sound asleep.

Son of a bitch.

Come morning, about six thirty, we were let out of our cozy little room by the big black cop that had picked us up. He had his cap pushed back on his head. He was heavy around the middle and had legs like railroad ties. He had a face that looked to have collected some violence.

"Good morning," he said as we rolled out of bed, still wearing last night's clothes, of course. They didn't even spring for little orange pajamas.

"And good morning to you," Leonard said as he dropped down from the top bunk.

The cop unlocked the door.

"Y'all can come out," he said. "I'm supposed to take you so you can have breakfast. I'll eat with you. We didn't have an introduction last night, since I was putting you in cuffs, but my name is Johnny Williams. Breakfast will be your treat."

He drove us over to the café in a cruiser. I had yelled for shotgun, so Leonard got the backseat. It was no longer raining, but from the night before the streets were as shiny as a snotty nose.

“This was not a nice place for us yesterday,” I said as we sat in the car in front of the café. “We ordered food and ended up getting snookered.”

Johnny sat behind the wheel of the cruiser and grinned across the seat at me.

“Wasn’t that bad a day,” Johnny said. “Your dog ate a bad guy. Really, he ate a bad guy’s head. And you got to sleep in a nice comfortable room, and you aren’t being arrested or detained, and you’re getting your dog back, and you’re about to buy me a nice breakfast, so how bad could it be?”

“When you put it like that,” I said, “not bad.”

Johnny nodded at the café.

“Place is all right, it’s the owner that sucks shit through a straw.”

“Professor,” I said.

“Yep. He’s not the actual on-paper owner, but he’s the owner. Got money invested, got a deal made with the lady who owns it on paper. He could sink her anytime he wants, so she toes the line. Deal he has with her pretty much goes like a lot of deals he has in town. You get to do what you want until he don’t want you to do it anymore.”

“What we heard,” I said.

“A hungry black man like myself comes through, they’ll feed him at the café, but a black man won’t work here, and he won’t own businesses in town or buy property. No new ones, anyway. And Professor prefers you not be supportive of the black people already here, most of them living in what we can politely call a collective spot on the far side of town. Plan is, Professor is going to gradually lily-white this place. Which is why Delf hired black officers on the force, to not have the town completely in his sweaty palm.”

“That’s also how we heard it,” Leonard said.

“People here, hell, most of them moved on from all that real hard-core racist shit years ago. Thing is, they got to live in this town, so they are sometimes what I like to refer to as overly cooperative with Professor. They like black people individually, it’s when they start thinking of them as a group that things get shitty. They seem to think all black folks are on welfare except the ones they know and like. Or they’re doping it up or committing crimes. Let’s go inside. I want Professor to hear that two brothers were in here today along with one white asshole, and who knows, tomorrow there may be four, then eight brothers. I like to think that kind of stuff keeps Professor pissed.”

"Good enough reason to eat here," Leonard said.

"By the way," Johnny said, "Sharon will not be serving today. She has a few things to answer for, and maybe for some time, and she'll be answering at the jail. We are not being as nice to her as we were to you. She's still in a cell and she will be having a very cheap breakfast. Has all the nutrients necessary, though. We are not savages."

"What about Professor and George?" I said.

"Chief is talking to them, plans to talk to his own brothers as well. Chief's all right. Full of shit a lot of the time, but aren't we all?"

"And the twins?" I said.

"Nothing to talk to them about right now," he said.

Johnny got out of the car, and we followed.

Inside, a couple folks gave us the look, but most went about their business, filling their bellies before they headed to work. Johnny smiled and nodded at a few of them. No one called him names or burned a cross.

We found a booth at the side, the one Sharon claimed Jackrabbit occupied when she came in and ordered tea and a salad and left small tips.

A very tired-looking older lady with dyed-black hair who walked like a pirate with a peg leg waited on us. She wasn't chatty, but she was efficient. She took our orders and went away.

"That lady right there," Johnny said, referring to our waitress. "She works two jobs to take care of her kids. Husband ran off with some floozy and actually got run over by a bus, him and the floozy both. He had signed his insurance over to the floozy, and it ended up somehow that the floozy's drunk-ass mother got it. Fifty thousand dollars to that piece of shit, an old hag that hadn't worked at anything more than fifteen minutes in her life, and that fifteen minutes she was most likely trying to con some poor retard out of a dollar. And his wife, the waitress here, she didn't even get his best wishes or a finger up the ass. Woman like that works hard to take care of her family. She's like most of this town. Basically good."

"Basically ain't always enough," Leonard said.

"I think this place can be as good as any," Johnny said.

"Ain't you the little optimist," Leonard said. "You and Hap should get together for a sing-along."

"I got hope," Johnny said. "But I'm not foolish. Professor doesn't get dug in too deep, there's a chance. He does, it's like a seed tick gets in your balls and you try to pull it out, and the head breaks off in you.

That's hard to get rid of."

"Damn, now I'm really hungry," Leonard said.

Actually, he was, and so was I. We ate and were on another round of coffee when Delf came in. He came over and sat by Johnny. He looked like he had been up all night.

"You want something to eat, Chief," Johnny said, "they're buying."

"I'll just have coffee…wait. You two are buying?"

"Looks like it," I said.

"All right, then," Delf said and summoned the waitress, gave her his order. "I'll have coffee, steak and eggs, a side of toast."

"You talk to Professor?" I asked.

"Him and George. They got nothing, of course. Said they talked to you two, that you were looking for Jackie and they didn't have any information and that's all there was to it. George said his dog is missing."

"He ought to put out some flyers," Leonard said, "maybe run a missing-doggy ad in the paper."

"What I told him," Delf said. "Johnny here explain our position on you two sticking your noses into our business?"

"I haven't yet," Johnny said. "Not really. But here it is in a nutshell. Don't get caught. Otherwise, do what you have to do."

"And if we do get caught?" I asked.

"Sucks to be you," Delf said.

"It's like that, is it?" Leonard said.

"That makes me nervous," I said. "It has…how shall I say it? A scapegoat sound. What if we decide this job isn't for us and we just get our dog and leave town?"

"That's fine too, but if you decide to come back, and you will, remember the ground rules," Delf said.

"What makes you think we'll come back?" I said. "Folks who hired us, we've used their time and money up."

"I don't think the money matters all that much to you. You leave, you'll be back."

"How could you know?" I said.

"Because I remember how you were in high school, Hap. How you crossed the color line when it was obvious it would cause you grief. I didn't do that, and I'm ashamed I didn't. Saying you're not a racist is not the same thing as living like you aren't one. You leave, you'll come back. Neither of you strike me as easy to get rid of, and I think now this is about more than finding a missing girl."

"Don't give us too much credit," I said.

"Yeah, I start to think I'm being worked," Leonard said, "all this highfalutin talk makes my nuts shrivel up. It has a bit too much of King Arthur and the Round Table to it. Like you think you'll pull us in deeper than we are just so we can feel noble."

"Is it working?" Delf said.

"I'm not sure," I said.

"By the way, called Chief Hanson in LaBorde," Delf said. "Told him I knew you two, asked how you guys were back home, how you acted, asked about your character. He confirmed you both are assholes and hardheads but said he would trust you with his life but not to tell you."

"But you just did," I said.

"I can't keep a secret," Delf said.

We picked up Rex and drove back to LaBorde. Screw all that macho shit from Delf about how we'd be back. We got paid for two days and we did two days. It wasn't all that wonderful a couple days either, least not as far as our case went.

We arrived in LaBorde close to noon, parked in our office lot, opened up the car trunk where our luggage was. As Leonard prowled around in there, I saw the bicycle lady through the plate-glass window at the front of her business. She was still blond and pretty and she still liked to wear shorts. Really short shorts. She looked up and saw me and smiled.

I should add that I am noble of heart.

Leonard got the thumb drive out of his luggage and put it in his pocket. Rex stood with us, watching things carefully, as if he might be thinking about coming back to steal the car when we weren't looking.

The three of us climbed the stairs to the office, and when we came in, Brett was behind the desk with her laptop open.

"Porn?" I said.

"Of course," she said. "Well, almost. I been reading up on guys like Sebastian, people with his kind of inclinations. People who want to witness their own deaths. It's fucked up. You boys seem to have brought a friend."

"Yeah, he's just hanging," Leonard said.

There is a foldout couch in the office, and right then it was folded up and was just a couch. Leonard made a beeline for that, sat down. Rex jumped up on the couch beside him and put his head in Leonard's lap.

"Cute," Brett said. "Poor baby. He another rescue?"

"He is at that," Leonard said. "Last night he ate a bad guy, chewed his head up like a Tootsie Roll."

Brett stood up then and we embraced. I sat in a client chair and told her the entire story.

“Jesus,” she said. “You boys have had a couple of bad days. And the police chief thinks you’re coming back?”

“But we aren’t,” I said.

“Our lovely clients actually brought in some more money,” Brett said. “I feel guilty taking it if you aren’t going back.”

“They’re doing all right,” I said. “Got a nice truck. They could do with paying a little extra. I got hit by a chair.”

“I see the bruise on your noggin,” Brett said.

“Will this allow me sympathy sex later?” I said.

“One never knows,” she said. “Guys, I went to the address the Mulhaneys gave us and checked out where they lived. Patch of weeds outside of town with a trailer on it, and the trailer has one end burned off. Kitchen fire is my guess. They’ve put a tarp on that end to patch it, used lots of duct tape to hold it in place. The truck they have is better than that trailer.”

“Duct tape is underrated even by those who love it,” Leonard said. “Like a friend of mine, Eugene Frizzell, once said, you got duct tape, you can get to the moon. You know what, maybe the trailer burned up on one end because someone had one of those intense religious moments and burst into flames.”

“I have no idea what that means,” Brett said.

“It means don’t underrate duct tape,” Leonard said, scratching Rex’s hard head.

“So, we got more money, and you can afford to go back, or we can return their dough,” Brett said, “just claim the two days we got paid for. Tell them what you found out and call it a day. It’s nothing definitive, but it’s what you know.”

“I don’t like them,” Leonard said. “They’re not the first folks who’ve lived in bad trailers. I lived in a ragged one, right out of the military. I’ve lived in houses with walls so thin the wind stayed inside instead of out.”

“What do you think, Hap?” Brett said.

“Well, we did find something,” I said.

Leonard stretched out a bit on the couch so he could get his hand in his pocket and pull out the thumb drive. “We got this.”

I leaned out of my chair, took it from him, and gave it to Brett.

“That’s the one thing I hadn’t told you about yet,” I said, and then I told her how we had come by it.

“Damn, you boys have certainly cracked a few eggs,” she said.

She put the thumb drive in the laptop, and we waited.

“Nope,” she said. “Not happening. It’s coded.”

“Not surprised,” I said. “It may be nothing but personal porn or a pie recipe, but it may also be something more important, and it’s maybe what got Ace killed.”

“Still don’t think the people killed him were looking for that,” Leonard said. “Think their beef was with Ace himself. Followed him there, gave him the ax.”

We heard footsteps on the stairs. The door opened and Chance came in. She had her hair tied back and was wearing a loose shirt and jeans and slip-on tennis shoes. I thought she looked cute as the proverbial bug.

I got up and hugged her, and she went around behind the desk and hugged Brett.

“Don’t forget old Uncle Leonard,” Leonard said.

Chance went to the couch and hugged him. She gave the dog a pat.

“What’s his story?” she said, nodding at the dog.

“He’s a client,” Leonard said. “He lost his cat.”

“Ha-ha,” Chance said.

Leonard told the whole thing over again about how the dog was rescued, and then he told her about the case, all we had discovered.

“Oh yeah. Brett told me about the case,” Chance said. “I wish I could have been more involved, but I’ve been taking a couple of college courses, so I’ve only been working part part-time. And I’ve been taking care of Reba a lot.”

“That really shouldn’t be your job,” I said.

“Then whose job would it be?” Chance said. “She doesn’t have anyone. I’ve been making sure she goes to school. She’s smart as a whip, so she should go. She worries me, though. She said there was a little honky there she was going to pop a good one. I suggested she not do that.”

“Probably has it coming,” Leonard said.

“Agreed, but in time we may be hearing from child protective services,” Brett said. “Honky-popping could certainly get them called in.”

“She needs someone,” Chance said. “She’s like a little sister to me. She cusses worse than Dad and Leonard, though.”

By this time Chance had taken a seat in the other swivel client chair. She spun in a circle and came back around to face us.

“You go back, you going to push until something blows?” Chance said.

“If we were to go back,” I said, “that’s exactly what we’d do. It’s really all we know. But we don’t know we’re going back.”

“They’ll go back,” Brett said.

“I don’t know,” Leonard said. “We’re getting a little long in the tooth for the tough stuff. Divorce cases, sneaking around taking photos of some wife or husband doing the two-bear mambo, that’s starting to be more our style.”

“Damn right,” I said.

“They’ll go back,” Brett said.

28

That night, at home, getting ready for bed, Brett said, “So Jackie thought she could move between dimensions?”

“According to some,” I said. “I don’t know if she thought that or not. Sounds to me like she was speaking theoretically. Of course, maybe we can’t find her because she really did move into another dimension. She could be dead. She could be in Australia training kangaroos to dance the jitterbug.”

“They would be good at that,” Brett said.

“Thing is, everyone we talked to thought she was a little on the odd side, so maybe something to it, about her thinking something like that, thinking she could do it. And maybe she’s merely talking quantum physics to a bunch of knot heads who have a hard time believing in a calorie because they can’t see it.”

Brett was beside the bed, pulling a nightgown over her head. When she had it on, she slapped her ass. “I believe in calories, unfortunately.”

“You wear them beautifully,” I said.

We got in bed and covered up.

“Jamesway, he might have been able to at least carry on a conversation with her,” I said. “He seems like a bright guy.”

“What was your take on him besides being bright?”

“Seemed all right, maybe someone using the bullshit of religion for good. To be honest, I liked him quite a bit, but man, he makes terrible coffee.”

I turned off the light.

“Shit,” I said.

“What?”

“You know.”

“I do?” Brett said.

“Yeah. You know. I decided to face it just now.”

“You and Leonard are going back,” she said.

“I know I am.”

“Then you know he is too.”

“Pretty much. Yeah.”

“I wouldn’t want you to go without him.”

“He wouldn’t want me to either,” I said.

29

Next morning I got dressed and called Leonard. Officer Carroll, aka Curt, picked up the phone.

“Hap,” he said.

“Leonard there?”

“I stole his phone. I’m in Puerto Rico.”

“I know better than that. Leonard can’t afford the roaming, and you can’t afford the trip.”

“Okay, he’s in the shower, which is a polite way of saying he’s taking a shit.”

“Have him call me, but wait until he’s good and finished. I don’t want him doing a half ass-wipe to hurry up and answer the phone.”

Officer Carroll chuckled.

About twenty minutes later Leonard called me back.

“That was one hell of a shit,” I said.

“Championship. I had burritos last night. We’re going back to Marvel Creek, aren’t we?”

“We are.”

“Good. I was going to call you and suggest just the same thing. I already got Rex boarded with some friends of Curt’s. I knew this was coming even when I said I didn’t know it was coming.”

“Yeah. Me too.”

“I don’t like being ran out of a town, or ran out of most anywhere, for that matter, unless I’m ready to go. Hey. Curt is off for a couple of days. He’s going with us.”

“Him being LaBorde law, could that cause him problems?”

“I’m only going to let him get involved so far, but I think he could be a help. I think you’re slowing down a little, so I want some backup.”

“Fuck you.”

“Pack a lunch. Three sandwiches and some chips. We’ll stop and get drinks. And clear out your trunk. Me and Curt will be rooming together, and I want space back there for a crate of rubbers. Now that I think about it, you might want to throw out the spare tire.”

30

I drove. Leonard sat beside me, and Officer Carroll sat in the back, leaning over the seat like a Labrador retriever. He had brought enough luggage for a month in Paris and, along with that, a bulletproof vest.

"You really need the vest?" I said.

"Never leave home without," he said. "That and clean underwear."

I liked Curt, but he was kind of a pest, so it was like driving on a cross-country vacation with a six-year-old. We had already stopped twice. Once for soft drinks, once for Officer Carroll to pee, and now he wanted to go again.

"Pookie, I told you to go before we left," Leonard said.

"I was excited," Curt said. "Are we on a tight schedule?"

"Guess not," Leonard said.

"Pookie?" I said.

"I call him that," Leonard said.

"I kind of like it," Pookie said. "My dad used to call me Poot. I never cared for that much."

"I can understand that," I said. "From now on, I'll call you Pookie too."

"All right," Pookie said.

"Shit," Leonard said, "I should have never let that out in public."

We stopped and Pookie took another pee, and then on down the road, he said, "I wouldn't mind getting some coffee."

"Damn," Leonard said. "That's why you always got to pee."

"If we could stop someplace where they also got pie," Pookie said, "I'd like that best. I like pie. You guys like pie?"

"I should have left his ass at home," Leonard said.

Brett had found us a bed-and-breakfast on the outskirts of Marvel Creek in a little community that would soon be annexed by the town. It was the only real place to stay unless we wanted to drive on to Longview.

Brett said according to the Internet photos, it was quite charming and, better yet, pretty cheap. The money we got from the Mulhaneys was not a fortune, but it was a fortune for them, as it would have been for me just a few years back. It was hard to believe there had been such a turn of fate in my life. I still had a lot of bad stuff going on, but at least now I could afford to be miserable.

Reminded me of my dad. He was a troubleshooter mechanic at one time for a butane company. Had to be on the road a lot, and he was, by all accounts, good at his job. Over time, he asked for a raise. It was promised, but it never seemed to make it into his paycheck.

Next time he asked for a raise, they said again, “Sure, we’ll do that,” but they didn’t. And when he received his paycheck and saw the raise had still not been added, he went to his stall and began packing his tools in his toolbox. The boss came by, said, “Bud, what are you doing?”

“Well,” Daddy said, “if I’m going to starve to death, I might as well be rested.”

Anytime I thought about being in need of more money, I remembered that story.

Brett had checked us in online, and when the lady who owned the place saw one of our group was black and that he and Pookie intended to share a bed, you could see the hair on the back of her neck stand up. The rest of it was in a gray knot on her head.

“You know, I’m not sure that room is ready,” she said. She reminded me of a nervous wasp, the way she flittered behind the desk. I had an idea her reluctance had nothing to do with Professor, who probably didn’t own things this far out.

Still, our credit card looked better to her than her bullshit church-lady morals, so after a bit of nervous fluttering, she decided the room was ready and checked us in. When we left, she would probably bring in one of those hazmat teams that clean up oil and chemical spills, have them give Leonard and Pookie’s room a real going-over, maybe burn the mattress.

“Breakfast is from seven until nine,” she said. “After that, you’re on your own.”

Leonard laughed at her without really meaning to.

After I got my stuff stored in the room, I called Brett and asked about the thumb drive. She was supposed to get it to Mercury so he could see what was on it.

"You know," Brett said, "turns out Jackie is damn smart. Even Mercury couldn't crack it right off the bat. I drove over to Camp Rapture this morning, gave it to him, and after about twenty minutes he said he was going to need time."

"Wow. That is some serious encryption."

"That's what he said. I think he was impressed. It takes a lot to impress him with computer stuff."

"I'll say. Well, we are all tucked in. Pretty soon we go back to shaking trees to see what falls out of them."

"Be careful something big and mean and ugly doesn't fall out of one and land on you."

"Of course. Which reminds me, have I told you the joke about the gorilla hunter?"

"I don't believe in hunting gorillas."

"Neither do I. It's a joke."

"I think you've told me that one."

"I don't think I have," I said.

"Think you have. Don't remember all the details, but pretty sure you have."

"You don't want to hear my joke, do you?"

"Got to go, hon," and she was off the phone.

I actually have some pretty good jokes. I don't know why no one wants to hear them.

32

The best way we figured to stir things was to make sure we were seen, and one place we wanted to be seen was at the Coffee Spoon again. Everyone came there. Someone was going to slip a word to Professor, and that was bound to bring out some of his help. Jimmy and Lou maybe, George perhaps, the twins, someone we had yet to meet who wanted to shoot us in the back of the head or beat us to death with sticks and stones. It was always a pleasure to make new friends.

First, we drove over to Marvel Creek and the cop shop to talk with Delf.

“So, you’re an officer of the law?” Delf said after we introduced Pookie and took seats in the office.

“I am,” Pookie said.

“He’s like fucking McGruff the Crime Dog,” Leonard said.

“I am,” Pookie said, “except I don’t sleep in a doggy bed.”

“What happened to Rex?” Delf asked.

“He’s having a spa day,” Leonard said.

“Knew you’d be back,” Delf said.

“You called it,” I said.

“I can be of assistance, but only to a degree. There’s a line I best not cross, but I can cross some lines. You find something, tell me. Don’t get yourself between a rock and a hard place. Also, Johnny, he’s part of this. The other officers, not as directly. I handle them, but Johnny, I can give you his cell and you can contact him if necessary. You can tell him anything you can tell me.”

“Thing is,” I said, “you got your agenda and we got ours. Finding Jackie.”

“Jackie, if she’s found, is dead, my man,” Delf said. “But our agendas cross enough we can be of help to one another.”

“Guess that’s true,” I said.

“Good,” Delf said. “Try not to shoot anybody.”

“No promises,” Leonard said.

“My brothers,” he said. “Don’t let them hurt you, but try not to hurt them. If possible.”

“Deal,” I said, and out of there me and Leonard and Pookie went.

33

We decided we weren't ready to hang out at the café drinking coffee, and it occurred to me another visit with Jamesway might be in order, and that seemed to suit Leonard and Pookie.

This time we came through the front door, which was unlocked, went through the lobby, and found him in his office with his feet on the desk reading a rather ragged-looking leather-bound copy of the Bible.

"Hap, Leonard," he said. "Good to see you. Who's your friend?"

We introduced Officer Carroll by his real name. I immediately feared coffee would be offered.

It was. Leonard and I declined. Pookie, not knowing any better, accepted. We left him to his fate.

"We're just going over our path again," I said.

"Meaning you haven't found Jackie, and you want to know if I know something. And you want to know if I had anything to do with Ace's death."

"We didn't say that," I said.

"But you were thinking it."

"Maybe," I said.

"I told you what I knew about Ace, and that's it. Next time I heard about him was reading about him in the newspaper, that he was found dead in Jackie's old house. What can I tell you I haven't told you?"

"It's just procedure," Pookie said.

"Procedure?" Jamesway said.

"I'm a cop," Pookie said. "I use cool cop terms. Don't get me started. I got a nest of stuff I can rattle off."

Jamesway smiled. "Ah."

"I don't know if we have any other questions," I said, "not really. But I'd like to come back to something. Just to touch it again and move on.

Jackie's good with numbers, had what some call odd ideas. Was she odd or just smarter than the average bear?"

"Maybe both," Jamesway said. "You don't find bears doing mathematics or theorizing on the universe."

"Don't talk like you know all the bears there are," Leonard said.

Jamesway laughed a little.

"Did she believe she could travel between dimensions, alternate worlds, or some such?" I said.

"She's a thinker. Maybe even a genius when it came to mathematics and physics, and she had to learn most of it on her own. We used to talk for hours about all manner of things. Did she actually think you could do it, travel between the dimensions? The answer is, theoretically, yes, but she didn't think she herself could."

"She wasn't saying what they thought she was saying?" Leonard said.

"Not at all," Jamesway said. "Truth is, I miss our conversations. She could make you think, and I was attracted to her. I told you that. But there was always something kind of dangerous about her. Not that she did anything I could put my finger on. It was just a feeling she gave me."

Jamesway went over, fixed Pookie his cup of coffee, and brought it back to the desk.

I watched as Pookie picked up the cup and tasted the coffee. I thought Jackie might not have passed into another dimension, but with a sip of that stuff, perhaps Pookie temporarily had. One of his eyes twitched.

"Jackie wanted to do something with that brain of hers other than what she was doing," Jamesway said. "I think she decided she'd had enough of this hole in the road."

"You don't think she could be dead?" Pookie asked.

"I hope not. I think she had bigger fish to fry. I think she merely went away to someplace better. Someday, I believe she will resurface. She may not even be hiding. I'd check out the colleges in Tyler."

Brett had actually done that while I was home. Nothing found, but I didn't mention it to Jamesway.

"Nothing else?" Leonard said.

Jamesway shook his head. "Sorry…wait a minute. The librarian. Marylou Cinner."

"Librarian?" I said.

"Friend of hers. Well, she used to be a librarian. But she and Jackie got to be friends there at the end, meaning the end as in when I saw Jackie last. I sort of forgot about it. She didn't mention Marylou much, but she did mention her, and she said they were friends. I think Marylou, who was a quiet sort, was someone she could talk to about the things she was interested in. Someone to talk to smarter than the rest of us. I think Marylou had about three degrees or something, but what she was cut out for was being a librarian. I can't say I really knew her, but that's what Jackie said about her."

"Do you know Cinner's address?" I asked.

"I know where she lived. The house is empty now. Up for sale. It was repossessed. Didn't respond to foreclosure letters, or so I was told. One of the ladies works at the bank goes to church here, and she told me. If you're quiet, and you know connected people in this town, eventually they talk out of school. One day Marylou Cinner was working at the library, next day she was gone. Didn't give notice, just up and left. People went to the house, and all the furniture was there, but she wasn't, and there was a note. Note said she had a sick aunt and had to go take care of her, I think in Ohio. Something like that. Said she was sorry to leave so suddenly, and she was letting the house go back, and that was it."

"That's interesting," Pookie said.

"Yeah. Oh, and she was Ace's cousin," Jamesway said.

"Also interesting," Pookie said.

"Does it mean anything?" Jamesway said.

"If it does, we don't know what it is," I said. "Not yet, anyway."

We thanked Jamesway and left.

On the way to the car, Pookie said, "That coffee is the worst thing I've ever put in my mouth."

"I got something for your mouth that can sweeten it," Leonard said.

"I know that, baby," Pookie said, and pinched Leonard on the ass.

We drove around town hoping to stir someone up, but no one was stirred. We went to the café and had lunch, but no one threatened us. We drove back to the bed-and-breakfast, but no one followed us. I looked out the window from my room. Nothing happening out there, though a large black bird on the lawn looked a little suspicious.

Maybe we had pushed as much as we could. Maybe Professor and his minions had got smart and decided to leave us alone and let us fade away. Maybe Professor had nothing to do with Jackie's disappearance. Perhaps Ace had been killed by someone who had nothing to do with either Jackie or the Professor. And Marylou Cinner, did she have anything to do with this? No fucking idea.

I sat down and turned on the TV and watched a bit of the news, but the political situation was so much like a shitty reality show, I turned it off before I got sick.

Brett called.

"It's your wife," she said.

"I love hearing that," I said.

"Here's something else you'll love. Thumb drive cracked. I picked it up from Mercury. A large part of it is numbers."

"That fits. She was a self-trained mathematician."

"Yep, but it's accounting. Nothing to do with any kind of super-math, but it is fanciful math at times."

"Come again," I said.

"It's records she kept. Way Mercury figured it, Jackie was the bookkeeper for Professor, and she started carefully moving money out of his account, disguising it as this and that, not something you'd notice right off, subtle stuff, but it was getting moved."

"Where to?"

"You're going to love this. It doesn't seem like anything at first. All legit, but she had a clever way to siphon the money off and have it end up somewhere else, and you know whose bank account it's in, and right there in Marvel Creek?"

"Do I have to guess?"

"Yep."

"All right," I said. "Her own account."

"Nope."

"How about Jamesway?"

"Nope. Your junkyard man."

"George?"

"Yep."

"That's a surprise," I said. "I thought he was Professor's man."

"George seems to have been his own man. He had this girlfriend who was a math whiz, and either he got her to do it or they were both in on it. Appears they began to slip money away from the Professor. Did it in small bits here and there. Never anything noticeable. Disguised as an expense, but the thing was, the expense was maybe half of what was used to pay out, and then part of the expense got transferred to this or that, traveling through channels, and pretty soon it's in George's bank account."

"I'll be damned. Might George not have known?"

"It was in his account," Brett said. "Surely he looked at his bank statements from time to time. There were several different companies under his name, and there were three banks, one in Marvel Creek, one in Longview, and another in Tyler. But in the end, they all came back to George."

"Damn interesting."

"Yep. But that's not all. Mercury figured that later, all that business was reworked. Not so you'd notice it unless you understood money and how to launder it and make everything look clean and on the up-and-up until all of a sudden you got nothing in your account, because what you see isn't what you get. It's all been boosted to another account. The figures in the former account are what Mercury calls ghost figures; the remains of dead money. George's bank accounts got shifted to Ace's bank account. Again, at a glance, George had money, but when you really looked carefully at the transfer numbers, Ace had it. Maybe Ace had something to do with it all too."

"Ace would be lucky to know which end the shit came out of an elephant even if he was standing under its ass."

“However it got there, it got there. But I’m not finished. Later on, Mercury figured out from all the revising what Jackie was doing. She was moving money from Ace’s account to one Marylou Cinner’s account.”

“The librarian.”

“What’s that?”

I said it again and told her the little bit Jamesway had told us, including the fact Cinner had moved off.

“Now, that is interesting,” Brett said.

“Yeah. It is. Cinner hasn’t been a player on the field, and all of a sudden, she is. I’m wondering, did she mastermind all of this?”

“I’ll see if I can find her by the usual routes, on Facebook, that sort of thing, and if that comes up goose egg, I’ll see if Mercury can help me. He’s still looking into the material on the thumb drive. He says there’s more, he’s just not sure what it all means. Looks like Jackie’s long game might have been being aided first by George, then Ace, and then it went to Marylou Cinner’s account. She may have been using them all as channels to take the money out and keep it for herself. Up to you to figure out what it all means. I have given you the tools to do your work, so now you can do it.”

“I gave you the tools to find the tools,” I said.

“True, but I’m your boss, and shit rolls downhill in a large stinky ball. Catch.”

35

I went over to Leonard and Pookie's room, told them what Brett told me.

"Bottom line," Leonard said, "it's like that movie where they say follow the money. We follow that, we find what happened to Jackie and her baby, if there is one. All this talk about segregation, shit, it's the money, you wait and see."

"Why not go talk with George?" Pookie said. "He works for Professor, and us knowing George was stealing money from Professor, even if he didn't end up with it, might not be something he would want revealed. Could give us some leverage and make him cooperative."

"I like it," Leonard said.

"Me too," I said.

We got directions to George's home from Brett, but when we drove out there, there was a burned-down house with a washing machine in the yard, blackened by fire. No one had lived in that spot for a long time. Somehow, George had gone off the grid, at least temporarily.

Plan B was since we were close to Longview, we would drive over there, and Pookie would rent a car and drive back out to the hill over the junkyard, find someplace to park, and see when George headed home. For all we knew, George had left the day before and was on vacation in the Bahamas. But as it stood, Pookie observing him and following him home and then giving us a call with directions was the best we could come up with. We wanted to talk to him somewhere other than the junkyard, somewhere away from Professor's influence, should he coincidentally be at the yard.

We figured this was a good plan because George hadn't met Pookie, and he didn't know the rental, but he knew my car and he knew me and Leonard.

By the time we got to Longview and rented the car and stopped to have coffee and a snack, because Pookie insisted, it was near what we thought would be George's quitting time.

Me and Leonard drove to a place not far from the junkyard but out of sight and parked and waited to hear from Pookie. We hoped no one thought we looked suspicious.

We played I spy for a while, but there wasn't that much to spy, and Leonard cheated. He changed what he had spied if he thought I was figuring it out. It was like playing with a five-year-old, but with a nastier vocabulary.

After a bit, the rain, which had left us for a while, came back. The sky turned dark and the clouds rolled in and there were splashes of rain on the windshield.

Leonard's cell rang. "Got you," Leonard said into the phone, then clicked off. "Pookie is following him. We'll get a report from him with directions shortly."

Pookie called back, and we followed his directions. George didn't live far from the junkyard. He lived down a road that ran into a path through the woods. It was a narrow road of shipped-in caliche and it worked good for the tires in the rain.

We saw Pookie parked off to the side. He had the rental car turned around, facing us. We pulled up in front of him. He got out in the rain and ran toward us, slid into the backseat.

"Just a bit farther up the road," Pookie said. "Best to walk from here."

"Did he see you?" I asked.

"Please," Pookie said. "Fucking spy satellite couldn't have found me, I am that stealthy."

We got out in the rain and started walking. We didn't have umbrellas or raincoats. What we had was wet clothes and skin. It was a damn shabby night, and I felt pretty shabby myself.

Only good thing was we didn't have far to go.

George's house wasn't a house but a double-wide trailer that looked as if it had been recycled from a major storm event. The windows had cheap curtains over them, and the bottom of the trailer had a dark outside waterline. The front door had a green lumber porch built up in front of it with an overhang. Rain cascaded off the slanted porch roof in a waterfall so thick it could have drowned a hippopotamus wearing diving gear.

I bet it was nice inside. Probably an example of interior decorating at its best. Lots of deer heads and a couch covered in camouflage, a shit-ring around the toilet, and maybe some cum-stained towels.

It was the only trailer on that lot, and it was set into a cutaway of the forest, which left it exposed out front and with trees at the back and on the sides. There was a pole with an automatic light on it, and it was on because the rainy sky had turned the world dark and soon the night would add to it.

In the glow of the light, I could see a small TV satellite dish on top of the trailer and I thought I recognized three struggling blades of grass on a patch of clay out to the side of the trailer along with some random spots of caliche.

In the caliche driveway, a soda-pop-orange truck was parked.

We spread out. I went left and Leonard went straight to the front door, hunkered down on the tacked-on porch. Pookie went right.

When I came around to the back of the trailer, I saw one window had open curtains. I ducked down under it and glanced over at Pookie coming up from the other side of the trailer. There was a door at the back of the trailer and a few steps leading up to it.

I met Pookie at the porch, and we got up close to the door and pressed our ears against it. We could hear a TV going. It was the usual twenty-four-hour redneck-news channel.

There was no overhang on the back porch and the rain came down on us like wet bullets. I was so miserable, I was ready to do something even if it was wrong.

I left Pookie where he was and went back to the window with the open curtains, lifted my head, and peeked inside. I could see George sitting on the couch with his shoes off, his socked feet up on a stool.

I edged back to Pookie, got out my lock pick, and went at it, silently as possible. In the meantime, Pookie sent Leonard a text letting him know what we were doing.

The lock snicked softly, and when it did, I jerked the door back, and Pookie and his pistol slipped inside.

37

George jumped to his feet as we came in, got caught up in the stool, and fell on his face. He started crawling toward the corner of the room where a shotgun leaned against the wall. I sort of accidentally stepped on his hand and stood on it with most of my weight.

He let out with a scream. By then Pookie had the shotgun.

I took my foot off George's hand, said, "Why don't you sit on the couch, partner."

He sat on the couch, which was not covered in the expected camouflage but had been nicely decorated in what appeared to be coffee, beer, and probably ejaculation stains. He sat there with his teeth gritted, holding his injured hand against his chest.

I picked up the stool George had tripped over, pulled it back a few feet from the couch, and sat down on it. Pookie gave me the shotgun. I placed it across my knees.

Pookie went over and turned on the light.

I looked around. There was indeed a deer head on the wall, and the nose of it looked to have been a moth buffet. One of the eyes looked as if it might fall out of the head. There was a cobweb in one nostril.

"What the fuck are you guys doing?" George said.

"We thought this was where the party was," I said.

"Fuck you," he said.

"Man, that told us off," I said.

"Yeah," Pookie said. "I feel told."

Pookie picked up the remote from the arm of the couch and cut off the TV racket, tossed the remote on the couch by George, then moved to the front door to let Leonard in.

Leonard came inside. He had been under the porch overhang, but he was still damp. He shook like a dog, slinging rain everywhere, including on me.

“You’re the first nigger ever through that doorway,” George said. “And you’ll be the last.”

“Yeah. You look like you’re in a great position to give me shit.”

Leonard sat in a fat-cushioned armchair and kind of worked his ass around on it.

“I’ll burn that chair when you’re gone,” George said.

“Ought to burn this whole place down, way it looks,” Leonard said. “I’d start with that fucking couch. What the fuck, man? All that money Jackie put in the bank, and you never got around to buying a nice place, and now she’s gone, and you’re left with dick, and I bet it’s a little one.”

“What money?” George said. But I could see his eyes had brightened with interest.

“Don’t go dumb,” I said. “Or dumber than usual, anyway. You were stealing money from Professor. If Professor found out, bet you told him Jackie stole it for Ace, since he ended up with it.”

Of course, he hadn’t actually ended up with it, but I thought that was a good place to start.

“Goddamn it,” George said.

“Bet it hurts to think Ace was working his weenie in your gal’s pussy,” Leonard said. “Big, black wiggle-weenie. Even made a baby with her.”

“That kid didn’t last long,” George said, and there was an odd look on his face. It looked a lot like the one he’d had when I stood on his hand.

“Here’s the thing we’re thinking,” I said. “We have all of Jackie’s accounting, how and where she put Professor’s money. He may not even know yet it’s missing, and the thing is, we got a clear trail to you, buddy. We can prove a lot of that money was in your account before it was in Ace’s and then, later on, someone else’s.”

“Someone else’s?” George said. “Someone besides Ace?”

“Yeah,” I said. “You didn’t know about that. You knew about Ace because I bet she told you. Kind of a jab. That might be why she can’t be found. You didn’t like being made a fool of, though, frankly, George, I think you should accept fool as your full-time job.”

“Wait a minute, now,” he said. “I didn’t do nothing to her.”

“Remains to be seen,” I said.

“Look here, I didn’t know she was doing that,” George said. “Not at first.”

“And when you did,” Leonard said, “you told her to put it back in Professor’s account. Want us to believe that?”

“Sure. I didn’t want that money.”

“I call bullshit on that,” Pookie said. “I think you’d steal quarters off a dead man’s eyes.”

George jerked his head toward me. “Who the hell is this plug?”

“He’s going to be the plug that sticks that pistol in your ear and gets rid of about forty years of ear wax,” Leonard said.

I could see that George had gone from being frightened to being terrified. And I don’t think it was the gun threat that was doing it.

“Thing is, your fault, Jackie’s fault, the fault in the stars,” I said, “doesn’t make a lot of difference. I think you try and explain to Professor how you didn’t know it was going on, that’ll be like kicking a dead rabbit and telling someone it’s jumping.”

Sweat beads popped on George’s forehead. Outside, thunder rolled and the rain came down harder than before, spattering on the cheap mobile-home roof. Loud enough I had to speak up.

“Know what I think?” I said. “I got an idea you did use some of that money, maybe laying you out a getaway plan, and Jackie might not have gotten away with it all.”

“Yeah,” Pookie said, “wouldn’t it be funny if some of it traced to a nice house and truck somewhere. Probably in another state.”

“Never did nothing like that,” George said.

“Let me get right to it,” I said. “You need to tell us about Jackie, where she is—”

“I got no idea,” he said.

“Don’t interrupt my man when he’s talking,” Leonard said.

“Like I was saying. You tell us what we want to know, and we won’t tell Professor what you don’t want him to know.”

George hung his head.

“Goddamn it,” he said. “Jackrabbit said we could bleed off more money. To wait. We’d be filthy rich. I didn’t buy anything. I don’t have a goddamn thing waiting anywhere. Don’t even own the junkyard. Professor, he bled me off, said he was helping me. I wanted to pay a bill, I had to go to him to get permission. I worked for that son of a bitch for years, and that’s the thanks I got. I wanted to fuck him over by taking some of his money. And I was sick of those goddamn twins. Always sneaking around.”

“That’s a sad fucking story,” Leonard said.

“Jackrabbit said we would take the money and go, and then after a time she quit hanging around with me and I started getting pissed, and then I find out she’s fucking Ace, and then I wanted my money, or my share, anyway, and I wanted rid of her."

"I bet you wanted rid of Ace too," I said.

"Sure," George said. "Then I found out the accounts she made for me, they were empty. Every cent. There wasn't even electricity left in those online accounts. I told Professor that I didn't trust Jackrabbit, said he ought to have someone look at his books. That was my way of getting back at her. He hired some smart-ass from Houston to give the records a check and saw how his money had been shifted. But me, I was in the clear. Ace had the dough by then. Professor never knew I had it, way I figured it."

"We found her records," I said. "And they will show you had that money for some time. It will be hard for Professor to believe you didn't have a clue. We could explain to Professor what you did and just walk away. How will that work out for you? I think those twins will be paying you a visit. It might be best to give us all the information there is to give, because you might end up with the cops, and they like you better when you're cooperative."

I let him mull that over.

"Of course, me and Leonard, we're not law. We can do what we think is best."

"Yeah," he said, "and how good will your best be?"

"It's what you got," I said. "We're it, Georgie."

"I tell you some things," George said, "you got to protect me best you can."

"Sure," I said.

It hurt me a little to know I was telling a lie.

38

I looked at Pookie, said, "It might be time for you to go."

Leonard got up, walked over to Pookie, and said, "You go on back to the bed-and-breakfast. You can't be here. Some things the law can't see and still be the law. We'll catch up to you later."

Pookie looked hesitant.

"I mean it," Leonard said.

Pookie nodded. He and Leonard touched hands, and out Pookie went.

"He's with the law?" George said. "You said no law."

"He's gone now," Leonard said, and he sat down in the armchair again.

"Tell us something we don't know," I said to George. "For that matter, tell us some things we do know, but don't get cute. Don't try and beat around the bush."

You could see George's brain weighing the possibilities, and then you could see him give in.

"Like I said, I told Professor about the scam Jackrabbit had going, like I had found it out and was turning her in because I wanted to save him his money, money Ace had. I was also mad about the kid. I thought it was mine when she got pregnant. She didn't tell me otherwise. I thought she was going to the library, turned out she'd been fucking Ace. I was thinking I was going to be a father, and I was getting used to the idea. Then one day she doesn't come to work, and then the money is gone out of my account. I find out about Ace, and then the baby's born and it's black as motor oil. Seen her and it around town a time or two. I didn't want nothing to do with her then, but I won't kid you, I was mad about that money too."

"And that's when you told Professor," I said.

"Professor decided it wasn't going to stand, him being snookered, and by a woman with a nigger baby. No way. You got to understand, he talks smooth, but you fuck with him, he'll jerk a knot in your dick. Or he'll have someone do it for him. The twins or someone else. One night, she's off to the store, her and that kid, and Professor has them nabbed on the way out."

"By you?" Leonard said.

"No. I couldn't do that. I didn't like what she'd done, that kid and all, and I hated Ace, but I couldn't do that, knowing what he was going to do. Anyway, Professor had done what he had done. He told me I could have Ace. I followed him one night to her old place, snuck up on him, grabbed the back of his jacket, jerked him down, and killed him with a Boy Scout hatchet. Those motherfuckers are sturdy."

"About Jackie and the kid?" I said. "What did he do to them?"

"Can I have a smoke?" he said.

"Light up," I said.

He scrounged around in his shirt pocket and pulled out a pack of smokes, shook one out, and lit it with a lighter he had in the same pocket.

"Professor had her and the kid brought out to the hog farm."

"And you're saying you weren't there?"

George shook his head briskly. "No. No way. But Professor and Red both told me about it. He had Red and the twins throw the kid to the hogs, like it was hog food. It didn't take them hogs long, Red said. Hog, if it's hungry enough, can eat a body like a cheese sandwich, and a little body like that…"

George paused. He actually did look bothered. He took a deep drag on his cigarette.

"I'm glad I didn't see it," he said.

"Jackrabbit fed to the hogs too?" I said.

"No. They were going to, wanted her to see what happened to the baby as punishment, but when they did that, she tried to climb over the barrier and get to the child. They held her back. She fought like a tiger, Red said, managed to break loose and get away. Baby was ripped apart by that time. She got through the woods out there and they couldn't find her, and then Jackrabbit wasn't around anymore. I think if they got her, they'd have said. They both told the same story.

"Professor don't normally do his own shit work, or even be around it, but that night, he was there. What happened out there to that kid. Not my style."

"I think something like that could get to be your style," Leonard said.

"Cowards can go any kind of way the wind pushes them."

George turned his head, looked at Leonard. "I think I could take you. I don't think you're so tough. Ace, now, he was tough."

"With you sneaking up behind him with a hatchet, you never really got to find out," Leonard said. "I did find out, and I handed Ace his ass. And without a hatchet."

"Sure you did," George said.

Neither Leonard nor I said a word. We just looked at him. I saw George's face change.

"Want to take on the man who whipped Ace's ass?" Leonard said. "You up for that? Maybe I ought to give you a hatchet to even things out."

Leonard gave me the pistol and stood up.

"Oh yeah, you're going to play it tough," George said, "but you got your boy here with my shotgun."

"He ain't going to do nothing but keep the peace in case you decide to run. I think that's a possibility."

George's face darkened.

"You want to talk tough, now I give you the chance to be tough," Leonard said. "You're still going to end up with the cops, but before that, you're going to get a beating."

"You said no cops."

"We lied," I said.

"You can't do that," George said.

"What do you think this is?" I said. "A sport?"

"Here's what you can get out of this deal, George," Leonard said. "And it's all you're likely to get, and it ain't that likely. You beat me, you get that satisfaction. I beat you, I get that satisfaction. Whatever, you still end up in a jail cell. And I tell you right now, you want to fight or you don't, you're going to take a beating."

George looked at me.

"What he said," I told him.

"Why?" George said.

"We don't like you," I said.

"No, we don't," Leonard said. "You need to take better care of dogs."

"What?" George said.

"You heard me," Leonard said.

"You took Rex, didn't you?"

Leonard merely smiled at him.

"Sure you want to bother with this?" I said to Leonard.

“Right now, it’s all I want to do,” Leonard said. “Get up, cracker, you and me are going to dance a bit.”

George stood up slowly, dropped the cigarette on the carpet, and put it out with his sock-covered heel. I guess he was showing us how tough he was. He was certainly a big boy. His mouth twisted in a smile as he gave Leonard a hard look. It wasn’t that confident a smile or a look, actually. Fear lived behind that mask.

Leonard locked the front and back door and moved to the center of the room. He stretched slightly to get the kinks out, bent his head from one side to the other. When he did, his neck made cracking sounds.

“Yeah,” Leonard said. “Now I’m good.”

George eased to the center of the room with Leonard, his hands up.

I kept my place on the stool.

George went for it, let one loose, a big looping right. If it had made solid contact, it could have dropped an ox, but making contact is the trick.

Leonard ducked the meteor, and then he was in on the bigger man, striking a series of quick punches low and to the kidney and bladder. George made a huffing sound, and then he hooked a left, and that caught Leonard, but Leonard turned with it. He’d have a bruise, but no bones were broken.

George came with a series of them now. Leonard slipped or ducked them all, and then he opened up.

George was easy. He was nothing. He was free pie.

Leonard worked the body so hard and fast, George couldn’t put any punches together, not anything good, anyway. And when he bent low to cover the spots Leonard was hammering, my man opened up on George’s face with a series of fast uppercuts. Leonard might as well have had a meat cleaver in his hand or that hatchet George had used, way he was cutting George up.

George staggered forward, tried another looping right, missed. Leonard slipped under it and to the side and swung a left deep into George’s belly. George dropped down on his ass. Leonard kicked him in the face and knocked him on his back. George peed himself. It was an acid smell and the piss stained George’s pants and the carpet.

George acted like he was going to try and get up, but then he shook his head, said, “No more,” and laid out on his side, breathing hard.

“You are one of the easiest nuts I ever cracked,” Leonard said.

That’s when headlights shone through the dingy curtains.

39

Not the newspaper boy, I assume," Leonard said.

"Think it might be our dear friends Jimmy and Lou," I said.

"I been wanting to see them again," Leonard said.

George lifted his head, said, "You son of a black bitch."

"Most likely," Leonard said.

"George," I said, "you move, I'll shoot you."

"I'm laying in piss," he said.

"And whose fault is that?" I said.

I was looking out the gap in the curtains as I talked to George. I saw two men get out of the pickup. Yep. Jimmy and Lou. You could tell Jimmy right off, the way he held his head, as if someone had screwed it on crooked.

They had what looked like shotguns.

Not good.

Leonard slipped to the other side of the door where there was another window, pushed back the curtains, and looked.

"Maybe I need to get my pistol back," he said.

"My pistol," I said.

"Tomayto, tomahto," he said. "Besides, you got the shotgun."

He walked briskly over to me and took the pistol.

That's when we heard the back door of the trailer swing open, and George was out of there in his sock feet.

"Goddamn it," Leonard said. "I must be losing my touch. I hit him really hard."

"Lock the doors," I said.

Leonard did that. I saw George out the front window, coming into view. He had come around the trailer, moving awkwardly, nursing his kidneys. He had his hands above his head, waving frantically at Jimmy and Lou.

“It’s me,” he called to them. “It’s me.”

Jimmy spoke over the rain.

“I know who you are.”

And then Jimmy and Lou lifted their shotguns and fired. The blasts hit George and tore him up. Little dark spots jumped from his body and disappeared beyond the glow of the yard light. George hit the ground so fast, it looked like a circus trick.

Lou walked over to him and shot him in the head, just in case there were still a couple of brain cells stirring.

Jimmy called out to the house, “Hap. Leonard. Know you’re in there. Why don’t you come out and let’s get this over with?”

Leonard gently unlocked the front door and cracked it open.

“Hell no. It’s nice and cozy in here, except for the stink where George pissed himself. Why don’t you come in and have a cup of my black ass, you crook-neck shit-ass?”

Jimmy grinned wide.

“You done hurt my feelings, talking about my neck. Don’t be a coward. Come out.”

“Don’t be an idiot,” Leonard said. “You boys come on up in here and get us. Let me see I can straighten that neck out for you.”

“That’s the way it’s got to be, we can come on up in there,” Jimmy said.

“Can you?” Leonard said. “Well, come on in. The bullets are fine.”

Jimmy turned and trotted back to the pickup. He and Lou got inside, and Jimmy gunned it.

The crazy bastard was racing straight for the trailer.

40

The truck was flying right at my position at the window.

I did a kind of quickie two-step and dived across the room. That's when the truck hit the trailer and there was a loud collision, like the heavens blowing a bean fart. The window glass was knocked out, the window frame caved in, and the front of the truck came inside the mobile home. A light fixture fell from the ceiling, crashed on the floor near me, and the home heaved off its foundations and dropped on one end, sent me sliding with Leonard tumbling after me.

I lost the shotgun for a moment, and then I had it again. I almost managed to get to my feet, but unless I was a fly, I wouldn't have been able to actually stand, so I fell to the ground on my belly, rolled to the side, pumped one into the sixteen-gauge chamber.

The mobile home was still moving but in slow motion now as it continued to swivel off its foundation blocks. The lights went out, except for the light on the post outside and the truck lights that were shining right at me; they lit the inside of the home pretty well.

I heard Leonard behind me cussing.

I glanced back. He had rolled into the bedroom door and knocked the hinges off, loosened up a plastic fuck doll from somewhere. It lay across his back where it had fallen, as if trying to mount him. Leonard still had the pistol in his hand.

I heard the truck doors slam, and then Jimmy appeared on the hood of the truck, which was poking through the remains of the window like an anteater's nose. He was standing there with his head at that odd angle, like he was being inquisitive. His shotgun roared, and as I was in a precarious position, he had me, but that's when the sagging mobile home slipped completely off the blocks and fell, throwing off his aim. The shotgun blasted the wall behind me. The home dropped hard, and when it hit the ground, the impact sent Jimmy flying off the hood and into the home, banging him up against the couch, which was slow-sliding across the floor.

The drop jarred my teeth, but now the home was mostly flat on the ground. I came up on my knees as Jimmy, still clutching the shotgun, tried to regain his composure. I didn't let him. Here's a tip in life-or-death struggles: Unlike the Lone Ranger, you don't shoot guns out of people's hands. You shoot them solid and you shoot to kill, and a shotgun in that situation is sweet.

I cut down on Jimmy just as he was about to cut down on me. He wasn't more than ten feet from me, maybe less. My blast was first, and when he was hit, his shotgun rode up and fired into the ceiling.

I thought for an instant I could see light through Jimmy, but it could have been an illusion. His crooked head even straightened slightly, and then he toppled onto his face and his butt went up in the air and wiggled a bit, and then he came down on his stomach, squirmed like a snake on a hot stove, then went still. Debris from the ceiling sprinkled him like snow.

His head had fallen so that his chin was supporting him. His eyes were looking right at me. I felt as if I saw his life wing its way out of him, through his eyes and into the shadows, like frightened quail scattering into the brush.

Leonard was on his feet now, stepping past me.

Lou was entering through the window with his shotgun. When he saw Jimmy's dead ass, he made a noise. It was a cold and horrible sound, like a rabbit dying. Before Lou could get a bead on either of us, Leonard let off a shot from the pistol.

I couldn't tell where the shot hit Lou, but I heard a smacking sound and saw dark liquid fly up, momentarily framed by the pole light outside; the drops seemed to fall in slow motion.

Lou went sideways at a stumble, through the gap in the wall, back onto what remained of the hood of the truck, which looked like an accordion pushed in. The crunch in the hood caught his foot, and he fell, toppled out of sight.

Like a juggernaut, Leonard went after him, springing through the gap and onto the hood. I heard a shot from the handgun. I came out right behind Leonard, and when I got there, Lou was running toward the road, wobbling. He had dropped the shotgun.

Leonard jumped off the truck and walked after Lou like the angel of death about to collect a soul. The rain was still coming down.

Lou stumbled and fell. He fell hard. He started to crawl, clawing his fingers into the wet dirt.

I came up quickly behind Leonard, and now Leonard was right on top of Lou. He lifted the pistol. I gently pushed it aside.

“No need for that,” I said.

Lou was still crawling.

“Maybe I ought to pop him one for mercy,” Leonard said.

“I don’t think you’re feeling all that merciful,” I said.

“You’re right. I just want to pop him.”

“Leave the poor bastard be,” I said.

The decision was taken out of our hands as Lou shivered slightly and quit crawling. He collapsed slowly, lay with his face in the wet dirt, let out his breath, and was as still and silent as his brother.

In the distance, we could hear dogs and coyotes howling, disturbed from their nightly activities by the sounds of our gunfire, and most likely the stench of death.

Delf said, "Dead? Both of them?"

"Yeah," Leonard said.

"They tried to kill you?"

"Yeah," Leonard said.

Delf was sitting behind his desk in the police station. Me and Leonard and Pookie were standing in front of his desk. We had already told him the story of what George had told us, how his brothers died.

"How again, exactly?" Delf said. He looked so stunned, so sad, it was painful.

"We're sorry," I said, but I didn't tell it to him again.

"Jesus," he said.

Eula came in from the front desk and rolled a chair over next to Delf, put her hand on top of his, which was lying on the desk like a dead bird.

"I knew it was coming, I guess," Delf said, "I even thought you guys being in town might lead to it. I should have encouraged you not to come back."

"We had no choice," I said.

"And why were you not there?" Delf said to Pookie.

"I'm an officer of the law, same as you. I couldn't take a confession illegally. Hap and Leonard could. It's worth what it's worth to a jury, but I didn't want any part of it. I didn't know your brothers were going to show up or I would have stayed. I think it would have come out the same way."

Delf shook his head.

"Oh Jesus. I'm glad Mother isn't alive. She would be devastated. Christ, I'm devastated."

"Again, sorry," I said.

Leonard had not said sorry once. The reason he hadn't was he wasn't sorry. He could kill you and sleep like a baby if he'd felt he had to do it, felt you had it coming. He thought a lot more people had it coming than I did.

The door opened and Johnny walked in. He leaned against the wall with his arms crossed. Like Eula, he had heard the story earlier, when we reported it. They had called Delf at home, had him come in.

"I guess we need a formal statement, and then I got to go look at the crime scene," Delf said.

"I sent what passes for our forensic team out there," Johnny said. "You don't need to see that shit, Chief."

"Yeah," Delf said. "Maybe not."

Delf's face looked as if he had just bit into alum, and suddenly he got up from behind the desk and came around quickly, heading right at me, as I was the closest. Johnny grabbed him and turned him and guided him like a child back to his chair. Delf sat down and put his head in his hands.

"Did you have to kill them?" he said through his fingers.

"Yep," Leonard said. "That's getting to be an old question. It was us or them. They came to kill George, and did, and when they saw our car, knew we were there, they thought they'd get a three-fer."

"If it's any consolation," I said, "Jimmy died like a man."

"It isn't," Delf said. But then he dropped his hands and looked at Leonard. "Lou. Did he die well?"

"No one dies well," Leonard said. "I gut-shot him twice. I meant to kill him right off but didn't. I won't kid you. I wanted to shoot him again when he crawled away from us like a fucking snake in the grass. And let me warn you, you get up to hit me or Hap, law or no law, I will knock you down."

"Hey," Johnny said, and moved away from the wall.

"Take it easy," Pookie said. "I have to knock you down and Leonard knocks Delf down, it'll be hard to move around in this little room."

"You boys quit posturing," Eula said.

Johnny and Pookie exchanged glances, then Johnny leaned back against the wall. Pookie stood where he was, didn't bat an eye or move a muscle.

"Delf asked how Lou took it," Leonard said. "And I told him."

"I did," Delf said. "I did indeed. What I'm going to do is ask Johnny here to take you two to the interrogation room. Officer Carroll, you are free to go."

"I'd rather stay," Pookie said.

“Have it your way,” Delf said. “Johnny will see all of you get coffee.”

“No, I won’t,” Johnny said.

42

In the interrogation room we sat without coffee at the table where we had sat before. Johnny was standing, leaning against the wall in the same way he had leaned against the wall in Delf's office. Pookie was leaning against the opposite wall. Johnny and Pookie studied one another from time to time, sizing up who had the biggest dick, I guess, and who could swing theirs the hardest.

"You had to kill those two assholes?" Johnny said to us.

"On a loop here," Leonard said.

"Damn," Johnny said, shaking his head. "Sure. Sure. I know they had it coming. I know that. Just don't like seeing Delf like that."

"Then quit asking us about it," Leonard said. "Do what you're going to do. Charge us. Send us home. Fuck us in the ass and call us Daisy, but ask any more questions, we call a lawyer. We got a good one named Veil. Course, we'll have to fly him in from Oregon."

"There'll be questions, but not by me," Johnny said. "Not anymore. Ah, hell. It could just as easily have been me. I thought once they were going to go for me. I saw them and they saw me one time out by the old spillway. I wasn't on duty. I was fishing. I thought they were going to take me out, way they looked. They had guns with them, wearing them on their hip. Ain't that shit when the law allows that and they aren't law or military? Can you imagine a coincidence like that? Me there and them there."

"Me and Hap believe in coincidences," Leonard said.

"I don't. I think they came to kill me. They didn't have any fishing gear. I had my police-issue with me, and I guess they decided the time wasn't right. Or maybe they got cold feet."

"Jimmy didn't seem like the cold-feet type," I said. "Just cautious."

"Maybe it was a coincidence. Perhaps they had come to fish. If they had, they never did, not near me, anyway. For all I know they didn't leave, just went downstream to fish away from me."

"In our case, tonight was a coincidence," I said. "They happened to find us with George, and I think Professor sent them to take care of a loose end. I think Professor knew George was a weak link, knew he had been stealing money. Knew he knew some things he wished he didn't know. We would have been icing on the cake, had they been successful."

"Been those twins, might have been a different story," Johnny said.

"We hear about them," Leonard said, "but far as we know they haven't done shit."

"A lot of it might be hot air," Johnny said, "but a lot of it might not be. I vote on the side of caution."

"Do you know their names?" I said.

"Yeah. The twins."

"Nice," I said.

"That's all I got, all anyone knows. Word is they have done quite a bit of killing, but the problem is that's all we got, a word or two. Again, I stick on the side of caution, just in case they're as badass as some say they are."

Delf stuck his head in the door, said, "All right, boys. Going to see the Professor. Going to give him a bit of a talk. I'm bringing you with me."

"Really, Delf?" Johnny said. "I mean, Chief. That isn't protocol."

"It is tonight," Delf said. "I'm the goddamn police chief of this one-horse town, and if I say they go, they go. And Officer Carroll here, I'm temporarily deputizing him in our jurisdiction so he can go with us."

"Can you do that?" Johnny said.

"I'm the goddamn police chief, didn't you hear?" Delf said. "Consider yourself deputized, Officer Carroll. Town council can fire me if they like. Right now I wish they would, but for tonight I'm still the boss, and I'm calling in everyone, off duty or not. Saddle up, boys, let's go. Now. I have a judge to see first, and then we will give Professor an antisocial call."

43

Killing people makes you tired. It erodes your soul as well. In Leonard's case, I think it might energize him, but me, right then, I was feeling worn out and blue with a soul as thin as the edge of a razor. I didn't seem to know anything anymore. I was like a student at the Helen Keller School of Astronomy for the Blind, looking through a telescope. It was dark out there.

Me and Leonard were sitting in the back of the cruiser Delf was driving. Pookie and Johnny were in another.

My cell rang. It was Brett. She gave me some info and I told her I was kind of in a bad spot and had to go. When I turned off the cell, I said, "Here's something else. Computer guy, he found out something about all this money Jackie has been moving. Librarian, Cinner, that was supposed to have got all the money? Well, she didn't really get all the money either. Jackie made it look like Cinner had the money. It was in accounts that seemed to point to her, but our man looked closer, saw they were shells, that the money was offshore."

"Damn," Leonard said. "I hate fucking computers. How can you make something look one way and it be something else? It gives me the heebie-jeebies."

"Guess whose name the money was really in, when it was all said and done. Guess who had all the money?"

"What the fuck is this?" Delf said, slowing the car a little. "A quiz show? I'm not in the mood for this shit. Just tell me."

"Professor," I said. "Guy who supposedly was being snookered and had lost all the money suddenly had all the money, and maybe he had it all along, slipped it through other accounts like shit through a goose. Money-laundering it somehow. Getting it offshore. It was a shell game. Everyone thought the peanut was under their shell, but thing was, Professor always had all the peanuts."

"It do be confusing for a simple country boy," Leonard said. "Seems to me, Jackrabbit would have had to do that for him."

"Maybe he forced her to do it," I said.

"Well, one thing we need are any computers Professor might have," Delf said.

Professor's place wasn't as fancy as you might think for a man with money. It was a large acreage with a number of storage buildings on it, and the house was good size but looked to have been designed by an idiot. You could see sections had been built onto it randomly, like the Winchester House but without the class. It even had one little stained-glass window, high up on the left side. I couldn't make out the design because no light came from behind it, but it was the only piece of stained glass visible.

Before we drove out, Delf had managed to quickly get a search warrant from a judge, went directly to his house, telling him something or other. We had to wait in the car like children while he was inside.

Now we were at the Professor's pad with Delf and his search warrant. Johnny and Pookie were already there in the other cruiser. They had come through the open gate the same as we had. It wasn't locked. Frankly, it wasn't much of a compound and it wasn't well kept.

There was a big white man with a tavern tumor sitting in a lawn chair on the front porch. The overhang was running with rainwater, and some of it was splashing on him, but he had on a rain slicker with a hood. He looked uncomfortable. Another big fellow, also a white guy, also in a rain slicker, was in the yard, wandering about like a child looking for Easter eggs. He came out of the shadows and was partially lit up from a yard light.

They both had weapons, rifles of some sort. The man in the lawn chair stood up. There was a feeling in the air like the last bridge had washed away and the dam was about to break.

It intensified as another cop car arrived and two black men got out of it, one short and fat, the other lean and tall. They would be the off-duty guys Delf had called in. They had on slickers and they stood by their cars in the rain. They had pushed their slickers back so they could rest their hands on their guns.

Delf, Pookie, and Johnny went up to the door to serve the search warrant. The other two cops didn't move. The man walking around with the rifle stopped moving. This was the time when things could go wonky, shots could be fired, people could be killed. Leonard and I slowly got out of the car and stood in the rain. I didn't want to be trapped in that damn car.

Still, I felt kind of helpless standing out by the cruiser with no real power to do anything but put my hands in my pockets and hold my balls and let the rain run over me. Even with the rain like that, in the strong wind you could smell the hog farm that was out back of the house, near the woods. As we'd driven up, we could see the shape of it back there, huge and ominous, pigs getting fat. I wondered if they knew they were going to die for someone's bacon.

As Delf, Pookie, and Johnny reached the porch, the man in the lawn chair stood up and blocked Delf. He was much bigger than Delf.

We could hear them clearly while they talked.

"Belvin," Delf said, "are you really going to try and block a sworn officer of the law and someone who's known you since you were small enough to shit in diapers?"

"Nothing personal, Delf," Belvin said.

Johnny was standing off to the side of the porch, his hand on his gun. His dark skin and the black of the gun blended as if they were one.

Pookie was standing away from both of them, watching the man in the yard. Pookie had his hand behind his back. He was holding the butt of his pistol where it rested in a holster fastened to his belt.

The other man came wandering in from the yard. He held his rifle in an obviously nonthreatening manner.

"Ah," Delf said to the man as he walked up, "Terry Joe Fisher. Son of a bitch. I didn't see it was you. Weren't you preaching somewhere?"

"Not enough in the offering plate," he said. "Had to quit it. I guess I wasn't called by God after all. For a while I was called by insurance, but I couldn't sell enough, and then there was real estate, but I wasn't any good at that either. So now I'm here."

"Listen here," Delf said. "You two, you all behind the Professor's shit?"

"Just hired guns," Belvin said. "Your brothers do the heavy lifting, and those two weird fucks and Red, until he got himself chewed up by a dog or some such."

"Jimmy and Lou have joined Red at the hog farm in the sky," Delf said. "Though not by dog bite. By bullet."

"Oh," Belvin said. "Oh, man. We didn't know."

"It was all of a sudden," Delf said.

"Where's Professor?" Johnny said.

"We got no idea if he's in there or not," Belvin said.

“Now, that’s not true,” Terry Joe said. “He’s in there, and we both know it.”

“Goddamn it, Terry Joe,” Belvin said.

“I ain’t going to talk shit that will get me in a hole,” Terry Joe said. “And I wouldn’t shoot nobody nohow. Thought I’d just have to walk around with a rifle and listen to Professor’s bullshit and pick up a check. I ain’t no better at this than I was at preaching, insurance, or real estate. I’m thinking maybe my calling is selling used cars or some such. I’m going home, if that’s all right, Delf?”

“You go on, then,” Delf said. “You go on, and that’s the last friendly thing I do. I lost two brothers tonight, and, worse, they both had it coming. But it puts me in a mood. You feel me, boys? You feel my mood?”

“I feel you,” Terry Joe said.

Hell, I could feel that mood all the way back at the car.

Terry Joe leaned the rifle against the doorsill on the porch and walked to where it was darkest at the edge of the house. A moment later we heard a car door slam, then there were lights, and then a truck came barreling around the left side of the house and was gone up the road faster than you could say, “Shit in a can and clamp the lid down tight.”

The car’s red taillights glowed back at us through the rain.

“What about you, Belvin?” Delf said.

“Professor has the note on my house and truck,” Belvin said.

“Let me worry about that,” Delf said.

“How worried will you be?”

“Quite worried.”

“You’ll do something?”

“What I can. Go home, have a beer, watch some TV. Jerk your dick, let the dog lick your balls.”

“I could do that, couldn’t I?” Belvin said.

“Either that or I’m going to knock your ass down, and if you lift that rifle, Johnny will shoot you.”

“Two or three times,” Johnny said.

“What am I going home to?” Belvin said. “Wife left me.”

“Right sorry to hear that,” Delf said, “but you got that dog I mentioned.”

“Died,” Belvin said.

“Hell, didn’t you used to have a donkey? You could go home to the donkey.”

“Ah, Delf, I was sixteen,” Belvin said. “You know I don’t own a donkey no more.”

“Belvin here got caught putting the pork to a donkey’s ass in a barn, standing on a bucket behind it.”

“Sweet, sweet donkey love,” Pookie said.

“Ah, goddamn it, Delf. People have mostly forgot about that. You didn’t need to bring it up. ’Sides, that donkey died before the dog.”

Pookie made a nickering sound like a donkey.

“That’s not funny,” Belvin said. “No call for that.”

“Belvin,” Delf said. “It’s time for you to go. You can drive home and sit in the dark and dream about that long-dead donkey, or you can think about it in a jail cell. Make a choice, and make it now.”

Belvin sighed, put his rifle where Terry Joe had put his.

Delf said, “Anyone in there with him?”

“Them twins are never far away,” Belvin said.

“Go on, then,” Delf said.

Belvin took a deep breath and walked into the darkness and around the corner of the house. Pretty soon there were headlights like before, then a white car, then there were only the taillights, and then like his partner, Belvin was gone.

“If only he had that donkey to go home to,” Pookie said.

Del turned and waved the other two cops to him, then he looked at us. “Ah, hell, boys, quit leaning on the car. Come on over here, you’re deputized.”

We walked over to the porch. Delf handed us the rifles the guards had left.

“Prefer you just look threatening,” Delf said. “Try not to shoot anybody. I don’t want to have to explain this deputy thing too much, but some asshole in there, the twins, Professor himself, anyone that decides to channel their inner Wild Bill Hickok, shoot the shit out of them.”

Delf pounded on the door and stepped off to the side.

No one answered.

“Johnny,” Delf said. “You up for kicking it down?”

“Let me,” Pookie said.

Pookie pulled his pistol out from under his shirt. He was preparing to kick the door when a shotgun blast tore through the door and hit Pookie solid in the chest and dropped him like Newton’s apple.

45

The world got slow and I felt as if I were moving through gelatin. When the blast knocked Pookie down, his gun went up in the air, and it seemed to defy gravity, appeared to be floating down toward the earth with all the speed of a feather in an updraft. Along with it, fragments from the door spun in the air and were caught in the glow of the porch light.

And then the falling gun smacked on the concrete porch floor, spun a little on impact, and time came unstuck.

Leonard grabbed Pookie under the arms, pulled him off the porch and into the rain, back toward the patrol car. I could hear Pookie gasping like a large fish out of water. Leonard was saying, “It’s all right, gonna be all right.”

Johnny leaped across the porch and kicked the door. It cracked loudly, slammed hard against the wall, and sagged on one hinge.

Then Johnny, me, and Delf were inside. I could hear the two cops splashing in the rain after us, and then we were all inside, stupid-like, standing at the end of a hallway, trapped like a pack of rats in a sewer pipe.

In that moment fear washed over me and I could imagine someone stepping out with a shotgun, firing, smacking several of us in a scattergun blast.

There were two doorways at the end of the hall, and one to the right near us. I figured whoever had fired the shotgun had taken that closest exit, might be right inside, waiting, so you wouldn’t want to go there. But I did anyway.

Can’t explain a thing like that, but somehow, the idea of standing there, not doing anything, waiting for the other shoe to drop was worse than the idea of going through that open foyer and into whatever was beyond.

I went through at a crouch, the rifle in my hand, and when I came into the room, it was empty. In a strange way, I was disappointed. I wanted the bastard who had shot Pookie. I wanted him bad.

I edged back out into the hallway, and there was just me and Delf and Johnny now. I shook my head.

"I sent them around back," Delf said, referring to the two cops. "You can step out of this."

"Not likely," I said.

"Split up," Delf said.

I went back through the foyer and into the room as Delf and Johnny went down the hall, planning to split up and go into the rooms at the end, I figured, maybe right into a trap.

I moved along through the room, and then through an open door and into another hallway. I looked both ways down the hall and saw nothing. I was keenly aware of the sounds of the air conditioner humming and the rain slamming against the roof of the house.

Easing along, I came to a kitchen, and on the far side of it was an open door that led outside. There was a back-porch light and the rain made lines in the light beyond the porch like billions of falling needles.

I kept up my caution, glanced all about, but there was no trap. The kitchen was empty.

I made my way to the doorway and peeked around the edge of it and looked out at the night. There was too much light to see what was beyond it, and stepping out onto the back porch under the light would make me a perfect target. I touched the switch on the wall and turned off the light, eased through the doorway, staying low, and stepped off the porch. In the distance, I could see two shapes running toward a structure near the dark line of the woods back there. They were rushing toward the hog farm. I didn't know if it was the two cops Delf had sent out back or the twins. They were too far away and it was too dark to tell much about them.

I thought about alerting Delf and Johnny, but there could be other bad guys in the house with guns, and I didn't want to throw them off their diligence, so I took a deep breath and went out into the rain.

The hog farm was a long line of buildings linked together by brick and concrete, seemingly glued tight by thick shadows. Off the buildings was a stretch of pens made up of close-together horizontal bars covered over by an aluminum roof, and there were a handful of lights on high metal poles, and the lights shone down into the empty pens, which were floored with concrete. The smell of hog was thick in the air. The rain stirred the stench like a foul soup.

I didn’t see the twins.

I didn’t see the cops.

I didn’t see any hogs.

The rain plastered my hair to my forehead. I had started to feel cold and uncomfortable. I glanced back at the house and thought maybe I should go back there and find reinforcements, but it wasn’t a thought that stayed with me long. But one thing that did stick with me was the fact that the two cops could shoot me by mistake as easily as they could shoot the twins.

That was unnerving.

And then there was a blast that made me crouch, and I got a glimpse of gunfire at the far end of the pen, where it met the building. I saw a shape move quickly and gracefully from the side of the pen into the building, and I saw another shape fall out toward the pen.

I heard someone yell inside the building, and then I heard double shotgun blasts, and then a silence that was far from golden. I inched my way to the pen, slipped the rifle through the bars so that it was propped against them, stuck a foot on the lower bar, and climbed over.

I dropped down as silently as possible, picked up the rifle, and moved toward where the body had fallen. I was shaking a little, like leaves in a light wind.

I reached the wall of the building and put my back to it and crept along it until I came to where the man had fallen. There was enough light I could see it was one of the cops, even if his head was gone. He had on the uniform. His service automatic was still in his hand.

Trembling, I took the automatic from him and stuck it in my pants pocket, turned cautiously into the opening where the shape had gone, knowing now it had been one of the twins.

Inside it was dark and the smell was strong, but there was a light at the far end of the building, and I could see in the distance better than up close.

I crouched down and put my back to the wall and sat for a moment until my eyes adjusted to the darkness. I took a deep breath and started out along what I realized was a walkway. As I came nearer the light at the far end, I could see better. I could see the walkway was attached to a wall on the far side and ended at a closed door.

I also noticed that if I were to step too far left, I would fall into a long concrete trough, and worse, I would fall into what was in the trough. Manure and what might have been blood from butchering churning along, pushed by water, probably dropping off into a septic tank buried somewhere outside. It was hard to see exactly what was there in that light, but it was easy to smell and identify it. Right then I swore off sausage and pork chops but reserved the right to eat bacon.

If it wasn't bad enough that if I fell off the platform to the left I'd end up deep in hog shit and blood, to the right the concrete floor was twenty feet below, and it was my guess the hogs first entered there on their way into the butchering room. I could almost smell the remnants of their fear, or maybe that was my fear I smelled.

On I went, sweating, the rain pounding about the same rhythm as my heart. And then I tripped, lunged forward, almost lost my footing and fell into the hog mess, almost lost the rifle too, but I ended up keeping both. I got down on one knee and felt what I had tripped over.

I put my hand out and touched something soft and warm, wet and sticky. I pulled my hand back. I squinted. It was hard to see, of course, but I could make out that what I had put my hand in used to be a face. It was the body of the other cop, and he had fallen in such a way he was stretched across the ramp, barring the pathway.

I inadvertently wiped my hand on his uniform front, stepped over him, and moved toward the door. The twin who had killed him had to have gone through there, and now the door was closed, and if I were to open it, there was a good chance he, or both of them, would be waiting on the other side, ready to cut me in half.

I paused for a moment, then went back the way I had come, outside the main building, under the aluminum hog-pen roof, and then over the side of the bars like before, only going outside this time. When I dropped on the other side and picked up the rifle, I could see the house in the distance, some of the lights on, and I thought I might ought to give it up and go back there.

But I didn't do that. I couldn't do that. The bastards had shot Leonard's Pookie.

I slipped around the outside of the building, ducking low where there were windows. There were a few dim lights inside, the kind that stay on all the time but have low wattage. I made my way on around the corner and got to the other side and saw a door there.

I didn't think going through a door was any better an idea now than it was before. I passed it and moved along the wall, came to a pen on the far side, only this one was filled with Yorkshire hogs. Rain splashed on the outside of the pen and hammered on the roof, and the hogs stirred restlessly down there, lots of them, too many for the space.

I put the shotgun through the bars, climbed over into a large pile of hogs, managed to pull the rifle out from under hog feet, picked it up, and made my way through them. It was like climbing over stinky, warm, moving boulders. They sniffed and honked. I tried not to excite them. I moved along there until I could see the pen had bars that led up to the side of the building, ended below a window. There was an orangish light in the window, like a candle inside a jack-o'-lantern.

With hogs bumping against me, one of them nipping painfully at the back of my thigh, I put the rifle against the bars and took off my shirt. I rolled it with a few whips of the wrist, then I tied one end to the rifle barrel, the other to the stock, making myself an impromptu strap. I slung the rifle over my shoulder with it, started climbing the bars by standing on a hog's head first, and inched my way up toward the window.

When I got up there, I peeked over the sill. It was a large window about the size of two normal ones, but it was one pane of glass.

In the orange light, I could see it was an office, and the pale-faced twins were in the center of it, standing back to back, at a slight crouch, facing the two doors I might have come through.

I hooked my right leg over a side bar, made myself as comfortable as possible, poked the rifle against the window glass gently, took aim, and was softly squeezing the trigger when one of the twins, perhaps alerted by a shadow, a sound, turned and saw me through the glass.

Any kind of weapon pointed at you is call for loose sphincter muscles, but a shotgun at that range is in a completely different league. As the twin whirled in my direction I fired my shot, but it was so hasty, I didn't know if I had hit anything, because the next thing that happened was I dropped the rifle and swung down with my legs caught up in the bar so that I was dangling upside down. I heard a clanking sound below me but didn't take time to note it. At the same instant, the glass was blown out by the shotgun and it rained down on me and the hogs below.

As I was trying to right myself and stay below that windowsill, out came the twin. I had just pulled myself up slightly when he leaned out of the window and poked the shotgun in my face. I grabbed the barrel and pushed it away from me, and that caused the twin to lose his balance and come tumbling out of the window and into the pen below.

He landed on some rambling hogs, and the shotgun bounced away from him and disappeared under a sea of hogs. I swung down on one of the bars and then leaped out at him as he tried to get up beneath a horde of now squealing and rampaging hogs. They ran together and knocked one another down and slid on the concrete that was wet from the blowing rain.

I dropped on a hog straddle-wise and rode it for a few feet before falling off. I turned at a crouch, and there came the twin. He had a knife he had produced from somewhere, and he was stepping partly on hog backs, partly on concrete, making a unique path in my direction.

I remembered the automatic I had picked up and reached for where I had shoved it in my pants pocket, and that's when I remembered the sound of something falling earlier, and now I knew what it was.

The twin stepped one foot up on a hog, and the hog moved, and the twin fell, and I tried to push my way through the hogs to him before he could get up, but that didn't happen. Just as I got to him, he was up and the knife slashed out at me.

I slap-passed it, but it got part of my naked skin, nothing terrible, but it seemed like a harbinger of things to come. I practice martial arts, have for years, including knife defense, but as my Shen Chuan instructor once told me, "There is no good knife defense, only a defense that is better than nothing."

Also, I had been stabbed and cut before and had found it most unpleasant.

The knife slashed back and I scooted back. It missed me by inches. He came again, a straight thrust this time. I grabbed his wrist with both hands, something my dad had taught me. I grabbed it and held on and kicked him in the nuts as hard as I could. It was a little like kicking a Ken doll in the crotch. No effect.

He slugged me with his free hand, and it was a good left hook. It shook me. Birds and bees seemed to pass before my eyes, and hogs actually passed beneath my feet, and down I went, still hanging on to that wrist with both hands, pushing the blade away from me.

I wrapped my legs around him as a hog stepped on my face, and I could feel the wet stink against my naked back, the weight of the twin pressing down on me. He tried to slug me with his free hand again. I jerked my leg up and kicked him in the thigh and sent him back, and at the same time I squirmed out from under him, but I had lost my hold on his wrist.

He was up as quick as a whack-a-mole, and with the knife hand in front of him, his other hand folded across his chest to avoid me gripping it and to use it to slap punches I might throw, he advanced on me.

As he did, a hog ran between his legs and knocked him forward. I heard his teeth hit the concrete as two large hogs ran across his back. This caused his head to lift, and as it did, I kicked a field goal with it. It was a really hard kick, and I heard a sound like a rotten stick cracking, knew I had caused something to go in his neck. He made a noise like a water hose breaking loose, then lay flat on the concrete as more hogs walked on him. He was breathing, but barely. I could hear that busted sound still going, but softly now, like a child trying to play a bagpipe.

I shoved some hogs aside, searched about, found the twin's shotgun, decided that would do, and then, stumbling, nearly falling, I made my way toward the bars of the pen. I put the shotgun through them and climbed over, receiving a nip on the ass from a hog as I went. Behind me, I could hear the twin making a sound almost like a scream caught up in a corked bottle and then I heard a sound like someone ripping a sheet, and I knew the hogs had him. He was still and bleeding, and now he was their sausage.

I worked my way around to the building again, and this time I decided to chance the door. I had done one of them in, so the one inside, if he was still there, couldn't be blocking both.

I tested the door. It was unlocked. I pulled it open quickly and slid inside at a crouch, my back against the wall. But no one was visible. I inched toward the desks, pointing the shotgun. No one was hiding between them. The door at the back of the room was wide open. I stood at the side of the door for a moment, looking out, letting my eyes become more accustomed to the light. The doorway led back the way I had come in originally, before I had turned around and gone back through the pen. It was a platform that jutted out onto the walk that bisected the trough of hog shit and the twenty-foot drop to a concrete floor.

I took a breath, went through the door, and that's when I knew he had me.

He was standing right there beside the wall, and as I came through he punched his shotgun against my temple, and in that instant I visualized all I was and all I would ever be flying away from me in blood drops, skull fragments, and brain matter.

But that's when Leonard, who had come up behind him, grabbed the shotgun barrel and jerked it up, causing a blast from the gun to smack loudly into the ceiling. He twisted the shotgun out of the twin's hand, said, "Give me that."

He used the stock on the surprised twin's head, twice in rapid succession, knocking him against the wall. Leonard crowded him so he couldn't fall, hit him again, flattening his nose. The twin staggered, and Leonard moved and let him stumble by.

Leonard put the shotgun against his head, pushed him with it, made him walk backward. Leonard said, “You don’t fuck with Hap and Leonard, and I hope you’re the one shot Pookie.”

The twin looked at him oddly. A slight smile crawled across his otherwise dead face, and Leonard let her rip. The twin’s head dissolved, and then he toppled into the hog shit. I went over for a closer look. He floated on top for a moment, and then the water moved him along, and he went under and churned out of sight.

49

Walking back to the house, I said, “Sorry about Pookie. He was a fine guy.”

“Still is. He had on that bulletproof vest. He’s got a bruise the size of a cantaloupe and the color of cancer on his chest, a few pellets in his face, some splinters from the door, maybe a cracked rib. Ambulance picked him up. He’s at the hospital. He’ll be all right.”

“They killed both the cops,” I said.

“I saw the bodies.”

“You came at the right time.”

“I usually do. You lost your shirt.”

“Oh, really. I hadn’t noticed.”

Back at the house, Delf and Johnny were holding down the living-room couch.

“Sorry we weren’t with you,” Delf said. “We were clearing the house.”

Leonard and I put the shotguns aside. “You did right,” I said. And then I told them what had happened out there.

“It’s messy,” Delf said, “but you are deputies, and they were scum. We’ll make it right. You lost your shirt, by the way.”

“Oh, really.”

“And you’re bloody.”

“Another surprise. What about the Professor?”

“Didn’t find him,” Johnny said. “But those dick guards said Professor was in the house. We were going to make another sweep for him or evidence.”

Me and Leonard picked up our shotguns.

“Let’s do this,” I said.

50

The search was slow and tedious, and we didn't split up this time.

Delf and Johnny went through drawers and closets, everything, and me and Leonard followed about with our shotguns, just in case an army of samurai were crouched in a closet somewhere behind the winter coats.

You could see Delf and Johnny had already done this, way things were thrown around, but this time out they were less tender and short on police procedure.

At one point, Delf paused at one of the bathrooms and peed in the sink, us standing outside the open door, hearing his stream hit the porcelain. He came out drying his dick on a hand towel, which was not a pretty sight. He threw the towel in the corner and zipped up.

I said, "Doesn't that compromise evidence?"

"Not the way I see it," he said.

"All righty," I said.

Upstairs, Johnny took a leather jacket from a closet, tried it on. It didn't fit. "Shit," he said. "Always wanted one of these."

He tossed it back in the closet. It made a hollow sound when it hit the closet wall.

We searched high and low, but no Professor, and no real evidence. We ended up back in the living room.

"Could have slipped out the back way when we came up," Johnny said. "Might be why the twins were back there. He could be hiding with the hogs."

"He was, they'd squeal," I said.

"That's some funny shit," Johnny said. "But not that funny."

"Okay," Leonard said, "so we check the hog house, see if he's hiding there."

“I got to pee first,” I said.

“Be sure and pee on something that matters, and wipe your pecker on a towel or curtain,” Delf said.

“I saw the master at work,” I said. “I know how it’s done.”

I didn’t do that, though. I went to the toilet down the hall and took a leak, and when I finished, during the shaking of the member, I realized something.

I zipped up, went back to the living room.

“One thing,” I said. “Outside, you look at the house, there’s a room off to the top left. It has a stained-glass window. I don’t remember seeing it from the inside.”

“Oh,” Delf said.

We all went upstairs, moved down a wide hallway to the far side of the house. We went into a room that should have been the room with the stained-glass window, but it only had a normal window.

I remembered that the closet where Johnny found the jacket had only had a couple of coats in it, and I remembered too the sound it had made when it hit the closet wall.

The closet door had been left open. I turned on the light and stepped inside. The others stood outside the closet and watched me.

I ran my fingers along the left side of the closet. I could feel air blowing against my fingertips. I pushed gently against the wall, but nothing happened.

I took down the clothes bar to give me more room and felt around at the bottom of the drywall, but still nothing.

I heard Leonard say, “Here we go.”

I came out of the closet and saw him touch the light switch. He pulled the switch down and turned off the light, then he turned the little panel that contained the switch. It moved easily. Under the light-switch panel was a gap, and you could see the wires that went to the switch, but you could see another switch inside.

Leonard hit the switch, said, “Open sesame.”

The wall where I had felt the cool air made a snapping sound, and there was a bit of light shining through a crack.

Delf took out his pistol, went inside the closet, pushed the wall gently. It swung open.

51

In the room, you could see through the round stained-glass window, and you could see the rain blowing sideways in the light.

Johnny felt along the wall and found a switch, clicked it. The room filled with light. It was a bigger room than I'd expected. It was well furnished, even had a bed and a couch and a desk and a very fancy computer on it, along with a printer and a desk lamp. There was a door off to one side, a bathroom maybe.

I went over and opened that door gently, made sure I stepped back so no one in there with a gun would have a clear shot at me.

I peeked around the corner of the door, saw what was in there. Then we all saw what was inside.

In the bathroom, sitting on the pushed-down toilet lid, was a woman holding a dark-skinned baby sucking on a pacifier. The woman was dressed in blue jeans and a T-shirt. She was barefoot. She was very pretty, had black hair and prominent teeth.

"Not as good a hiding place as I had hoped," she said.

"Hey, Jackrabbit," Leonard said.

Johnny said, "Hey."

We turned and looked where he was looking. The bed. Underneath it we could see someone lying on the floor. Johnny walked over to the bed with his gun drawn.

"I am not armed," said the body from under the bed.

And then the body inched its way out into the open.

It was Professor.

52

We hustled Professor and Jackie downstairs, and Johnny went out to his car and brought me a T-shirt with a Marvel Creek Police Department logo on it. The logo was red. The shirt was blue, like me. I pulled it on. It was Johnny's size. You could have put two of me in it.

In the living room we all sat down, and I said, "So the baby wasn't fed to the hogs?"

Professor laughed. "You got that story from George. That's what he was told. What we wanted him to think. Look here, Delf, you see the baby is okay and Jackie is okay, so what's the problem?"

"My brothers aren't okay, and George isn't so good either. And you can add Red and the twins to the pile."

"The twins too?" Professor said.

"They weren't as bad as you thought," Johnny said.

"Oh, they were bad," I said, "just me and Leonard were more bad."

"They came with good recommendations," Professor said. "I paid them well. But just for protection. Nothing more."

Delf looked at Jackie. "What the hell?"

"We fell in love," Jackie said, and she gave Professor the sweetest look I have ever seen a woman give a man. It made my skin crawl.

"Black baby," Johnny said. "What gives, Professor? What about all that segregation shit?"

"I had a front to keep up," Professor said. "Without it, I'd lose influence."

"Professor doesn't care about color," Jackie said. "Not really."

"Jackie and me, we were a few days away from heading for someplace nice," Professor said.

"I got it," I said. "You and Jackie moved the money around so it wouldn't show you always had access to it. She's a whiz with numbers and computers, you're a con man. You don't believe in anything. You two took off—you three, actually—she and the baby would be thought dead, and you'd just be thought gone. That takes care of a lot of problems."

"Jackie changed me," Professor said. "That baby changed me. Boy's not mine, but it might as well be. I was selling all the hogs tomorrow. The farm. That was going to be the easy running cash."

"And you decided to tie up loose ends, like George," Leonard said.

"I didn't say that," Professor said. "Listen here. There's a lot of money. Let us go, you could end up with some of it. All of you."

"Write down he tried to bribe us," Delf said to Johnny.

Johnny didn't write down anything, but he nodded.

I looked at Jackie, sitting on the couch, the sleeping baby in her arms.

"I have a feeling the missing librarian didn't move off anywhere," I said.

53

Leonard was home in LaBorde with Pookie on the day I went out to Miss Cinner's house with Delf and Johnny and a couple of men with shovels.

Delf and Johnny went through the place and found nothing outside of dust motes, a cutout section of carpet from the living room, and a damp smell in the kitchen.

The backyard was enclosed by a tall wooden fence. There was a scattering of flowers. The grass had grown up high, and it was especially high in one spot at the edge of the fence where the ground was slightly sunken.

Delf had a couple of minions dig there. While they did that, me and Delf and Johnny stood over them watching. Johnny even had his arms crossed. You would have thought we were important, way we stood there doing nothing.

"Funerals for the deputies tomorrow morning," Delf said. "You coming?"

"I'll be there. It could just as easily have been me," I said. "So, the twins?"

"Dug one out of the hog shit," Delf said. "The other one got pretty well eaten by the hogs, even the clothes got eaten, except for one shoe. I'm looking for an amputee that might need it."

"What's peculiar," Johnny said, "one in the shit, we took his fingerprints, and they're not in the system. We don't really know who they are and may never know unless DNA turns up something. I have a feeling it might not."

The diggers were at it about fifteen minutes before they found something. The missing patch of carpet. It was rolled and wrapped in duct tape. They cut the carpet loose of the duct tape and inside was a badly decomposed body. There was a ferocious stink about it.

We stood around the hole and looked down on what was inside.

Delf put his hands on his hips, crinkled his nose, said, “Miss Cinner, I presume.”

54

It was late at night and I was back home in my own bed, having been to two funerals in one day. I was sleeping sound, all things considered, when Brett elbowed me awake and clicked on the lamp on her side of the bed.

“What?” I said.

“Don’t sound unpleasant,” she said.

“If you’re waking me for sex, I forgive you,” I said. “If not, I don’t forgive you. I was dreaming I was Batman.”

“It’s not for sex, unless you really are Batman. Okay, here’s the reason I woke you up. What’s your favorite color?”

“What the hell?”

“Okay, your favorite number?”

“Jesus, Brett.”

“Just fucking with you. Look here. I can’t sleep. I got questions and need some answers. Let me get this straight. Jackie and Professor became partners?”

“You woke me for that?”

“Yep,” she said. “She must have been something in the sack, to get him to give up his prejudice like that.”

“Professor really fell in love with her, and he didn’t care if she gave birth to a litter of rabbits. She got her hooks in him, and he liked it. Wouldn’t surprise me if it didn’t go both ways. He might have been next on her list to steal from. She might have even had plans to do him in.”

“What about the librarian? Who killed her?”

“Could have been any of Professor’s crowd, even her cousin Ace. Jackie was working everyone. Neighbors saw Jackie there, but after a point they didn’t see Cinner. Appears Jackie took over the place. No telling what was done to Cinner to get her banking information. Miss Cinner thinks she's got a friend, and instead, she has the devil. I don't know. I'm guessing. We may never know."

"What about Sebastian?" she said.

"Again, no idea, same as when I got home. No revelations in my sleep."

"So that's it?"

"That's it. Hey, baby, now that we're awake, how about we try and reach the moon?"

"Are you asking to have sex?"

"Begging."

"No, thank you," she said, rolling over and turning out the light. "I'm sleepy now. Good night."

55

Couple days later, me and Brett and Leonard met the Mulhaneys at the office. We told them Jackie was in jail, told them what had happened.

"I hate telling you this, but she told the chief over there that she has nothing left for you two," I said. "And don't come see her in jail."

Thomas looked sullen. Judith looked somewhere between sad and relieved. She was very pale that day and seemed to have turned frail.

"Thank you," she said. "Better to know than to not."

Leonard mentioned there was an outstanding debt for services rendered. They smiled and left.

About a month after our meeting with the family, Jackie was released from jail. Professor copped to everything, said he forced her to do what she did, and Jackie didn't argue against it. That got her off the hook. I don't think anyone believed she was innocent. They just couldn't prove she was guilty, not with Professor taking the rap like that, and I think her having that baby helped the court decide to let her go free and take care of the child.

But the topper came one afternoon when Brett got back to the house from shopping and said, "Did you hear?"

"Hear what?"

"In Marvel Creek, someone shot Jackie and her baby to death."

"What the hell? Wait a minute. What was she shot with?"

Brett shook her head. "A gun. That's all I know."

Not long after, Leonard came over. He had heard about it too.

"She was at the Professor's property, and someone broke in and shot her, and then the baby, who was in a bassinet. One shot to the head with a twenty-two for both."

I said, “Where did we first hear that probable scenario?”

“Thomas,” Leonard said. “Come on. Drive me.”

56

We rode over to the mobile home where Thomas lived with his mother. One end still had the tarp over it. There was a brand-new mobile home moved in next to it. The big truck was parked near the new home and it had a set of new tires on it and fancy hubcaps.

Driving up in the yard, we saw there was a black wreath on the door of the new trailer.

Leonard got out of my car and walked up the steps in front of the trailer's entrance and knocked hard on the door. I stood below the steps and rocked on my heels. The air was warm but still as death.

It took a while, but Thomas answered. He was wobbly and drunk and his pants were unzipped and his underwear was showing.

"What the hell do you want, nigger?" Thomas said.

Leonard grabbed Thomas by the throat so fast it was like a CGI effect. He pulled him out of the doorway of the mobile home and turned a little and sent Thomas hurtling over the steps and onto the ground.

Thomas started to get up. I said, "Stay there, if you know what's good for you."

"What the fuck is with you guys?" Thomas said.

Leonard went over and squatted near Thomas, who was in a half-lying, half-sitting position.

"Where's your mother?" Leonard said. "I don't mind she hears this."

"She died, had a heart attack a week ago, you black moron," Thomas said. "Why there's a wreath on the door. You ain't getting another cent from me, by the way, don't care if I do owe it."

Leonard ignored him, looked at the brand-new mobile home, glanced at the new tires on the truck. I saw his expression change as he turned his attention back to Thomas.

"Keep the money," Leonard said. "You might need it for buying twenty-two shells. Though I think you got a bit of money from somewhere, seeing your new home. Your old daddy, who knew you didn't like him, I'm thinking he might have given you a call to help him fulfill that fucked-up plan he had, that's what I think. You'd be all for that. Revenge and easy money in one swoop. Bet you enjoyed pulling that rope around his neck, cutting that key out of his belly, taking that money out of his bank box. It all falls into place now. Want to know what else I figure?"

"I don't give a shit," Thomas said.

"Thanks for asking," Leonard said. "My figure is you already got rid of the twenty-two you used to kill your sister and nephew. I bet you never even knew the kid's name. I know I didn't, but you should have."

"You don't know nothing," Thomas said.

"You may think you're a badass, way you could sneak up on your sister and her son, do them like you done. I got nothing for her. I think she's as big a piece of shit as you are, as Professor is. But that child never did anything to anyone. Baby's only crime far as you were concerned was it had dark skin. The kid didn't even have a personality yet."

"Get off of me," Thomas said.

"Here's something I want you to think about," Leonard said. "I want you to know that one day you'll come out of this new blood-paid mobile home on your way to pick up a six-pack, and I'll be there. Might even call your name. Surprise, motherfucker. And then it's coming. A bullet. I might even use a twenty-two, same as you. I got one, and mine can't be traced."

"I'll go to the police," he said.

"Go ahead, my word against yours. What did you hear, Hap?"

"I heard you give your condolences about his sister, nephew, and mother."

"See? That's what Hap heard. Your day is coming, cracker."

Sweat had beaded up at Thomas's hairline.

"Now, me and Hap are sorry for your loss, but we got to go. I have to oil a gun or two."

Leonard stood up. He looked at Thomas, pointed his finger at him, brought his thumb down, and said, "Bang."

57

About six months later, give or take an afternoon, I woke Brett up and asked her her favorite color and got slugged in the arm. A few minutes later I got laid, so that took the pain away.

We had breakfast together, and then she went grocery shopping.

I was sipping a cup of very fine coffee and reading our local rag, which is mostly ads these days, when something caught my eye in the police report.

BODY FOUND, the headline read.

I felt a cold chill start at the base of my spine and move up to my neck and nestle under my hairline like a solidifying glacier.

A man had been found in a ditch partially filled with water. It was a ditch down a clay road in the woods. It was surmised that the man had gone out there to dump his trash illegally.

He was found clutching a plastic bag full of beer bottles. He had a bullet hole between his eyes. A .22 caliber was suspected. Most likely shot at close range. No suspects.

Surprise, motherfucker.

The dead man's name was Thomas Mulhaney.

I took a deep breath and put the paper down on the kitchen table. I sat there and thought for a little bit. I drank my coffee. I got up and poured myself another cup, sat down again, and reread the article. It said the same thing it had said before.

I carefully folded the paper and took a sip of my coffee. It tasted bitter as reality. I got up and carried it to the sink and poured it down the drain.

From the kitchen window, I could see a crow flying south.

About The Author
BOOKS BY JOE R. LANSDALE

For Bill and Judy Crider. Good friends.
Gone, but not forgotten.

That’s a lot of damn water.

Noah

Me and Leonard got something better than the element of surprise, we got the elephant of surprise, and you can bet that’s some serious business.

Hap Collins

The night was dark, wet, and cold, and the rain was coming down hard. The trees on the right side of the road were bending toward us as we passed, and leaves and limbs were coming loose of them, tumbling in front of and against the car. I kept driving, dodging branches when I could, hoping there were no washed-out sections in the road or a limb didn't hang up beneath us.

The wipers slaved back and forth like a mean librarian wagging her finger at a loud child, and the lights bounced off the night. I kind of wished to see another car on the road, but most everyone else had sense enough to get in out of the storm.

Me and Leonard had finished up a surveillance job in San Augustine and were on our way back to LaBorde. When we'd left, the sky was clear and you could see the stars and the partial moon, but that situation had changed five miles out of town. First came the wind, then thunder and lightning, finally the rain, and then the wind picked up even more, and it began to seriously storm.

I had the car heater on to fight the January cold, and it was mostly working. I was hungry and thinking about being home with some food and a big hot cup of decaf coffee but knowing, late as it was, I ought to just go on and go to bed and wait for breakfast.

Maybe just a granola bar and a glass of milk.

Or I might have some cereal. Only one bowl. A small bowl. A bagel, no cream cheese. Light butter, maybe. Might be some of that barbecue left over from the other day. No. That was too heavy. But hell, barbecue, that was nice, and if it stayed in the refrigerator too long it could ruin.

Leonard said, "Look out, man."

I looked up as something ran into the highway. I whipped to the right, just missing a bar ditch, and skidded to a stop in a spray of water.

I glanced in the rearview mirror and then the water-beaded side mirrors, but all I could see was rain.

"It was somebody," Leonard said.

"Could have been an animal?"

"It was someone," he said. "A girl, I think."

I drove up a space and turned in the road, trying to be careful not to end up too far on either side, as the earth there slanted down into ditches. It was wet and muddy and steep, and easy to slide. If we ended up in a ditch, it would be full of fast-running water and the only way out would be a wrecker, if we had cell service to call them. We were in a bad place for that. And I wasn't sure a wrecker service would come out in this. Hell, Noah wouldn't come out in this, and it was getting worse by the moment.

I got us turned around and drove slow but didn't see anyone, at least not at first, and then Leonard said, "Hap."

I braked and skidded slightly, looked where he was pointing. A girl stumbled back into the road, having made it across, then having decided to come back. She was waving her hands at us. Her hair was white in the headlights and was plastered against her head like a cowl, some of it draped across her face, and there was something dark running from her mouth and down her chin. The rain washed it away as fast as it appeared. She was small and pale and obviously weak. She was wearing a stained T-shirt and pajama shorts and was barefoot. She collapsed in the road.

Leonard got out and went after her, the rain hammering against him, the cold wind whistling into the car through the open door. He picked her up like she was a doll and carried her back to the car. I unfastened my belt, leaned back and stretched over the crack between the seats and worked the back door open. Leonard set her inside, nudged her to the center of the seat.

With the doors open, the inside was lit up, and I saw the girl was an albino, and Asian, and so small I at first thought she was a child of eleven or so. She opened her mouth and blood ran out and dripped over her chin and onto her chest. She looked up at me with pale eyes, not white, but a blue so thin they were almost clear. She had the appearance of a wounded bird trapped behind glass. She tried to talk but all that came out of her mouth was blood and a choking noise.

Leonard closed the front passenger-side door, slid in beside her on the backseat, closed the back door, said, "You're all right. We got you. Easy, now, let me look. Open your mouth."

He gently touched her chin, looked inside her open mouth, said, “Hap, give me the flashlight.”

I reached over and into the glove box where we keep a pistol and a flashlight and some odds and ends and pulled out the flashlight and gave it to him.

The young woman was starting to moan.

“Easy,” Leonard said, “just a peek.”

Leonard looked, and there in the glow of the flashlight, I could see his face change.

“Give me the Kleenex,” he said.

I opened the glove box again and got out a small packet of Kleenex. Leonard took it, tore the plastic cover off of it, pulled out all the Kleenex, and said, “Honey, you need to put this here in your mouth and close it gently. Might tilt your head back, but don’t lie down.”

He put the Kleenex in her mouth, and she didn’t argue about it. He strapped the seat belt around her, said, “You’ll be all right.”

That’s when a big black SUV came out of a side road about where the girl had first appeared and turned into our lane so that its headlights were pointing right at us. The SUV stopped and a big black man in black clothes wearing a dark, rain-beaten hat got out of the car on the passenger side. He looked as if he could straighten the Leaning Tower of Pisa with one hand. He had a large pistol held down by his side. The tower gave him any shit, he could shoot it.

I said, “Leonard, hang on.”

The man in the road lifted the handgun.

I threw the car in reverse and looked over my shoulder between the woman and Leonard, and as far as I could tell, all that was behind us was night and rain and the faint glow of my taillights. I stabbed the gas and away we went. I heard a gun crack and something scraped across the top of the car. It had been a hasty shot.

I kept my foot punched down on the gas, took a forward glance, and saw that I had made quite a gap between us and the SUV, but a Prius isn't a race car.

Leonard said to the girl, "Hang tight, kid."

He slid between the seats and into the front, opened the glove box and took out the automatic pistol, said, "Turn it around."

I stepped on the brake and the car slid. I turned the steering wheel in the direction of the slide and whipped the car completely around amidst a spray of water and a moan of tires, a move that was aided by a wet road and a bit of experience.

I hit the gas and looked in the rearview mirror. Lights. They were coming, and they were coming fast.

For a moment, I thought about a side road but decided that was a bad idea. Then I considered the main road we were on and how fast they were coming, and that wasn't such a good idea either. The only way I could see out of this problem was levitation of the car, and believe me, I was really concentrating on that, hoping I would find within me unknown powers of telekinesis. But nope.

Leonard hit the window button, rolled it down, hung out of the window, and pointed the pistol at them. Leonard is a so-so shot, and with that handgun and the rain and wind being like it was, I felt he had about as much of a chance of hitting that car as he had of farting a bird off a tree limb.

He fired twice, rapid succession. I glanced back. The lights were still coming. They probably had no idea he had a gun. He fired twice more. The SUV went sideways and tried to straighten, and then sparks flew up from underneath it.

Leonard had somehow hit the front right tire and they were dealing with a blowout, the tire rim slamming on the concrete.

The SUV swerved and tried to slow, but it was too late. It was all over the place, and then it went sideways and the taillights tipped toward the sky. It had fallen into one of the long, wet ditches by the side of the road.

Someone tried to cut her tongue out," Leonard said. "They sawed about halfway through it."

We were sitting in LaBorde Memorial Hospital, having brought the girl in before calling the cops. Our friend the chief of police, Marvin Hanson, was off on a trip with his family somewhere up in the wilds of Montana, and Leonard's boyfriend, Pookie, also a cop, was out of town, visiting his sister in New Orleans. The two cops who were there didn't know us as well as the chief and Pookie did, and I couldn't decide if that was a good thing or a bad thing. Way they were looking at us and talking to us, you would have thought we had tried to cut her tongue out ourselves.

After a while, they had the hospital open up the gift shop that had closed hours before, and we bought T-shirts and underwear and socks and windbreakers that all had hospital logos on them. In a bathroom, we squeezed our jeans out in the sink and dried them pretty well in front of the hand dryers and put on the clean underwear and socks. The jeans were still damp but not as miserable cold and wet as before. Leonard had been out in it when he picked up the girl, but just going from the car into the hospital, Leonard carrying the girl, we had both been soaked to the bone.

When we came out of the bathroom, the cops were standing there like they thought we might squeeze into the toilet and flush an escape.

We had to drive to the station and answer all the questions again. A matter of routine, they said. Sure, they thought we were Good Samaritans. Sure, they believed us. Cops believe you like they believe in Santa Claus.

They had already sent cops out to see if they could find the SUV in a ditch, and they had taken the gun Leonard used. We both had permits, so at least we had that going for us.

We sat there in the station in the interrogation room until a lady cop we did know, Manny, came back and said they had found the SUV. We were sure as hell glad to see her, but she stayed professional throughout. It was all being filmed, of course. That's how an interrogation room works.

"The SUV was there. But shooting at cars, Leonard, that could cause you some problems," she said.

"Figured getting shot by them might cause me some problems too."

Manny was her usual attractive self, but the long white scar on her cheek was whiter than usual against her otherwise flawless Hispanic skin. She had a look on her face like she had been dragged out of bed by a pack of wolves. I looked at my watch. It was two in the morning. Did wolves work that late?

"Tracking the plates, of course," I said.

"Already have," she said. "They belong to a family in Oklahoma, but they don't own the SUV the plates are fastened to. VIN number on the car is being looked at, but you know how that will turn out."

"The car will have been stolen or the VIN number will be a false one, something like that," I said.

"Bad night for those assholes to be out wandering around without a ride," Leonard said.

"Unless someone picked them up," Manny said. "I tried my phone there. There's service. You should have done that, called it in."

"No service where we first came across them," I said. "And we were a little too busy being chased by them to try and phone on down the road. Yeah, I should have worried about that instead of worrying about getting the girl to the hospital."

Manny gave me a hard look. "Fair enough, and I get it. Don't run it into the ground."

"Look, Manny," I said. "You know we didn't hurt that girl, and you know we had to do what we did. They shot at us. They were trying to get to her, for whatever reason."

"Poor girl," Manny said. "Who could do that, and why?"

"Humans," I said. "That's who."

"Any idea who she is yet?" Leonard said.

Manny shook her head. "No idea, but whoever she is, someone wants her to suffer and die, that's for sure. Maybe she gets where she can talk or write a little, we can find out. She didn't have identification on her. If she was from these parts, someone would know her. Not that many albino girls around."

"Listen here," Leonard said. "Whoever did that will most likely still be looking for her. Best you have someone in the hospital to watch over her."

"How would anyone know she's there?" Manny said.

"That's an easy one," I said. "Where else would a rescuer take her?"

"Good point. I don't normally make the decisions here, but it's me for the night or until Marvin gets back. Wait a moment."

Manny went out.

After a bit, she came back. "They're posting someone at her door," she said. "He's already started over. Good cop, Eric Braider."

That was a relief. Probably unnecessary, but you never knew for sure.

Finally, they let us go with warnings not to leave the state. We drove to the IHOP at the end of North Street and had a late-night supper and breakfast. I had a short stack and Leonard ate enough pancakes, sausages, and eggs to feed an army and most of their relatives.

"Who would do such a thing to a little girl like that?" Leonard said, asking what had already been asked.

I didn't have an answer.

Outside, the rain slammed the parking lot and rattled the windows. We had just finished eating when the lights went out.

We sat there silently, and after a while a waiter came over with a flashlight and told us he was sorry, but they were going to have to have everyone pay up and leave.

Since the register didn't work without electricity, there was a tedious time when we stood in line and people paid with cash or their credit card numbers were written down. Leonard gave them the ticket with two twenties and we left.

The rain and wind were so bad we could hardly make it to our car. Once we were inside, this time with Leonard driving, he said, "Think we ought to go back to the hospital. Not long until morning anyway. We can see how the girl's doing. Jesus, why would they do that to that girl?"

He kept coming back to that, and I still didn't have an answer.

"I no longer wonder why people do horrible things," I said. "I just know a lot of them do."

"Speaking of that, I like to be ready for those horrible people. I have another pistol under the front seat. Find it and put it in the glove box? Makes sense to have it in a more reachable position."

Lights all along the street were out, and we were once again the only car on the road. It was as if we were in an old science fiction movie and everyone had been killed or was in hiding because bad aliens had taken over the Earth.

“Did you know LaBorde is the barbecue capital of Texas?” I said.

“I don’t give a shit,” Leonard said.

“They have a blueberry festival here too.”

“Who doesn’t? I live here, Hap. I know that shit. Hey, this isn’t the barbecue capital of Texas. Barbecue here mostly sucks.”

“I’m just trying to pass the time with interesting conversation.”

“It’s not that interesting when you make it up.”

“Boy, are you in a mood.”

“You should have seen that poor girl’s tongue,” Leonard said. “They almost cut it out.”

I was glad I hadn’t seen it. “My jeans are dry,” I said.

“Will you shut up?”

It took us an impossibly long time to reach the hospital. The lights were on there. Backup generators, I presumed. That would seem right for a hospital. But not all the lights were on, and some were not that bright. We went and sat in the lobby in the comfortable waiting-area chairs under dim lights. Leonard began to snooze, and then he began to snore softly.

Except for a middle-aged lady at the desk, we seemed to be the only ones in the hospital.

I pulled out my cell and called Brett, told her what had happened, told her we’d be home when we got home.

“Still have lights here, but it’s scary out there,” she said. “Chance and Reba and Buffy Dog are here with us. We had dinner and then they couldn’t go home, or didn’t want to.”

“They’re safer there. Did Reba eat you out of house and home?”

“Just complained about the food. She wanted McDonald’s. I told her she was free to go to town and buy us burgers.”

“Bet that shut her up.”

“Nope. She said give her the money and the car keys and she’d go.”

I laughed. Reba was a smart-ass kid we had kind of rescued. She lived with my daughter, Chance, and Buffy the Biscuit Slayer, also known as Buff, Buffy Dog, or the Buffinator.

Brett said, “Will the girl be all right?”

“I don’t know. I think so. They sewed her tongue up, gave her some pills. She’s sleeping upstairs.”

“Poor thing,” Brett said.

We passed a few more words and closed out the conversation. I turned to ask Leonard if he wanted to call his boyfriend, Pookie, but he was still asleep. Probably best not to call Pookie and ruin his out-of-town visit. Nothing he could do right then.

I put the cell away just as I saw a large tree limb tumble across the parking lot at the side of the hospital and slam into a car hard enough I could hear the impact. At least it didn’t set off an alarm.

The wind began to howl and the rain became even more fierce. Lightning cracked and thunder rumbled, shaking the glass in the hospital windows.

I could envision, somewhere out in the Gulf, a vicious, unseasonable storm, perhaps a hurricane, sending in its reserve troops, giving us a taste of what it could do just to remind us that compared to nature, we weren’t as important as houseflies.

When I awoke in the hospital waiting area, I checked my watch. It was seven in the morning. Leonard was still asleep. It was dark as night, and the rain and wind hadn't let up an ounce. In fact, it looked worse out there. Meaning there was nothing to see but absolute blackness. The sun wasn't going to shine that morning, maybe not all day.

The same middle-aged lady was at the front desk. I went up there, said, "You certainly are putting in the time."

She smiled at me. She looked weary.

"I'm supposed to be gone," she said, "but the rain is so bad I'm better off here in the hospital than on the road, and my replacement is better off home. I figure before the day is done, we'll have a lot of new occupants. A storm like this, it makes things crazy. If only the rain would stop. Better yet, the wind."

"Lady we brought in last night. When can we check on her? We were told she's in a room on the third floor."

"No visiting hours yet, but way things are, it gets nine, you can go in, unless there are any medical concerns."

I thanked her and sat down again, and that's when I saw a big man come in the front door carrying a long, damp cardboard box. He had it tucked up under one arm. He wore black clothes. He had a black plastic rain cover over his hat.

I recognized the man from his size. It was the big black man that had gotten out of the SUV with a pistol. He was even bigger than I'd thought, looked like a weight lifter, not a bodybuilder, kind of guy who could dead-lift a battleship. His face was as expressionless as a mannequin's.

He hadn't seen us last night, had seen only my car, maybe a shape hanging out of the window firing at the SUV, so he had no idea who we were. He hardly gave us a glance. He adjusted his hat with a touch of his hand and walked past us and the desk, toward the elevator. I had a good idea what was in the box.

The lady behind the desk might’ve thought about saying something to stop him, but she didn’t. Not the way he looked. She just watched him pass. I thought that was most likely a good choice.

I shook Leonard awake, said, “Hey, the guy that took a shot at us just walked in.”

“What?”

“He’s over by the elevator. Had a long cardboard box with him. I don’t think it was curtain rods.”

“Damn.” By that point he was on his feet. We both headed toward the big man as he stepped into the elevator, but moments later the doors closed.

We went back to the desk, but the woman was gone. A bathroom break, maybe. We couldn’t just hang out and call the police for backup. By the time they got here, it would be too late. That guy was there to finish the job he and whoever he was working with had started.

“How would he know where to go?” Leonard said.

“This is the logical place for her to be. Phones here work, so he called and convinced someone who didn’t know any better to give him her room number.”

I heard the front hospital door slide automatically back, and I saw another man enter. He was short and thin and white, wearing black clothes. He had a hand in his coat pocket, a bandage across his forehead, and he walked with a bounce.

Leonard saw him too.

We didn’t wait to figure him out. We made the stairs before he made the elevator. “I think those two may be an unmatched set,” Leonard said.

We charged up the stairs to the third floor, where the girl was, trying to beat the elevator. There was supposed to be a cop up there, and the thought of that was some relief. I hoped he hadn’t decided to drift off or take a bathroom break.

When we got to the third floor and rushed out into the hallway, we saw the cop in a chair. He was a young, curly-headed white guy. He was posted about midway between us and the elevators, next to the girl's room. He was sitting up straight in the chair, his uniform crisp and his badge shiny. He had his hand resting on the butt of his pistol. He looked as alert as a hungry cobra.

The elevator dinged.

We rushed toward the cop. He had seen us around, knew we had brought the girl in, so he wasn't overly concerned.

"Guy in the elevator," I called out. "He's got a gun."

The cop stood up, looked puzzled.

I said what I had said again.

The elevator door opened before we could reach the cop and the girl's room.

The elevator was empty.

"Shit," Leonard said. "He got off on another floor."

I thought, Yeah, that would be an idea. He didn't know us, but he might have suspected protection for the girl, and since I'd stood up as he headed to the elevator, he might have assumed I was part of a protection detail.

In a way, I was, but I'd been doing a piss-poor job, and Leonard had been napping.

"What's going on?" the cop said. We had reached the door to the room he was protecting.

"Someone has come for her," I said.

That's when the big man came around the corner. He must have gotten off the elevator on a lower floor, used the stairs on the opposite side we had taken. The gun was no longer in a box; it was a shotgun, twelve-gauge was my guess. He handled it with familiarity.

The cop pulled his gun. Leonard pushed the girl's door open and went inside as I ducked down and the shotgun ripped. The cop, gun in his hand, lost his head, so to speak, and I was peppered with brains and blood and falling shot.

As the poor cop fell, his handgun slid back toward me, our only lucky break so far, and I grabbed it, darted inside the room as another blast from the shotgun splintered the wall and pocked part of the door.

Once I was inside, the door swung shut. There was a small square of glass in the door and I saw the man fill the space on the outside. I flicked the door latch and scuttled backward with the cop's gun tight in my hand. I knew then how those three pigs felt when the wolf came to their door.

I took a quick look behind me. The girl was in the hospital bed. She was unconscious, probably drugged into peaceful sleep. Leonard snatched up a chair and swung it against the large, wide window, but the window held its own. He swung at it several times, but the chair kept bouncing off it.

I saw the big man push his face to the glass in the door. I jerked the gun up and fired and the door glass shattered. He had seen me move and had moved himself, and just in time. He moved fast for being about the size of the Statue of Liberty.

I turned, said to Leonard, “Stand aside.”

I shot a hole in the big outer window, heard it crack; the cracks started at the hole and spiderwebbed in all directions. Leonard hit the window with the chair again. It finally fell apart with a crunch and a tinkle of falling glass. The cold wind and rain blew in.

“Watch for that motherfucker,” Leonard said.

I glanced back at the door. I didn’t see the man. I didn’t see his shadow. I felt the cold wind and rain dampening my back.

I looked over my shoulder at Leonard.

Leonard set the chair down beneath the window, turned to the bed, jerked back the covers, lifted the IV bag off the IV stand, dropped it on the girl’s chest, and picked her up. All she wore was a hospital gown, not the best clothing for the outdoors, since your naked ass hung out of the back of it, but it might beat dying in bed.

Holding her close to him, Leonard put his foot on the chair he had placed beneath the window and then stepped out into the swirling storm.

The shotgun roared and the wood in the door jumped apart, made a gap large enough to ride a donkey through. That guy was packing some serious ammunition.

I hurried to the window. The wind and rain pushed at me. My hair and clothes were soaked in an instant. I trembled in the cold. There was a wide ledge beneath the window. Not something you'd want to have a pachyderm walk, but wide enough. I could see Leonard moving on it like a tightrope walker, one careful foot in front of the other, carrying the girl, going away as fast as he safely could. The ledge might have been wide, but it was wet as a snail trail.

I turned and looked at the door. Nothing yet. The big man was being cautious, now that he knew I had a gun.

I stepped up on the chair and went after Leonard, nearly losing my footing immediately. It was actually slimier than a snail's trail.

I put my back to the wall and inched along. Leonard made the corner of the building and turned out of sight. Carrying a girl, even a small one, walking on a ledge with a wet wind blowing hard enough to roll an army tank was no small feat.

What the fuck was he, a mountain goat?

I turned my attention back to the window. The gun was in my right hand, and I held it across my chest, kept my left hand down and against the wall, kept scooting.

The man stuck his head out the window. I snapped off a shot, and I could tell from the way the blood jumped like a dark arrow into the night that I had hit him. But I knew too that I had just parted his hair, because his hat jumped off and the wind caught it and carried it away. Had it been the shot I had hoped for, he wouldn't have been able to pull back.

I turned the corner around the edge of the building, crossed in front of one window and then another, and finally the ledge widened. Down below I could see another roof from a building that had been added on at some point.

That's when I caught up with Leonard, standing with the girl held tight to him, looking down at the roof below. It was at least a twelve-foot drop, and there was a lower concrete roof below us to another building, but it didn't look inviting.

I yelled out, "Don't do it!" but the wind snatched my voice and hauled it away.

Leonard looked down at the lower roof for a moment, then turned and continued along the widened ledge. I was moving along faster and caught up with them. When I did, Leonard said, "What now?"

I looked where he was looking. The ledge continued around a corner, but the question was, how did we get off of it without taking a swan dive? The best we could do was keep moving around the hospital.

There was a window near us. I said, "Hang on."

I pointed the pistol at the window and hoped no one's bed was right under it, that a nurse wasn't standing there doing something or other. The room was dark, so I figured the latter wasn't likely. I shot at the window, and it cracked. I leaned against it, and then I kneed it, and when I did, it gave and shattered and fell apart into the room. I felt a sharp pain in my knee but nothing to write home about.

The hospital room was empty, but it wouldn't take long for the big man or the little guy we had seen downstairs to find us. Not if they were serious, and I had a feeling they were.

I went over and locked the door, looked around the room.

There was a wheelchair folded up near the wall. The room smelled of disinfectant.

Leonard placed the girl on the bed and looked in the closet. There was another ass-open gown in it, like the one she had on, and nothing else.

"I need something to fight with," he said.

"Might I recommend a chair."

There was one by the bed. Leonard went over and got it and held it by the backrest.

"What we got to do is get her out of here," Leonard said.

"I'm just waiting for our gyrocopter to show up."

The copter didn't show, but a shape appeared at the busted-out window. It wasn't the big man. It was the little man we had seen come in downstairs with the bandage on his head, most likely covering an injury from the SUV taking a dive. He was stone-faced and wiry and had his hair cut so close to his head, he might as well have gone on and shaved it. His coat flapped in the breeze.

I lifted the revolver, but he sprang across the room like a kangaroo on crack, kicked me in the chest, and drove me back against the wall, sending the revolver skittering across the floor.

I was scrambling to my feet as Leonard swung the chair at him. He swung it low, but the man dropped down so quick, and was flat on his belly so quick, it was like he had turned into a snake. As the chair passed over him, he leaped forward, grabbed Leonard by the windbreaker with one hand, and used the other to hit him with a hammer fist in the forehead. I think he was going for the nose, which would have been smarter, but Leonard lowered his head a little, and just in time.

If Leonard's forehead hurt the little guy, he didn't let on. He grabbed Leonard's windbreaker with the other hand, swiveled, and threw Leonard over his hip, threw him so well and so high, Leonard's feet nearly touched the ceiling; a foot or so higher and he might have needed an oxygen mask. Leonard came down on the tile floor with a smack so loud, I felt the pain myself, felt it crawl up my ass and up my spine and come to a throbbing rest at the base of my neck.

I was on the guy by then, delivering a front kick to the side of his leg, but he moved, swung his leg out of the way and up, hook-kicked me in the temple. I was surprised to find myself on the floor.

As I tried to get up, he kicked at my throat, but I was able to throw a hand up and merely get my palm whacked, but that was no walk in the park either. It hurt so bad I considered gnawing my hand off at the wrist.

Leonard, who I thought might be napping, had recovered and was up. He leaped on the little guy from behind, wrapped his legs around his waist, hooked his heels into his thighs, threw his arms around his neck, and fell backward with the guy trapped between his legs.

That didn't last long. The little guy squirmed out of Leonard's grip so fast and so clean, it was like he was part eel. He recovered his footing and kicked out at Leonard, who was still on the floor.

I found the pistol, but by then the little guy had produced one of his own. It was going to be which of us could pull the trigger faster. Or that would have been the case, but Leonard stepped in with the chair again, knocked the little man's hand down. The gun went off and the shot hit the floor and bounced against the ceiling, went on up through the thin tiles. The gun itself was knocked from his hand.

By then the little guy knew it was time to leave. I had the gun, and he had air. He pulled his injured hand against his chest, scooped his dropped pistol up with his good hand, backpedaled gracefully, as if he always went places walking asswards.

He made the window, threw up a leg like a back kick, and set it on the ledge without even looking. Then he pushed off on his other leg and was suddenly standing on the ledge, looking in the wide space where the window had been. He grinned at us. I was going to try and shoot again, but Leonard fucked that up. He stepped into my line of fire and threw the chair.

It was a good toss, though. It hit the grinning asshole right in the face and knocked him off the ledge.

“Bingo,” Leonard said.

Not quite bingo," I said.

The little guy's hands were clutching the ledge.

"Goddamn monkey," Leonard said.

He wide-stepped toward the window, and as the little man lifted himself up and his face rose into sight, Leonard smacked him one with a good straight punch. The little man's head went back, but still he clung. Leonard slammed his fist down on the little man's right hand, striking the fingers.

That made the little man jerk that hand free of the ledge, and when Leonard hit his other hand, his fingers loosened and he fell.

I ran over and leaned out of the window with Leonard. The little man had taken that twelve-foot drop like a cat, had landed on his feet and was crouched down, looking up. The rain was washing blood from his face where Leonard had busted his nose. He grinned at us.

I leaned out with the gun and took a shot at him, but he was already moving, went over the side of the lower roof like Spider-Man.

"Where the hell did he go?" Leonard said.

"The ledge below, if he didn't miss his footing."

"I'm sure he didn't."

We pulled back into the room. I pushed the handgun into my windbreaker pocket, said, "Leonard, we'll put her in the wheelchair."

Leonard went to pick her up while I pulled the chair away from the wall and unfolded it. Leonard brought her over and gently placed her in the chair, giving me a glimpse of her naked ass, the color of the moon on a clear summer night. He arranged the IV bag so that it hung on the back of the wheelchair. I wasn't even sure if what was in it was getting into her.

I grabbed a blanket off the bed and threw that over her to give her some warmth and some dignity.

I sidled over to the door, pulled out the pistol, and peeked through the small glass square. Lot of darkness in the hallway. The little guy didn't stick his eye against mine. The big man didn't blow my head off with a shotgun.

I unlatched the door and opened it, stepped gingerly into the hall, listening to my heart pound.

Leonard pushed the wheelchair into the hall. The wheels squeaked a little.

"Maybe if we use the elevator, that'll fool them," I said. "They might not expect that."

"Why wouldn't they? They might also expect the stairs. Only thing they wouldn't expect is someone to drive a tank through the wall and evacuate us."

"We're on the third floor."

"We'll have to use the elephant of surprise. I'll punch the elevator down, but we'll take the stairs. You lead with the gun. I'll lift the chair and carry her down. She's light as a feather."

Leonard went to the elevator, pushed the button. By then I was turning down the stairs, the gun pointed in front of me.

10

With my heart still beating like a drum, I moved carefully. I had gone down one flight and was on the second-floor landing when the auxiliary lights went out.

I assumed someone had gotten to the backup generators, reasoning that if it was dark, we might not find our way so easy, but whoever it was hadn't considered my trusty cell phone. I took it out of my pocket and—

The battery was dead.

Shit. I put the phone in my pocket.

I put my hand on the railing and eased along until I had nearly made the bottom of the stairs. If it was like I thought, one of them would be waiting at each stairwell. The elevator was near one set of stairs, so whoever was there would have that covered. No matter which way we came down, they had us trapped.

I thought for a moment, then started up the stairs again. I met Leonard carrying the wheelchair with the girl in it.

"Turn around," I said.

We went back up, me helping Leonard lift the chair. On the second-floor landing I told him what I thought.

"Yeah," he said, "that's how I'd do it if I was them."

"But you'd think to bring snacks."

"Of course."

The girl hadn't moved. She could have been on Mars or at the bottom of the Grand Canyon for all she knew.

"I got an idea," I said. "Stay here."

There was a large trash can at the far end of the hall. I padded down there and picked it up. It was a little heavy, but right then, scared as I was, I had adrenaline strength. When I got to Leonard, I let the can rest on a stair step.

“Look here,” I said. “Follow close with her, and when it starts, you push her like you’re jet-propelled.”

“All right,” he said. “But what’s the plan after that?”

“Push her toward the front door, but wheel around the desk and head for the side door to the parking lot.”

“That’s not much of a plan. Front door’s closer.”

“It works electronically. My guess, that generator went dead, so did the door. It’s locked up for the night. Go out the back emergency exit, it’s just a push-bar door. And hey, maybe they won’t expect it.”

“And maybe they got people waiting out there.”

“Maybe they don’t.”

“Maybe shit don’t stink if the wind blows just right,” Leonard said. “That plan sucks.”

“What say we push her into a closet and try to take out these guys by ourselves, without her being in the line of fire?”

“A closet?”

“She won’t fit in my pocket.”

“I don’t know, man. We get killed, then she’s in a closet somewhere. They could kill us and still find her. If we don’t have her, they know she’s somewhere in the hospital.”

“Yeah, there’s that,” Leonard said. “Okay. This plan of yours is going to be back to our usual elephant of surprise, I suppose?”

“I don’t know how large an elephant it’s going to be, but if you mean half-assed but energetic, then yeah. But I got a little something in mind.”

“In case things go south, nice knowing you, bro.”

11

I stood at the bottom of the stairs with my trash can, leaning slightly against the wall. I could see through the gap leading off the stairs and into the main hallway. The lady who had been behind the desk was now on the floor near the front door. Blood was flowing out from under her head. Probably shot her so she couldn't get away and bring help. Poor lady.

That meant at least one of them was downstairs again, as we'd suspected.

I somehow lifted the heavy can above my head without it crushing me flat like an accordion and tossed it as hard and as far as I could. It hit the floor and bounced. A shotgun roared and the can jumped and the lid snapped free and trash popped out.

With the gun drawn, I stepped into the hall, turning in the direction from which the shot had come, thinking, Little Guy, don't be behind me, and I fired at Big Guy, who I could see standing, the shotgun lowered now, a look that might possibly pass for surprise on his face.

My shot hit him in the chest and knocked him down. Behind me I heard Leonard, who had been creeping down the stairs with the girl in the chair, rolling the wheelchair out of the stairwell and into the lobby. The wheels squeaked as he went. He swerved around the lady on the floor and charged past the desk toward the hallway and the rear exit.

I kept the gun on Big Guy. I went over and grabbed the shotgun he had dropped, saw him twitch a little, open his eyes, start to get up. I realized he was wearing a bulletproof vest. As he moved, the now-flattened slug I had fired rolled off his chest.

I should have shot him again. But I had his gun and we'd gotten the girl, so I figured we were ahead for the moment. No reason to kill someone if I didn't have to. Instead, as he put his hands and knees under him, I kicked him under the chin. It was like kicking a concrete block, but he went down again, rolled over on his back, twitched like a dying carp, then quit.

I put the pistol into my coat pocket, backed away from him holding the shotgun. I glanced at Leonard, saw him galloping toward the side door, pushing that chair.

I ran after them. Leonard wheeled the girl around and hit the door with his back; the door popped open, and out he went. I was exiting after them, pushing the door as it started to close, when a big blast of power hit it. A bullet. It had whizzed over my shoulder and torn a hole in the door about the size of a cabbage.

I ducked and wheeled back the way I had come. It was Big Guy, up and ready with a revolver about the size of a howitzer in his hand. I should have killed him when I'd had the chance. Leonard would have.

I cut down on him with the shotgun, but he was way down the hall and already moving to the side and behind the reception desk. Damn, he was swift for someone so big. I heard my shot rattle against the elevator.

I backed against the press bar of the door and went out into the parking lot, the chill wind howling and limbs and debris flying around me. I felt like I was in Dorothy's tornado.

Leonard was at the car, practically bouncing up and down on his toes. I knew why. I had the key in my pocket, if "key" is the right term for it; you have to indulge us older folks with all this new electronic equipment.

I reached them and touched the door and it automatically opened, needing only for me to have the key in my pocket. We got the back door open and got the girl slid into the seat. Leonard hung the IV bag on the laundry hook above her door. Outside, he popped the hatch up, folded the wheelchair, and put it inside. Part of it stuck over the backseat. That was all right. The girl didn't have to worry about headroom. She was asleep on the seat, blissfully unaware of all that was going on around her. You couldn't have stirred her with a brass band and a pack of howler monkeys.

While this went on, I was facing the emergency door with the shotgun. It was a good piece between us and it, but not as far as the hallway shot had been.

No one came out.

I eased around to the driver's side as Leonard slipped into the front passenger seat. When I got in, I gave him the shotgun, then I started the car and rolled down our windows so we could use our weapons if we had to. The cold and the rain blew into the car, but right at that moment, I found it refreshing. I was all het up.

I took the handgun out of my windbreaker pocket and put it on the seat between my legs. Leonard poked the shotgun out the window, said, “Show a head, you sons of bitches.”

I pulled out of the lot, and when I reached the street, I had only one way to turn. To our right was a tree that was old and thick when Davy Crockett passed through this area on his way to his fate at the Alamo. It had been uprooted by the storm and fallen across the road, blocking an exit that way.

I turned left and started down the street through a whirlwind of leaves and limbs, dirt and rain.

I felt relieved for about ten seconds.

In the rearview I saw a car come sailing out of the lot and turn after us. It was a big white Lincoln. I didn’t think it was a coincidence someone else from the hospital had decided to leave and come in our direction at a high rate of speed.

“Haven’t these assholes got something better to do?” Leonard said.

“Apparently not,” I said.

Then I saw the street ahead of us was blocked. Two cars had smashed together at some point, and the drivers had abandoned their vehicles.

I said, “Hold on to your ass,” jerked the wheel right, and hit the curb. The Prius bumped over it with all the grace of a tricycle going over a railroad tie.

Into the yard we went. The tires spun in the grass, dipped into the soft earth, and for a minute, I thought we were screwed and double screwed.

Then the tires caught and the Prius moved. We bumped over some rough spots, hit a driveway, and then I turned back into the street, just beyond the cars that had blocked the road.

Now we had something of a clean run, at least as far as I could see in the headlights. Leonard turned in the seat and looked behind us and laughed.

“What could be funny?”

“They’re stuck in the yard,” he said. “That’s what’s funny.”

“Okay,” I said. “That is amusing.”

Our bad luck held. We got to the end of the street and another large tree had fallen across it.

Simultaneously we both said, I think appropriately, “Damn.”

“Go through the yard,” Leonard said.

I looked at the yards on both sides of it. Only one side was possible, the one where the tree ended almost at the front door of the house.

"Here we go," I said, and bounced over the curb and drove with hope. As I passed between the tree and the front-door steps, the car scraped limbs on my side with a nauseating grate, and on Leonard's side I heard one of the tires against the concrete steps; it made a sound like an electric can opener for a moment, then we were on the wider part of the yard and around the tree. I kept going, across the yard and off the curb and into the street, past the middle school, the yard of which was festooned with all manner of limbs and papers and even a tumbled-over car.

Damn, what a storm.

Back on the main street, I gave the car the gas, turned left when another pile of broken limbs and unidentifiable debris kept us from going forward. On down the narrow street I went. We sailed over a bridge with water running over it, and the water caught us and moved us to the right. The door on Leonard's side screamed as the concrete bridge gave it a body job, and then we were over the bridge and on the road, where there was less water.

To our right, a water park was now surely a water park. Floodwater had filled the pools and the whole place was a lake with metal tubing and metal platforms rising out of it. It reminded me of the skeletal ruins of a long-dead dinosaur.

Straight ahead was all we had as a way of escape. We drove by my dentist's office on the left, but I didn't honk, and continued with only the headlights to show us the way.

On we went, toward the loop, but when we got there, a left turn was out of the question. Cars were stacked there like tumbled dominoes. It looked as if they had been washed down from the parking lots of a housing division just above the loop. On the right, there were limbs and unidentifiable wads of debris. All routes were blocked except for a squeeze-through path on the right side of the road, around a turned-over tractor-trailer. It had most likely been trying to make the corner too fast in too much water.

We took that route, brushing up against the tractor-trailer, scraping some more paint off the left side of the car with a noise like fingernails on a chalkboard, and then we were around it.

I let out a satisfied sigh. Looked like smooth sailing for quite a way. Then the tire that had scraped concrete earlier blew out.

The car spun on the wet concrete and I tried to correct it with a gentle nudging of the brakes and a slight turn into the skid as Leonard said, "About par."

When I finally got the car to stop spinning, we were facing in the wrong direction, toward the overturned tractor-trailer. I popped the hatch, and me and Leonard got out, and set the wheelchair out and pulled up the back flooring to get to the spare and the jack. The tire was a temporary tire, because the car manufacturer was too special to put a real tire back there. It was small and thin, like a life preserver for a three-year-old. The jack was one of those kinds I hate. I missed the old sort where you just stuck it under a spot on the car, put on the emergency brake, jacked the car up, and changed the tire. Now you had to put a rod in a hole under the car and crank it. It was a little like a mastiff trying to get his dick into a Chihuahua. It took patience, something I was short on at that moment.

Leonard said, "I hate everybody and everything."

I eventually got it in position with a lot of cussing and encouragement from Leonard. I offered to let him do it, but he declined, twice. He seemed to think he was better in a coaching capacity.

The rain beat on us like galley-slave whips, but we got the tire off and changed, threw the jack, such as it was, into the back of the car, rolled the tire into the street, put the wheelchair in, and closed the hatch. Then we saw car lights sliding out onto the highway, moving toward the overturned tractor-trailer.

Through a gap in cab and trailer, we could see the white Lincoln. They had gotten out of the rut and past all the crap, and since there was only one way to go, they knew that's the way we had to have gone.

We jumped into the Prius, and I turned it around and drove hard as the car would go, that little tire making the car feel like it was limping on a short leg. I reached the end of the road. Billboards had been knocked down and laid into the street along with their metal racking, so I took a left, which was not a choice but the only path, as to the right there was a giant sycamore lying across the highway.

If something else fell into our path, we were pretty much boned.

We knew it wouldn't take the Lincoln long, with a little scraping, to get around the tractor-trailer, but it might take them a bit longer than it took us. The Prius was small and maneuverable, the Lincoln less so, but when it came to motor power, we were riding a bicycle and they were riding a jet.

As expected, in minutes, we saw the Lincoln's lights pop up behind us. They were far back, but soon they would close. We had the shotgun and the pistol I took from Big Guy, and there was the gun I had placed in the glove box, but I had a feeling they had a lot of heavy armament, and I had no idea how many were in the car. Was it just Big Guy and that creepy little fuck, or were there more? The Lincoln had room for quite a gathering.

"Hey, are there train tracks up here?" Leonard asked.

I knew there weren't but immediately understood why he had said that. I could hear what sounded like a train. I rolled the window down, heard that pathetic tire bumping uncomfortably over the road, and then I saw the trees to our left part, and out of that came a howling black wind and a wet whistle of rain—a twister, nature's freight train.

When I came to, the car was upside down.

In the rush not to have our heads blown off by our friends at the hospital, none of us had put on seat belts. I lay on the ceiling of the car with the girl lying over my chest. The IV had come out and something wet from the IV bag had run over me and made me feel sticky and cold. Leonard lay with his legs across mine. He wasn't moving.

It was light outside, but it was a muted light, and there was still rain, but not like before, and the wind was no longer howling. The tornado train had come and gone.

I gently got out from under the girl, trying not to put my hands on her naked ass—she was pretty exposed in that hospital gown—and then I eased over to Leonard.

"Goddamn," he said as I touched him.

"You hurting anywhere?"

"Question ought to be, where am I not hurting? But I think I'm okay. You?"

"Far as I can tell."

"The girl?"

"She's still breathing."

It was a chore but I got a door open even though the car was upside down. It grated in the mud, and then it hung, but I was able to squeeze out. That's when I noticed the back hatch had twisted off like it was made of wet cardboard. Would have been nicer had I noticed that right away. I was lucky I knew who I was.

Leonard and I got the girl out that way.

I found the shotgun and then the handgun, which I put in my pocket, and then we looked around carefully to see if our friends in the Lincoln were about. It was possible the tornado had missed them, and it was possible it had hit them too. It sure was one hell of a wind.

We tried our cell phones, as it was the first time we'd had a minute to consider it. I remembered my battery was dead, and Leonard didn't have any service, so we might as well have been carrying turnips.

"Now what?" Leonard said.

"We take turns toting her."

"Where to?"

"Good question."

I looked at the sky. It was a pearly mist and the mist was damp on our faces. There were no clouds, and though there was light, the sun wasn't visible. I was trembling a bit with the cold, and the girl certainly was.

"Feels and looks like the end of the world," I said.

Leonard helped boost the girl onto my shoulder, tried to pull the gown around her a little and tie it off. It wasn't perfect, but it gave her some modesty and made us feel better. Leonard carried the shotgun and crawled back inside the car and got the pistol from the glove box and put it in his belt.

I carried the girl along what served as a trail, though there was twisted wood everywhere, and we constantly had to navigate around or between debris.

The tornado had cut a path through the forest, and we followed that path, even though it was in places littered with tree limbs and pieces of tin and shingles that had been torn off houses or barns. We had no idea where we were going but had decided the highway might not be a good idea, as the Lincoln and its occupants might be up there. For all we knew, they might be making their way through the woods on foot, trying to find us.

I looked at my watch, realized we couldn't have been knocked out long. I had seen the time on the dashboard clock shortly before the tornado tossed the car around like a toy, and only about a half hour had passed. That made me think the thugs had experienced the storm as well, otherwise they would have found us easily enough. Didn't want to be tacky about it, but I hoped the tornado had wadded them and the Lincoln up and tossed them into the Gulf of Mexico.

After a long time walking, switching the girl out occasionally, we heard birds rise up in a great blast of wings, and then we saw that they were rising off a large misty patch of water, and then we generally knew where we were.

Lake LaBorde.

We looked out at it. It was impossibly swollen. It swelled shiny into the trees on the far side of the lake and washed up against the doors of lake houses over there that had once had frontage between themselves and the lake.

"I was sure we were going in the other direction," Leonard said. "I can't tell north from south under this sky."

"This means we aren't anywhere near help…wait. What's that?"

I could see a small cabin through the trees. It was always iffy these days to come up on someone unexpectedly, because now everyone had learned to live in fear from television news, and people who wanted to be sure they were safe might be packing enough guns for defense against an invasion from Mars. They might shoot on sight if they saw us come out of the woods, me with a girl slung over my shoulder like a hunter bringing home a deer.

She wasn't heavy, but she was heavy enough, and I was getting tired and was bone damp. I was chilled and hungry, and while whoever was in the cabin might shoot us, I was willing to chance it, since those in the Lincoln definitely would. Why they had cut the girl's tongue and come after her was still an unknown, but I was quite certain they were unpleasant people and now we too were on their shit list.

When we got to the cabin, I switched the girl to Leonard and went up to the porch. There was still that whole thing about a black guy showing up on your porch unexpected, and we thought we'd put our best foot forward with a white foot.

I knocked on the door several times, but no one answered. I walked around the cabin, past an overturned barbecue grill and a little shed with a padlock on the door. The water from the lake had washed up around the shed, but the front of it was still clear.

I knocked on the back door of the cabin with the same lack of results, and then I walked around and looked in the windows. It looked dead inside, like no one had been there for a while. I got out my lock-pick kit, which is really a couple of little picks I have in my wallet, and worked on the back door and popped it open easy.

I went inside and looked around. I tried the light switch. Nope. Electricity was out over here too. Expected, but disappointing.

I ran my hand over a table. It was coated with dust. Same for the couch and the bar that separated the kitchen from the living room. It was a small two-story cabin. I went upstairs, calling out in case someone was asleep, but no one answered. Up there I found an open door that led into a bedroom. On the bed, under a blanket of flies, was a corpse. I couldn't tell if it was a man or woman, as the person had been dead some time. The corpse was dressed in pajamas, but they were the sort either a man or a woman might wear. The person's hair was short, but lots of women had short hair. A large revolver was near the withered, nearly skeletal hand, and what had been the person's head was broken open and some of what had been in it was in dark, dried wads on the wall. A window was open. Which was how the flies had got in.

I crept out and closed the door. I didn't know how long the person had been dead, but it seemed obvious they had got that way by their own hand and it had been long enough ago to allow a lot of flies to cluster.

I walked down the hall and came to glass double doors. They looked out onto a roofed deck surrounded by wooden rails. There was a heavy metal chair there, turned over and caught up in the railing. I didn't open the doors and go out there.

Downstairs, I opened the front door and signaled Leonard, who was standing in the misting rain with a frown on his face. He brought the girl in and laid her out on the couch, used couch pillows to prop up her head. There was a thin folded cover on the back of the couch, and he put that over her.

"She hasn't got the bag and the juice anymore," he said. "She needs a doctor."

"We'll just have to make her comfortable for now," I said. I told him what was upstairs.

"Well, shit. Aren't we on a run of luck?"

"Whoever is up there, their luck is worse."

"I'm sorry and everything, but my main problem right now is I'm starving," Leonard said.

The refrigerator was full of food, and the electricity hadn't been out so long as to allow things to rot. It was like it had been waiting on us.

Well, mostly. There was a gallon of milk that turned out to be spoiled, as it had been in there probably since the person upstairs decided to redecorate the wall. Electricity or no electricity, it had turned into a white glob of stink. I took it outside, found a big fifty-five-gallon drum for trash next to the overturned barbecue grill, and dropped it in. It was the only thing in the drum.

I was at a spot now where I could see behind the shed and through the twisted branches of a fallen sweet gum tree lying partially in the water. There was a long dock and a pretty good-size boat out there with a roof and fishing chairs fastened to a deck at the back. Of course, it was riding high in the water. So high it had lifted up over a weathered dock. The weight of it was starting to cause the dock to collapse. The boat surely belonged to the fly target upstairs.

I went back in the house. Leonard had found some TV dinners, but since the microwave didn't work, that wasn't all that much of a help. I found a set of a dozen keys on a ring hung on a nail by the door and went out to the little shed near the barbecue grill to try them.

After going through seven or eight keys, I found one that worked on the padlock. I opened the shed. Inside there were the usual things—a chain saw, general tools on a wall rack. A snakeskin on the floor. I knew the mice were in there because I could hear them squeaking. I prowled around in the shadows until I found a bag of charcoal and some flammable liquid in a squeeze bottle. I also found one of those things you could press and start a spark with. I tried it. It didn't work. I found a box of large kitchen matches. I shoved the matches into the windbreaker pocket that didn't house the gun.

The misting rain had ceased, so I felt I could get a fire going in the grill. I went over and righted it and put some charcoal in. I used the fluid in the squeeze bottle to coat it. I lit the doused charcoal directly with one of the kitchen matches. A flame jumped up and nearly took my eyebrows. I cocked the cooker lid over the fire without closing it all the way, then went back inside the cabin.

Leonard found a beer and a bottle of ginger ale in the fridge, and he pulled those out. I carried the TV dinners outside. They were enchiladas in paper containers, the kind designed for microwaves. I set them on the ground, went back inside, and me and Leonard looked through the shelves until I came across some aluminum foil.

Outside I shook the food out of the boxes and wrapped them in the foil and put them on the grill, waited impatiently while they heated up. I went inside and found some plates, went back out, put the food on those by nudging it loose from the foil with a stick, and took it all inside.

I sat the plates on the table. Leonard had found forks, and he gave me one, and we unrolled the foil and ate. It wasn't half-bad, though there were some cool spots in it. I had been too hungry to let them heat properly. I drank warm ginger ale and Leonard drank the warm beer.

I put the plates in the sink and washed them with tap water and bottled soap. I didn't want to leave the dead person a heap of dirty plates.

The wind began to whistle outside, and the rain picked up again, and the sky turned darker.

I said, “Damn it. Just quit already, will you?”

Leonard said, “I found some candles.”

“Not sure we want to light them,” I said. “The Lincoln folks may be searching for us.”

“Good point.”

Leonard went through the cabin, looking about. He went upstairs too, came down carrying a deer rifle and a box of ammunition. “We might need this.”

“There’s the handgun too,” I said. “You know, next to the corpse.”

“We’ll let the dead keep it for now.”

Leonard went over and sat by the window near the front door and pulled the curtain to, then pushed it slightly aside at one corner so he could see outside. He sat with the rifle in his lap. He put the box of ammunition in his windbreaker pocket.

I went around and pulled all the other curtains closed and locked the back door.

Then I checked on the girl. She was still out. I assumed that was due to the drugs she had been given, maybe what had been in the IV bag. She was breathing evenly.

In the bathroom, I found some over-the-counter pain relievers. I brought the bottle out with me, used a cutting board and the butt of a butcher knife to grind a few pills into a powder, and then I put the stuff in a cup, dampened it with water, let it set. I planned to give it to the girl if she woke up, so I thought it needed to be easy to take. I put the bottle of pills in my pocket.

I found a chair to sit in. There was a spare couch pillow. I got up and took it and put it behind my head. I wondered how many rounds were left in the pump shotgun. I wondered how many flies were on the corpse upstairs. Would we go to Mars in my lifetime? It was stuff like that running through my exhausted brain.

The chair I was in was a stuffed chair. It was comfortable. It was the most comfortable chair I had ever sat in since I was born. I yawned.

Leonard said, “Go to sleep, Hap. I got this.”

He didn’t have to tell me twice.

14

When I came awake, the wind was still blowing and the rain was still coming down. The sky was partially light, but the shadows were creeping in, dragging night along after them. I had slept a long time and I felt slightly refreshed.

I took Leonard's spot and the rifle, and Leonard took my chair. He was asleep immediately.

I'm not sure how long I sat there looking out the window, but at one point I chose to go upstairs to the deck, as I thought it might be a better vantage point. I opened the glass doors and stepped out. The rain was blowing onto the deck and splattering at my feet and hammering on the roof above. I stayed back enough to not get wet, close to the door. It was then that I saw something moving in the tangled woods beyond. And then I didn't see it anymore. I stepped back through the open doors and stood there, just inside.

It was starting to be solid dark again, and as the night oozed in with its wind and its rain, it was harder to see. I stood there for several long minutes watching that spot, but I didn't see anything again, and now it was so dark if a bear were dancing in a top hat, I couldn't have seen him. Though I would have liked to.

And then lightning cut across the sky and cracked a tree in the woods, and in that flash, I saw Big Guy and, off to his right, what I think was a woman. Pale-skinned with a rain hood around her head, damp black hair dangling out from under it, plastered wet against her cheeks.

Both wore black and they both had very nasty-looking guns. I couldn't tell what kind, but I was pretty sure they weren't water guns.

When the lightning was gone, they were out of sight, so I went downstairs quickly and shook Leonard awake.

"They've found us," I said.

He got up and got the shotgun I had been carrying. The handguns were still on us.

"I guess we play Alamo," he said.

"I don't want to. Hey, the boat out back."

I didn't have to say it twice. Leonard gave me the shotgun, picked the girl up off the couch, and carried her in his arms like a baby. She made a moaning sound. They headed out the back door, and I followed.

I thought, All right, they may assume we're here, but they don't know that for sure.

Or maybe they did. Maybe one of them or all of them were trackers. Maybe they had a pack of bloodhounds with them. One thing I'd say for them—storm, tornado, what have you, they were not quitters.

Outside we moved swiftly toward the boat. We had to climb over a tree trunk and push through some shattered limbs with wet leaves on them, but we made it to the sagging dock and finally onto the boat.

Leonard tossed loose the tie lines that held the boat to the dock. It was a tenuous connection. A little bit more storm, and the dock wouldn't be there to hold anything.

We pushed against the boat, and it came off the dock with a scraping sound that made me turn and look back at the cabin.

No one yet.

I kept my guard position there on the deck, giving Leonard time to get the girl inside. No one shot at me. No flashlights bobbed our way.

I had the ring of keys in my pocket and hoped like hell one of them was for the boat. I ended my vigil and went into the wheelhouse. There was a short stairway that led down, and I logically assumed that's where the girl was, that Leonard had tucked her away down there. She had certainly been through hell, although she'd spent most of it asleep.

I fumbled with the key ring while Leonard came up from below and stood at one of the wheelhouse windows and looked out. The view wasn't a good one, as there was a tree or two in the way, mainly that big sweet gum, plus the shed. From where we were, we could see in the direction of the back door, but the night had pretty much swallowed it and the cabin.

I found a key that fit. I hoped there was gas in the engine and the damn craft was in working condition.

I said, "I'm going to try and start it."

"Wait," Leonard said. He put the shotgun aside and picked up the rifle I had leaned against a wall.

He gently opened the door to the cabin, stepped on deck. I started the engine. It hummed like a champ. I heard a shot, and something struck the boat, and then a lot of shots struck the boat. I heard Leonard open up with the rifle, less rapid-fire, but by then I was steering us away from the dock and pushing out into the lake.

Bullets snapped. The boat pinged and ripped in places I hoped weren't serious. Lightning flashed across the water, and the wind made the water swell and the night was as solid as a big black brick.

I didn't try to turn on any lights. I gave the boat the throttle and went on into darkness, hoping there wasn't anything I might hit.

15

When Leonard came into the wheelhouse, I said, “You okay?”

“Fine.”

“Hit anything?”

“I shot at the gunfire. I don’t know. The boat took some shots, though. Guess it’s okay.”

“We aren’t sinking,” I said. “Better check on the girl.”

Leonard went down, came back in a short time.

“She’s all right. Still out but starting to stir some. Did you notice she smells like strawberries?”

“I did.”

“Shampoo, I guess.”

I reached in my pocket and took out the pills I had taken from the cabin. “Doubt she can swallow these,” I said. “Mashed her up a batch at the cabin but never got around to giving it to her. If you can find a cup and a spoon down there, if there’s water, maybe you can crush them up, make a liquid. You might give them to her if she wakes up.”

“Right now, all I’m worried about is this black water. I can crush pills anytime.”

I fumbled around until I found the lights, and when I hit them, the water lit up, and so did the wheelhouse.

“I think we’re far enough away now,” I said.

“Man, they are relentless.”

“Won’t be the first time we’ve dealt with their sort,” I said.

“It’ll be the first time we’re as old and tired as we are. And you know what? I think it may be the first time we’ve dealt with their sort. They are major prepared.”

The lake was littered with floating trees and all manner of windblown and rain-pushed debris. The boat rode rough and I wasn’t particularly skilled at driving it. A raccoon could have been trained to do better than I was doing, though it would have to be a smart raccoon.

I could sometimes see cabins on shore, when my lights caught them or the lightning revealed them. They were all dark and lifeless.

The lake was large, larger now due to all the storm waters, and I decided to push across it, try and find a place to dock, see if we could get help. Leonard tried his phone again, but no dice. He figured a tower was blown down.

I thought of Brett and Chance and Reba, and I hoped they were okay. Was the house still standing? Was Buffy the Biscuit Slayer under the bed?

I wished I were under the bed.

On through the rainy night and over the leaping water we went, and soon we were on the far side of the lake. In the lights from our boat I could see the water had risen far above the shoreline, and I feared there were hidden docks under it, so I tried to ease in, pulling back on the throttle. It was a good thing I did, because we bumped up against something that gave the boat a jolt.

Leonard went outside and leaned over the railing with a flashlight that he'd found in the wheelhouse. He came back inside, said, "There's limbs everywhere, and I mean big limbs. There's no way you're going to slide it in here."

I backed the boat off and gradually swung it around, and with my lack of experience it wasn't any harder than trying to turn a dead whale.

Back on the open water, we went along for a while, and finally the rain ceased, and the sky lightened some, and after a while we could see a star or two peeking through strips of dark rain-packed clouds. Then I saw lights suddenly pop on along the shoreline. Houses were visible now. The lights made them look warm. The electric company had been hard at work.

I eased toward the shoreline there and found a place I could run the boat aground. I throttled it up big-time and shot it forward. It bounced on the water like the lake was made of hard concrete. The boat went onto the shore even as I throttled it back; it was too late to make a comfortable nose-in landing, and the bumping water helped jump us onto a patch of mud. The bumping was hard enough to knock Leonard down and hard enough to make my teeth bang together and nearly cause my knee to go out from under me.

I killed the engine, and we went down and turned on the cabin light, found our girl still sleeping, quite comfortably. She hadn't even been shaken out of the bed.

Leonard went through the little closet down there, found a pair of men's pants and a rain poncho.

"You remember all I did was put pants on her," Leonard said.

"Gotcha."

"You can turn your head, Hap."

"I was going to. What about you?"

"I'm gay and I'm putting the pants on. I don't get excited by naked women. I want to double note that."

I turned my back as Leonard worked her pants on and pulled the yellow rain poncho over her head. I turned around again as she groaned and her eyes opened.

She started fighting immediately but then must have realized who Leonard was, remembered he had thrown her in the back of the car in the first place. She looked over at me. I could see her swole tongue. It looked like there was a pale, stuffed sock in her mouth. She tried to talk, but her words were like cars trying to get around a too-narrow pass in the mountains. They tumbled off into sounds that meant nothing.

"Take it easy," I said.

"You can zip yourself up," Leonard said. "Whoever those pants belong to was a lot bigger than you, but it beats traveling around with your butt hanging out."

It was then that she realized she had been wearing nothing but a hospital gown. She reached under the poncho and clutched at it, gave me a confused look.

"You were in the hospital," I said. "Some folks came for you. Not nice folks. They wanted to shoot you."

"And us, I might add," Leonard said.

"Are you in pain?" I said.

She shook her head gently.

"I have some over-the-counter pain stuff. I can mash it up and maybe you could drink it."

She shook her head again.

"All right, so next thing we do is get the hell out of here."

16

Considering people were trying to kill us, we hesitated to leave the shotgun and the rifle, but finally decided we had lost our pursuers, at least for now, and the best thing for us to do was to head out and make for the highway. It had to be out there somewhere.

We kept the handguns, tucked them under our wet shirts. We left the boat and started hiking out, the girl walking now but doing a weak job of it. Still, it beat carrying her.

We didn't stop by houses and ask for help. It had been a long time since you could knock on someone's door and ask for assistance and get it. No one trusted anyone these days.

There was a trail from the lake between two cabins, and we took that. Some dogs barked at us. I glanced down the shoreline and saw more lights coming on in lakefront homes.

We followed the trail to a little road that was an exit for those who lived along the lake. In short time we began to hear a buzzing sound, and then the sound grew louder. We came out on the edge of the highway. There were trucks there, people working, lots of lights. The electric company restoring power.

I went over and talked to one of the workers, a little Hispanic guy with a yellow hard hat. Others came over to see what we were about. They gave us some water, which even the girl managed to drink around her fat tongue. Then they called the cops for us over their radio. Before too long, perhaps an hour, a car came out and parked near the truck we were leaning on, the girl sitting inside of it.

The driver's door of the car opened and someone got out.

It was Manny.

We were dry and warm and had coffee and sandwiches that a short, stout cop named Alton had bought for us. He brought the sandwiches in a couple of bags and stood around, holding a white bakery box under his arm. He smiled at us.

Leonard and I ate and felt better, but the girl couldn't eat, not with that tongue. She did get some dry clothes, though, something Manny rustled up. Manny got a nurse over to the police station, thinking the hospital might still be unsafe, and a jail cell with an open door and a soft bunk became the girl's hangout.

The girl had got some fluids in her, thanks to the nurse, and now she was asleep again with an IV hooked up to her. We knew nothing more than we had when we first found her on the road, except some people wanted her tortured and dead. Right now, they didn't like me and Leonard too much either, but my guess was they had no idea who we were. Just a couple of meddlers.

"I think we'll keep her here for a bit," Manny said. "She seems stable enough. Then we have to consider if we'll send her back to the hospital with more cops to watch her. We have your descriptions of the shooters you saw, and that helps."

"These guys," Leonard said, "they strike me as professional, maybe ex-military. One of them, he's like a kung fu rabbit. Me and Hap, we're trained, we're pretty good, but this guy is crazy good and acrobatic. Not that big a guy either, but he didn't mind coming after both of us at the same time."

"And he damn near beat us," I said.

"I don't know about that," Leonard said.

"Thing is," Manny said, "he doesn't know who either of you are. That's to your advantage."

“What I was thinking,” I said. “But we don’t actually know how many of them there are and who they are connected to.”

Alton was standing in the doorway, a shoulder against the door frame. He watched us talk and eat, still with the white box under his arm. He had one of those sad faces, like a hound dog with a stomach ailment.

“For them, we were in the wrong place at the wrong time,” I said. “They weren’t taking names. Damn. What about the lady at the hospital? She make it?”

Manny shook her head. “Neither she nor the officer survived.”

“Guys did the shootings were sure of themselves. Me and Leonard, we had a streak of luck.”

“Bad luck,” Leonard said.

“Neither of you are dead,” Manny said. “There’s some good luck in there someplace.”

“You have a point,” Leonard said.

“Here’s what I think,” she said. “Since they don’t know who you are, you’re out of this. You can go home and put your feet up. My guess is the only person they really want is her. You were just in the way. When she wakes up, I’m going to get her a writing pad, ask some questions.”

“I could use some rest,” I said.

“Me too,” Leonard said.

“You got a lot more explaining to do,” Manny said. “Breaking into a cabin, stealing a boat. Taking the girl from the hospital. But it’s all logical survival stuff.”

“What about whoever was dead in that cabin?” I said.

“We’re looking into it. And by the way, I am the acting chief until Hanson gets back from his trip. It was decided last night.”

“A little promotion,” I said.

“Temporary,” she said.

“What time is it?” I said.

Manny hesitated. She wasn’t sure. She looked at Alton.

“Late morning,” Alton said.

We had been in there since before daybreak, telling Manny all that had happened, all that we’d seen.

“I’m hitting the bricks again,” Alton said. “At least where I can still see bricks, concrete. Lot of water out there. I got to put this up first.” Alton lifted the box under his arm to show us what he was putting away, stepped out and went down the hall.

“Alton’s all right,” Manny said. “He’s new, comes from a little cop shop somewhere in Louisiana, I think. Don't remember exactly. Transferred here a few months back. He'll do fine."

"Glad to hear it," I said.

"Poor guy, got a sick kid, and I don't mean with the flu. Really sick, some kind of neurological disease. Costs a lot to take care of his daughter, Ginger's her name, I think. He has another job being a part-time rent-a-cop, and his wife works two jobs, one as a baker. She's the one bakes the pies he brings in. That's what's in the box. His rule is whoever wants some can have it, as long as he gets a slice."

"Maybe it's a leftover from work," Leonard said.

Manny frowned at Leonard. "Whatever, he brings them in. But that poor kid, that poor family, even with insurance and additional government aid, and there's less of that all the time, they can hardly make ends meet. Actually, I doubt they do meet." She shook her head. "I think about having kids once in a while, but then I wonder if I have some genetic mess lurking inside me that will cause a kid to not be right, or the father has it, or we both have it. I don't even date much these days. Well, Cason, who you know, but we mainly just shag and we're both heavy on the protection. He likes to wear handcuffs and do it with a doughnut in his mouth."

"I don't want to hear about it," I said.

"Wait," Leonard said. "A doughnut?"

"No, I was just trying to make Hap uncomfortable."

"Shit, he likes doughnuts," Leonard said.

Manny grinned. "Well, our relationship may not be about doughnuts, but like that old Haggard song, 'It's Not Love, But It's Not Bad.'"

Since we no longer had a car and neither of us had a working phone, I used the office landline to call Brett and ask her to pick us up. Right then there wasn't anything I wanted more than being home in a nice dry and warm place that didn't have cops in it.

We stood outside the cop shop waiting for her to show up. There was a thin veneer of water over everything. We had learned from Manny that the outskirts of the town, the low places, were now deep water. We watched as Alton drove his cop car around the building, onto a side street.

On the far side of the street, there was a swollen creek, and water had run out of it and was splashing over the curb. Some of the water was running down a drain near where the road met the highway. It was a lot of water, and that drain could hold only so much.

When Brett arrived, we climbed in the car, and she turned in the seat and checked us out.

She wrinkled her brow, said, “You boys really shouldn’t ever go outside. It always turns bad.”

18

When Leonard and I walked in, Buffy the Dog licked our faces and wagged her tail. Chance peppered us with questions, while Reba sat in a chair at the table where we were gathered and watched us like we were monkeys in a zoo. She was a twelve-year-old child, and she seemed way too wise and just a little evil. Leonard nearly always called her the Four-Hundred-Year-Old Vampire.

After we told of our adventures, Reba said, “Y’all could have got yourself shot. And for some whitey.”

“I’m a whitey,” I said.

“Another whitey, standing right here,” Brett said.

“Make that three,” Chance said.

“I’m not in the club,” Leonard said.

“Yeah,” Reba said. “All y’all white except Leonard, and he’s just an asshole, but you said she was real white.”

“Albinism,” I said.

“She got them pink eyes?”

“Light eyes,” I said. “Not pink.”

“I thought they had pink eyes, like a rabbit or some such.”

“Albinism varies, Reba,” I said. “She’s a very pretty girl, or young woman. Frankly, she’s so small and young-looking, it’s hard to tell. She might be eighteen, she might be thirty.”

“That’s cause she’s a Chinaman,” Reba said. “They look young when they’re a hundred years old.”

“You can take the girl out of the projects,” Leonard said, “but you can’t take the projects out of the girl.”

“You talking big, country man,” she said. “Listening to all that cracker music and shit. You ought to put some shine on your black ass.”

Leonard gave her a look that could have made a bear call a taxi. “And you ought to shut up before I set you on fire, you little shit."

"Come on, Leonard," Chance said. "She's a kid. Talk nice."

"Naw," Reba said, and she might have been the bear's taxi driver. "Bring it, cowboy."

I saw Leonard fume and perhaps consider how long he would be in prison for killing a child. "Last time I rescue your ass," Leonard said.

"Yeah, well, you get killed, you ain't rescuing no one's ass," she said, and I thought I detected a small catch in her voice.

Leonard relaxed. "No way. Me and Hap, we're invincible."

"No, we're not," I said.

"Well, we're tough," Leonard said.

"Ain't nobody tough enough in the end," Reba said.

Chance got up and came over and put her arm around Reba. "They're both fine."

"Hell, I don't care," Reba said. She didn't look at either of us when she said it.

"I know what," Brett said. "How about I fix some lunch? You boys want coffee?"

"That would be good," I said.

"Good," she said. "I'll order us a couple of pizzas. Hap, start the coffee."

"That's not fixing lunch," I said.

"It's my way of fixing lunch," she said.

19

A couple days passed, and the weather stayed volatile. Every time it cleared up and looked as if it was going to stabilize, a black cloud would appear in the distance and the rain and the wind would come again and howl loud enough to scare the shit out of a lion.

The Atlantic kept brewing up unseasonable tropical storms, and it was said a hurricane about the size of Rhode Island was going to make landfall in Houston. It might even make it to LaBorde.

The news told us not to take it lightly, to prepare and expect storm damage. It warned that though it was rare for a hurricane to make its way this far inland, this one looked highly possible, and maybe with category 3 winds. The weather lady suggested we stock up on food, flashlight batteries, and candles.

We had already lost one window on the house due to flying debris, and I expected it would be worse in a few days. I nailed some plywood over the missing window. When the weather settled down, I planned to replace it.

Brett Sawyer Investigations was out of work right then. No one needed a cheating spouse followed, so we were mostly sitting around. Pookie was still away, so Leonard had been staying with us.

It was a crowded house. Chance and Reba gave up the bedroom, where Chance had slept in the bed and Reba on an air mattress. Leonard took their place in there. Chance ended up on the couch, and Reba had the air mattress on the floor next to it. Buffy slept with Reba. Reba loved that dog and cuddled her like she was a big stuffed toy. It seemed as if Buffy was pretending to be one.

Something about the storms, and the big one that might be coming, caused me to give my life a lot of consideration. The storms were out of season that year, and so was I. Leonard and I joked, but I was beginning to feel my age.

I used to heal practically overnight, but now my bones ached from past encounters, and I found I enjoyed lying about more, staying near Brett. We filled in places that the other lacked, and no doubt, I got the better end of that deal.

We had recently married after living together for years. There had been a couple of separations, a worry here and there about things the three of us had done in the name of justice, as if we had any right to deal out justice. But we had anyway. Leonard and Brett were fine with that. They slept well at night. They were pragmatic. Me, I was a wounded idealist with a liberal limp. I wanted justice, but I wanted hope, and I wanted to be the old me, the person I was before I had taken a life.

I was not a pacifist, but I didn't want to keep trying to solve problems with weapons and fists. The guilt of that had begun to outweigh the satisfaction.

Maybe it was time me and Leonard pulled out a couple of rocking chairs. We could just peek through windows to see who was cheating on who and cash our checks, take it easy.

We couldn't set everything right. Hell, me and Leonard had done all we could for that girl, and now the cops had her and she was safe. We were done.

Sure. It was over.

Like hell it was.

20

One morning I got the call from Manny.

“Here’s what we’ve learned. The girl is feeling much better. She wrote down her name. It’s Nikki. She won’t say her last name. We’ve asked her what happened, what’s going on? She wrote that she wanted you and Leonard. Actually, she wrote, ‘I want the black guy and the white guy who saved me.’”

“Okay.”

“She’s still here at the station. Doesn’t want to go to the hospital. I don’t blame her. In a nest of cops is probably the safest place she could be. Her tongue swelling has gone down. She might even be able to talk in a few days, and if she is, will you two come down and hear what she has to say so we can hear it too? Or maybe she writes it all down for you. Doesn’t matter. But I’d like for you to come.”

“We can do that,” I said.

“Should you ask Leonard?”

“I know what his answer will be. We’ve been talking about her, wondering how she was, what had happened to her. Wondering if someone out there was still determined to kill her.”

“Wondering the same myself. I’ll call you when I think she’s ready for it, because right now she’s on some strong pain relievers and sleeps a lot. Outside of her tongue cut like that, almost cut off, she’s all right. Looks like the doctor stitched it back together. The doctor, she says Nikki will be fine in time. But I wanted to know you two can be here so I could tell her. Have you heard the weather report?”

“I quit listening. It’s always bad.”

“It’s going to get worse. A series of tornadoes are expected for our area. Lots of rain and high wind the rest of the time, and then we’ll get some hurricane from the Gulf. Probably fire and pestilence to follow, could be a plague of boils and locusts, maybe an egg and bacon shortage to top things off."

"Thanks for making my day."

"Hey, blame global warming, not me. Who the hell expects hurricanes this time of year. Mother Earth hates us."

That night I came down from the bedroom, where I had been reading in bed beside Brett, and found Leonard in the kitchen with Reba. There was a bag of vanilla cookies on the table and she had a glass of milk and he had a large cup of coffee. I could smell the coffee when I came into the kitchen, and now I wanted some. I went over and put a decaf pod in the machine, put the cup under, and got that going.

"Now I get a cookie," Reba said.

"Just one," Leonard said.

Reba took one from the bag, dipped it in her milk like she was drowning someone she didn't like.

I sat at the table with them and told Leonard what Manny said.

"That little white girl ain't something oughta be messed with," Reba said. "White people get you killed. Real white one like that, she's nothing but trouble. More white on they ass, more trouble they is."

"You don't even know her," I said.

"Got some idea."

"I'm white."

"Done said that. And you trouble too. But guess you my trouble, and she ain't. She ain't oughta be none of yours."

Reba had seen some death in her young years, had been disappointed by people more than once. I couldn't blame her youthful cynicism, but sometimes, the depth of it for a child, the knowledge she had, pained me.

"She's got no one else right now," I said. "You know how that is."

Reba eyed me for a long moment, then looked at the sack of cookies. "Ain't you supposed to take a turn?" she said to Leonard.

Leonard reached in the bag and took one. Reba turned the bag and took one for herself. "Now we even," she said.

"You're one ahead," Leonard said.

"Ain't I always?" she said.

21

Upstairs, back in bed with Brett, I told her what was going on, said, “You know what?”

“What,” she said.

“I think you should take the girls, including the dog girl, and you should go someplace else for a while.”

“Sending us out for our own protection again,” she said. “I can take care of myself.”

“I know that, but I’m not so sure about Chance and Reba or Buffy the Dog.”

“I think you’re being all macho, the man taking care of his little woman. You know what?”

“What?”

“I like that. I’m all for being an empowered female badass, but I still need someone to lift heavy things off the top closet shelf.”

“Now you’re going to get technical. Listen, Hap, I do appreciate you watching out for me. But I can take care of myself, boy. I like the thought, but I’ve been known to be trouble myself.”

“This is true.”

“You’re not the only one has murder in his history. You, me, and Leonard.”

“Thing is, why have more? It’s a heavy weight, and more just makes it heavier.”

“And no one hates carrying it more than you.”

“So you’re really fine with what you’ve done? What we’ve done? Hell, what me and Leonard have done?”

“It’s not about being fine with it, dear. It’s about knowing why it was done. I never lie down and think I’m a random killer or that I did anything for money or profit."

"In my case, revenge has been in the soup a few times."

"But there was more to it than being angry about being cut off in traffic or someone beating you to a Walmart Black Friday sale. It was more complicated than just getting even. You've stepped on some bugs, Hap. Me and you and Leonard."

"We do a lot of stepping."

"When the law does its job, we don't need to do a thing. They don't always. And as you've said, when the law breaks the law or refuses to do its job, there is no law."

"I think I stole that from the Billy Jack movie. I don't know how much I believe it."

"I'm not saying it's cut and dried, but you really seem worried. More than usual. What exactly are you afraid of?"

"I'm not sure. The weather, for one. It's becoming worse, and if the weather reports hold, it's going to make LaBorde very wet."

"It's East Texas, baby. We always have storms."

"And there's those guys I told you about. They're bad news. They know what they're doing, and what they're doing is dangerous and ugly, and they are persistent. I've got an uncomfortable feeling about that girl, like maybe whatever went on with her is still going on, and me and Leonard are somehow in the pile. That leads to you guys."

"You said they don't know who you are."

"Things can be found out. Guys that have the kind of organization and weapons and determination these people do, well, they got money behind them. And if you got money, you have power, and you have connections. We can be found out, and then you're found out. All that leads to Chance and Reba. I need them taken care of, and you're the one to do it. They love you, they trust you, and as you said, you're a badass."

"Where would we go?"

"First time in our life, we got a little money," I said. "My life, anyway. Why not take advantage of it? We aren't going to be getting any private-investigation business in this weather, and me and Leonard will be tied up a little with Manny and the girl, so, you know, you could go most anyplace."

"And what if you go in to talk with Manny, and you're back in two hours?"

"Then I'll meet up with you guys."

Brett twisted her mouth the way she does when she's considering an idea.

“We could go to Tyler,” she said. “I’d like to do some shopping. They got a Half Price Books there, a Thai place. I ate there when I bought Reba shoes. I like shoes too.”

“All the shoes you got, it’s like you got a lot more feet than two. It’s like you’re a centipede.”

“They have a new theater there too. Lots of movies.”

“That sounds good.”

“They have a hotel right there in the mall. All kinds of stores. It’s big-time for East Texas.”

“Does the hotel allow dogs?”

“I don’t know. Maybe not. If they don’t, then the closest hotel to the mall that does allow dogs would be our pick.”

“Sounding better and better.”

“I’ll be spending some serious money if I go over there.”

“It’s your money more than mine. I work for you, remember?”

“I never forget.”

“So?”

“I’ll give it some thought. We might do that. I do, you join us there when you’re finished.”

“Good. Go there and wait until you hear from me, stay as long as you need to stay. I’ll catch up with you.”

“Hap, you sound like you’re really worried, not like you’re excited about a vacation.”

“I said as much.”

“Yeah, but this feels different.”

“That’s because I’m really worried, but I’m not exactly sure what I’m worried about, and that worries me even more. I hope you’ll take that vacation, and before it gets really stormy.”

Brett rolled over and put her arm across my chest.

“Maybe we should see if we can make a storm ourselves.”

“I’m feeling a bit like a tornado,” I said.

“And I know a tornado alley you might like to visit.”

“Oh my, girl, you are nasty.”

“Uh-huh, I am.”

22

Time passed but the wind and rain didn't. The tornadoes Manny warned me about came, but we were lucky and our place wasn't hit by any. The twisters tore up the woods on the eastern edge of town and took a few houses and mobile homes out in the country on a sightseeing tour, and though there were some minor injuries, no one was killed, though there were reports of missing chickens.

That was a good thing, no one being hurt, though who knows about the chickens. The morning Manny called us to come down to the station, the weather was still bad. The sky was black, the wind was high, and the rain was furious.

We drove to the cop shop in Leonard's truck, and as we went, we saw the roofs of some houses were missing, and there were plenty of shingles lying about like dead soldiers. The streets were littered with wet leaves and paper. Now and again, something unidentifiable blew by or against the truck.

Even that early in the day we drove with the lights on. There were few cars out, probably folks like us, doing only what they had to do. We reached the center of town. Leonard drove slow and easy because the brick streets were slick as owl shit. There were a couple cars crashed alongside the road. I wondered how long they had been there.

Stores were closed, even the café on the corner. We had to turn a street early because we could see parked city electric company trucks and workers wearing yellow slickers in our path.

It felt so eerie.

We took Pecan Street next to the bookstore, went up a ways, turned left, crossed North Street, and came to the rear of the cop shop.

There was a parking lot back there, and there were two police cars in the lot. One of them had a crumpled front end, most likely a result of the stormy weather. There was a white transport bus there too. It had wire mesh on the windows. It was an old bus and had once been used to transport prisoners, and from time to time it still was. According to Marvin, it was supposed to be sold in the next county auction.

We cruised through the back lot, went around the side of the building, and parked out front. There were only a couple of cars there.

We got out wearing our black hooded rain slickers ("Same alike," Reba called them) and made our way into the station, leaning into the wind the way you would if you were trying to push a truck uphill and feared a hernia.

The receptionist knew us and we walked over to the plasti-glass she was behind and spoke into the little grate that allowed our voices through but not much else. That glass, Marvin once said, was built like the Great Wall of China. Evelyn was always friendly and kept her kids' and grandkids' photos in frames on her desk, which bent like a horseshoe around her in what was a good-size room. She looked like a lady who loved bacon and grease. She wore big flowery explosions of cloth and always had a tall Styrofoam cup of something on her desk. She had hair like a wasps' nest, but it wasn't by accident—she styled it that way. There was enough hairspray on it to pin a wrestler to the mat, and she wore a flakey white lipstick that reminded me of cake frosting.

"How's things with the family?" Leonard said.

"Fine. You boys in new trouble yet?"

"Why, Evelyn," I said. "We don't get in trouble, we get in adventures."

"Is that what you call them?"

"Yeah," I said. "We go with that."

"That's not what Chief Hanson calls them," she said, and pointed at the door to the side of her office and buzzed the lock. With waves to her, we pushed the door and went in.

Manny was easy to find. She was in Hanson's office going over some paperwork. The door was open. We went in.

"Caught you working," I said.

"Pretending to work," she said.

"So how is she?" Leonard said, and we both took off our slickers and hung them on hooks on the back of the open door and sat.

"She can talk a little, but not for long. She gets tired and her tongue starts to hurt. She might talk some and write some. But she can communicate and claims she'll tell more with you guys here. I'm not sure what the attraction is."

“Sterling manhood,” Leonard said. “There’s nothing like a real man that’s queer as a duck in trousers to bring out the enthusiasm of either sex.”

“What about me?” I said. “I’m not gay.”

“That sort of sets you back a notch,” Leonard said. “But you’ll do.”

“That’s funny,” Manny said. “Just not enough.”

“I think I’m perfectly manly,” I said.

Leonard grinned at me. Manny chose not to get involved.

Manny got up and led us out of the office and down the hall. There was a jail cell at the back with its door swung wide, and Nikki was sitting up in a hospital bed that had been rolled in for her. She had a stack of pillows behind her head and at her back. She wore an orange jumpsuit, same as a criminal. She had an IV in her arm, and the bag for it hung on an IV rack. The nurse, a slim, older woman, nodded at us and then, without a word, got up and went out.

I guess Manny had her trained.

There were three chairs in the cell, and they had provided Nikki with a small table. There were four books on it, popular bestsellers. There was a yellow legal pad and a ballpoint pen beside them.

We sat in the chairs.

I smiled at Nikki. “How are you?”

“Terrible,” she said. I understood her clearly, but there was an oddness about her voice. She had to pronounce the word “terrible” with painful care, and it arrived as if by banana boat.

“Looks like you got a lot of reading material,” I said.

“Nurse’s stuff,” she said. “She’s very sweet.”

“Manny said you’d like to talk to us.”

She nodded. She waved her hand, indicating we should come closer. We scooted our chairs nearer to the bed. When we were settled, Nikki reached out and took Leonard’s hand and pulled it up on the little table and held it. It was quite a contrast, the hand of a snow-white woman grasping a hand as black as the bottom of a coal mine.

She took a deep breath, let it out, said, “I’m scared.”

“We know what you’re scared of,” I said. “But we don’t know who they are or why they’re after you. That something you can explain?”

“Nicole Beckman.”

The three of us just stared at her. She might as well have pulled a name out of a hat, stuck her finger on a name in the phone book, or said that Santa Claus had sent his elves after her.

“Who’s that?” Manny said.

“A year ago,” Nikki said, “she was murdered in her home, and her girlfriend was there with her.”

I thought I had the answer. I said, “Are you the girlfriend?”

She shook her head gently. “I bat for the other team.”

“Okay,” I said. “How are you connected to her?”

“I’m not. Not really.”

“Shit,” Manny said. “Beckman. Yeah. Wait. I heard about that. Around Tyler, right?”

Nikki nodded.

Manny explained. “No one could figure out why Nicole Beckman was killed. No record. No indication of criminal activity of any kind. Someone broke in her house and blew her brains out while she was in bed. Her girlfriend was with her, and the girlfriend said the man with the gun came in and said to Nicole, ‘Is your name Nicole Beckman?’ She said it was, and he shot her, hit the girlfriend in the head with the stock of the shotgun, and got out of there quick. No one has any idea who it was killed Beckman, or why. Killer wore a mask, animal mask of some sort. The girlfriend said he seemed unsteady on his feet, like maybe he’d spent too much time at a bar. Odd observation, but I remember that’s what she said, what was reported, anyway.”

I was more baffled now than before I came to the station.

Leonard’s mouth fell open, and I saw a look in his eye like a chicken that had just laid an egg and was mighty proud of it. He leaned forward in his chair, said, “And is Nikki short for something else?”

“Nicole,” she said.

“And your last name is?” he said.

“Beckman.”

23

Someone killed the wrong Nicole Beckman,” Leonard said. “They were after you.”

Nikki nodded.

She started talking, and although she eventually had to resort to writing it down, we got the complete story, and it was an odd one.

It boiled down to this, at least at first. The center of Nikki’s problem was Larry Keith, aka One Mean Asshole.

When Nikki said that name, Manny knew who it was immediately, sketched in some background for us so as to save Nikki’s tongue too much of a workout.

Larry operated a garage outside of Tyler, near Bullard, but he used it as a chop shop as well. Fix a car by day, chop one by night. Legitimate when the sun was up, crooked when the sun went down.

Larry was the son of Wilson Keith. We had heard of him. He was big in the Dixie Mafia. Leonard and I had put our hands into that dirt a few times and happily toppled some of those assholes off their thrones, but it was like whack-a-mole—someone new popped right up. Wilson Keith was that someone new, a former second or third in command that took over things due to design and attrition. Always suspected of this or that, always written about in the papers, mentioned on TV, but never caught with his hand in the cookie jar. He was as smooth as owl shit and twice as stinky.

Wilson set his son Larry up in business, and business was good. Larry was fond of older muscle cars when he could get them. Couldn’t sell the whole car, he sold the parts. But no matter how hard the local law or the feds tried to nail him, they couldn’t do it. It wasn’t that Larry was all that smart, but his old man was. And as long as Larry followed the old man’s lead, he stayed in the clear. He and his crew could take a car apart in seconds, redo it, and have it on a truck going up north about the time you pulled your coat on. They sold them way under the cost of the original cars. Theft has a low overhead.

Nikki said Larry's favorite car thief was a fellow named Pretty Boy Florence. He was a real pro, had been known to steal a car midday right off a car lot. He was quick, self-assured, and could talk a nun out of her underpants and convince her to buy them back. He had a girlfriend named Nicole Beckman. She knew all about what was going on. She was deeply in love with Pretty Boy, no matter that he was a thief.

That Nicole was our snow-white Nikki.

Nikki started talking again. Manny said, "If you're going to tell your story, I want the nurse here. I want to make sure we don't push you too hard or you don't overdo."

Manny got up and called the nurse in and I got up and went out and got another chair and brought it back. The nurse sat close to Nikki, but Nikki didn't let go of Leonard's hand.

Manny said to the nurse, "We want to make sure we aren't pushing her too hard and that she's not pushing herself too hard, but anything you hear tonight, it's confidential. You understand?"

"I understand," said the nurse. "And I appreciate being with my patient. I'm here for her health. You do what you got to do, and it's safe with me."

"Good," Manny said.

Nikki began talking again.

"One night I was out with Pretty Boy, and we were coming back from dinner, and he was always fun, so funny, and maybe at the bottom of it all, he wasn't that smart, but he dressed sharp and took me to nice places, and there was part of me that knew I was being shallow, that this guy was going nowhere fast and dragging me with him. But I loved him. I did. I dreaded the moments I was without him, but when I was with him I was, in the back of my mind, always wondering how I might shed myself of him. He was like having a dangerous wild animal for a pet, one that thinks you're the pet, and you know in your bones that pet isn't loyal, and one day it's going to turn and bite you, but, man, is it fluffy and cute, and there are such fine moments when you're with it.

"But this night, that was the night I had been dreading, that down-in-the-bones feel that something bad was coming. I can't tell you how many times I told myself I was standing on a railroad track and the train was heading for me and I ought to step off because the engineer was my wild pet.

“He had never done that before, what he was about the do, with me on board, though I have to be honest and tell you I knew what he did for a living, and he had told me all kinds of things about how the business works, how he went about what he did, so I want you to know I’m fessing up, that I’m not a babe in the woods by any means. I knew. I didn’t participate, until this night, but I knew he was a car thief and good at his job.

“May I have some water?”

The nurse gave her a bottle of water, said, “Anytime you need to stop, you stop. You’re my patient, and they can wait.”

I glanced at the nurse. Her eyes were soft and hooded. I liked that look, and I liked the way she protected Nikki, but I hoped like hell Nikki would keep talking, damaged tongue or not. We needed to know. Manny certainly needed to know.

After swallowing some water and a pain pill, she took Leonard’s hand again and continued.

“He stopped the car, said to me, ‘Nikki, this will just take a minute, and then you follow me to the shop.’ Right then I knew that I was on the edge of crossing over, but I got in the driver’s seat, and Pretty Boy got a little bag of tools out of the trunk and crossed the street to the car.

“But things went wonky. I’m watching him, and I’ll never forget, he had a kind of strut in his step. Maybe that was for me or maybe it’s just how he was when he was doing something like that, because I know he loved it and had talked to me about how powerful it made him feel. He said to me, ‘They think those cars are theirs until I take them, then I like to imagine how hollow they feel when they come out and there’s an empty space where the car had been, and now it’s my car, at least for a moment, and I feel like someone made me the king of the world, and then when I get paid, it’s like money from heaven. Didn’t cost me nothing more than a lock pick and a hot-wire and fine drive to the chop shop.’

“So he’s standing by the driver’s-side window of the Corvette, glances back at me with a smile on his face, then turns to his work, and that’s when I know it’s gone wrong. I didn’t understand exactly what was happening at first, but then I saw a man’s head raise up, and then a woman’s, and I got the impression they had been parked in the drive so they could have sex. Why they parked there for that, I don't know. Maybe just for fun. Maybe not. I don't even know if that driveway was their driveway or just some random driveway they pulled into to do something naughty. But when I saw those heads raise up, Pretty Boy jumped back liked he'd come upon a snake. I saw the man jerk the door open and step out of the car, naked.

"Pretty Boy froze with that bag of tools in his hand, and I heard the man say, 'Who the fuck are you?'

"That's when Pretty Boy dropped the bag, pulled a pistol from under his sport coat and shot twice, killing both of them. If shooting them like that wasn't cold enough, he pulled the woman's body out of the car and left both of them lying naked on the driveway. There was blood all over the concrete.

"Pretty Boy came back to his car, the pistol shots still ringing in my ears. He put the bag of tools in the trunk, took a towel out of the back, came to the window where I was, said, 'Don't ask a question. Follow me.'

"Lights were coming on in a house next door and some dogs had started to bark. Pretty Boy went back to the Corvette, used the towel to wipe down what I figured was blood, then he got in the car, and, using the key the man had left in the ignition, he backed out and drove down the street. I went after him, did it with the car lights off too. At the corner he turned on the Corvette's lights, and I turned on mine. He turned right and I followed him.

"Part of me was thinking, Peel off, go to the cops, you're just digging yourself a grave. But, hell, I kept driving. Can I have some more water?"

The nurse helped her out, and Nikki drank long and hard from the bottle. She sighed when she handed it back.

"You need to stop and rest," the nurse said.

"No," Nikki said. "I'm fine. I want to get it all out, or as much of it as I can. I get tired, I'll write it out."

The nurse nodded. Nikki continued.

"I followed him like he asked, but I was almost in a trance. I just didn't know what else to do. We went out on the far edge of town where Larry Keith had his chop shop. All the way out there I'm thinking I've gone from being in love with a bad-boy car thief to being in love with a murderer. What do I do?

"I got to the shop and I parked out front. The shop doors were wide open. Inside it was bright. Pretty Boy drove the Corvette through the shop doors, parked, got out. I could see from where I sat that the seat of his pants was wet with blood. Then I see this guy walk up to him. I didn't know it at the time, but it was Larry Keith. Later I saw photos on the Internet, but I'll come to that. I saw Keith talking to Pretty Boy, who was explaining the blood, I guess.

"After a while, Keith, appearing none too happy, looked out the door at me in Pretty Boy's car. His expression could have curdled milk, as my mother used to say. He was a handsome guy, but even from a distance, there was something unsettling about him, like his soul was dying or was already dead. I know how that sounds, but when he looked at me, I felt like I was melting into a puddle of blood.

"Larry Keith walked Pretty Boy out of view of the doors, and they were gone for some time, but eventually they come back into view, and Pretty Boy, I could tell that plenty was wrong, and at first I'm thinking it's the murders he committed, as he looked like someone had let the air out of him. He was almost as white as I am, walked with a kind of shuffle, like his shoes were sticking to the ground.

"The two of them walked to where I was waiting in Pretty Boy's car, and I felt sick suddenly, because Keith glanced at Pretty Boy, said so I heard it, 'We got to clean things up a little, right?'

"I wanted to think they meant the stolen car, but in that moment, I felt it meant a lot more than that. And then Keith comes over and looks in the car at me. Puts his hands on the open car window and ducks his head and looks in. I've never seen eyes that cold before, like a dead animal lying on the side of the road, its eyes open and flat and looking at nothing. He stares at me a long time, says, 'Might want to eat some red meat, honey, you look kind of pale.' I knew then I would never get the chance to eat any meat or anything else if I sat there for very long, but I was glued to the car seat, looking out the window.

"Pretty Boy walked over to the car, told me they wanted us to come inside. I was surprised they wanted me. Why? I wasn't in a stolen car. Fact was, that was the closest I'd ever come to the shop. There was something odd about the way Pretty Boy looked at me, like he was about to shovel dirt in my face. I knew then for sure that I wasn't being melodramatic, that Keith wasn't talking about 'clean up' in the sense of wiping blood off the seat of a stolen car. I was a witness to the murders, and I was connected to Pretty Boy, and he was connected to Larry Keith. I loved Pretty Boy, but I knew right then he didn't love me. I knew what was coming. Pretty Boy would have a new girl on his arm in a week, if it took that long. I'd be buried somewhere, thrown in a lake, maybe turned into a sausage or mashed up in a car crusher along with some automobile. I threw the car in gear, gunned it backward, turned it quick, and started out of there. I could hear Pretty Boy yelling for me to come back. I glanced in the rearview mirror, saw Larry Keith and a big man come out of the garage, the big man with a wrench in his hand, Pretty Boy still looking down the road at me, growing small in the rearview mirror.

"There was a flash. A bright pop of light in the mirror, and I saw Pretty Boy fold up in the middle and fall to the ground, and then I saw the big man with the wrench go to work on him. I don't know if Pretty Boy was still alive or if they were just making sure, but in a moment, I didn't see them anymore. I was driving too fast. I knew then what Pretty Boy didn't know. They hadn't planned to kill just me, they were taking him out as well. He had crossed the line from car thief to stupid. They didn't care about the murder. They cared there would be too much heat brought to bear, and they were trying to throw cold water on things before they turned into a fire. I mean, I don't know if I was thinking about it that carefully then, but that seemed like the deal to me, and I had plenty of time to think about it later. Maybe they killed him because I got away, thought he was part of that, but I think he was going to die no matter what.

"I drove wild for a while, and then I slowed down and drove on, not knowing where I was going. I only stopped to buy gas and eat a burger. Later I had to pull over and throw that burger up beside the road. It fit in my stomach like an acidic boulder. I drove through the night without plans, just reviewing what Pretty Boy had done, then what had been planned for me, and finally I kept seeing what I saw in the rearview mirror play over and over in my head. The flash of light. Pretty Boy bending in half and falling to the ground, and then that big man with the wrench.

"In the end, I drove right out of East Texas, across North Texas, crossed the Red River into eastern Oklahoma. I found a town that had its bus station beside a liquor store and parked Pretty Boy's car, a '68 Ford Mustang, out back of that store with the keys in it. I caught a bus and got off at the first stop and ended up at an out-of-the-way town about the size of a postage stamp called Hootie Hoot."

"We know it," Leonard said. "We had a little adventure there once. It makes a stretched dead rat's asshole seem like a nicer place to live."

"That proves you've been there. About half the downtown is closed and boarded off. There's a theater still there, a restaurant where they burn a bad steak and grease up worse home fries. You can gain five pounds walking by that place. It's got a few service stations and a bank and some of this and some of that, and one of the thats they had was a flower shop.

"I had a little money, and I managed to get an apartment, was quick to get a job at the flower shop. It was walking distance from where I was staying. The shop paid in cash, because even though I had some credit cards, I thought it best not to use them. I feared those men finding out who I was and tracking me. Maybe they already knew—good chance Pretty Boy told them that night before Keith came out and looked at me. I started going by the name Nikki Smith. The old man and his wife that owned the place, I think they liked the idea of someone like me, an albino, working there. It was unique in that little town, brought in a little business. You know, 'They got that albino girl over at the flower shop. Let's go over and look at her.' All I had to do to stay hidden was let the old man in the shop rub his fat hand across my ass now and again. When his wife wasn't looking, of course.

"One time, when the old lady wasn't there, he asked if the hair on my vagina was as white as the hair on my head or if I shaved it. I told him I didn't shave it because I had a disease that might get spread by shaving. I thought that might make him leave me alone. He didn't believe me, or didn't care. He kept up with the touching.

"Compared to being discovered and killed, being groped by him seemed like a small trade-off. Most of the day I made deliveries, and though I had a license, it was the one with my correct name on it, so I was extra careful. I don't know if it would have mattered had I got a ticket. I don't know if Larry Keith could track me somehow because of that. I didn't think so, but I wasn't chancing it. He had money, so he had a lot of connections. Maybe had someone looking at arrest records, checking credit card use. I know Pretty Boy once told me Larry had people in high places, moles, and he got a lot of information that way, though Pretty Boy told me it was really Larry's father that had the connections. Larry's real connection was his father, Wilson Keith. Words Pretty Boy used was 'He's the real swinging dick. Larry, he's just the underpants.'

"Anyhow, I learned how to dodge around the old man, stashed some bucks for a long jaunt to somewhere else.

"Day I left there, I was going to punch that old man as hard as I could. And I did. Hard enough to knock him down. I had to stand on a stool to do it. But before that, when I was still delivering flowers, one day I was curious, peeked at the news with the flower shop's computer.

Up to then, I had managed not to bother. Didn't want to know. I knew Pretty Boy was dead, and I still loved him a little, even if he had planned to let them kill me, maybe even do it himself. I assumed he was ground up in a hot dog somewhere.

"But that day my curiosity got the better of me. Couldn't help myself. Really wasn't anything there. Nobody knew Pretty Boy was dead, didn't even know he was missing. No unknown bodies found, no one came up with a finger in a taco or some such. Then I saw another piece of news about the murder of a Nicole Beckman in Tyler. Then I knew. Someone had been hired to hunt me down and kill me, make sure I didn't talk about the chop shop, tell anything I might have learned from Pretty Boy. Thing was, someone had killed the wrong Nicole Beckman. My first thought was I was safe. They thought I was dead. My second thought was that poor girl. I felt I had to do something.

"I called the cops in Tyler, told my story. They needed to see me, of course, said they'd protect me. Wanted my testimony. On the same day I punched the old man at the flower shop as a way of delivering my resignation, the cops picked me up and hauled me to Tyler, Texas."

Nikki leaned back and shut her eyes. We all sat silent, waiting. Finally, she sat up, took the water bottle from the nurse, took another pain pill. When she started talking again, her words came slower and were tripping over each other a little, but she was determined.

"Reporters got wind of what I told the cop, about it being the wrong Nicole. Someone at the police station leaked it. News trumped common sense. They wrote how the wrong Nicole had been killed, which of course put me in even greater jeopardy. It was widely known then that I was going to be a witness for the prosecution against Larry.

"I was under protection, but I was nervous. If it had been leaked I was alive that quick and easy, I didn't know I was safe where they had put me up, a hotel downtown. Cops watching me, most of them were all right. Talked to me, played Monopoly with me, brought me books and movies, food. One night, one of those cops, he spilled some stuff to me. Not that he was supposed to, but he did, which goes to prove there are no real tight lips when it comes to rumor, gossip, or righteous news. Hell, for all I know, he was the one that let it loose to a reporter that I was alive. He liked to talk, and the thing he talked about frightened me.

"He said word was Larry Keith's dad couldn't let me stay alive. I guess it was a kind of pride thing. You don't get away from his family, not if they want you dead. And of course, there was that whole not-being-able-to-testify-if-I-was-a-corpse thing.

“This cop, Cantor was his name, he says, ‘Small-time car thief and lifetime criminal Pete Ridgely got arrested for trying to boost an SUV. Minute he thought he might end up going to prison, he wanted to land as soft as he possibly could, so he decided to cut a deal. He knew who had killed the wrong Nicole: Pete, his own self.’

“That’s how Cantor put it. ‘Pete, his own self.’ He had been paid to do the job, was so excited he got drunk, looked up Nicole Beckman in the phone book, drove to her house, and killed her. Thing was, the Nicole he wanted was me, and I was in hiding, so the wrong Nicole Beckman was murdered. Cantor said Pete told the cops, ‘I don’t do so good when I drink.’

“I figured his drinking had to be pretty damn bad, all right. Someone must have at some point mentioned I was Asian and albino, certainly memorable enough for those with brain cells.

“After that, Pete had his own head on the chopping block for killing the wrong girl. At that time, I was loose in the wild, so to speak, in Hootie Hoot, and Pete, he didn’t know which end was up. He didn’t know where to find me to make things right by killing me, and Wilson Keith wanted him dead for being a screwup, and maybe kind of wished his own son was dead for being stupid enough to hire a drunk who didn’t know an albino from a rhino. Pete knew it was his turn to get whacked, so he went state’s evidence. He didn’t last long in jail. He had provided written testimony, but he wouldn’t be speaking at the trial after all. Hanged himself.”

“At least he got to quit being stupid,” Leonard said.

Nikki smiled a little. It wasn’t exactly an amused smile. Maybe her tongue hurt.

“Do you need to stop?” the nurse said.

Nikki gently shook her head, kept talking.

“Cantor said shortly after a jailer named Frank Quinn found Pete hanging, he retired from the jailer business and began living high on the hog without visible means of support. Turned out he liked to talk, and rumor was he talked about Pete’s death now and then, like how maybe Pete got some help getting that rope around his neck.

“An explanation for Jailer Quinn’s expensive lifestyle didn’t happen. He was found under a piece of tin near an old fallen-down shack by two homeless men that had stopped to pee. Quinn’s mouth was stuffed with his amputated foot, a symbolic suggestion he had put his foot in his mouth. Damn. I feel like I got a foot in my mouth, way my tongue is swelling.”

"I said you could stop," the nurse said.

"I'm okay. At least until I'm not. May I have more water?"

The nurse gave Nikki the plastic bottle and Nikki let go of Leonard's hand and took a long pull of the water and gave the bottle back to her. She rested her head against the pillow, closed her eyes, and let whatever she was thinking about ramble around inside her head.

About the time I thought she might have fallen asleep, she opened her eyes, sighed, and picked up where she'd left off.

"Quinn had been another of Larry's hires, and now someone was cleaning up problems. Canton's guess was it was Wilson Keith doing the cleaning, or having it done, and this time by more efficient people, the cream of the crop, the High Cotton Gang, he called them."

Manny nodded. "Yeah. I know of them. Rumored team of hitters, dirty-jobbers sometimes employed by Wilson Keith, the king of East Texas dirt. Right amount of money, they'd kill their mothers."

"I was supposed to be safe, and I know Cantor was thinking he was keeping me in the loop, though he wasn't supposed to do that," Nikki said. "He had good intentions, I think. And he liked to talk. I figured I was next on the cleanup agenda."

That's when Nikki's voice began to sound as if it were coming through a potato in a sock. She had to stop. She had the nurse crank her up in her hospital bed, and she picked up the pad and pen on the table beside her and began to write. Her hand wobbled, like it was slowly being electrocuted by a weak voltage.

What she wrote in that chicken-scratch handwriting boiled down to this:

Larry's chop shop had already been shut down by the cops. They found some violations or some such shit, but there wasn't enough evidence to have him arrested on murder charges, just Nikki's word. But it was a strong word, and there were other pieces of the puzzle that might fit together and lead to a lethal injection for Larry, and if Pete's and Quinn's deaths could be led back to Wilson Keith, that ol' boy might be having his vein tapped with a spike as well. But to clinch the deal, to get them both, Nikki's testimony was just the thing. But she had to make it to trial, and it was reasonably certain someone at the cop shop in Tyler was leaking to Keith and cashing a check. Someone with all the ethics of that jailer who'd ended up with enough money to retire. Maybe whoever it was ought to have thought deeper, remembered how the jailer turned out, rotting under a piece of hot tin.

Cops hid Nikki out in the deep woods between LaBorde and San

Augustine, but the one thing wrong with it was that someone, or more than one, in law enforcement was on the Keith payroll. Nikki wrote:

> They knew where I was, where the cop protecting me, Cantor, was. It wasn't an accident they found me in those woods. Someone squealed, and certainly for money. Place where we were, a cabin, the toilet got stopped up, and I had to go, so I went outside to pee in the woods like some kind of wild animal, and then the real wild animals showed up. Cantor was inside working on the toilet, and there I was outside, peeing in the dark woods, with a storm brewing, feeling pretty safe, and the killers came. I heard a shot from the cabin. That would have been poor Cantor taking a bullet. Then I saw them coming along the trail, wearing night-vision goggles, carrying guns.
> I panicked, ran, but they caught me, held me down and used a pair of tin snips on my tongue. One held my head, another pulled down my chin, and then this little guy used the snips.
> My guess was that was Kung Fu Rabbit.
> I think they planned to get the whole tongue to take back to the Keiths. Symbolic stuff about me not being able to testify. But the little guy snipped quick and I was struggling. Hurt like holy hell. I passed out. And then they got me up and pushed me against a tree, were going to do the tongue business again, get it right, put a bullet in my head or a knife in my gut, but there was a loud crack in the woods, a tree breaking and falling, and in that moment, they wheeled and that limb landed right in the middle of us, knocked the little guy with the snips to the ground. I broke loose and ran, shots dancing around me.
> I was a track star in high school, and I can still run. I got some space between us quick, leaped over a pile of briars and rolled down a deep embankment and landed in a ditch full of water. Then I was out of that and running. They fired down at me, but the night and me running, all the brush, kept them from hitting me.
> I was growing weak. It was hard to breathe. I had to spit blood constantly. My tongue was swelling. I was starting to stumble, felt faint.
> I came through the woods out onto the highway, and soon as I did, there they came. They had me figured. I could see their lights coming down a little road next to the woods that emptied into the highway.
> I ran out into the highway, thinking I had to get across and into > the woods on that side. Maybe not really thinking at all. Just trying to get away. And then you guys showed up. Another minute or two, they would have had me.

That’s where she ended it. She gave the pad to me and lay back against her pillow again.

24

By the time we got all of the story from Nikki, she was tuckered from talking and writing, and she had to take her medicine. The nurse handled that, and we went into Hanson’s office with Manny. She sat behind his desk. As always, I noted just how fine-looking she was. Even the scar along the side of her face gave her a uniqueness, like a model who had been in a knife fight.

She said, “Well, you believe that story?”

“It sounds possible,” I said.

“Yeah,” she said. “It’s too outlandish to be made up, and she tells it straight, writes it out straight. I believe it. I mean, hell, she may be protecting herself a bit here and there, and I’m thinking she might actually have helped Pretty Boy steal a few cars, but I don’t know if that’s true or if that’s just the cop in me talking. Do this awhile, you forget not everyone has an angle. Not everyone is trying to get away with something, and not everyone is lying. Lies are saved for presidents and Congress.”

“Everyone lies,” Leonard said, “and all the time.”

“Not everyone has a murder to lie about,” I said. “I believe her.”

“She seems to trust you two,” Manny said.

“We could be being used,” Leonard said.

“You really think so?” I said. “Hell, you dragged her hurt ass out of the rain.”

“Naw, I guess she’s telling the truth. Mostly. Like Manny said, I think maybe she not only knew what Pretty Boy was doing, but she might have been helping him do it.”

“At this point,” Manny said, “none of that matters. What matters is the big fish, so we have to take care of her, make sure she testifies. You guys mind sticking around? I’m going to see if I can verify what she told us, check out a few things. She might still prefer you two being here if I need to talk to her some more, and I'm sure I will."

"We're at your service," Leonard said, "long as you have something to eat."

"Go to the break room. There's some snacks there, coffee, nothing special."

"We've had the cop shop's hospitality before," I said. "We know what we're in for. Potato chips and bad coffee."

"Get tired, use one of the cells to lie down. We aren't exactly packing them in, and with all the storming, I doubt we will be. Even the weasels hunker down in weather like this."

Me and Leonard went into the break room and poured coffee so sour and acidic you could have used it to melt a hole through a vault. There weren't any potato chips, but there were some stale peanut butter crackers. We sat at the break table, sipped our bad coffee, ate our crackers, and felt forlorn.

Outside, the storm had regained its intensity. It just wouldn't go away. It would blow out, then blow back, and now the wind was howling and the rain was beating and my soul was quivering. There was something almost apocalyptic about that storm.

Manny came into the break room, said, "It's a wet hell out there. Lot of patrol cars can't get back to the station. Water's rising. I kid you not, I heard from dispatch there are people in boats cruising around where roads and highways used to be. Boys, you aren't going home tonight, and I'm not sure about tomorrow either. Supposed to get worse."

The lights flickered.

"We have a backup generator," Manny said. "Also, there's that pie Alton left for the station. Chocolate mousse pie."

"You took a peek?" Leonard said.

"Yeah, I looked. He always brings something different."

The pie was in a little refrigerator where the cops kept some personal food. Manny took it out of there and placed it on the table and opened the box.

The pie smelled delightful and my mouth began to water.

"You know, Alton is not going to get to taste this pie," she said. "Not even one piece, and I know that's mean and breaking his rule, but hey, we're trapped here. I'll take the hit for it, and I'll buy him a whole pie. But tonight, we are the pie-eaters of doom."

"Pie confiscation," I said.

"Absolutely," Manny said.

“What about the nurse?” I said.

“We won’t tell her,” Manny said. “Or the dispatchers, or Nikki, and she can’t eat it anyway, right?”

“Right,” Leonard said.

We split the pie in thirds with a plastic knife, put it on paper plates, ate it with plastic forks, and drank more bad coffee. When we finished, Leonard said, “Thank you, Alton, wherever you may be.”

“Damn,” Leonard said.

The idea of all that water inching toward us gave me the creeps. I began to worry about my family. I stepped out of the office to call Brett to see if she had decided to haul everyone off to Tyler. I wanted to tell her our situation, what we were up to, but there was no cell service.

When I came back into the break room, I said, “Leonard, try your phone.”

He did. Nothing.

Manny tried her cell with the same lack of results.

“They can’t repair things fast enough,” Manny said. “Tower’s down is my guess.”

The lights blinked.

“So, if the electricity goes, does the generator cut on automatically?” Leonard said.

“It does, if we get to that situation, and I suspect we may,” Manny said.

“I’m going to see a man about a horse,” I said.

I thought I’d make a bathroom trip, then use the cop-shop ground line to call Brett. I walked along the hall to the bathroom. The place was quiet and eerie as a politician’s soul. There were only a few people in the station. The three of us, Nikki, the nurse, the receptionist, couple cops, three dispatchers.

As I walked by the dispatch room, one of the dispatchers was going in, having made her own bathroom trip, I suppose. The door closed slowly behind her. I didn't hear them answering calls in there. Maybe the landlines were out too, though I knew they had serious backup that most of the town wouldn't have.

I went to the bathroom, washed up, walked out, and went to Nikki's cell. She was up but groggy. The nurse was helping her to the bathroom, holding on to the rack with the juice in it, rolling it along.

"I thought you were knocked out," I said to Nikki.

"Light dosage," the nurse said. "But she'll go right back to sleep soon as she gets back to bed."

Nikki smiled at me. It was a drunk kind of smile.

They went on to the ladies' room, and I went to the back door of the station, pushed it open. It wouldn't open from the outside unless you knew the code to use on the exterior keypad. That was comforting.

The air that hit me was cool and sticky. It lifted my hair and shirt collar. It was dark as the source of sin out there, except for occasional rips of lightning. In those flashes, I could see water running wild over the concrete, and where the street dipped down a bit to the left, it was like a little stream. In the flashes, the water was the color of a vein of silver.

I wondered if we might be able to get home. It was wet and dangerous, but if we went to the right, on up to North Street, we might manage to turn on Main and make it to the house. But then below Main was the creek, and it filled easy, rose up over the bridge, so maybe not. I was thinking about us trying it in spite of what Manny said. Perhaps this was the time, before things got even worse. I wanted to see my family. If I got home and things got so bad we couldn't get out, at least I would be with them, and Nikki wouldn't be going anywhere anyway, not until the storm played out and the roads were cleared.

I took a deep breath of the wet air, let the door close, made sure it was locked, and walked back to the break room. It was then that the wind outside screamed and the rain fell on the roof like hippos dropped from a plane. The building actually shook.

All hell was about to break loose.

We sat around awhile, tried to talk about this and that, but that wind howling and that rain slamming made it difficult.

Finally, I said to Manny, “I’m going to take you up on that offer to lie down.”

“Other than the one Nikki’s in, the cells are open,” she said. “Pick one.”

“We’ve been here before,” I said, “and in a different capacity. We’ve got familiarity.”

Leonard said, “I’m out too. That coffee didn’t do shit for me. I’m starting to see dancing tigers. Going to bed. I’d like my breakfast on a tray with a little rose in a white vase in the morning.”

“Yeah, that’s going to happen,” Manny said.

Me and Leonard walked out together, down the hall, turned past where Nikki and the nurse were, found a two-bunk cell, went in, left the door open, took off our shoes, and stretched out on the bunks.

“I have never liked storms,” Leonard said.

“I know.”

“Think it’ll pass quickly?”

“No. This one is going to hang around awhile. You heard Manny.”

“She doesn’t know everything.”

“And I do?”

“You’re right,” Leonard said. “You don’t know shit either.”

I’d thought, as tired as I was, I would probably lie down and then the coffee would hit and I’d be sleepy but wouldn’t be able to sleep, and I’d feel miserable. Too much coffee bothered me that way.

This didn’t prove to be the case.

As my head hit that thin little pillow, I had a brief moment where I listened to the wind and the rain, and then I fell into a light sleep, one of those kinds where you are aware of where you are and yet part of you is in the night world. I remember I had a strange near-awake dream about a pack of wild dogs walking across high water like Jesus hounds, their fangs bared. The moon was bright behind them, and then the moon seemed to fall off a shelf and hit the water in a gold explosion, and then I was deep asleep.

I'm not sure how long I slept because I didn't check my watch when I woke up. Leonard was still snoozing. The lights in the corridor were flickering as if they were having a fit of some kind.

I got up and put my shoes on, walked down the hall to the bathroom. I went back and checked on Nikki and the nurse. The nurse was asleep in her chair, her head hung down, her nurse hat on the nightstand on top of the books.

Nikki lay in bed, unmoving, the IV in her arm, the IV bag in a rack next to her. Her white hair was spread out against the white pillow; a white sheet was pulled over her pale body. The shadows from the cell bars lay over her and the nurse like long bruises.

I padded down the hall, past the dispatch office, went into the break room, and got a new cup of bad coffee and a packet of peanut butter crackers. I made my way through one stale cracker, then the rest of them, along with the coffee, went into the trash.

I walked to Hanson's office. The door was open. Manny was leaned back in Hanson's chair, asleep.

I started back to the break room, but when I came to it, I kept walking. Now that I was awake, I was too wired to go in there and sit. I was like a bored child with no one to play with.

I walked along to the door that led to the foyer. There was a glass-and-wire frame in the door that led out to it. You went out, the door locked behind you. You had to be buzzed back in. I was thinking I might go out and walk around in the wide foyer, perhaps poke my head outside and look at the street from the front of the station, but I didn't want to be locked out.

I decided to walk through the back door to the receptionist's station and ask if it would be all right for me to go out front for a moment and have her buzz me back in. Maybe she and I could visit a bit to knock the boredom down.

I went in carrying my coffee, and the woman there, pleasant-faced, her hair tied back, dressed in blue jeans, boots, and a loose shirt, smiled at me. She looked fit, muscular.

I didn't know her. But there was something familiar about her.

"This weather," she said. "Really something, huh?"

"Yep," I said.

There was a long canvas bag at her feet, and the door into the foyer was cracked open, held in position by a brick. I had never seen them do that before. It was always locked. The closet to the right was leaking dark water under the door.

"Can I get you some coffee?" I said.

"Maybe later," she said. She swiveled in her chair and looked at me directly. She had a coat stretched across her knees.

"Are you new?" I said.

"I am. Came on shift a little while ago."

I nodded. "Well, all right. Hang in there."

I went out and closed the door and walked to the break room and poured my coffee into the sink. I picked up a chair and brought it back and tilted it under the door handle to the receptionist's office.

I made my way back to the door that was used to buzz visitors in, examined it. No way to put a chair under that. There was only a push bar on my side.

Quickly, I walked to where Manny was, shoved the door wide, and called her name.

She opened her eyes with tremendous effort. When she got them open, she glared at me.

"You better have fresh doughnuts and coffee or I'm going to shoot you."

"Let me ask you something. Do you have a new receptionist?"

"What?"

"Do you have a new receptionist?"

"Just Evelyn for this time of night. And I figure, like the rest of us, she's trapped here for a while. Now, unless you want to know who all is on the day shift, I have to ask: What the hell, Hap?"

"Evelyn seems to have been replaced, and the new woman's propped open her office door, one that leads to the foyer."

"That's against regulations."

"Figured it was."

Manny studied me for a moment, then opened the desk drawer, took out a couple lightweight revolvers. She came around the desk and handed them to me.

"I have a feeling I'm deputized," I said.

"Go wake Leonard."

26

I quickstepped down to the cell, and when I got there Leonard was sitting on the edge of the bed, pulling on his shoes.

He looked at the guns I was carrying, one in each hand.

"I snore that bad."

"Something isn't right," I said.

He finished with his shoes, and we went along the corridor after looking in on Nikki and the nurse. They were still asleep and fine.

We hustled down the hall, found Manny standing outside the receptionist door. She had moved the chair I had placed there.

She said to me, "You're backup if needed."

"What about me?" Leonard said.

"You're a man without a gun."

I gave Leonard the extra pistol.

I eased to the side of the door with Leonard. Manny opened it, left it open, and went in. I could see the "new receptionist" through the crack in the open door, where the hinges met the wall. She still had the coat stretched over her lap, and her hand was under it.

Manny said, "Odd, I don't recognize you."

"I'm a replacement," I heard her say.

"I don't think you are," Manny said. "Not a proper one, anyway. What you holding under that coat, girl?"

The woman's face turned sour. "My clit," she said.

"I bet mine's bigger," Manny said.

That's when the woman moved and the coat slid off her lap and her hand came out. It wasn't her clit at all. It was a big old nasty automatic with a fat silencer on the end of it. The gun huffed once.

Manny moved. It didn't seem fast, didn't seem an excited move. She merely lifted her pistol and fired. It was really loud inside that room.

Her shot hit the woman in the face and her head went back, and then I couldn't see her anymore because she had fallen out of the chair.

Me and Leonard entered in the office behind Manny. Manny was replacing her gun in its holster. I had the one she gave me held down by my side.

The woman lay on the floor. Her head was a mess. Her gun had slid across the tile and ended up against the wall. A cell phone was beside her, having also fallen out from under the coat. There was blood everywhere, even on the great sheet of plasti-glass that fronted the receptionist's area. Manny's bullet had gone through the woman's head and hit it. It had made only a small dent. That was some plastic.

I knew then where I had seen that woman. She had been part of the crew that had tried to kill Nikki, not to mention me and Leonard. Hers was the face I had seen in the lightning flash when we were at the cabin.

I went over and kicked away the brick holding the door open. The door closed automatically.

"How'd she get in?" I said. "And where's Evelyn?"

Leonard went over to the closet, where the dark liquid was running out from under the door in a broader and more recognizable pool than before. He opened the door. I saw Evelyn inside. She was sitting on the floor with her head on her knees. She was leaking a lot of blood from her ear. The inside of the closet smelled like heated copper. She wasn't sleeping. I thought of all those photos of her family on her desk, and felt sick.

"Somehow, this bitch," Manny said, looking down at the woman she had shot, "convinced Evelyn to let her in. That door is pretty solid, and the lock is good."

"Maybe she beat the lock, the keypad code," Leonard said. "People can do that."

"Damn," Manny said. "Evelyn was all right. What the hell?"

"Nikki," I said. "They've come for her. And considering the weather, they must want her bad. Someone, Daddy Keith is my guess, is paying some serious bucks to get rid of her."

It sort of came together then. The woman Manny had killed had managed to talk her way into the receptionist's office, maybe used some kind of sob story. Or maybe she shot Evelyn through the little speaker hole in the glass, dragged her into the closet, and cleaned the blood up a little before she took her place.

However it had been managed, it had been managed.

Seemed to me her next step would have been to let some coconspirators in. Folks who could deal with the cops, dispatchers, all of us. Leaving no witnesses, including the most valuable one to the Tyler Police Department's case.

"I'm going to take a look outside," Manny said. "Close the door behind me, and unless it's me, and just me, don't open it again."

"Hey," Leonard said, "you're what law there is here. You got to stay around to handle things. I'll take a look."

Manny thought on that. "I don't know," she said.

"I'm going," he said.

Before Manny could think on it anymore, Leonard was out of the reception door, clutching the pistol. Me and Manny stood by the glass and watched as Leonard eased across the foyer to the front door, pushed the exit bar, then slowly stuck his head outside into the wild weather.

The wind came whistling in, slipped through the talk-hole gap in the plasti-glass, hit us inside the reception room. The air was damp and wet and cold, like the skin of a drowned person.

Leonard eased out farther into the storm, and soon most of him was no longer in sight. We could see his hand, which was holding the door open. Water was rushing in around his feet, washing over his boots.

He came back quickly and the front door closed behind him. I opened the inside door and let him in.

He had a look on his face like someone had borrowed his dick and forgotten to give it back.

"Well?" Manny said.

"Things are bad."

27

The parking lot is nothing but water," he said. "Worse, there are people in a fucking armored car out where Highway Seven used to be. There were some people wearing water boots and slickers sitting on top of cars. Sitting there with the rain pounding on them. They have guns. They were pointed at me. Pretty sure they're the same assholes that tried to kill Nikki in the woods, plus others. Though they are missing one now."

He looked at the body on the floor.

"Armored car?" I said.

"Yeah. SUV all tricked out. Got a winch and shit on it, probably holds five or so, has a boat trailer on the back and there's a motorboat in it. The car is about halfway submerged, but it looks like it could plow through some pretty deep and fast water. Speaking of water, it's two feet high and rising. There's a dump truck parked on the far side of the street, and there's a garbage truck too. That's not where those are kept, is it?"

"Nope," Manny said.

"I think they got them some special rides," Leonard said. "Makeshift tanks borrowed from the sanitation and street departments. Drivers would be sitting high in those things, could navigate this bad water a lot better than in cars."

Manny picked up the dead woman's coat, popped it out, and placed it over the corpse. "Shit," Manny said. "I killed that woman."

"Yeah, she ain't gonna get no deader," Leonard said.

"I felt like I had no choice."

"Drop it, sis," Leonard said. "We've got our asses in a crack here, so feel bad about it later, and when I'm home. I don't want to hear it."

"It's not the first time I've shot someone," Manny said.

“There you are,” Leonard said. “Now you’ve had more practice. And she’s still the bitch you thought she was before, only she’s a dead bitch. And you should check your ear.”

Manny reached up, brought away her hand with blood on the fingertips. “My earring is gone.”

“Silent shot,” Leonard said. “Clipped your earring. Had she been a better shot or faster, you’d be on the floor instead of her. You did all right.”

Manny took a deep breath, went where the receptionist had sat, reached under the little counter in front of the voice hole, and flipped a switch. The automatic front-door lock clicked. Water was running under the door now, and that was a tightly framed door.

A moment passed, and then there was a push against the door, but the door held.

“Good timing,” I said.

“That’ll hold them for now,” Leonard said.

“And except for you, there are no police here,” I said. “Just the dispatchers and some citizens. Maybe it’s not that absurd.”

Leonard gave me back the pistol I had given him, picked up the dead woman’s gun, unscrewed the silencer, and tossed it onto the floor.

“I want those motherfuckers to hear me coming,” he said.

We went back into the main station, letting the door to the receptionist’s room close. I put the chair back under the latch so I could pretend it was another barrier, but considering these guys had commandeered a dump truck and a garbage truck and had brought a fucking boat, it didn’t seem like something that would stop them for long.

Manny’s boot heels clicked as she walked along the hallway, and we followed her. She used a key card to unlock a metal door. It was a roomful of weapons and body armor.

“Suit up,” she said.

It was the police arsenal.

Most of the weapons were high-powered pieces of business. I decided on a twelve-gauge pump shotgun and an automatic rifle. I put on a bulletproof vest and traded in the gun Manny had given me for a large-caliber revolver.

Leonard loaded up with a serious shoot-’em-up automatic rifle and two handguns, including the one from the dead woman. He also put on a vest.

Manny took an automatic rifle and another handgun and put on a vest. She gave each of us shells for the weapons and a kind of slip-over jumper that had numerous pockets for shells.

We loaded the weapons and packed the remaining boxes of shells into those jumper pockets.

There were some rain slickers in there too, and they were better than the ones we owned, so we took them, went ahead and put them on. I had a feeling we were all going to end up outside in the rain.

All of this was done quickly.

Manny went down the hall to the dispatch room to prepare them for what might happen. She punched the code and went inside. Me and Leonard hurried down the hall to where Nikki and the nurse were sleeping.

Just before we reached the cell, when we came even with the short hall that led to the back door, we heard the automatic lock on it click open.

Damp air blasted through the doorway as it widened, and then we saw Alton. At first, I was much relieved, and then I saw his service weapon in his hand and the stone-cold look on his face, and I knew sure as shit stinks, Alton was bought and sold.

I could see behind him two other armed men, both holding serious long guns. I didn't recognize either of them. Alton came in lifting his weapon, startled at seeing us as much as we were startled at seeing him and suddenly knowing on which side he stood. I whirled with the shotgun, pumped a round into place, crouched low, and cut loose.

At the same time, I heard Leonard's automatic rifle bark, and I was reasonably certain it was a miss, because they all kept coming. Thinking Alton probably had on an armored vest, I shot low and took out his knees. It was like he had fallen over a trip wire. His head came forward and his legs went backward, into the doorway.

I got a glimpse of the two other men that were now in the doorway, and then there was a sound like two pans being banged together. I saw one of the men lose half his face, due to Leonard's second shot making good, and behind me a shot slapped into the wall and sent plaster flying up and snowing down on me.

I pumped another round, and the last man standing, the one who had sent a shell into the wall behind me, got a load from my shotgun. The blast hit him in the neck, and he went straight to the ground, so fast it seemed as if a hole had opened beneath him. He fell onto the concrete platform outside the door; the rain washed his blood away as fast as it gushed out of him. He raised one hand and made a movement akin to someone flagging a ride, and then he caught one—the bus to hell. His hand fell down, trembled slightly, and he was still.

Leonard was already dragging Alton away from the door, letting it close. Alton would have been the one with the key code, but I figured he might have given it to one of the others, and that was a sincere worry. If he hadn't given it to anyone else, then in time, if Keith's crew were as well equipped as they seemed, they were coming through that door, one way or another.

Leonard rolled Alton over on the tile, which was turning wet and dark with blood. My shot had taken out his legs. They were just raw bone and shattered flesh hanging together by frayed strands of muscle. Alton was still alive.

"Piece of shit," Leonard said.

"Needed the money," Alton said.

"Piece of shit," Leonard said again.

Alton managed a smile. It seemed strange there on that pained face, or maybe he was past pain right then. Maybe it wasn't a smile but a clenching of teeth.

"Wish I hadn't done it," he said.

"I bet," Leonard said. "And just for the record, I ate your slice of that goddamn heavenly pie."

Alton laughed blood onto his lips.

"Of course you did," he said.

Alton stared at both of us as if straining to see us from a great distance, and then what was left of Alton's life left him with a burst of air and a violent tremble. The blood beneath him pooled wider.

"What the hell was he thinking?" Leonard said.

"I bet he was thinking about his sick kid," I said.

"Well, he might as well have been thinking about dog shit, because he can't do a damn thing for her now."

Behind us we heard footsteps. I pumped a round in the shotgun and turned.

It was Manny hastily making her way toward us.

29

Manny saw Alton on the floor, said, “They got him, those bastards.”

“Wrong bastards,” I said.

I saw the realization wash over her face. “You guys shot Alton?”

“Technically, Hap did,” Leonard said.

“He switched sides,” I said.

“We’d been a second slower, him and his two buddies, who are now holding down the wet concrete outside, would have come in,” Leonard said.

“Alton has the lock code,” she said.

“Had,” Leonard said.

“Damn you, Alton,” she said.

“Remember he brought us a good pie, and let his memory go,” Leonard said.

“Do you think he might have given the code to the others?” she said.

“Probably not,” I said. “That would have meant they didn’t need him at all. Knowing the code and not telling them could have been his trump card. Then again, what do I know?”

“Believe him,” Leonard said. “He doesn’t know much.”

We saw the nurse then, peeking around the corner of the cell section. From there she could see us but not what was down that short hall, the one where Alton lay in a puddle of blood.

“It’s all right,” Manny said as we hustled toward the nurse. “But we are going to have to make some tough decisions.”

“Tough decisions?” she said.

“Is Nikki awake?” I asked.

The nurse nodded. “She’s groggy, but awake. We heard gunfire.”

“You did indeed,” Manny said. “Come on, let’s get Nikki.”

As we hurried into the cell block, Manny said, “I gave the dispatchers guns, told them to stay inside the dispatch room. They aren't cops, though, aren't professional shooters, so the ones outside get into the station, it's only a matter of time before they break into the dispatch office."

"Let's hope it doesn't come to that," I said.

As we reached Nikki's cell, Leonard said one of his favorite sayings. "Hope in one hand, shit in the other, see which one fills up first."

30

The nurse unhooked the IV bag from Nikki, and then we had them moving. We guided them down the hall to the dispatch office, Nikki kind of stumbling along, about half doped up. Manny knocked at the dispatch door. It was a couple of knocks, followed by a series. Code she had given them.

One of the men, a guy with longer hair than you would expect on someone working for dispatch, opened the door. Manny went inside with the nurse and Nikki. We stood outside the room and waited.

Manny came out. “She’s safer there, at least for now.”

That’s when we heard a clacking sound in the hallway, a voice. We followed the sound, came back to Alton’s body, which was leaking even more blood, like a spilled can of red paint.

Leonard, careful not to get too much blood on his shoes, bent down, patted Alton’s coat pocket, found a little walkie-talkie, old-school. Leonard fished it out.

Leonard touched the walkie, turned on the speaker.

Leonard said, “Hello, Pippo’s Pizza Parlor.”

“Who do I have?” a voice on the other end said.

“Well,” Leonard said, “it ain’t Alton.”

“Ah,” said the voice. “I’m assuming Alton met with a bad end.”

“You could say that,” Leonard said. “You can also mark the two that were with him off your Christmas-card list.”

“I see. Well, I’m going to assume you’re the black guy. You sound like a black guy.”

“You sound like an asshole,” Leonard said. “But I’m going to assume you’re Wilson Keith.”

The voice on the other end laughed. “You know, I know who you are. You’re Leonard, and Hap’s there, and that cute little cop piece, Manuela, is there with you as well.”

Alton had given him that information, of course. I wished then I could shoot him again. I was glad we didn’t save him any pie.

“We just want the girl, then we go,” said the voice.

“That’s it? You don’t want maybe some coffee first, little hand job?”

“We just want the girl.”

“Yeah,” Leonard said. “What we want is better insurance, some new clothes, and a trip to anywhere but here, but I don’t think that’s happening.”

“Leonard,” said the voice. “That sounds practiced.”

“A little. I like to have some quips on hand. Sometimes I say things over and over, I like them so much. Here’s one now: You’re an asshole.”

“Alton said you two thought you were smart guys.”

“Maybe not that smart, but smart enough not to give you the girl and expect a free ride out of here.”

“I can see why you might not trust me, but I think we should talk.”

“Aren’t we talking?”

“I mean in person.”

“So you can shoot us?”

“You could shoot me. What say you to this? I come to you, through the front door, but I bring in one of my guys, and we work this out.”

“We can’t work this out.”

“Might be a way we all go home happy.”

“I’m not seeing that,” Leonard said.

“What’s it hurt to talk?”

“I don’t trust you.”

“Fair enough. But it might be productive for all of us.”

We were all listening to this. Manny leaned in to Leonard, whispered something.

Leonard nodded, clicked the walkie. “All right,” Leonard said. “You come in through the front door in five, not before that, and you can have a guy at the door, but he can’t carry a weapon.”

“I would be taking all the chances here. So what about this? You stay behind the reception glass, we’ll talk through the voice hole, and my guard carries a weapon in case things go south. You can have weapons too. Fair?”

“All right. You stay on your side, us on ours, but the bodyguard at the door can’t be carrying a big weapon. He can have a handgun, holstered, put away. We’ll do the same.”

There was silence on the other end for a long moment. Then: “Place me a chair out front of the reception glass. I like to be comfortable. Maybe some bourbon."

"A chair we got, bourbon we don't," said Leonard. "Maybe I could just piss in a jar for you."

"The chair will do."

31

We could just shoot him in the head," Leonard said, "guy at the door too."

"I don't think so," Manny said. "He still has people outside, and maybe a second in command. His son may be out there."

"Larry sounds like the one we'd rather deal with," Leonard said. "He's not as bright. But the dad, he sounds like trouble. Crafty-ass shit on a stick. Kind of guy thinks he can talk his way out of anything and talk you into anything, along with providing a lot of goddamn money. I hate that type. I wish I had money out the ass like that. I did, you and me would retire, Hap. Well, I would. Maybe I could give you a light allowance or something."

"What we're doing here is stalling for time," Manny said. "I have an idea that might help us out, but we got to get our Mr. Asshole to chat awhile."

"Have Hap talk to him," Leonard said. "He's chatty."

"This is true," I said.

"Thing is, with the water rising and them knowing exactly where we and Nikki are, this place won't be safe. They'll get in, and we'll be trapped like rats."

"Okay," I said, "what's the idea?"

She told us. It wasn't that great, but considering our circumstances, hiding under one of the jail-cell bunks was beginning to look like our only other option. This idea of hers, well, it was something.

While me and Manny talked with him, stalling for time, Leonard was to take the others to the old transport bus and start it up. That didn't sound all that good, but there was one advantage to it: There was a hidden exit that led into the compound yard. The bus was about twenty feet away from the back door.

Thing was, we then had to have enough time for Manny and myself to get on the bus. And then once we roared out of there, if we made it that far, we had to worry about outpacing them and not getting caught in deep water.

Piece of cake.

Though, actually, I would have preferred another piece of that chocolate mousse pie, no guns, a nice warm house, and a foot massage from my one and only.

32

Before me and Manny went into the receptionist's office with the walkie-talkie, Leonard said, "Don't let anything go wrong. Just keep him engaged."

"That's all? Don't let anything go wrong?" I said. "What could go wrong?"

"Remember, this is us."

"Yeah," I said. "That means most anything could go wrong."

"I'll wait on you."

"Don't wait any longer than we've talked about waiting. You go when you should go. Don't worry about me."

"How can I not? You're so incompetent."

"Yeah, but I have my charm to fall back on."

"You better have that pistol instead of your charm."

"Listen, Leonard. Me and Manny, we're not out there on time, you head out."

"You think I'd wait on your ass?"

Manny was bringing everyone out of the dispatch room right then. She hustled them down the corridor, and Leonard waved them to him, and away they went, my brother heading out into the unknown, a pack of ducklings behind him. Except one.

The long-haired guy.

Manny said, "Jordan, you know what you got to do?"

"I think so," he said.

"No thinking so," she said. "You go into the generator room and in fifteen minutes from when I say 'Mark,' you do what I told you to do, then you go out the back door and run to the bus like your ass is on fire. Do not mess around."

"I don't plan to."

“Here’s a flashlight for when the lights go out.”

Jordan took it. I saw him take a long breath like he was about to jump into deep water, and with the weather the way it was, he just might be doing that.

Manny looked at me. “You ready?”

“I am. Hearing Keith on the walkie, I think he’s a guy likes to talk, same as me. His plan is to wear us down with fear, make us give up and give him the girl, so I think it’ll be easy to keep him talking.”

Manny turned back to Jordan. “You got a watch?”

“Phone. Well, it’s nothing but a clock now.”

“What time you got?”

He told her. She adjusted her watch. He held up his phone and they compared timepieces.

“Mark,” she said.

“Mark,” he said.

“Okay,” she said. “Get into position.”

Jordan nodded, started down the hall.

Manny handed me a small flashlight. “I have one too. Put it in your slicker. You’re going to need it.”

I looked down the long hall and saw Leonard and the others standing in front of the door to the back lot, waiting.

Leonard gave us a thumbs-up.

I nodded at him.

“All right,” Manny said, “let’s play the game and hope the prize isn’t a bullet in our heads.”

33

I was all right until we went through the door into the receptionist's room, and then the fear hit me. My legs trembled and my mouth felt dry and tasted of copper. Me and Leonard had been in plenty of tight spots, but we were braver when we were together. At least I was. Leonard probably did okay either way.

I think what was scaring me more than my own possible demise was that my brother Leonard might be killed. It had been close a few times, for both of us, but if something happened to him, no matter how much I loved Brett and my daughter, Chance, I had to wonder if I could make it. It would be worse than losing an arm. Family breathes for each other, and close family breathes as one.

I took a deep breath and propped the door we had come through open so we could make a fast retreat into the station. We put the long guns just to the outside of the reception room, leaning them against the wall. We took off the slickers, not wanting Keith to see them and think we were ready to hit the great outdoors, and dropped them on the floor next to the wall.

The lights were adjustable in the office, so Manny turned them down a bit so we wouldn't look like moths against a lightbulb. I found a chair like Keith asked for, went out of the reception room into the wide foyer, and put the chair there, about four feet from the plasti-glass.

"Comes through that door," she said, "nothing says he won't come through shooting. He may not come through at all, but some of his goons might, and not to talk."

"Keith will show up, all right."

"Because you trust his word?"

"Because of what I already said. I trust his ego. He believes anyone can be cajoled into anything, bought out, intimidated, what have you.

I'm counting on that."

"Yeah, you do keep saying that."

"And I keep believing it."

Manny nodded at me, turned on the walkie Leonard had given her. "You out there?"

Static, then a voice. "I'm at the door. Unlock it."

"You come through in a rush or there's a pack of you, we'll be gone before you can get to the reception glass."

"My bodyguard will come in first. No long weapons, but she'll be armed, a three-eighty in her holster. She's ready to go if it comes to that."

"So are we," Manny said. She clipped the walkie to her belt, reached under the desk, and flipped the door-lock switch. We stood with our hands near our pistols.

There was a moment of hesitation, and then the door opened slowly. The bodyguard came in. She was short and stout and moved like a cat. She pushed a rain hood off her head. Her dark hair was tied back. She had hard features beaded with water and a look on her face that almost made me think she had laser vision.

She stepped to the side and Keith came in. He wore a black rain slicker but no hood. The slicker was made like a cowboy duster and fell low to his ankles. He had on a cowboy hat with a transparent blue plastic cover over it. He was tall and looked Native American. He was probably sixty, but a good, solid sixty. He had on black cowboy boots, the toes of which were all I could see beneath the slicker. He took off the hat and flicked it a little, sending rainwater into the foyer. He gave the hat to the woman and she accepted it without taking her eyes off us. She held the hat in one hand, the gun in the other.

Keith unzipped the slicker and took his time slipping out of it. He handed that to the bodyguard as well. He took his hat back and put it on. Under the slicker, he had on a pair of black jeans and a light black jacket. It was unzipped, and a black shirt was visible. It had silver snap pockets and silver snaps where buttons would be. He looked as comfortable as a pimp in a whorehouse.

He walked over and sat in the chair. The woman stayed next to the door, just in case Keith wanted her to hold his hat again.

Manny hit the switch under the counter, and the door lock snicked. The bodyguard touched the butt of her .380.

"Is that wise?" Keith said. He had a nice voice, like a radio announcer's.

“Just keeping things honest,” Manny said. “Tell her to take her hand off the gun.”

Keith looked back at the woman, nodded. The woman put the gun away.

The chair he was sitting in was a tall chair, so he was looking directly at us. He crossed his legs, then reached out and pulled his pants leg down slightly. Manny took a seat in the receptionist chair, and I stood at her side, one hand near my gun, the other on the back of her chair.

“This really can be easy,” Keith said.

“Can it?” Manny said.

“It certainly can. It’s a simple thing you need to do, and you do that, then both of you walk away.”

“I think I know what that simple thing is, and I’m not going to do it,” Manny said.

“Look, I respect honor. I do. But the truth is, this isn’t a comic book, this isn’t the sort of thing where everything is black or white. The world has a lot of gray.”

“I agree,” Manny said, “but some things aren’t that gray. And there’s that whole law-and-order issue. I’m a cop.”

“So was Alton, but, like you, he had bills to pay. He wasn’t a bad guy, just knew how to do business. Is that so bad, taking care of your family?”

“Depends on how you pay those bills,” Manny said. “And you know what? He paid a big bill tonight.”

“Unfortunate,” Keith said, spreading his hands. “Things don’t always work out. But what I can assure you is this: You don’t do as I like, it won’t work out for you, and Hap here…I assume that’s who you are. Alton described you. Said you were like a once nice-looking guy who had gone through a wringer and then been heated up in a microwave.”

“Now I’m glad I shot him,” I said.

I was talking to Keith, but I watched the woman in the back, making sure Keith’s conversation wasn’t just misdirection. That plasti-glass could take a solid hit, but still, I watched her. My take was, she made a move, I was going to shoot through the speaker hole and blow a canyon in Keith’s chest. He was lined up good for that.

“Just so you know, you’re thinking about shooting me through that little hole, you would have to be quick.”

The son of a bitch read my mind.

“And then I got a vest on. Good one. Better than the ones you two are wearing, I assure you. And that locked door? Once shots are fired, my crew will come inside. Door being locked won't matter. It'll be as easy as throwing rocks through cotton candy. And that plastic in front of you, it's tough, but we got weapons that will make it seem like nothing."

"You don't have a vest on your head," I said.

"You'd have to be a really good shot, restrictions of that hole and all. And if you hit that little metal framing, who knows where a bullet could go?"

"Look, you got something to say, say it," Manny said. "I'm starting to get bored."

I sneaked a glance at my watch. The time was being eaten up, and if Leonard left when we agreed he should leave, I wanted us to be on that bus. All Manny and I were doing was stalling to make sure the noncombatants got on.

It wouldn't be too long before Jordan hit the switch in the generator room and all the lights went out. That would be our cue to haul ass.

Manny sighed, said, "Why don't you give us the short-story version of whatever novel you got in mind to tell us, whatever you got in mind to stall us with while you do whatever you think is going to work."

"As if I don't think you got some kind of plan going," Keith said.

Manny said nothing.

Keith leaned back in the chair. He looked comfortable. I half expected him to put on pajamas.

"Very well," he said. "Let me lay it out for you."

"Lay what out?" Manny said.

"What you're going to end up doing."

34

Standing in that reception room thinking on it, waiting for those lights to go off, suddenly our little plan seemed goddamn crazy. We would have a long way to haul with people on our ass, and Wilson Keith, he was smooth and deadly and had the soul of a piranha but with less compassion.

And if we made it to the bus, Leonard had to drive it through the locked gate, and after that, well…I didn't know. I didn't know pig shit from axle grease. It was all a big crapshoot, and Keith had the loaded dice, not us. What we had was a wish and a hope and an old transport bus.

But Leonard was out there waiting. That was something. Still, bad as it looked for me and Manny, I hoped he wouldn't wait too long if we were delayed. I wanted to know he and the others, that little girl Nikki, got out of there alive and well.

I could feel my palm sweating on the back of the chair I was touching. Keith's voice seemed to be an echo. I took a deep breath, used my martial arts training to find my center. It was dark at that center, and a little loud from the thumping of my heart, but I found it, and I began to relax.

Keith had never stopped talking.

"…have to do is consider the reality of your situation. Reality is what dictates ethics and decisions, not morality. Something is fine and moral and ethical until it's about you and your life. We can all afford to be ethical and moral when our lives don't matter, but in this case, frankly, yours matters a lot."

"Situational ethics," Manny said.

"That's one way to put it, but I call it realism," Keith said. "You can do nice and fine and right when your ass isn't on the line, but when it's money or sex or your life, a person's viewpoint changes. Let me tell you what you should already know. You're old enough to have left your teddy bears behind. The world isn't fair, and right now, you're caught in the unfair part. Idealism is a shield that melts with age and experience. You must know that. You must know you're holding only a piece of that shield now, or maybe you know it's gone already, but, out of habit, you keep hanging on to that bullshit we were all taught when we were young. Think about it. Everyone's dipping their snouts in the trough. What I'm doing is cutting right through the shit. I don't know you. I wouldn't care if I did. I neither like nor dislike you, but to suit myself, to put things at an easier advantage for me, I'm willing to do for you what lobbyists do for politicians. I'm going to offer you money, and you can be my little representatives. Hell, I'll promote you to senators."

"I have a feeling we might end up like the jailer your son hired, under some tin at a junkyard dump," I said.

"He took the money, but he didn't live up to his end of the bargain. My son picked the kind of guy that was a little too proud of himself and couldn't keep his mouth shut."

"But us, who you've known a few minutes, we're a wise pick?" Manny said.

"I'm picking you, my son isn't. He couldn't pick a rotten cucumber over a ripe one. And just for the record, Alton was on my payroll for some time. Let me add something else while we're having this discussion. Little Miss Nicole has false recollections."

"Could be," I said. "But I think she's closer to the truth than you are. Her tongue is a lot better now. I thought she talked quite convincingly, although I had to listen close. She's already got a written statement in, so even if something happened to her, shit, man, you're sunk."

"In the end, it's her word against mine. And I have a few of my spots picked, so to speak."

"Spots?" I said.

"He means money invested in lawmakers," Manny said. "More crooked cops like Alton."

"You said that, not me. I only hinted that I have friends in high places. Cops are actually on the bottom of the stack. There are others I have in my pockets, and they have more power. I'm merely suggesting we should be friends because it would be in your best interests."

"We are not your friends," Manny said.

"You ought to try to be."

"I was a friend of yours, even a passing acquaintance, I wouldn't like to look at myself in the mirror, see what was in it," I said. "Besides, you just made it perfectly clear no one is worthy of having a friend, because in the end, we're all going to turn on one another if the need arises."

"Mr. Collins, you are just a half-assed private investigator. Surely you see and do some pretty unworthy things from time to time."

"There are lines I don't cross."

"Let me put this in a way that will make sense to both of you. We all have loved ones. Some of them, like my son, who is outside, can be a cross to bear. There are times I think a sack of shit and the brain in that boy's head couldn't be any different, but he is my son. That said, if it comes down to me or him, I'll tell you truly, and I don't know that he knows this, but considering how I've lived my life, he must have some idea…I would throw his ass under the bus, and I would drive the bus over him, then back it up if it was about my survival. My dick still works, and I can find a woman to bear a child. I can make another son, but the empire I've put together, I can't remake so easily. You two, however, being as you're such idealists, might be more considerate of your family, and therefore maybe you truly would try to jump in front of the bus I'm driving to protect them. You do, that bus will run right over you. But if you want to get on the bus, well, hey, I can make room for both of you, and your friends and family too. Hell, bring the dog and cat, a pet goat, I don't give a shit. But it has to come out my way."

I saw where he was going with this. I hoped Brett had decided to leave, to go on to Tyler and take everyone with her. I wished I had been able to call her and verify that. I wished a lot of things right then. I took a deep breath, tried not to show how scared I was. I put a smile on my face. Maybe Keith was right. Maybe it all did come down to situational ethics.

"You didn't put together shit," I said. "You took over this crew and all the money that came with it when the people who had it before got nabbed, killed, or you helped finish them off. You didn't build a goddamn thing. You took in a short time what others spent years building. Not that I have any admiration for those assholes either."

"The ability to take something is important, Mr. Collins. That's called having the wisdom to recognize favorable circumstances. It's called power."

"Is that what it is?" I said.

"I'm giving you both an opportunity. I don't know where Mr. Pine is, but I am giving him the same opportunity. I want it to go well for all of you and the people close to you. That said, you make a different choice, I got to do what I got to do. I mean, hell, I know who you two are, and I know who matters to you."

"Let me give you a note, and you might want to stick this on your refrigerator. My family, you touch them, and I will kill you and everyone who works for you."

He laughed. "That's bold for a fifty-year-old man."

"I'll help him," Manny said. "And let me tell you something. Hap, he's spry."

"This is your one chance to walk out of here instead of what's left of you being washed out with a hose. Let us have Miss Beckman. You don't even know her. She's just a chink white-trash bitch, and I do mean white, who stuck her nose in where she shouldn't have. You want to give up your life for someone you don't know? You don't even have to hand her over, so you won't have that on your conscience. Just leave, and we'll take care of her. You'll find a nice package in the mail in a few days, something substantial inside that will help you forget what happened here…You can say we took you by surprise, put you in a jail cell, then grabbed the girl. We could do that, you know. Put you in a cell so it doesn't look too obvious. There are ways to make this look okay."

"You're not letting us walk," I said. "You're not letting anyone walk. And I couldn't forget doing something like that if I got a million-dollar check weekly and starlets from Hollywood came in daily to hold my balls while I changed pants. I'd rather be dead. Though the starlets would be nice."

"You realize I'm suggesting it could turn out that way, Mr. Collins. Not the starlets. The dead part."

"In the long run, the law will get you," Manny said.

"That is so precious. I keep telling you, the law and justice and the American way goes out the window when money shows up."

"Not for everyone," Manny said.

"People love the power of the law, not the law. Christians don't love Jesus, they love John Wayne. Kindness to the poor and the meek, do you see that happening? Turn the other cheek? And another thing—I can't let small-time assholes like this girl run over me and my family business. I let this go, then others will challenge me. Maybe those others will be a lot better than you two and some split-tail albino. You have to have some standards, you're going to run a business, especially my kind of business."

I glanced at my hand resting on the back of the chair, at my watch. It was just about that time.

If Jordan didn't fuck it up.

"We might be better than you think," I said.

"And you might not," Keith said.

"Listen," I said. "Let me ask you a question. Do you ever wonder what it's like when it goes completely dark?"

"What?" he said.

The generator lights went out.

35

Dead black.

Jordan had done his job, and on time. It was so dark you couldn't see an inch in front of you.

I heard Manny slip out of the chair, and then me and her started for the door, making our way by memory and feel. Shots were blindly fired. I could hear them hit the plasti-glass, but that stubborn stuff held, though it wouldn't for long.

Manny and I ran for it. I tried to charge through the doorway at the back and ran smack into the wall.

I heard Manny fall; I groped around for her, got her up. I reached in my pocket for the flashlight, brought it out, popped it on. We could see the open doorway and went through it. Behind us I heard the plasti-glass crack from more gunfire.

When we were through the door I made sure it was closed tight, put the chair under it, but Manny had a better idea. In the glow of my flashlight, she used the keypad by the door to lock it, then we grabbed up the guns and slickers and hustled toward the exit.

We got to where we could see the door that led to the generator. It was wide open. The flashlight showed no one was in there. Jordan had hauled ass like he was supposed to.

We moved to the other open doorway, one that led into the short hall that extended to the exit. We hurried along, and as we got closer to the end of the hallway, I turned off the flashlight, jammed it in my pocket.

We hit the exit door like a stampeding buffalo herd, and all of a sudden, we were outside in the coal-mine dark, the rain slashing us, the wind blowing our hair, cutting us like cold razor blades. It was so dark we couldn't see the steps under us. We couldn't see the bus. Hell, we couldn't see the parking lot.

“We’ll have to use a light,” Manny said.

I fumbled my long gun to her, and against my better judgment, I got out the flashlight. I turned it on, flicked the light toward the lot so we could see the bus. I got a glimpse of Leonard at the wheel, other shapes behind the wire-net-and-glass windows, and then we were moving swiftly, slipping a little as we went. Water was not so deep there, but it was deep enough to flow over our ankles. It was cold, and it took only a few steps before you could feel it seep into the flesh and chill your bones. It was so unsettling and uncomfortable, I think a polar bear would have taken his chances back inside the cop shop.

“I’m cutting the light,” I said, “keep going straight.”

I cut it. We kept plowing ahead. And then there was a shot. It zipped through the night and slammed into something, but thankfully that something wasn’t us. Next thing we knew, we were running up against the bus, feeling our way around it, making our way to the door. I could hear the bus motor humming, and then I heard the hydraulic door open. There was a dull green light on the dash of the bus, and that made it so we could see. Leonard’s face was softly painted by the light. He smiled green teeth at me.

“Good to see you,” he said.

“Likewise.” I glanced toward the back of the bus. Shapes. Except for Nikki—she was closer to the front—I couldn’t make out anyone.

“Everyone good?” I said.

Everyone agreed they felt good enough, then Jordan said, “Come on, man, let’s go.”

Me and Manny took seats, she behind Leonard, me on the right side not too far from the door. The door hissed closed.

“Grab your asses,” Leonard said. “Here goes.”

With that, he shifted a gear, the bus jumped a little, and away we went, straight for the locked fence gate.

36

Shots were hitting the bus now.

"This thing is reasonably bulletproof," Manny said. "Tires are designed to take small-arms fire. It's built like a tank."

"Let's hope so," Leonard said, then he stomped the gas.

We hit the gate, and bam, I was nearly jolted to the front of the bus, and then I was thrown out of the seat and onto the floor. I hustled myself back into place.

The gate was knocked flat, and we rattled over it, rolling toward what looked like too much water.

Leonard turned right and climbed the hill toward North Street, away from the deep stuff, but water was running down the hill in a silver shine and splashing along the sides of the bus. Leonard turned the headlights on.

In the headlights, the rain on the road looked slick and snotty. It came down fast and looked like a beaded curtain.

We were near the top of the hill when the dump truck Leonard told us about charged out of the alley, its headlights off. It hit the right side of the bus with a sound like the crack of doom.

I heard people flying around in the back of the bus, and I was thrown across the aisle and splayed over the seat where Manny had been sitting and was now lying.

"Goddamn, Hap, get off me," she said.

The bus didn't spin, it just slid on a coating of water. The dump truck kept pushing. Soon we'd be across the street and smacked up against a building.

I grabbed the pole that was near the front of the bus, used it to guide myself back into my seat again, all of this performed as we slid in slow motion, pushed by that dump truck, its tires struggling to maintain traction.

Leonard jerked the wheel to the left, right toward where I feared we would collide, and gave it the gas. The front of the bus went left, and the back of it spun right. The back end of the bus hit the dump truck and made it slide, turned it so that it was facing the way it had come.

“Damn, you do that on purpose?” I said.

“Of course,” he said.

I could tell he was lying.

Leonard turned the bus around as adroitly as a professional stunt-car driver, and that was probably an accident too. He drove the bus left through an alleyway, and it looked like a clean escape, and then, damn, that garbage truck Leonard said had been parked out front of the cop shop with the dump truck was at the end of the alley, shiny white in the bus headlights. I could see that big killer I had shot in the hospital sitting behind the wheel. The way the lights hit him, he looked like an obsidian golem. Keith and his minions had planned ahead, moved the garbage and dump trucks into position to block the exits.

We were speeding toward a head-on collision.

Leonard slammed on the brakes. The bus slipped a little, made us feel like it was on wet grass. And then he was in reverse, gunning it back out of the alley, using the side mirror to plan his path. A precarious thing, since most of what he had for lighting were the now-busted backup lights. The garbage truck’s lights came on, and the truck roared and rattled after us.

“We’re all going to die,” the female dispatcher said.

“Possible,” I heard Manny say.

37

The lights from the garbage truck filled the bus like watery honey. I sat looking backward, the direction we were going. In the lights from the garbage truck, I could see the dispatchers clinging to the backs of the seats in front of them. Someone was praying. The others were cursing. Nikki was quiet, something not so surprising for a lady with a sore tongue. Manny and I joined her in silence. Leonard, inexplicably, had started singing “Mama’s Little Baby Loves Short’nin’ Bread.”

If that wasn’t bad enough, the dump truck was back in the game, and it had turned on its lights and was driving for us, trying to sandwich us between several tons of speeding metal. I was already imagining them finding me with a transmission up my ass, my teeth full of the windshield.

But Leonard had a bit of a lead on them, and he made it out of the alley before the dump truck hit our ass, before the garbage truck plowed our front.

He whipped the bus toward the hill that rose up to North Street and gave it the gas. It got traction easier than expected and started climbing. The dump truck looked certain to clip our ass, but it just missed.

Unfortunately for the dump-truck driver, he couldn’t slow in time to avoid the garbage truck. I looked behind me and saw them ram together, maybe six inches from the back of our ride. It was a hell of a smack and you could hear the brakes grinding on both trucks as they tried unsuccessfully to prevent a collision.

In the bus taillights, I saw the passenger door on the dump truck spring open, and then I caught the driver’s circus act as he was thrown out of the truck by the impact, into the wet street.

I blinked in amazement when he rolled and came up on his feet. It was that little kung fu fucker we had fought in the hospital. He looked devilish in the taillights. I had done martial arts all my life, and I didn't think people like that were for real, just in the movies.

He shot us the finger as we roared away and he disappeared into darkness behind us.

Same to you, I thought.

Leonard was no longer singing. He was whistling the shortening-bread tune.

On up the road we rolled, and then we were on North Street. We turned left, went two streets down, and turned right.

"Where're you going?" Manny said.

"Where am I supposed to be going?"

"Tyler, that's where we need to go now."

"I think I'm going to Hap's house."

"You're out of your mind."

Leonard turned his head sharply, looked at me. "Am I out of my mind, Hap?"

"No, sir, that's exactly where you need to go. I need to be sure they got out."

"Oh," Manny said. "Of course. I don't have a family. Even my dog died."

The bus went along that way and we passed some houses, and then we turned right, hoping we could get back to my place.

We made it all right for a while, and then it was obvious we couldn't continue, not in that bus, not the way we were going. We came to where a house had been destroyed and the wind and rain had pushed much of it into the street. To turn right was to drive into a vast pool of water and risk being stuck, and to go left meant we would be blocked by trees and lumber.

"Goddamn it," I said.

Leonard backed the bus into a driveway, turned it around without letting it slip too far into where water had gathered in an incline, and drove back the way we had come. He turned right, hit University, turned left on it. The road was open where it had been closed to us before, and where it had been open to us, now there were trees and cars and wooden debris. The water park and its water slides were gone.

Leonard made a few false starts, took a variety of roads, wove the bus through all manner of messes, ran over people's yards where they were clear, and finally made it to my place.

When we got there, Leonard sprang the door open, and I leaped out and ran toward the dark house. As I neared, using my flashlight, I noted that most of the roof was gone and a tree from somewhere, a large tree, had gone through the right side of the house like a spear.

I was going to use my key, but the door wasn't locked. I went in fast, the flashlight in my left hand, my right holding the pistol.

I called everyone's name, including Buffy's.

No one came.

I ran up the stairs with the light bobbing in front of me, and when I got to the top I pushed into our bedroom. The bed had collapsed under some fallen roof timbers, and the room was wet and smelled bad. I could see the dark sky through the hole in the roof and I could hear the wind and the rain. The world had gone to hell in a wet handbasket.

I checked the other rooms upstairs. They were intact. I went downstairs, shone the light around, saw the kitchen window had been knocked out by something. Air whistled through it like wind in a cave. It was then that I saw there was a note on the table, held down by a salt shaker.

I put the flashlight on it.

It said: You know where, baby. Love, Brett

I did know where. The first hotel or motel in Tyler that took dogs and was near the mall and Half Price Books. They had slipped away in time. I breathed a sigh of relief, shivered, and then I was okay. I went out to the bus.

38

We passed the one and only real hotel in LaBorde, saw there were some dim lights inside, most likely from a weak generator. Leonard pulled over there. We let out the dispatchers and the nurse. Manny and I got off with them, went inside, leaving Leonard at the wheel and Nikki still in her seat.

We weren't letting her out of our sight.

We found a clerk sitting behind a desk. The only light there was a small lamp on the side of the long desk. The nurse and the dispatchers bunched up close to us. Our shoes made little puddles and mud marks on the tile.

"Bad night," said the clerk. He was a young black man with a tight haircut, a tight necktie, and a condom-tight suit. He looked a little excited in the lamplight.

"Police," Manny said, and pulled out her badge. She gave the clerk some info, but didn't give him all the juice. The clerk explained they only had an old backup generator working. The facilities were inadequate. No elevator. No lights in the hallway. Limited light in the rooms. No room service, as if he thought we might be planning to order coffee and pie.

"It'll do," Manny said. "Bill the department."

We spoke in a comforting manner to the dispatchers and the nurse, told them to sit tight until they got word to leave.

The clerk started sorting out room keys.

"We should go," Manny said.

"Good luck," the female dispatcher said.

"Yeah," Jordan said. "Good luck."

"You done good with that generator," I said.

"I just flicked a switch."

“Still,” I said, “you done good.”

“I really should stay with you,” the nurse said. “The girl is my patient.”

“I don’t think that’s best,” Manny said. “We’ll take care of her.”

The nurse hesitated. I could tell she was torn between duty and common sense. “Here,” the nurse said, opened her purse and gave me a couple bottles of pills. “I brought these with me. She needs this one about every four hours. The other, well, twice a day.”

I took the pills and slipped them in my windbreaker pocket.

Manny said to the clerk, “Hey, you got a hotel van?”

“We do,” the clerk said.

“You better put that on the bill too.”

39

Nikki and I rode together in the courtesy van from the hotel, following the big white bus with Leonard and Manny on it.

"What are we doing?" Nikki said.

It surprised me when she spoke. She hadn't in a while. "We're going to ditch the bus, which is what they're looking for, try to get you to Tyler, to the cops there, some medical attention."

"Will that be any safer?"

"We'll be with you," I said.

"He may have paid someone off. That's what the Keiths do."

"Not all cops are like that."

"Only takes one."

"We're going to see that you're protected. Manny will be there too. You're her duty, and we're making you ours."

"I am such an idiot. I believed Pretty Boy, and I should have known better. No. That's a lie. I did know better. I wanted some adventure, a bad boy. Was that stupid?"

"Yes."

She made a kind of snicker sound. "Yeah. It was. What's with women and bad boys?"

"I have no idea. What is with them?"

"I had such a strange growing-up. My parents, they were fine, but me being albino, kids at school, they didn't know what to do with that. And there have been some health issues, and there was no sunbathing or swimming during the day, and during the summer I didn't go to camp… is this starting to sound like a poor-me rant?"

"A little."

"Yeah, I know. Everyone has a story."

"Where you are now is due to bad choices, Nikki, but it's not your fault that Pretty Boy turned out to be a big shit and a coward. I got a list of bad choices, girl. I have a lot of blood on my hands."

"Some of it was for me."

"A lot of it is for other reasons. I'm all the things I never meant to be. You got a chance now to move on, to get in a better groove. This is your break."

"You bet I'm going to try. But Keith—all the energy and resources being put out to kill me, doesn't make sense. I've already given enough evidence to get them in trouble even if I am killed. What's the point?"

"It's not all about you," I said. "It's about Keith's pride, about who's the big boss, and with the weather like it is, I think he feels more powerful, a real renegade. It's like the apocalypse, and it's everyone for themselves. Thing is, though, he's scared."

"Scared?"

"His big show of power is about hanging on to the spot he's got. Had his druthers, LaBorde would look like Juarez at the height of the drug war. Kind of guy that would decapitate folks and hang bodies off bridges and from trees. Knew some of the guys in the Dixie Mafia before him. They were trouble too. But they were mostly low-profile. It's Keith's posturing that will do him in. Or he'll run up against someone he can't handle."

"I hope so," she said. "I better be quiet. My tongue is swelling."

I drove with one hand and used the other to fish out one of her bottles of pills. "Can you swallow like a chicken, without water?"

"Yeah."

I gave her the bottle. "One pill," I said.

She took one out and gave me the bottle back. I put it back in my slicker pocket.

"I can't explain to you how grateful I am to you and Leonard. That's right, isn't it? Leonard. Manny told me, but I'm not sure I remember it right."

"Yeah, and just in case you don't know for sure, when it comes to me, I'm Hap."

"You didn't have to help me."

"Yes, we did."

Ahead of us, Leonard turned up a big hill with dark apartments perched on it, drove around a curve and then along a wooded road that was right in the middle of LaBorde. It looked like a country lane.

He pulled over to the side of the road and parked the bus so it was leaning toward a ditch.

He and Manny got out on the ditch side without falling into it, eased their way to us, and climbed into the van.

“Take us to Tyler,” Leonard said. “And don’t spare the horses.”

“Yes, boss,” I said.

40

It seemed simple enough, and I was starting to feel encouraged. All we had to do was drive to Tyler. Keith and his men weren't looking for a white van. We had already reached North Street again, and the path was clear enough to navigate. There were few lights on along the street, and everything was quiet and still. No other cars were on the road.

I checked the rearview mirror. Nope. No one was following us.

We rode on out until we were at the end of LaBorde, near where the old abandoned LaBorde Bowling Center was. We passed it and drove up a rise in the highway and came down on the other side, and there was a disaster.

There had been a bad pileup of trucks and there was a dead cow in the road. Trees that must have been two hundred years old had been uprooted by the wind and the rain and thrown into the pile of dead bovine and twisted metal.

We parked the van, and me and Leonard got out in the rain, left Manny with Nikki. The rain had slowed and the wind was mild for a change, but we still weren't much encouraged. We walked around and looked in the trucks, poking around with my flashlight, but there was no one there. It was obvious this had all happened some time back, maybe yesterday afternoon or last night, and whoever had been here had either walked off or been taken by ambulance to the hospital. At this point, there were probably no ambulances running, or they were running in a limited way. There was no way to call a wrecker to have this stuff moved. No way to do much of anything. And as far as the police went, well, the entirety of the available Laborde Police Department was behind us in a van.

I felt odd right then, how prehistoric man must have felt when the night came and storms stirred up. The edge of the road was mostly forest, but it looked like a black wall, except at the top where the trees sighed in the wind and the sky was a little fainter, but if the rain came back and the wind picked up, then it would be solid black up there too, like being inside a bag of shadows.

“You okay?” Leonard said.

“No.”

“Me either.”

“The bowling center,” I said.

“What?”

“We hole up there, park the van around back, wait until daybreak. Maybe the repair crews will open up the road, some cops can come into work.”

“In the old science fiction movies, they always called in the National Guard or the army.”

“That’ll work too,” I said.

“You know, it might even be the best plan. I don’t know about you, but I feel like I was whupped with a knotted plow line, buried in a bucket of shit, and brought back to life with a shot of electricity. I got the coffee jitters but at the same time I feel like I could lie down on broken glass and sleep.”

“Yeah. I’m getting a little weak, not to mention hungry.”

“Me too. My stomach thinks my throat’s cut.”

We went back to the van and told Manny our plan, which she eagerly agreed to. Truth was, we were all starting to slow down as the fear and excitement wore off. We drove back to the bowling center and parked behind it.

It was huge. There had not only been a bowling alley there but also a place for games, and there had been upstairs apartments where the owners lived.

The back door was locked, of course, and neither Leonard nor I had our lock picks with us. We had misplaced them along the way.

“Shall we kick it in?” Manny said.

I got a straight tire iron out of the back of the van and went over and stuck it into the edge of the door, worked it a little, and popped the door loose. Everyone but me went inside. I went back to the van and pulled it up against the door sideways, so I could open the door, squeeze a bit, and step into the bowling alley. When I was inside, I closed the van door and then the bowling-alley door and hoped the van door would be a bit of a barrier if it came down to it.

Right then, though, I felt snug and safe and thought it was highly unlikely Keith and his minions would find us. I felt that by that point, we'd shaken them.

Manny was bouncing her flashlight beam around the bowling alley, and the place was massive. I got my own light out, started moving it about. The bowling alley had been closed for at least ten years, and for a couple of years, there was talk that it would be reopened. A For Sale sign went up, but no one bit. There was a rumor that a fellow was going to buy it and turn it into a skating rink, but that never happened. The potential buyer probably decided if people didn't come to bowl, they wouldn't come to skate.

The air had been stirred by our arrival, and in the beam of the flashlights we could see dust moving, and the wood lanes were a muted gold, and the balls in the racks at the head of the alleys looked like little boulders.

I shone my light down one of the lanes, and I could see some bowling pins turned over inside the open troughs where the balls fell through. The pin rack was halfway down, but it hadn't picked up any pins, and I could almost hear bowling balls smacking them, like the story of Rip Van Winkle, where he discovered the old men in the mountains playing ninepins.

In the other direction, there was a long row of seats in front of the alleys, and there were a dozen alleys, and there were honey-colored couches where you could recline while waiting your turn to bowl. Behind those was a short wall, and you could see over that to a long rack of small shelves where you picked up bowling shoes. There were still shoes in those shelves, covered in dust and linked by cobwebs. There was a stairway next to the rack that led to the second floor.

I flashed my light on the stairway that went up, then turned left and out of sight behind a wall. There was a long row of windows above the stairs, and it was broken up by some wood frames at eight-foot intervals all the way across, and it was like that over the shoe counter and all along the top of the bowling alley, and the windows ran on two sides. That way the managers could be upstairs and look down on the alley through the long row of windows and make sure no one was walking off with bowling shoes or a bowling ball while they had gone upstairs to grab a sandwich or use the toilet.

Leonard came out of a doorless room next to the pin racks with his cell phone light on.

We all went in there for a look, and there were still snacks inside the machines. Leonard used his windbreaker sleeve to wipe the dust off the glass of the closest machine so we could see inside more clearly.

"Jesus," Manny said, "that stuff is as old as Methuselah's grandpa."

"I was hoping for a Twinkie," Leonard said. "They say those last forever, all the preservatives in them. I'm about ready to look for mice to eat."

"That you could probably find," Manny said, "and fresh, but that stuff in the machines, I wouldn't suggest trying it, otherwise you might end up blowing out your bowels."

With food out of the picture, we went upstairs and moved the lights around. It was spacious up there, and there were several rooms, and there was a toilet, but it didn't have any water connected to it, so that wasn't going to be a plus, and worse yet, just seeing it made me want to pee or take a dump.

After looking in all the rooms, we went down and gravitated without a word toward the couches. We laid our long guns on the floor in front of them.

Nikki stretched out on one of the couches, and when she did, the dust from it stirred up and spun in my flashlight beam. Manny stretched out on another, and me and Leonard sat for a bit, and then suddenly I felt all fired up again, got up, and went to where I could walk behind the lanes and look at the racks for the bowling pins. Leonard came with me. We are adventurers.

"You thinking about trying a vending-machine snack anyway," he said.

"Too much work to break into one," I said. "And I'm not so hungry I'm willing to chance it."

"Yep. You know, I bowled here a couple of times. Did you know this is where you could meet men if you were gay?"

"I bet it's where heterosexuals could meet folks too," I said.

"You know, you're probably right. Sometimes I wish life were simple like back then."

"You mean when you had separate water fountains and toilets?"

"No. After that. When I could come here."

"I'm not so sure those days were the sweet spot we make them in memory."

"You might be right," Leonard said.

We got bored and tired all over again, and we bold adventurers went back to the spare couches, chose one apiece, stretched out. I was asleep so fast, I don't really remember putting my head against the dusty backrest of the couch.

41

I wasn't out long before the wind woke me up. The rain was coming down hard again too. I could hear it running through the roof somewhere, dripping into the bowling alley.

I had gone from a dead sleep to being wide awake, and right now that wind and that rain seemed to be the only sounds in the world. I got up with my light and discovered that near the wide front doors, just over them on the inside, there was a leak. The ceiling had been taking a weather beating for a long time, and the rain was slipping in and running onto the floor, and the floor had warped slightly and that part of the place smelled of mildew and what I assumed from experience was rat turds.

I hadn't seen that leak when I was on the second floor. That seemed real important to me right then, like maybe I was surveying property I intended to buy. I guessed it had been leaking through the roof above the shower and draining along the edges of the shower, breaking open the ceiling over time. A few more years and that whole section would come down.

I thought I should try to go back to sleep, but then I heard something outside that wasn't the wind and the rain but a loud growling sound. I went to the wire-mesh window on one side of the door and looked out. There was a row of lights on top of something moving toward the bowling center.

It was coming up the long drive toward the bowling alley, splashing through the rain. I could tell the way the lights were set and the way it moved that it was the vehicle Leonard had described after looking out the front door of the cop shop. It came to a stop about fifty feet from the front door.

But how had they found us?

"Hey," I called out as I turned off my flashlight. "The assholes are here."

It took me a couple of calls to wake Manny and Leonard up, but when they were awake, they got their long guns and came over and stood near me and looked out the window.

Nikki didn't have a gun, but she came over too. I was glad I had forgotten to give her one of those pills that would knock her out. It was best we were all alert now.

"How the hell?" Leonard said.

And then the walkie clipped to Manny's belt squawked.

"Ah, shit," Manny said.

She pulled the walkie off her belt, touched a button, and a voice said, "You know, I have a tracker in the walkie-talkies to make sure I have all my men in place. I got the gear to track you without having to do anything other than climb inside my truck. This thing has a nice movie screen, impossibly comfortable seats, a winch, this bullhorn, and the nice spotlights you are currently experiencing. It even has a wet bar. Fact is, right now I'm sipping a glass of premium scotch. Anyway, I know you're in there. Look, send snow girl out, and we'll make it quick for her, and the rest of you, we let you go."

Manny clicked the walkie. "We been through this."

"Yeah," said Keith's voice. "I know you know I'm bullshitting you, but I wanted to see what would happen. I thought maybe you had turned stupid."

"Look, we're going to be generous," Manny said. "If you surrender to us now, no one gets hurt."

We could hear Keith laugh.

Manny dropped the walkie-talkie on the floor and put her foot on it and it snapped into pieces.

"Sort of figured he wasn't going to surrender," she said.

Now came a loudspeaker voice from a device attached to the security vehicle. It was louder than the walkie-talkie, and it was Keith laughing at us. He didn't say a word, just laughed like an idiot, and then there was silence.

"Seen too many James Bond films," Leonard said.

While we watched through the long glass window, the door to the vehicle opened on the right side, and a big man got out. He was the big black man who had been driving the garbage truck. He had a long gun of some sort. He was the man I had shot. He was a black Hulk. All he needed to do then was say "Me smash."

A moment later an SUV pulled up behind the security vehicle and five shapes got out of it. I couldn't make out any of them, really.

"See Kung Fu Bobby out there?" Leonard said.

"There's one guy smaller than the others, I think that's him."

"Yeah, could be," Leonard said. "What is that motherfucker, a cat? Ought to be in some kind of circus act or trying out for the Olympics or something."

"Maybe you can rep him?"

"Think I could make him and me a lot of money."

I saw the big black man raise his weapon. "Quick," I said. "Step away."

And step we did. The glass beside the door burst apart and the wire woven inside the glass was twisted. The bullet smacked something in the background but, fortunately, none of us.

We hurried to the couches. I'm not sure why, but it had suddenly become our gathering point.

I said, "They'll be coming in, and pretty quick. Maybe the front door, maybe the back, probably both. They'll hook the winch on that truck out there to the van and pull it away. It'll be easy."

"Upstairs," Manny said.

"I don't love that idea," Leonard said.

"Until you got a better one, I'm taking Nikki up there with me. I might be able to hold them off better from that position."

"Oh God," Nikki said.

"I'm going to do my best to protect you," Manny said.

"Her best is damn good," I said.

Nikki nodded, but she was beginning to tremble.

Manny headed for the stairs, Nikki following, Leonard and me pulling up the rear. When we got to where the stairs turned, me and Leonard stopped. I said, "I'll stay here at the corner, see if I can hold them a bit. Maybe you can find a way out up there."

"Yeah, we'll just turn ourselves to water and slip down the drain. Shit, Hap, we get up there, we might as well bend over and kiss our asses good-bye. Or there's always the roof. We might find a hole somewhere leads up there, but then they can climb up and shoot at us until they hit something."

"I'm sorry to say I'm not exactly full of fresh ideas."

"I got one," Leonard said. "You stay here, and I'll go down and get behind the pin racks, take a position in an opening. They might not expect that, and it'll give me some cover."

“You know I should do that, not you.”

“Why is that?”

“Because you can’t shoot like me. I need to catch the first ones in.”

Leonard sighed.

“Shit, you’re probably right. Hate it when you’re right. I’ll stay here at the stairs, maybe we can get them in a cross fire or some such.”

“Just don’t get me in that cross fire. I’ll be the handsome white man hiding in one of the pin openings. I want to stay handsome and alive.”

“You ain’t handsome.”

“Then let’s just make sure I stay alive.”

Manny came back down the stairs. “What the hell, boys?”

I told her.

She gave Leonard her long gun. “You’ll need this, and I’ll take your handgun to add to mine, maybe give one to Nikki. It might come to that.”

Leonard gave it to her. I reached for my handgun.

“Keep it,” Manny said. “I think you might need a lot of ammunition.” She gave me some of her ammunition to go with the long gun, and Leonard gave me some of his; all the sets matched. I had automatic rifles and a shotgun and a pistol now. If I only had crossing bandoliers.

“I’ll try to barricade upstairs, protect Nikki,” Manny said. “But that will leave you out here, Leonard.”

“I’d rather be where I can see Hap.”

“All right.”

“If you can get out with Nikki, get out,” I said.

“Believe me, I’d have no trouble leaving your asses behind, but I’m not sure there’s a way out. Nice knowing you boys.”

“Same to you,” I said.

Manny went back up and I slipped down the stairs and skulked to one of the wooden lanes and went down it with my body bent. I slid in on my side where a bowling-pin drop was open, wiggled on through.

When I was in the path behind where the pins were racked, I tracked along the openings back there, found one I thought best, one where I could see the front door. They came through the back door, they had to come along the side of the alley, and since I was in the center, eventually I would see them as they came forward. And Leonard would have them right in line for a shot.

I looked and saw Leonard’s shadow at the place where the stairs turned, and then his shadow slipped out of view behind the wall. I took a deep breath to calm my nerves a little, but it was the kind of calm that wouldn’t last, and the air tasted like the dust from a mummy’s shroud.

The truck lights went away and left the windows at the front of the bowling center dark, and then I heard that big damn truck rolling along the side of the building, and then it was at the back. A 747 could have landed with less noise than that mechanical beast.

And then I heard the sound of the winch out back being snapped into place, and then I heard it pulling the van away from the door, as I suspected they would do, and then the front door cracked and turned my attention there as wind and rain spilled into the room.

Someone was trying to be clever and push it open in the dark slowly, but I saw it.

I saw it all right.

But nothing happened, not right away. Damn, they were coming from both ends of the building, and soon the place would be swarming with them.

I took a deep breath, told myself, “I still live,” using the mantra of one of my favorite childhood fictional heroes, John Carter of Mars.

Things began to slow and I felt fear crawling along my spine like a centipede. I was tired and I was dealing with a lot of assholes, and I wasn't sure I could handle it from all angles, even if I had a fair view of everything. I placed the gun on the alley beneath the pin rack and waited. My hands were sweating and I felt warm, even though the air wasn't all that humid.

In fact, the front door was wide open now, and the wind and rain were coming inside, and it was a cool wind, I guess, but I sure wasn't cool. My blood was boiling with fearful anticipation. I thought: I have killed before, and I can do it again, and maybe I can do it too easily. All these goddamn guns, and all these bad places I put myself into, and no matter how I justified it, I was a goddamn killer. I had crossed the line a long time ago, and you can't uncross that line, and that's what's scary.

I wiped my damp hands on my pants, picked up the long gun.

I saw a shadow slip through the door, a shadow with an automatic rifle, I presumed. I had him in my sight, and I eased the trigger slowly as I gently let out my breath. I can't describe why I can shoot like I can, but I've always had the knack. I learned early on how to shoot, but there was nothing classical about it. I didn't really care for guns at all, but if you put one in my hand, it was like a natural extension. Where I pointed, I could quite often hit, and right then I was pointing at that shadow, and as my breath was eased and the trigger was pulled, I saw the top of the shadow, where the head was, become a black swarm like bees flying out from their hive. The shape collapsed in a heap to the floor and the shadowy swarm splattered against the wall.

And then the back door was slung open, and though I couldn't quite see it, I could hear them coming through. Three or four steps in, they would be visible if I angled myself a little, but now others were coming through the front door, and they were firing in my direction. I wasn't sure if they saw me or had seen the gunfire, but now I held the trigger down and let the sparks fly, filling that doorway with hot destruction.

I figured they had a plan to get me busy on one end, then take me from the other, but I knew Leonard was facing the back door from the stairwell, so I decided to forget about the back door, concentrate on the front.

There was fire from the stairway toward the back door, and the firing was loud. Leonard was at work.

I emptied a clip, and while I was reloading one of those Manny had given me, I dropped down behind the alley for protection, and when I did, splinters from the alley floor in front of the loading rack were knocked up by wild shots. Some of the splinters sprayed me. One of them stuck in my cheek, another in my forehead.

I crawled along the floor with my weapons, holding the long gun, the pistols shoved into my coat pockets. I was pushing the shotgun before me. All those shells in my pockets made me feel as heavy as a bag of bricks.

I inched down two lanes, came up there, poked the rifle through, let loose again. This time I caught someone coming in the front door, probably thinking he was safe, that I was pinned down and couldn't shoot.

He was wrong.

I cut him across the groin with one sweep, across the neck with another as he dropped to a knee. I thought I saw some sparks against his chest, where shots had hit his protective vest. The shooter fell over against the headless shadow already there, and I could hear him moaning, and it was a sickening sound. I wanted to shoot him again just to shut him up but knew I should save the ammunition. That guy, alive or not, was fucked, and good, and he was no longer a threat.

Leonard was breaking it down, shooting fast, flooding the back door like a fireman watering flames. After a moment, the firing stopped. It was clear Leonard had driven them back. I heard him click in a new clip.

We hadn't been as easy as they'd thought, not the way we were positioned. They thought we were cake, and we were poison.

Come on, motherfuckers, come on back, run at it again.

I felt the fire rising up in me. I felt the thing I feared about myself most. A kind of anger that could surface and make me red-hot and madly savage or coldly efficient; sometimes, it was a little of both. It was a thing that squirmed in the primitive part of my brain. It came loose a little too easy, but right then, I needed it. I was down to survival, not philosophy.

I didn't know how much was in the new clip, because the first one went pretty fast. I had held the trigger down on that one, like my finger was glued to it. I decided I had to be more careful. The shotgun was near me and I had the handguns. They were backup, but my best bet right then was the military-style weapon from the cop-shop armory.

I dropped back out of sight, my ears open for any sound. After a moment, it was all too much, and I slipped up for a peek.

No one was moving. The moaning was still going on. And then there was a burst and a bright burn of gunfire stitched across the night and the moaner was put out of his misery. They had killed their own killer.

That was one way to do it. At least it was quiet for a moment.

I knew one thing: Mercy from them was not an option, not if they cleaned up their wounded like that. I had a feeling when it came down to us it wouldn't be that quick. No way. Wilson Keith was a vengeful asshole. He was going to make it as miserable for us as he could manage.

I was trying not to breathe too loudly, but my breath was still a little ragged. It felt as if it were climbing out of my lungs wearing a sandpaper suit.

Leonard opened up again, fire jumping from his position. I heard the sound of hot lead smacking flesh and bone.

And then there was a ramming noise and the back wall moved, and then there was a crashing sound, and some of the ceiling came down behind me.

Keith's vehicle had slammed into the back door of the bowling alley, pushed forward, and stopped. I could see the nose of it. The tires rotated savagely. Keith's killer machine was stuck; it had broken the doorway apart, but the back end had hung up somehow. I could tell that by the black smoke wafting up from the front tires. There was a cracking sound, and the vehicle edged in a little more, its headlights bright, its row of lights on the roof brighter. The tires grabbed the floor and the truck broke completely free of the wall and came charging into the room like a bull looking to gore a matador.

A window was down on the driver's side, and a long gun was hanging out of it, and it was firing in Leonard's direction. Leonard jumped behind the wall, out of sight. The truck stopped and the driver got out holding his weapon.

It wasn't Keith. It was the big black guy.

The weapon in his hand looked like something out of a science fiction movie. He was crouched and ready, but he wasn't firing.

Then there was a loud blast followed by a crash and a tinkling of glass. The light from the vehicle was so bright that even though the big man was not in front of it, I could still see him clearly in its spreading glow, and in that moment, when the glass fell from on high, the top of the big man's head split wide open and his knees folded and he hit the floor with one leg twisted behind him in a way no one could naturally make his legs go, not even that kung fu son of a bitch, wherever he was.

I glanced up. I saw Manny briefly, she having been the one who'd made the shot that shattered the glass upstairs and split the big guy's head wide open. She darted into the shadows with her gun in her hand. The gunfire from the other side of the vehicle that was sprayed up there was way too late. They had lost one of their best men, and Manny was still an active shooter.

During all the confusion, with the glass shattering, Leonard had moved off the stairs and behind the low wall near the couches. There was a gap there so bowlers could make their way to the bathroom, get better shoes, or cross over to the vending-machine room. I discovered he was there because suddenly he was firing from that position, and whoever was at the vehicle wasn't firing back.

Leonard crossed from his spot toward the vehicle. At the same time, two people came through the front door; one went right, the other left. I shot the one on the left as cleanly as if he had been nailed to the floor waiting for it; it was another head shot. Like us, they all wore vests. Bullets we had might penetrate those, but I wasn't taking any chances now. I was no longer a butcher. I was a surgeon.

The one on the right was coming up behind Leonard, ducking along the low wall. I wanted to yell out at Leonard but didn't. I didn't want to alert the guy to where I was, because it was my guess he didn't know I was there. Seeing Leonard was just too much for him, like a hound after a rabbit. Worse, I couldn't see Leonard anymore, but I was pretty sure the shooter would be able to see him near the vehicle that had broken through the wall. Wherever our bad guy lifted up from behind the wall to fire at Leonard, I had to be ready. I began to sweat like a goat at a barbecue.

That's when there was another shot from upstairs. More glass rained down and I saw a rifle fly up from behind the short wall and knew Manny had nailed him.

Bless you, Manny.

I crawled through the opening in the pin rack, pushing the rifle in front of me, pulling the shotgun behind me.

I heard shots where Leonard had gone, near the vehicle, and I went there, discarding the rifle and carrying the shotgun with me, anticipating close work. When I got there, a dead woman was on the floor, the one I had seen with Keith back at the police station. Her face had been moved from left to right, or maybe it was right to left; it was such a mess, you couldn't really tell.

Leonard was standing there, looking pretty calm considering the circumstances.

"Okay?" I said.

"Yep," Leonard said. "You?"

"So far, but I may need you to wipe my ass later."

We were looking around all the time, watching for Keith or any remaining minions. I'm sure we both expected Kung Fu Bobby to show up eventually. I plucked the splinters from my face and flicked them away. I was trembling a little. I no longer felt warm. Now I could feel the cold air and it made me cold, and the wind from outside was ruffling my hair like an excited girlfriend.

I opened the door on the vehicle and looked inside. There was no one there. The motor was running and it was warm inside with the heater on, and the overhead light was bright enough you could damn near see the air crawl. There was a scoped rifle of some sort in the seat, and I had never seen such a weapon. It was silver in color and the stock was thick and the scope on it looked large and cumbersome, but when I picked the gun up, it was as light as a poor man's wallet. I took a moment to look through the scope. It was a nightscope and you could see shapes clearly in it, though all of them looked slightly alien and gold-colored.

I kept the rifle and leaned the shotgun against the truck, closed the door. We each took a side of the vehicle and made our way through the debris it had created when it slammed through the wall. Outside, in the wind and the rain, we didn't see anyone. I pulled the hood up on my slicker, and the rain rattled against it. Then we heard the SUV out front start up. We rushed back inside, and we could see headlights shine in through the open front door, and the lights began to move away, like two small, bright moons falling off a cliff. The SUV was backing out of the drive, down the rise of the road.

Now we knew where Kung Fu Bobby and Keith were. They were hightailing it out of there.

“Jump in,” Leonard said.

He rushed back to the armored vehicle, climbed in behind the wheel. I was about to climb in on the passenger side when I looked up and saw Manny standing at the edge of where the glass wall had been. Nikki was beside her. They were both holding handguns.

“Get him,” Manny said.

I got in, carrying the rifle I had taken and the shotgun too. Leonard backed us out with the vehicle making a lion-like roar, taking some of the remaining back door and wall with it for a few yards, and then he turned the wheel to the left, and away we went, around the back of the bowling center, around the side of it, and down the driveway, which had already been navigated by the SUV.

When we reached the highway, we knew which way they had gone, because the road to Tyler was blocked. Unless they had managed to come up with a cloak of invisibility or the SUV had the ability to fly away into the wet, windy blackness of night, they had to have headed back toward LaBorde.

Leonard yelled out, “Giddyup, Scout.”

The security vehicle had swift and powerful windshield wipers. They slapped the rain away with the speed of a hummingbird's wings. The lights were phenomenal, cutting through the wet dark effortlessly. Our roaring ride began to catch up with the black SUV, its taillights revealed in our head beams.

A moment later we were riding their ass. Leonard bumped them lightly, then hit them harder. The SUV began to spin, and the wet streets made it worse. Leonard slowed, and the SUV wobbled to the side of the road as a tire blew and then it went skipping left toward a deep roadside ditch and a line of dark trees that were in front of a fenced-in pasture. I could see clearly because the morning light was beginning to slip through the sky.

The SUV's tires shed rubber like a snakeskin, and the rubber slammed against the windshield of our stolen killer machine and flapped away without so much as leaving a mark.

We had passed the SUV by then; it had stopped when it jumped the ditch, went off into the trees, and smacked against a big sweet gum. It had turned sideways, but not before a door had come open and dumped the contents of people out of it as fast as shit flying out a diarrheic goose.

Leonard stopped slowly, then turned Scout—as I now affectionately thought of the armored vehicle—around and headed back where the SUV had gone off into the line of trees.

He pulled to the side of the road and angled Scout a little so that the headlights and the overhead spots illuminated the scene.

We could see both Keith and Kung Fu Bobby climbing up out of the water-filled ditch. Kung Fu Bobby was up and gone into the woods so fast, I wasn't even sure I had seen him. Keith had lost his hat and ran out of steam. He clutched at the far side of the ditch, but the mud came away in his hands and he slid backward like a slug on teflon.

It was a deep ditch. The rushing water in it came up to his waist and it was moving him around. He caught hold of some roots sticking out of the side of the ditch and clung to them.

I pulled the rifle off the seat, and we got out. Leonard had the shotgun with him. I climbed on top of Scout's cab. I looked through the scope at the tops of the trees, and then I stood up on the cab and looked some more. I could see the trees and the fence and the field from up there, and the scope outlined Kung Fu Bobby climbing between the wires of the barbed-wire fence, then running like a goddamn cheetah across that field.

The wind was stout, and it was all I could do to stand there and not be blown off. I could feel it lashing my hair, so I knew from which direction it was coming and in which direction it would push my bullet. I judged the speed of the wind instinctively, guessed about how fast it would move my shot. I had killed others this night, and before, but this was different. I was homing in on a living human that couldn't harm me now and who was running away and had his back to me.

I hesitated.

And then I took a deep breath and kept Kung Fu Bobby outlined in the scope. I pulled my aim a little to the right, accommodating the blowing of the wind, and elevated the barrel slightly. I slowly let out my breath and gently tugged on the trigger. Kung Fu Bobby looked like part of a video game in the scope and that bothered me even more.

He tried to kill you and Leonard and Nikki, I told myself. He would kill you now if he thought he had the advantage. He might have been the one that killed the lady in the hospital. He certainly helped make it possible. He may be human, but he lacks humanity.

I told myself this as I looked through the scope, the very essence of inhumanity to man on my mind. I was surprised when the shot fired. The sound of it startled me a little, like when the proctologist finally sticks his greased finger up your ass.

I had missed. I had misjudged the rain and the wind. The shot carried past him and hit on his left side and I could see a small jump of dirt in the scope. I pushed my shot a little farther right. He was getting close to the barbed-wire fence on the far side, another line of trees. I had only a few seconds.

Still, take your time, I told myself. Don't get in a hurry.

I lifted the barrel slightly higher. I could barely see him in the scope, as I was having to give up so much of his view for the wind and the carrying of the bullet.

Once again, when the rifle fired, I was startled, but this time I saw Kung Fu Bobby stagger a little, go to one knee, come up again. By now he had reached the barbed-wire fence. He was slipping between two strands of it when he quit moving and collapsed on the bottom strand, like an oversize bird on a telephone wire. He lay still, his arms and legs dangling, and then he rolled off the wire toward the tree line. Only his left foot was still on the wire.

I took a deep breath, tried not to congratulate myself on being an efficient killer. I climbed down from the roof of the truck, went down the side of the road to the edge of the ditch.

Leonard was squatted there. He had laid the shotgun across his knees. I could hear Keith talking when I came up.

"There's no reason you should have won that firefight," he said. "None."

"Ain't life funny," Leonard said. "Reason we won is our secret weapon. Right, Hap?"

"That's right," I said. "We used the elephant of surprise."

"Listen here. I could use boys like you. And I mean for front work, lots of money."

"Do you have dental in your plan?" I said.

"Listen, now, I'm making a serious offer."

"And I'm going to give you a serious answer," Leonard said. "First part of that answer is you've done bad to a lot of people, and I'm sure you'll do more bad if I give you the chance. And the rest of the answer is even more simple: I see that gun you're reaching for."

Keith had been reaching, talking, distracting, looking for his moment, and he'd thought he had us.

Leonard swiveled the shotgun off his knees, and, still squatting, he shot Keith in the head, taking most of it away. Keith's gun fell out of his hands and into the water, and then Keith slipped down the slope and was caught up in a clog of brush for a moment. The flowing water moved the brush away from him, and he eased the rest of the way down. His body tumbled over a couple of times due to the power of the water, and then hung up in some exposed roots on the side of the ditch and stayed there, his feet swaying in the water but going nowhere. Parts of his head on the side of the ditch dripped down too. I could see this clearly because the sun was coming up red as a plum, and the wind was beginning to blow out and the rain went with it.

When we got back to the side of the road, a figure came crawling out of the damaged SUV. It surprised us. We thought everyone inside had been thrown out. He stood and put his hands up.

"Hey, guys, don't shoot. I don't want nothing to do with this shit anymore." His hair was washed down over his forehead and he looked as pathetic as a drowning rat.

"You've decided to retire a little late," I said.

"I'm Larry Keith. Law wants me. For God's sake, take me to the law. Don't shoot me. Please don't shoot."

Leonard studied him. "Why not?"

"Because I want to talk. I want to tell everything I know about my father and his work. I want a deal. Was one of those shots…him?"

"Yep," Leonard said.

Larry looked toward the ditch. I doubted he could see his old man from that angle, but he looked for a long moment anyway.

"I didn't even like him and he didn't really like me, and still I feel bad. Good God. We used to go to the zoo."

"I hope you got to see the monkeys," Leonard said, "because you won't be going to the zoo again anytime soon. You'll be living in one."

The way Larry stood there, the way his head was hung, his wet hair in his face, his hands lifted, I felt bad for him. There was no reason to feel that way, but I did. Right then I felt bad about everything.

We found some rope in the back of the truck, tied Larry up with it, loaded him in the vehicle, bound him to the passenger seat. Leonard drove him and us back to the bowling center.

As we went, the red sun rose higher, and the thin mist in the trees began to melt. I saw birds flying over the tops of the trees, and before we had gone far, the red sun became gold, and the sky was absent of clouds and had turned a bright baby-blanket blue.

45

I felt sad about Kung Fu Bobby, more than the others, until they went out to get his body and he wasn't there. That helped me out, in a way, because I didn't have to explain shooting him as he was running away. Not to anyone, even myself.

They looked where I'd said he was, and then they looked in the tree line and beyond, but they didn't find him. He hadn't got up wounded and wandered off and died. They didn't find any blood.

I knew then I had missed twice. Unusual for me. Maybe in the back of my mind I meant to miss. And maybe it was the rain and the wind. I don't know. But Kung Fu Bobby had fooled me, had taken a dive into that fence, and, in his acrobatic way, he had been convincing.

He was out there somewhere.

Larry Keith turned out to be a big ol' blabbermouth and he told everything, admitted he saw the murder of Pretty Boy but tried to distance himself from it, like it wasn't his idea at all, that he was just an observer, not the one who pulled the trigger. He knew singing loud and clear might give him a reduced sentence. It wasn't all that reduced. Twenty years. Not what he deserved, but what he got.

Nikki, when her tongue was well, gave her testimony, and if Old Man Keith had been alive, he'd have gotten the death penalty. Well, he got it anyway.

Leonard and I were cleared of any charges. Manny made us out to be heroes, and I guess we were. I hope we were. Thinking of it that way helps me sleep at night.

LaBorde was devastated by the storm. Downtown had stood pretty well, but along the streets and out in the country, the hurricane winds, the tornado spin-offs, and the high water had destroyed a lot.

We got declared a national disaster area, and already the town is rebuilding. That's the Texas way. We might have our faults, but we can get shit done if someone throws a barbecue with it.

Leonard's apartment fared fine, and so did our office, though the bicycle shop below us was washed out. Somewhere a large perch is riding a ten-speed.

Mine and Brett's house was easy enough to repair, and we had that done right away, thanks to the insurance, and after a few months had passed and Kung Fu Bobby hadn't shown up, I decided he had moved on. Practical. He wasn't the kind of guy, at least in my estimation, to stick to an agenda that wasn't paying. His loyalty was to the hire, not the man. I wondered where he was right then, what he was thinking. Probably learning to leap tall buildings in a single bound.

Wondering doesn't give much in the way of results, though. Months later I would still be wondering, though with less frequency.

Nikki came out fine, and when our house was repaired, we had a house-repair party, and she was invited. She came over wearing a wide-brimmed hat, a pretty yellow dress dotted with blue flowers, little tennis shoes as white as snow.

It was a bright day and cold, and we had cooked all morning. We had enough food to feed the proverbial army, and we had an army coming over. Besides Nikki, we had Hanson, minus his wife, who hated us, and we had Manny and Cason Statler, and there was Pookie, Chance, Reba, and Buffy the Dog, wearing a red-and-white neckerchief and new dog tags, and there was Leonard, of course.

The food was pulled pork and greens and cabbage, and there were hot dogs and hamburgers, fried chicken, dips and chips, and drinks of all kinds. And primarily for Leonard, there was banana pudding with vanilla cookies mixed into it. It was the one dish Reba had made.

We pushed the couch and the furniture in the living room aside, and in the kitchen, we added a foldout table and chairs, and at around two p.m. we attacked the food.

There was lots of talk and laughter, and that helped the storm and the killing seem distant and long gone and unlikely again. Manny said the city was giving me and Leonard some kind of award for helping law enforcement in a unique time of need. That was about as surprising as discovering a thousand-dollar bill in one of my socks.

Reba was really taken with Nikki's whiteness. She said, "You white as I am black."

Nikki stared at her, said, "But I burn easy and I'm not as pretty as you."

The color of Reba's skin didn't allow us to see her blush, but we could sure sense it in the way her eyes fell and her head turned.

"I ain't pretty."

"Yes, you are. But you might think about working on your hair a bit. I can help you with that later, if you like."

"I don't know."

"It's no trouble."

"You know about my kind of hair?"

"I might surprise you with what I know about hair of all sorts."

"Maybe," Reba said. "Where you get that hat?"

"Goodwill."

"Nah, you didn't."

"Did."

"Be damn. Looks like it high-end."

"It was at one time. But at Goodwill, it was my price."

When the talk became repetitive, Brett, beautiful in jeans and a black T-shirt and red slip-on shoes, pushed her long red hair back and bound it, turned on the CD player, put one on and others to follow.

"Runaround Sue" by Dion came up first, and Brett held out her hand to me while swaying her hips from side to side. It was an invitation impossible to ignore. I came in from the kitchen and took her hand.

She said, "Hap, let's dance, baby."

I used to dance well, but I didn't do it much anymore. But right then that music was beautiful and stirring, and I began to dance, and my body became loose and easy. I told myself I would never pick up a gun again. I would never get involved with anything where I might be hurt or I might hurt someone else. It wasn't the first time I had spoken to myself that way.

Brett dropped my hand and came in close and we rolled our shoulders and swung our hips, touched noses, then moved back and let the music take us.

Reba laughed, but then she and Nikki were out there with us, dancing together, clowning a little. Cason and Manny joined in, followed by Pookie and Leonard.

Leonard proved once again that the idea that all black men can dance is a myth. He had the rhythm of a broken clock. But Pookie, now, he had it, man. He could move.

Hanson kept his seat and clapped his hands to the beat.

Brett signaled to him, did it a couple of times. Hanson got up and came over. She grabbed his shirt and pulled him close and the three of us danced until Hanson’s bad leg sent him back to his chair.

More old music followed, the Beach Boys, early Beatles, Buddy Holly, the Sun hits of Johnny Cash, all the gods of rhythm and blues, rockabilly, and rock ’n’ roll. Brett turned it up.

As we danced, the day began to fade and the night began to crawl and the room turned dark.

Hanson turned on the lights. We all stopped and ate some more, had some coffee while some slow ones played, and then we were back at it when the fast ones came, dancing like fools. We did that tirelessly, late into the night, constantly replacing played-out sounds with unplayed sounds, and at some point, for no reason I could determine, there were tears in my eyes, running down my cheeks.

I looked at Brett and smiled, and she smiled back.

Even a blind pig finds an acorn now and then.

—Old proverb

Sometimes the truth wears an overcoat and a pulled-down hat, and therefore cannot be completely seen.

—Jerzy Fitzgerald

Wait a minute, now. You’re saying you want us to deal with a pig problem?” Leonard said.

We were sitting in the agency office, just me and Leonard along with an economy-size woman in a colorful flower-patterned muumuu and house shoes. She looked as if she might take a bite out of your ear. She had thick and bright false teeth and in my view wasn’t afraid to use them.

“It’s a hog. Sizable. Keeps attacking the family,” the woman said. “My kids, three of them. Another one, Sharoline, doesn’t live at home, so she’s pig-free. I hardly knew her father. I was pretty wild once. Used to drink a lot. But that’s a different story, and you don’t want to hear about that.”

She paused, perhaps hoping we did want to hear about it, but we offered no encouragement. I found a fly on Brett’s desk to watch. The moment passed for her story. The fly had had its moment as well and flew off.

She said, “All the kids are afraid of Porky. That’s what we named him. One time, Porky humped my leg like a dog. I had to let him finish because he wouldn’t let go. He was kind of soothed afterward, so I was able to escape with a wet leg and all of me still intact. Big as he is, wonder he didn’t push me down. But he’s quite agile and can stand on his hind hooves. He was more of a shoat then. He put on some weight since that lovesick moment. I bet that son of a bitch tops out at four hundred pounds. He still gives me the love eye when he catches me hurrying from the house to the pickup.

“The kids go to catch the school bus or come home on it, they got to run like wild horses to keep Porky from getting to them. Goddamn bastard ate my daughter’s cat, Tulip. And that cat was sizable and a scrapper. Seen Tulip whip a good-sized dog once. But that hog ate old Tulip like she was an ear of corn. Sometimes, to get the kids on the bus, Baby Darling, my youngest girl, owner of the cat, also the fastest of the kids even though she’s short-legged, will put herself out there first and run around the house, old Porky following. That gives the other kids time to run to the bus, and then Baby Darling will beat it to the bus just before the driver closes the door. She’s a brave little scamp."

"Lady, we're a private detective agency, not swine management," I said. "There's got to be someone else to talk to. American Pig Patrol or something. Besides, how much are you willing to pay for Leonard here to catch that pig and throw him in the can?"

"Leonard?" Leonard said. "I'm not catching no damn pig. If Jim Bob Luke was here, he'd catch him. He used to raise those things. He could teach it to drive you to work."

"He's not here, and he's retired from the pig business," I said.

"I have a little disability pension," she said. "I work cleaning houses, but it's not a daily job."

"Hog capture is not really our bailiwick," I said.

"So, no help?" the woman said. "Me and my kids have to live in terror from the neighbors' hog?"

"Officially," Leonard said, "I don't work here no more."

"You talked to the neighbors about it?" I said.

"Yep. Called the sheriff's department too. Sheriff's deputy came out and tried to herd it back into its pen, but he wasn't much of a herd dog. He got pulled in the mud and bitten. Understand he filed a suit against the hog's owners, the Planters—who are cousins of mine, by the way—but no action was taken that I know of. Like me, the sheriff is a cousin to the Planters, so he's a cousin to me. He's more closely related to the Planter family tree than I am. I don't know if he's a branch of it or a root. I think had he known the call came in from me, he wouldn't have done anything on account of that. I figure they've interbred enough, one could take a shit for the other. The other thing is we don't live close enough to the city limits for the city cops to take the matter in hand."

"The Planters being your cousins," I said, "couldn't they just do you a solid? Put the hog up."

"And they live next door?" Leonard said. "What are the odds?"

"It isn't because we feel great warmth toward one another. They're cousins quite a few times removed. I haven't got any pull with them. I'd just like to get the hog corralled and penned up and the pen made stouter. Planters are like a bunch of hillbillies from a cartoon. That hog goes in their house, and they let it. It don't bother them none. One time, I looked out my kitchen window, and my window's close enough to their house I could see through their big ol' living-room window. There they were on the couch watching TV, and that big-ass hog was sitting on the floor by them. For them it's a house pet. For us, it's a pork chop terror."

"Was the show they were watching Green Acres?" I asked.

"What?" she said.

"Never mind."

"I don't see how this is anyone's job but the Planters'," Leonard said.

The woman tapped her pocketbook on her leg. "I got two hundred dollars if you nab it, three hundred if you kill it. If you kill the neighbors or their kid, I can come up with something more, but I don't want it to look like I was involved."

"Damn," Leonard said. "The rural life is even more savage than I remember."

"Hell, we aren't all that rural," she said. "We live on the edge of town. Sit on the porch at night slapping mosquitoes, and we can see the lights from LaBorde. Or we used to sit. That hog roaming around, we stay tight inside now, look out the window to note if we can make a run for our transportation. Come on. Help a lady out. You pigging it up or not?"

I thought, Grab a pig, take two hundred. Do not pass Go.

Me and Leonard had grown up country boys and had been around a few pigs, some by birth, some by personal transformation, so we weren't without some experience in the matter.

I looked at Leonard.

Leonard looked away, adopted an expression that indicated he had heavy thoughts on his mind that had nothing to do with pig hustling.

"Oh, all right," I said. "But we're just nabbing the hog, not killing anyone. And that includes Porky."

"We?" Leonard said.

"I was just funning about all that killing," she said. "I just want it caught and put up, maybe sent to a good pig school or something."

I got the feeling she hadn't been funning.

She told us a little more about Porky and her situation. We took her name, Belinda Grant, got information and locations, took her check, and set about getting ropes at my house for pig-nabbing.

In my garage, while I was coiling the ropes over my shoulder, Leonard said, "What kind of low have we dipped to?"

"Brett Sawyer Investigations and Swine Control," I said. "I mean, hell, Leonard. We got nothing else going on, and with Brett gone for a while, we got to find something. Pay the bills, you know."

"Last gig got us enough money that we could hire someone to pay the bills."

"But we won't. That would be lazy."

"I'm okay with lazy," Leonard said.

"We took that woman's money, and I bet that was lunch money for her kids."

"You took it. I didn't. I never said I'd do shit."

"What'd she say? She had four children?"

“I wasn’t the one fucking her, so I’m short on feeling sorry for her,” Leonard said. “That many kids, little heathens ought to strip naked, put on some war paint, get some rocks and two-by-fours, hunt that hog down themselves. That’d save two hundred dollars and they’d have a nice supper. They wanted, they could sell some of the meat. I could give them a sauce recipe. Shit. Another idea is human sacrifice might appease it. A kid a day for three days to appease the hog gods. If they could get the grown kid home, Belinda could offer her up as well.”

I just looked at him. “Don’t do that, Hap.”

“Do what?”

“You know what.”

“Do not.”

“Look at me like I’m a heartless asshole.”

“If the asshole fits.”

Technically, Leonard no longer worked for the agency. He was teaching martial arts and boxing at a health club downtown, but Brett had talked him into sticking around part-time for another six months so she could decide if she needed to hire help when he left.

I was cherishing the remaining six months, even if he still worked at the health club some days and on the weekends.

He told me he was given a chance to buy the club and was seriously thinking about it. He wanted me to come in with him, be a kind of martial arts coach. He said when age caught up with me, which he felt was dwelling on my front porch already, I could maybe sort towels or some such.

It wasn't the worst idea in the world, but I didn't want to abandon Brett. I had to do a lot of thinking on that offered job. Brett was not only my boss, she was my wife.

Belinda told us the hog came out late afternoons and early mornings most of the time, but she also said Porky didn't wear a watch and could show up most anytime he took the notion. One time in the middle of the night she said she went outside to sit on the glider and take in the night air, and when she looked off to her left, there was Porky, partly in shadow, just eyeing her with a kind of "Surprise, motherfucker" attitude. She had to hustle back into the house. She could hear Porky climbing the steps and then the next thing she heard was him snuffling at the front door, like he could get her scent and suck her under the door, out of her house, and into his mouth.

We put the rope in Leonard's pickup, then we went inside and changed into work clothes. Leonard keeps some clothes at mine and Brett's house from when he lived there. He was already wearing a pair of lace-up boots, and he had a straw hat in the truck. The hat had a purple band with a short yellow feather in it. For some reason, he pushed the brim of it up in front.

Morning was gone, so we planned for the afternoon. We went to lunch at a hamburger joint, then drove over.

As we were riding in Leonard's truck, he said, "Someone always has to fuck it up for the rest of us country folk by fitting a cliché. Belinda could be central casting for The Beverly Hillbillies or Li'l Abner."

"I fit some of those clichés," I said. "Some of my relatives fit those clichés, and some didn't. You and I have risen above our clichés and are on our way to Nirvana."

"I do like fried chicken necks and greens cooked with bacon, though. I don't want to lose those stereotypes."

"And I can tear some crispy pork skins up," I said.

Both of us tried to eat better these days, but my mouth watered thinking about fried necks and pork skins. Greens without grease and bacon was a little too close to eating weeds. Grease and bacon rind fixed them up. Fixed that way, they tasted as if they came from the Garden of Allah. Also, it takes grease to make a turd.

It was a nice spring day and the houses and cars we saw were coated with a patina of yellow pollen. There were woods, but they were cut wide in spots, interrupting what should have been a solid strip of greenery. Still, the trees and the sky, blue with clouds as puffy and fine as the breasts of Hera, were soothing.

I had plenty to soothe. Leonard and I had spoken of it a bit, the loss of our friend Hanson, murdered before our eyes, shot by Kung Fu Bobby while floating in cold water, us spared by hiding behind moss and trees. Saying it out loud about him being murdered and it being partly our fault had only made it hurt worse, so we didn't talk about it anymore. At least not much.

There wasn't a thing we could have done, but it didn't always feel that way. Rachel, Hanson's wife, had been murdered at their home; they were starting a new life. He had retired from law enforcement, but his killers feared he might know something we could use to find them.

We found them. Vanilla Ride took care of Kung Fu Bobby, kicked him around like an empty cardboard box. The rest of them didn't survive either. One, Purple Eyes, might have gotten away or might be rotting somewhere in the Colorado woods. She took some damage. Literally ran off a cliff.

Bad fall, baby. Bad fall.

But we didn't see her body, so the possibility of her escape was tucked into the back of my mind along with all the horrid dreams of people I had killed in service of justice as I saw it.

Leonard wasn't bothered. His code was simple: Did they belong in this world? Were they dangerous? Did they plan to hurt people and would they? The answer to all those simple questions was yes, but a simple answer didn't touch well on my feelings about having become a killer. It got easier as I went. I satisfied myself enough most of the time knowing I saved lives, including my own, but taking a life from someone is the ultimate. I felt there were some people who deserved to die, but I wasn't happy that me and Leonard had become judge, jury, and executioner.

This was why something simple like capturing a hog seemed worthwhile. Wash away some of the nastiness of last winter with hog slop. It beat the idea of washing it away with blood.

As a side note: We hadn't been invited to Hanson and Rachel's funeral. Their family didn't care for us.

I didn't blame them.

When we found Belinda's house, it was extremely close to another with a large front window that took up half the house. That house had been nice once, but time and occupants had mistreated it. I assumed it belonged to the Planters, Porky's parents and Belinda's cousins. Belinda hadn't been exaggerating about being able to easily look from her window into their living room.

Today, however, the Planters' living-room curtain was pulled, and the blinds were down in Belinda's kitchen. There was a shabby slab-lumber pen between the houses, and part of it was broken down and spilling into Belinda's yard. There was a sizable storage shed not too far behind the pen almost tumbling into a creek.

Both small houses were coated with pollen, making them glow gold in the sunlight. Some of the pollen had blown up on the front porches of the houses, and lying facedown on the steps of the Grant house in a powder pool of it was Belinda. McDonald's bags were shredded all around her. Drink containers were draining their contents into the ground. The door to a car that might once have been blue was wide open. There were some French fries trailing from it to the disaster on the porch.

"Damn," Leonard said, and he was out of the truck.

We ran up to the porch. Belinda's head was bleeding and she had wounds on her arms and blood seeping through her muumuu and running down the steps. Leonard got her head lifted. She opened her eyes and looked at him.

"Porky ate my goddamn breakfast," she said.

"And a bit of you, it looks like," Leonard said.

"Got me in the hock and on the arm," she said. "A stray dog ran by and Porky let me go and went after it. That dog saved my life. I hope he can run fast. Damn, where in hell did you get that hat, fellow?"

"I forget," Leonard said.

We helped her to a sitting position.

"Better get us in the house before he eats us all," she said. "That bastard don't even leave bones."

We helped her to the door after Leonard recovered a sack of food that looked unmolested. I opened the door and we guided her inside. As I was about to close the door, I looked back and saw what looked like a hippopotamus rushing us at no less than the speed of a bullet.

We barely got inside and slammed the door before Porky hit it with a thud like a cannonball.

I glanced out the window by the door. It had been a hell of an impact. He had rolled off the porch and was now on his back kicking his short legs in the air, squealing. Then he rolled onto his feet and, in an insane burst of angry energy, took off running around the house and out of sight.

"Now you know my concern," Belinda said, standing at the kitchen sink, pressing a towel to her head. The kitchen was really just an open extension of the living room. No doorway, just a wide gap.

"I'll say," I said. "Are the Planters home?"

"They come home about five most of the time, but that's not set in stone. They have a wrecker business, but that isn't all of their business. They got some illegal things going on, you can count on it. You can hear them coming in that goddamn wrecker from a mile away. Sounds like a train that's got a cold or some such. It's smoky too. I thought three or four times it was on fire, but no such luck."

"Reckon all that was left of your lunch is this bag of fries," Leonard said. "Hog stepped on the sack, but they look all right. Out in the yard, I saw a couple of Big Mac containers, maybe part of a burger left in one, but I wouldn't recommend it."

"Maybe I'll take a look at it later, when or if I feel it's safe. So what are you boys gonna do?"

"I recommend we shoot it, and tell the Planters next door that God shot him," Leonard said.

"Think that would work?" she said. She sounded like she thought it might be a viable tactic. She might have hit her head harder than I'd thought.

I went to the kitchen window and looked out. Porky came whistling by, darted around the corner of the house, and was gone. I waited a few seconds, and he appeared again, still galloping at full speed, circling like a hyper–pork shark.

"He is not slowing down," I said.

"Raised around livestock, never seen anything similar," Belinda said.

I tried to come up with our next move. While I did, I looked around the small house. It had quite a few shelves with knickknacks: colored glass angels and little statuettes of gnomes and bears and deer and such. There was even a big souvenir back scratcher on the wall. It had a thick wooden handle with a slightly bent long metal rod poking out of it, and the scratcher had elongated prongs on it. It could have been used to comb briars out of an alpaca’s fur. Burned into the handle were the words “Hot Springs, Arkansas.”

“Ropes are in the truck,” I said.

“I’m not going out there,” Leonard said.

“We can’t stop him if we don’t make an effort.”

“This isn’t Hatari,” Leonard said.

“You got my two hundred dollars,” Belinda said.

“We can give it back,” Leonard said.

“He bit me on the leg,” she said. “Ain’t bad, but could have been. My arm got a nip too.”

By this time Belinda had found a soft chair and was eating the fries.

“Come on, man,” I said to Leonard. “We can’t leave her to this.”

“I’ve got a revolver in the glove box. You should shoot it. You don’t miss.”

“Sometimes I do.”

“Not often.”

I paused for thought. “I say we let it wear itself out, then sneak out and get the ropes and try and capture him. I don’t like shooting a poor critter. How would you feel to come home and find out your pet four-hundred-pound hog was shot and dead?”

“Relieved,” Leonard said.

I'm not sure how many rounds Porky made, but his speed didn't slow until his last lap. He edged around the house and out of sight. I went and looked out all the windows. That wasn't hard; it was a small house.

Out the bedroom window I could see that he was lying on his side in an existing wallow, breathing heavily. He looked like a beached whale.

I called Leonard and he came and looked.

"I think you can slip out now, get the ropes," I said.

"Who can slip out and get the ropes? Hell, man. He could be fooling. It could be a trick."

"He's a hog," I said.

"He might be a smart motherfucker. Hogs are smart."

"Not that smart…I don't think."

"You find out how smart he is," Leonard said, "I'll be here waiting on you. Get the gun."

I slipped out the front door and eased over to the truck, got the ropes out of the bed, and slung them over my head and shoulder. I went around and tried to gently open the passenger door, but it creaked. I heard a hog grunt from the other side of the house.

I took the revolver out of the glove box. It was small enough it fit into my front pocket. Gun that small and small of caliber might not be any use against our hippopotamus. When I was little, I used to call it a hippy-potty-mouse. The thought came to me and rattled around in my head like a BB in a boxcar.

Focus, Hap. Focus.

I began to slip back to the house. When I stepped on the top step, it made a sound like a mouse squealing. I heard the grunt again, opened the front door, and so help me Smokey Bear and all his rangers if that hog didn't appear suddenly on the right side of the porch. And if I'm lying, I'm dying—that meaty monster leaped onto it. I wouldn't have thought he could have gained that height if he had the power of levitation and a gyrocopter.

I beat him inside, slammed the door.

I said, "Okay. We're ready."

Leonard was looking out the side window. “Shit. I’m not going out there. You couldn’t haul me out there chained to a hand truck.”

Then I heard a rustling on the porch, and damn if that hog didn’t drive his head through the window glass next to the front door, causing Leonard to jump back.

Belinda, accustomed to hog fighting, came forward with a broom and whacked the hog on the head a few times; it was little more than a scalp massage to that impossible monster. He was tossing saliva from his mouth left and right as he jerked his head. What was left of the window glass was falling out of the frame like solid rain.

“Gun,” Leonard said.

No sooner had Leonard said it, then the hog pulled his head away.

“I don’t want to shoot him,” I said.

“That’s okay,” Leonard said. “I’ll do it even if you are the better shot. I’ll be glad to do it.”

“What we do,” I said, “is we wait until he wears down again, then we sneak up on him, loop his head with one rope, a leg with the other, pull both ends tight, then sort of yank him sideways toward the pen.”

“Which is broken down, mastermind,” Leonard said.

“I think there’s another way. I’ll raise the window so he can easily stick his head through. I’ll loop his neck. You go out the door and slip the other rope over a back leg. We’ll pull him your way. I think the window is high and wide enough I can step through after him when you get him going. We pull him to the truck, tie him off to it, fix the pen, and waltz him into it.”

“That sounds like a really bad idea.”

“It does sound stupid,” Belinda said.

“We keep the rope taut. I used this method years ago with a friend of mine who raised hogs.”

“How many years ago?” Leonard said.

“I was in my twenties. It broke out of its pen. It was a bad hog, too, though nothing like this one. This one is just plain weird.”

“Did it work?” Leonard asked.

“Ended up shooting it,” I said. “But I think it can work.”

“There’s some confidence,” Leonard said.

“I’m wiser now,” I said.

“So I’m pulling him toward me, and you’re following.” Leonard shook his head. “I don’t know, man.”

“I’ll switch with you. You take the head and I’ll take the leg.”

“You boys are crazy,” Belinda said. “I should have just shot it. Thought you boys could handle it.”

“Why didn’t you shoot it in the first place?” Leonard asked.

“It’s not like me and the neighbors, my cousins, get along that well as it is. Besides, I don’t have a gun. Kids and all.”

“You got anything a hog likes to eat?” I asked Belinda. “Besides us.”

“The man with the plan,” Leonard said.

Belinda took a thick slice of coconut cake out of the refrigerator. She gave it to me on a paper plate. It looked store-bought and maybe old enough to be hazardous. I went to the window with the cake. I had my rope on the floor next to me. Leonard had his rope coiled in his hands and stood by the door with it slightly cracked open.

If the hog stuck his head through the window, I would offer him the cake, rope him, and Leonard would rush outside and rope Porky's nearest hind leg. Then he would hurry toward the truck, pulling, trying to tumble Porky off the porch, and I would follow. Then we would get him sideways between us, and waltz him out to the truck. Tie him off to it.

"Everybody's got a plan until it don't work," Leonard said. "Tell you right now, that hog's smarter than you are."

"We'll see about that," I said.

"You might ought to listen to Leonard, hon," Belinda said. "I'm beginning to think Porky might be smarter than all of us."

Porky was no longer running in circles around the house. He was ambling, having decided he was the new sheriff in town. As he came up to the porch steps, I yelled out at him.

"Come on, Porky, you ignorant pig. Come get me, stupid."

Beady eyes focused on me. They looked like little gun barrels loaded with hate.

I said, "Uh-oh."

By the door, Leonard said, "Why 'uh-oh'?"

Belinda had already decamped to the bedroom. I heard the closet door in there close.

Porky was practically rolling up the squeaky steps, hitting the porch boards with a cracking sound, and then he came right through the window into the house. The window frame came loose and was around his head. I was knocked back on my ass, covered in coconut cake, holding a forearm against his throat. It was like trying to raise the Titanic with a two-by-four for a lever.

Leonard tried to grab his hind leg. That saved me. He turned on Leonard.

"Run, brother, run!" I said.

Leonard was off at a gallop, his rope clutched in his hands. Couches, chairs, and the kitchen table were toppled as Porky rushed after him, losing the window frame around his neck in the process.

Leonard hiked a foot up on the kitchen sink and clambered onto the top of the fridge, and let me tell you, that was a tight fit. He had to lie across it, his legs jutting out. Porky jumped at him, rocked the fridge, then rose on his hind legs and leaned against it. His snout almost reached Leonard. Porky did a little hop back and forth on his hind legs as if he were doing an ancient swine war dance.

"When you have time, Hap, ol' hoss, get your goddamn ass over here and help me."

As Leonard said that, he dropped the rope over Porky's head and pulled on it. This caused a squealing loud enough that the window over the sink shook. Porky danced more vigorously than before, and the cabinet doors swung open and dishes fell out of the shelves and smashed on the floor. Knickknacks were dislodged from shelves and fell and shattered on the floor. The back scratcher slid under my feet.

I grabbed Porky's hind leg as he was dancing a step, hooked the rope over it. Porky launched himself backward, knocked me down, bowled over me. It wasn't quite as bad as having a truck roll over me. I was able to get up. I tried dragging Porky with the rope. He took off. This, of course, jerked poor Leonard off the fridge and into the counter. But he still clung to the rope.

"Awww," he said, then the power of the hog pulled him around the counter and across the floor. One side of his straw hat was crushed.

We both had Porky, but we damn sure didn't have him between us or in any kind of way that was helpful. Our ropes might as well have been kite strings.

I was able to hold him long enough for Leonard to stand up. Then Porky was on me. His impact knocked me across the floor—I slid on that slice of coconut cake—and against the front door, which he banged open, then tumbled down the steps. This meant Leonard, not a quitter, still clutching the rope, was jerked over me. He slid on his belly across the porch and was pulled into the yard.

I heard him say, "Shit."

By this time, I had let go of the rope.

Realizing the cowboy-roping plan wasn't working, Leonard sprang to his feet and made a mad dash around the house.

I got to my knees, edged down to the porch steps, sat, inched the pistol from my pocket.

And here came Leonard, leading into the homestretch minus his hat, but Porky, formerly and presently hatless, was moving to the outside, dragging ropes. That wily hog looked sure to overtake him.

If I were a betting man, I would have bet on the hog.

I got to my feet just as Leonard ran for the pickup. He jumped inside of the truck bed. Porky rose up on his hind legs and leaned into the bed, trying to scramble himself inside.

Leonard bravely reached under Porky's neck and grabbed the rope that was over Porky's head. I stuck the pistol back in my pocket, ran, and grabbed the rope on Porky's leg. When I ran, it felt like someone was shaking a martini inside me. Porky had probably bruised a rib.

I tugged on the rope. Porky turned and went after me, jerking Leonard out of the truck as easily as lifting a minnow out of the water with hook and fishing line.

It took some real work, but Leonard clung to the rope and, after sliding along a bit, was able to get to his feet. I clung to my rope, and eventually, just missing some hog bites, we got him between us and sideways and walked him back to the truck. I slipped my end of the rope around the trailer hitch and tied it off, and Leonard hooked his over the front tire and axle, pulled it tight, and secured it.

We wobbled over to a spot on the ground and sat and watched Porky froth at the mouth and effortlessly shake the pickup.

“Poor Porky,” I said.

“Damn, Hap, that fucker is crazy.”

“I think we don’t say ‘crazy’ anymore. It’s offensive. I think what we say is something more medical, though for the life of me I can’t remember it.”

“Fuck you.”

“That’s not it.”

We went into the house. Belinda was sitting in the only chair left intact. It was a big fluffy thing with the ugliest pattern that could possibly be created. She was a sad lump in a muumuu. She was crying. She had placed her false teeth in her lap.

I felt sorry for her in a deep way. I had sort of looked down on her that day she came into the office. The reason was simple: I was having a bad day and she represented a lot from my past. Except for a few twists in life, there was a good chance both Leonard and I could still be in that place, stuck working day labor and so on. Now I had a home, insurance, a dental plan, and some serious money. As well as a fine wife.

Her mass of broken cheap furniture and shattered knickknacks hadn’t been worth much from a money standpoint, but for her, they’d been a rise in position equal to that of a billionaire buying his first Maserati.

My guess is she didn’t have insurance of any kind. It would take a long time to replace the stuff she had lost. Even if she did most of her shopping at a thrift store and boosted furniture that folks put on the curb for garbage pickup.

“That two hundred dollars cost me a lot,” she said. She looked around. “Damn near everything I have is smashed up.”

“Bathroom and your bedroom are untouched,” Leonard said as if that might cheer her up.

“That bedroom is for all of us. Youngest sleeps with me, another at the foot of the bed, the other on a pallet on the floor.”

“You get the two hundred back,” I said. “And another thing, I’ll buy you all new and better furniture. Give you some money to pick out other things you might want.”

For the first time in my life, I could do that sort of thing for others.

Leonard said, “We’ll both pay. And we’ll clean up here after we fix the pen and put Porky away. We might get him into some kind of job program or some such.”

Belinda lifted her head, fitted in her dentures. She looked at us like we were Tooth Fairies.

“You’d do that for me?”

“Yeah,” I said. “We will.”

“I don’t mean the job program for Porky,” she said.

“No,” Leonard said. “The rest of it.”

“Hap,” she said. “You got coconut cake on the seat of your pants.”

“I know,” I said.

Leonard drove into town to get a hammer and nails. I gave Porky a head of lettuce from Belinda’s refrigerator. It was blackened in spots. Porky didn’t mind. He ate it with a vicious chomp.

He had calmed down considerably. Something odd about that. He wasn’t a wild boar. He was a domesticated hog, mixed Yorkshire, Hampshire, Duroc. A real blood-and-bone of a domestic hog. Yet for a while, he had been as nutty as a squirrel’s winter storage.

When Leonard got back, we realized the remaining boards on the side of the pen that Porky had broken out of were in terrible shape and not recyclable as part of the pen. We didn’t want to spend the rest of the day running to town, so Leonard used the hammer to beat the storage shed’s door open, then knocked the door off its hinges.

“Porky’s parents are going to be mad,” I said.

“Fuck ’em.”

He brought the door over and took hold of one end. He put some nails in his teeth and put one in place with his left hand as he used his palm to hold the door. I kept my end tight and even.

Leonard drove a nail swiftly, then another. He came down on my end and put in two more. He gave me the hammer.

“Now finish it up.”

I got some nails and reinforced Leonard’s work. Now the door filled most of the gap. There were still weak spots in the pen, but that door was solidly in place as part of the pen’s wall.

Leonard went into the storage building and ripped some boards out of the wall with the hammer, and I carried them out.

We nailed them tight in the weak spots and made the pen solid. The swinging gate with a latch was a little feeble, so we tore more boards out and placed them in such a way as to strengthen it.

More boards were needed, and this time I was the scrounger. I moved toward the rear of the shed where it had been dark but was now illuminated by the light coming through the gaps in the walls Leonard had made.

There was a long table back there. There were jars and heating devices and a whole lot of cold medications in a cardboard box by the table. There were chemicals in bottles and an electric cookstove plugged into a floor outlet. There was an old-style tin-shade lamp hanging down on a precarious cord with a chain pull. I pulled the chain. The light came on and lit up a spot about the size of a dinner platter. The table had burn scars on it.

I grabbed my phone and took a photo. It was dark. I pulled some more boards off the shed wall and more light came in. I took the photos again. When I finished, I put the phone in my pocket.

“Leonard, I’ve found a meth lab.”

I called the sheriff, but I also called the LaBorde police and spoke to the chief, a guy named Justin who was a recent addition. We weren't friends, but me and Leonard had helped him on a matter he would never admit to.

He owed us one and probably feared we might tell what we had done and that it might put some stink on him. We wouldn't have said anything, but he didn't know that. It's nice to have a hole card.

While we waited for the bastions of the law to arrive, we got our rope ends untied from the trailer hitch and the axle, and, with Porky between us, we waltzed him into the pen, whipped off the ropes, and closed the gate. He found a muddy wallow right away and rolled in it. He lay there silent and still as boulder. We knew now why Porky was so manic—somehow, he had gotten some of that meth. I wouldn't put it past his family to have shared it with him.

Leonard pulled a large bag of hog feed out of the back of the truck and flung it over his shoulder. He went to the side of Porky's fence, hung the bag over the top rail, used his pocketknife to cut it open, and let the pellets fall into the trough below it.

"Nice of you to pick Porky up some chow," I said.

"Isn't it? Sooey," Leonard said.

Porky slapped his curly tail once in the mud but didn't get up. It was a kind of save-it-for-later message.

The sheriff arrived first. He looked like a sea turtle had died under his shirt. His feet splayed to the sides in cheap cowboy boots, and his hat was the nicest-looking thing about him. White and crisp with a brown band. He looked like a guy who had once been handsome, about the time the last mammoth died off.

When Leonard saw him and noted his hat, he said, "Shit. Lost my hat."

I assumed it was somewhere on the runner's path he and Porky had created.

Another sheriff's car pulled up and two deputies got out. They wore similar outfits as their boss without the sea turtle under them. They looked just smart enough not to shit in the street.

The sheriff came over and looked at us. "I'm Sheriff Doolin."

“You have a nice hat,” Leonard said.

“Thank you. Well, sirs, you called?”

“We did.” I gave him our names. “Did you know your cousin has a meth lab in that shed? You are cousins, right?”

He looked a little pale.

“What happened to the goddamn shed? Looks like beavers been at it.”

“Industrious beavers, I assure you,” Leonard said.

“That door on that pen come off that shed, didn’t it?” the sheriff said.

“It took some work to get it loose, but yes,” Leonard said. “I may have bumped my thumb with the hammer once.”

“Are you trying to be a smart-ass?”

“I don’t think so, though I don’t have to try that hard.”

“Fuck the shitty shack,” I said. “There’s a meth lab in it.”

I told him the whole story about the hog, how I thought he had been methed up. He said, “Nah, Porky is just a bit hyper.”

“A bit?” I said. “He ran so fast, he almost traveled through time. Hyper, my ass. He was high on the crap in that shed.”

“Let me have a look at that,” the sheriff said.

The sheriff went inside what was left of the shack. After a moment he came out. He looked at one of his deputies. “Get rid of all that shit.”

“You mean take it into evidence,” I said.

“Yeah,” he said, “that’s what I mean.”

I didn’t think that’s what he meant. The deputies brought the stuff out, making numerous trips, and put it in the trunk of their car.

“That doesn’t seem like the proper way to handle evidence,” I said.

“What the fuck do you know about it?”

A LaBorde police car pulled up slowly and parked. Chief David Justin got out of the car on the passenger side. He looked tall, dark, and handsome and just a little annoyed. Maybe it was because he didn’t want to lose the crease in his blue suit pants to the rising heat. He wore a blue tie that shimmered in the sunlight.

From behind the wheel, Leonard’s fiancé, Pookie, just as tall, built like a bombshell and with a head so smooth, the light almost gave him a halo, stepped out. He was newly a detective. He had on an ugly turd-brown suit and shoes by Walmart.

“My baby,” Leonard said.

Sheriff Doolin looked where Leonard was looking, said, “Baby?” Analyzed for a moment, then said, “You queer?”

“Oh,” Leonard said, “you have no idea.”

Doolin stepped back, perhaps fearing he might get some queer on him, turned, looked at Justin, said, “Kind of out of your jurisdiction, ain’t you?”

“We were out for a peaceful drive in the country,” Chief Justin said. “Saw you here, thought you might need help. Especially with these two.”

“You know them?” Sheriff Doolin said.

“Who in law enforcement doesn’t, except you?”

“I was just elected.”

“And I was hired recently. So we’re even. All right, you guys give me the story.”

“So they called you,” Doolin said. “You weren’t just driving by?”

“Little of column A, little of column B.”

It was all of column A, but I didn’t say anything.

By this time, Belinda had come outside and made her way over. It hurt to watch her waddle. Had diabetes, I figured. A disease anyone could get but one that the poverty-stricken had more than others due to lack of medical care, lack of insurance, and a diet of white bread, day-old cake, Yoo-Hoos, and Ding Dongs. Also burgers and French fries when a hog didn’t get them.

“Well, cuz,” Belinda said. “Congrats on coming up in the world. Whose dead body did you have to step on to get your promotion?”

“I’d be willing to step on yours if needed.”

“I bet,” Belinda said.

After the loving cousins finished snotting at one another, we introduced Belinda to Justin, then told our story, including the destruction of her house and all of us being attacked by Porky. When we finished, Leonard said, “And I lost my hat.”

Nobody cared about his hat.

“You telling me,” Sheriff Doolin said, “you let a piggy chase you about?”

“We did indeed,” I said. “When he’s rested and gets another dose of meth, you get in the pen and pet him.”

“Jesus,” Justin said.

“I wish Jesus had been here to help,” Belinda said, and sounded as sincere as a church choir.

Sheriff Doolin said, “Reckon you boys need to come with me. We got some mediocre food served at the jail, and you can wipe your asses on your shirttails.”

“What about the meth?” I said.

“What meth?” Doolin said.

“The meth in the trunk of your deputies’ car.”

“Ain’t no meth in the trunk of their car. Just a spare tire.”

“We watched your deputies carry that shit out, limp nut,” Leonard said.

"Open the trunk of your deputies' car," Justin said.

"I don't have to do that," Sheriff Doolin said.

"A law enforcement courtesy," Justin said.

"I don't feel that courteous," the sheriff said, hands on hips, his sea turtle shifting a bit.

"I can bust it open," Pookie said.

"What gives you the right to do that?" Doolin said.

"He's bigger than you," Justin said. "Get a tire tool and bust their trunk open."

"You will not," Sheriff Doolin said. "That's lawbreaking."

"And your cousin's hog destroyed this lady's house and tried to kill these two, which is an understandable goal—"

"Hey," Leonard said.

"But alas, folks own the hog are responsible for keeping it penned up."

"Not your goddamn jurisdiction," Doolin said.

"And you're hiding evidence. I think the judge will understand my need to investigate, considering you're supposed to be upholding the law. We'll call in the drug task force—they can cross jurisdiction if needed."

I wasn't sure that was right, but I remained silent.

"We were hauling in what we found as evidence," Sheriff Doolin said. "We just thought it was our place to make the report."

"Figured it was something like that," Justin said, then nodded at me and Leonard. "These two idiots will go with me. After your bullshit with the meth, Doolin, you might not want to argue. Have your boys put that stuff in the trunk of my car. My officer will open the trunk for you. Tell your nitwits to wear gloves."

"Who's he calling a nitwit?" one of the deputies said.

"It's self-evident," I said.

"Careful, buddy, or I'll bend the barrel of my pistol over your head," the deputy said.

"You'll shit and fall back in it," Leonard said. "That's what you'll do."

"Boys, put your dicks back in your pants," Justin said. "Apologies, Miss Belinda."

"Quite all right," Belinda said.

"Where are your cousins that own the hog?" Justin said to Doolin.

"At work, I presume," Sheriff Doolin said. "I don't keep up with them."

"And what is their employment?" Justin asked.

"Day labor. Wrecker service. Bit of this, bit of that."

"Meth dealers?" Justin said.

"Not that I know of. That stuff in the shed, it could be hers."

Belinda made a noise that sounded like a dog bark.

“Open the trunk,” Justin said.

Leonard and Pookie smiled at one another. Pookie went with the two deputies out to load the stuff from their car into Justin’s. He gave them disposable gloves to wear.

At this point, Sheriff Doolin ceased to argue. He was nervous enough that he was unconsciously playing pocket pool with his balls.

The school bus rolled up, and three anxious children got off—Belinda’s family. They all looked pink and plump but had the attitude of trained runners. One, a short kid on stout legs—probably Baby Darling—leaned forward in case she had to distract Porky while the others darted to safety. They saw Porky in his pen and all of them relaxed.

Leonard looked at Belinda. “We’ll get back to you on that furniture.”

Chief Justin didn't arrest us. He and Pookie rode in the cop car, and me and Leonard followed in the truck.

"I don't know how I let you get me into this kind of shit, but every plan you have has stink on it," Leonard said. "I ought to know better."

"That's your problem. You don't know better."

Justin led us to a coffee shop and asked much of the same stuff that had already been asked and answered. I sat across from Justin, Leonard across from Pookie. They made goo-goo eyes at one another.

"One thing we didn't mention," I said. "I have photos of the meth lab. All of it on the table before they removed it."

I pulled out my phone and showed the photos to Justin. He had me email them to him.

"Having these photos can't hurt," Justin said. "I don't like that fucking Doolin. Another guy that missed an inch or so being a turd. And a cousin with a meth lab? Knowing that and that the sheriff stole evidence, I could really cause him some problems. May yet, if I want to."

"Ah, come on," I said. "You know you want to give him problems. Fuck those two deputies over too. They deserve it."

"And what do you two deserve?" Justin said.

"Hog Wranglers of the Year awards," Leonard said.

We talked a bit more, then Justin said they had to put the drug stuff in evidence. He told us to go home. Leonard drove us to my house. Brett had been out of town on a case, and now her car was parked in front of the garage. For some reason, she didn't like putting it inside where mine was. As always, when I knew I was about to see her, be near her, my heart beat a little faster.

Inside, Brett greeted us, and Leonard went about making me and him sandwiches as Brett was already eating a salad. She told us about her trip. Nothing special. A bit of observational reporting in a divorce case. When she finished, we told her about our hog adventures.

She laughed. We explained about the furniture. She didn't laugh about that. She marched us out to Leonard's truck, and, with her following in her car, we drove over to Belinda's.

Belinda and her kids were all sitting on her porch, grouped together as close as grapes. Brett introduced herself.

“You look like a movie star, honey,” Belinda said.

“I know,” Brett said, and laughed.

But she did know.

We all went inside and Brett looked at the house. She studied it. “I’m so sorry,” Brett said. She peeked into the bedroom and saw the blanket pallet laid out from the night before.

Leonard handed Belinda two hundred dollars in tens and twenties. “Here’s a start. Your money back.”

“Hap, you and Leonard and the kids stay here and clean this place up,” Brett said. “Me and Belinda are going furniture shopping. And, Belinda, furniture is on us. This hardly turned out to be a positive experience.”

“In our defense,” Leonard said, “we were just trying to help.”

Brett looked at Belinda. “Sometimes their help is like giving gorillas a china tea set and a ball-peen hammer.”

Me and Leonard and Baby Darling walked out to Porky's pen and looked at him chomping on the feed Leonard had poured the day before. Baby Darling said the Planters had not returned last night, and no supplies had been parachuted into Porky's pen by plane or drone. They had pretty much left the old boy to fend for himself, as if he had job interviews and was expecting employment.

Porky seemed somewhat docile today, and it was probably due to being cut back on his meth. If the morons who owned him were giving him a daily hit as a kind of family activity, it was wonder his heart hadn't played out.

We got the long water hose that was hooked to their house and let Baby Darling fill his water trough. Leonard poured him more feed. We stood at the pen watching him drink and eat.

"He really ain't such a bad piggy, but he's been influenced by his parents' rough ways," Baby Darling said, looking through the slats in the fence.

"I assume you mean the Planters and not Mama Hog?" I said.

"That's right. They have what I've read is called a negative-enabling lifestyle. Porky's not a psychopath by birth or choice, but he's very much influenced by his environment, and part of that is a lot of meth. Otherwise, I think he is a calm and centered kind of pig. Though he did eat my cat."

I looked at Leonard. He looked at me.

I said, "How old are you again?"

"How do you measure age?" she said. "There are many factors, you know. Mental and emotional as well as chronological considerations."

"You seem the perfect age, then," Leonard said.

"My mama said sometimes it seems I'm from Mars, because the rest of the kids, though not slow, are on the normal track to careers as hairdressers, nail technicians, or wiping asses in old folks' homes."

"That's okay work," Leonard said.

"Not if I had to do it," Baby Darling said. "My mom says I'm precocious. I read a lot."

"I assume it is not Goodnight Moon or Go, Dog, Go!" I said.

“Oh, heavens, no. Not that kid poop. I read real books. We have a bookmobile comes out here, and I have a library card at school. I may try and get a card in LaBorde, but you have to have a city address. And we mostly don’t go any farther than McDonald’s or the Dollar Store down the road. Most of their stuff costs more than a dollar, you know.”

“What is your career choice, Baby Darling?”

“I haven’t quite decided. I have time to consider. I’m young. Possibly an anthropologist or something to do with literature, though a career in mathematics has its appeal. I’m good with numbers.”

“That’s a good point,” Leonard said, “you do have time. I advise you to stay away from rose field work. It didn’t prove profitable for us.”

“My whole family has pecked shit with the chickens for years. Don’t tell Mom I said that. I want to remove us from that low and desperate lifestyle when I go to work. Right now, college looks questionable due to money, but I’ve got some thoughts on the matter. Do you think most people get away with filling-station robberies?”

“I don’t believe they do,” I said. “That wouldn’t be a good way to grow a college fund. What’s your real name?”

“Baby Darling.”

“Oh. Gotcha. Well, Leonard, let’s go clean out the house.”

Baby Darling beat us to the house, running on her trained legs. Leonard said, “Either that kid is a genius or I’ve forgotten what it was like being a kid. I don’t think I was that smart.”

“Not even having been there when you were that age, I assure you, you weren’t.”

11

Leonard found his straw hat. It had been run over and mauled by Porky. Leonard took it out to the pen and fed it to him as a kind of sacrifice.

The kids swept up the busted knickknacks and stuffed two black garbage bags with them. A few of the knickknacks were still intact, so they were saved. The back scratcher was all of one piece, and when I picked it up, it felt hefty and impractical, more like a medieval weapon of war. Definitely a tourist item. I put it aside for Belinda to reshelve or rehang. Next, we filled the bed of Leonard's pickup with those bags and the broken furniture. When that was done, Leonard took the first load to the dump.

I drove the second trip to the dump while Leonard stayed with the kids to clean and sweep out the house. When I got back, I thought it looked pretty good.

A truck from the furniture store arrived. Behind it, in our Prius, came Brett and Belinda. The furniture guys had an air about them that assured you they had done this a lot. That made me watch them more carefully. An overconfident person will actually be more likely to fuck things up. And sometimes what appears to be confidence is indifference.

Belinda was beaming when she came into the house, followed by Brett.

"That's a quick delivery," Leonard said.

"Brett is persuasive," Belinda said. "She doesn't let up."

"I know that's right," I said.

"Hap," Brett said, "would you mind bringing in the groceries?"

"Not at all."

Leonard went with me. There was a boxful of goods and two large cloth bags as well. We brought them in and put them where Belinda told us.

The furniture men studied the size of the doorway and went back to the truck and brought in the furniture, managing effortlessly to take the couch inside. Turned out their confident appearance was justified.

Belinda showed them where to place stuff as they made trip after trip. It wasn't the most expensive furniture in the world, but it was nice and well beyond what had been there before Porky's rampage.

When the furniture truck was gone, me and Leonard went to work on the window, and Brett and Belinda and the kids made some sandwiches.

I was glad of that. I was hungry.

We finished the window, though it needed new glass. We put some cardboard over the empty frame and made note to have someone who could do that work properly come out and put the glass in. We thought that after our lunch of pressed ham and cheese sandwiches and potato chips, we'd fix the squeaky boards on the porch and steps.

Our lunch was interrupted when a wrecker appeared and parked in front of the Planters' house by the hog pen. Porky grunted and ran to that side of the fence. Poor guy. He thought they were his family, although they most likely had plans later in the year to take him on a ride to the slaughterhouse and return later to pick up rump roast and pork chops.

There were three people in the front seat, two men and a woman. One man with a shaved head sat in the back of the truck near the lift device. He climbed down slowly. He was thick, like a boxer that had given up the sport. When the people in front got out, I noted one of the men had a heavy-lidded look that made him seem sleepy. The other one had an expression of perpetual amusement, like the joke was on him and he knew it. The woman was gaunt and stringy-haired. Turned out there was another person in the truck, a young boy about Baby Darling's age. He was a good-looking kid but had a little potbelly and his hair looked to have last been combed by a nurse at birth.

They had a way of moving that was hard to pinpoint. A lot of poor, desperate country people have it. It's as if they're expecting trouble and are constantly prepared for it. Light on their toes, quick to bluster, even quicker to flee.

The sleepy-eyed guy was wearing an old-style western six-gun in a holster on his hip. It wasn't illegal in Texas to do that, but it made me nervous to know a meth dealer had the right to carry a firearm. I bet he had a record as long as I am tall and still had access to weapons. Texans' love for guns borders on the psychotic.

The guy with the shaved head stayed back near the wrecker. He was the only one that looked truly alert. He was wearing clothes that were marginally clean.

The other two looked at Porky and the shed, then at us. Leonard walked over to his truck, opened the passenger door, and after a moment closed it.

Sleepy Eyes crossed in front of the pen and moved into Belinda's yard. Baldy maintained his position by the wrecker. The smiley man went inside the open shed, and the woman went into the house, pulling the kid in after her.

When Sleepy was in front of me, he turned his head and looked at the storage building. He formed a smile at the corner of his mouth that climbed his right cheek and spread to the other side. Nerve damage, I presumed. His teeth were yellow and brown, meth-violated; a few were nubbed. He had some red splotches on his neck that he scratched at. He was in his bluster moment, but I assumed fleeing might not be far behind.

"We seem to have had our door and boards rearranged," he said.

"Carpenter fairies," I said. "If you put out a hog and a bowl of milk, they sometimes show up."

"Would you and your friend be the Carpenter fairies?" Sleepy asked.

Leonard was back with me. He stood close to the man near his gun-holster side. I could see Leonard had put the revolver from the glove box into his belt so it could be seen. "Hell yeah," Leonard said. "We hammer the shit out of things. We are sometimes known as the fuck-up-stuff fairies."

"What gave you the right to hammer apart my shed?" Sleepy said.

"Carpenter fairies do what we want," Leonard said.

"The union does have some restrictions, however," I said. "We don't work if they say not to. But the dental plan is amazing."

"Look like a couple of retards to me," Sleepy said.

"You boys have been out of touch," I said. "We saw your cousin the sheriff. Now, that fellow is one charmer, I assure you. But Chief Justin of the LaBorde cops took your meth lab with him. Gonna think that might have repercussions for you. Ought to plan on a vacation in a galaxy far, far away, and immediately."

Sleepy's body slumped a little. "You, buddy, don't know what you've done—to us and you."

"I think we do," I said. "Let me tell you something. Your hog, after you were asked to pen it properly by your cousin and neighbor, wasn't. Porky smashed up Belinda's house, furniture, at least three dozen glass angels, and I think a unicorn. Maybe it was a thin rhinoceros. When we get it all added up, we'll be back with a bill for you to pay."

"That ain't happening," said Sleepy. "It ain't me you're going to have to deal with in the long run, it's our benefactor and manager."

"Benefactor?" Leonard said. "That sounds like a big word for you. I'm surprised your mouth can carry it."

Sleepy gave Leonard a look, but not for long. In a game of stare, Leonard generally wins.

"Sheriff Doolin?" I said. "He's your benefactor?"

"This big boss is called the Benefactor or just Benefactor. He's not someone you want to mess with."

"Wasn't aware we were messing with him," I said.

"And even then, we don't give a flying shit," Leonard said.

By this time, the other one, Sleepy's brother, I assumed, had ceased to wander around in what was left of the storage building and came over. "Stuff's gone."

"Just heard. Seems we're in trouble."

"I don't mind some trouble," the gooney one said. Most of his teeth were nothing but blackened wrecks, though one front tooth stood firm and white at the bottom of his mouth like a tombstone for tooth decay. "'Sides, we know the sheriff."

"That fat-ass motherfucker couldn't pull a duck out of a well with a hoist and harness," Sleepy said. "He's just a worker bee. Like us. A cousin who got elected on bullshit and payoffs, some of them from us."

"You ought not say things like that out loud," Gooney said.

"Like cuz has done anything to protect us," Sleepy said. "We're messed up now and it's that goddamn hog's fault."

"I'm going to shoot his ass," Gooney said.

"No, you're not," I said.

"Bzzz-bzzz," Leonard said. "Though you may think I'm imitating a bee, that's really the sound of two carpenter fairies who would like you to go home before they hammer your bones flat and make hacky sacks out of your balls."

They considered taking a chance. Gooney bowed up a bit. Smiley let the tips of his fingers touch the handle of his gun. I almost wished they would come at us but was glad they didn't. Leonard might have killed at least one of them, which would have forced me to kill the other.

Sleepy said, "I'd be careful whose hog you mess with. And whose meth you fuck with. Benefactor wouldn't like that."

"Oh, snap," Leonard said, and his face was close to Sleepy's face when he said it. There was a little tremor in Sleepy's shoulders, but he turned out to have a smidgen of common sense. He and his weird brother stilt-stepped back to their house and slammed the door like angry children.

Gooney looked out the window at us for a moment, then went away. Whoever the Benefactor was, they seemed seriously frightened of him.

The bald one by the wrecker kept his spot for a moment. He didn't seem to be trying to stare us down. He actually nodded at us like a student passing a teacher in the hallway. He followed them inside and closed the door gently.

“Porky strikes me as the smartest in the family,” Leonard said. “Probably had more schooling than they did.”

Realizing we didn't really want to do it ourselves, we hired a carpenter to straighten up Belinda's porch and put in window glass. Belinda owned the place, had inherited it from her father, who'd had an unfortunate farm accident involving a tractor, too much beer, and a sizable rock in the middle of a row of potato mounds.

We paid to have a large room built onto the house, then decided we wanted them to divide it into two smaller bedrooms. The kids still had to share but not as tightly as before. It took about two months for the carpenters to get it all done, so we spent some time with Belinda and her kids. I bought them a few toys, including a Frisbee that they threw and chased about the yard like they were in an Olympic event. We bought the family a nice TV and had it mounted on the wall.

Baby Darling was amazing. I enjoyed talking to her. She knew a lot about a lot of things, just didn't have the depth of experience to understand it all in the way she would in a few years.

The other kids were nowhere near as sharp, but then, compared to Baby Darling, neither was I.

As for the next-door neighbors, a few days after our introduction to them, their house was empty, front and back doors left open. A mattress was in the front yard, probably making it that far before the neighbors abandoned it. They should have. It looked oily and nasty, like a combustion engine had chosen that spot to puke.

Porky they left, and pretty soon Belinda and the kids had taken over feeding him. Without the meth, he became quite docile and could even be let out of his pen to come in Belinda's house after a hosing and toweling from the kids. It was kind of weird, but neat, the former enemies washing and feeding their old nemesis. Leonard and I hired the same carpenters to build him a deep and high shed inside his pen where he could get out of the elements.

Concerning the meth business, Chief Justin said the Planters had disappeared, and no one knew where they had finally decamped to, but he figured, as we did, they would show up before long, making more meth and with less teeth and even nastier dispositions.

Justin had heard of the Benefactor, or Benefactor, but his identity was a secret. He ran most of the meth-makers and dealers through intimidation—actually, force—and by supplying them with the goods to make that crap.

One day I went over to the abandoned Planter house. I put on some disposable gloves from a box of them I kept in the car. I roamed around inside their place. The electricity and water were both off. The kitchen sink was rusty-looking, and the refrigerator was full of rotted food that almost made me gag. The bathroom had a nice hunk of well-formed turds in the toilet bowl and no water in it. Most likely they had ceased to pay their water bill and it had been cut off before they left, leaving a loving memory in the toilet bowl. I used my foot to push the lid down on it.

The bedroom had a bare set of box springs and a few dead roaches and a scattering of rat turds. There were paper cups and fast-food wrappers strewn around the house. The living-room couch was gouged up and had some stuffing coming out of the cushions. It smelled like assholes. I could see where a TV had been pulled off the wall, leaving some dangling wires.

When we felt we had Belinda and her crew straightened out, we hired her to clean our office once a week. Due to a number of fortunate financial breaks over the past few years, we could afford it.

About this time, I learned the old safe house Hanson had loaned us was up for sale. Me and Brett wanted it. We needed a change of location. That place came with quite a bit of land and a barn that needed work.

Hanson's people might not have been fond of us, but they were glad to take our money. We closed out the property deal and made plans to move. We weren't exactly sure what we would do with our old house.

Life seemed copacetic.

For me and Leonard, the way things looked frequently turned out to be less than met the eye.

13

Not long after we bought that house, a man and his son parked their pickup off the Trinity River bridge and, carrying rods and reels and a tackle box, found a narrow trail that looked like a good path to the river, and they thought it might lead to a nice spot to set up for a day of fishing. The trail proved long, and there were a lot of broken limbs on either side of it where the trees had been hit by something large. At the end of the trail, where it broke out to show the river, parked on a spit of sand that poked out into the water was a large, blackened, smoke-stained wrecker.

It was obvious the wrecker had been set on fire. One door was partly open. The fisherman pulled the door wider, and a dust of dried ashes floated out along with a wad of buzzing flies and a toasted stench. There were bodies crammed tight inside the cab, all charred. Three adults and one child. He could tell that much, even though the bodies were also chopped up.

His son wanted to look, but he wouldn't let him. The man and his son walked back to their pickup and drove away from there and went for the police. Pretty soon there were cops and sheriff's people crawling all over the place. I read about it all in our local online paper, which had surprisingly improved from the rag it had been for a while.

The Planter family had been found. Their commercial-meth venture had ended. They had been playing grab-ass in a pretty ugly profession with pretty mean people involved in both purchasing and selling. Considering Sleepy's comments about Benefactor, it was conceivable they had gotten too sloppy, and Benefactor, whoever that was, had given them their pink slips.

Baldy wasn't one of the victims. Or at least, he wasn't in the wrecker. Where was he? Of course the news didn't even know he existed. But it was easy to tell from the report there was one short, due to our inside knowledge, and my guess was Baldy was the one that wasn't there. Maybe he was the one that killed them, decided to take over the business. It could be all kinds of ways.

The sky turned blood red that evening, then a shadow grew over it and there was crackling electricity in the air as well as deep bass thunder. The lightning jumped so quick and fast against the heavens, it seemed radioactive.

Brett and I snuggled in our upstairs bedroom and flinched a bit as the lightning popped and thunder rolled. Soon there was a loud cracking sound and the outside night-light went dead, which meant the electricity in the house was out. With the air conditioner shut down, it gradually grew warm in the bedroom. I got up and opened a window to let wind in through the screen. The air was nice and cool and brisk. Some rain blew in with it, but that was okay. It felt good on my skin.

Looking out, I thought I saw a strange misshapen shadow push itself out of the lighter darkness and flow toward me, but when I tried to focus on it, I found I was in bed, and though I had in fact opened the window, I had dreamed the part about the broken shadow.

Come morning, when the rain had cleared and the sky had blued and the birds sang happily from the trees, a call from Baby Darling darkened things up.

I called Leonard and told him that Baby Darling wanted us over there right away. Something was up, and from her tone, I didn't think she wanted to discuss physics, though she might have been able to.

I reset the clocks that had been sent blinking by last night's break in electricity. I had a cup of coffee and a toasted English muffin and poured Brett a second cup of coffee.

Leonard came by and picked me and Brett up in his truck. He was wearing a red baseball cap with a white feather in it.

No idea. It was Leonard.

When we got there, Porky trotted over to the side of his pen, poked his snout through the slats, and grunted at us. He looked a lot calmer and happier. I was glad he had a house to go into.

Baby Darling and the other two kids were on the new porch, sitting on a glider. It looked like a gathering of sick pigeons.

When we walked up, Baby Darling dropped out of the glider, trotted down the steps, and hugged me, then Leonard, who absently patted her on the head like a puppy. She hugged Brett. She had been crying. Fact was, they had all been crying. And now they were all off the porch and taking turns hugging us.

"What happened?" I asked.

All the kids started to talk at once. Baby Darling put up a hand. "I'll explain," she said.

Baby Darling wiped away a tear with the back of a plump hand and said, "Mama's in the hospital. She had some kind of spell."

"Spell?" Brett said.

"A fainting spell and such," Baby Darling said. "I believe it has to do with her heart and diabetes. She didn't have any signs of stroke."

I didn't doubt that Baby Darling was well read enough to know the signs of a stroke, but still, she was far from a specialist.

Baby Darling had called the ambulance, which came and hauled Belinda away, leaving the children there as if they were feral.

That part pissed Brett off.

Baby Darling took my hand, said, “Can I talk to you folks alone?”

We agreed, and like a commander of invading forces, she told the other two kids to wait there. I hate to say it, but about those other two, I didn’t have ten cents of knowledge. Even now I think of them as Kid Two and Kid Three.

We walked out to the truck and stood by it.

“It’s what she found that set her off,” Baby Darling said.

“What did she find?” Brett said.

“Rain flooded last night, washed little June’s plastic car into the ditch out back. It’s big enough for her to pedal and drive. She loves it.”

“Okay,” I said.

“Mama could see part of it from the window this morning, at the edge of the ditch, and went out to get it. I went with her. She found something along the edge of the ditch. I think I ought to show it to you. It surprised her. It surprised me.”

Baby Darling, leading me by the hand, took us out back of the house and we looked down into the ditch where she was pointing. The furious rain had washed the earth apart during the night and had collapsed mud into the center of the ditch. The water was still running brisk. The collapse of the dirt on the sides of the ditch had revealed something.

Coming out of the wet earth on our side, back behind where the meth shed had stood, were some skulls and bones and rotting clothes, and in one case there was still enough facial skin with mud-colored hair left on one skull to recognize it as the remains of a woman.

Turned out Sheriff Doolin was no longer in charge. He had been put out to pasture over his actions with Chief Justin, and a fellow we had never seen before, named Jim Crank, was now sheriff. He was black and had a slightly hooked nose that gave him the appearance of a hawk about to dive down on a rabbit. He gave you the feeling you were the rabbit.

The deputies we had met were also gone. He didn't bring anyone else with him in their place. We found out all of this from Crank and Justin talking, because, as before, I'd called both departments because I thought Doolin was still there. I was trying to get the right folks in and cover our asses at the same time. Crank and Justin had some sort of relationship, and though they weren't bosom buddies, the connection helped roll things along.

We looked at the bodies for a while, then Crank and Justin sent us up to the house. A few minutes later, they came up. We settled in the living room, which smelled of new furniture and fresh paint. What served as the county's forensics team were on the way. Probably someone with a toy doctor's kit and a bottle of alcohol and a lot of good intentions.

Brett had Baby Darling herd the kids into the back bedroom. She did it smoothly and without much sass back. Not only was Baby Darling smart, she looked like she might be scrappy if it came down to it. It had already been established that she was a hell of a runner. I bet she had a good right cross.

Sheriff Crank stood at the kitchen window with his hands behind his back, looking out. He said, "That is one big-ass hog."

"Yep," I said.

Crank had us fill him in on what Justin already knew, and my guess was it was what Crank already knew as well. The law likes to ask the same question a lot, looking for holes in your story. We told him about Belinda, how we had gotten involved, and how we had found the meth lab. And we suspected the same as he did about Doolin: that he was nipping a bit of the profit from his cousins for keeping quiet about their meth activities. We mentioned Benefactor, but there wasn't much to say there. Crank had heard of Benefactor, but if he knew more than we did about him, he didn't let on.

Leonard said, "But, all things aside, Doolin has a nice hat."

"Yeah," Crank said, "but what the kind of hat you got there with a feather in it?"

"I think it's festive," Leonard said.

"Do you, now?" Crank said.

"What about the bodies?" Brett said.

"Those bodies have been there a while," Crank said.

"Ah," Leonard said, "a Sherlock Holmes moment. And by the way, they're dead."

Crank gave him a look that seemed to say, "Hey, man, respect the law." Leonard just grinned at him.

"One of those bodies," Justin said, "has not been there as long as the others. Not fresh, but not ancient. That seems worth noting."

"Noted," Crank said. "Forensics will figure that out easily enough."

"I'm going to guess this is connected to the Planters, the family who were burned up in their wrecker," I said.

"Could be," Crank said. "You know as much as I know. I'm new. I was the department's token hire, to be honest, a deputy. But I deserved that job, and now I'm the sheriff because I can read."

"When we saw the Planters," I said, "there was one other person with them, bald guy. Looked like he might actually have a few brain cells."

"Did you get a name?" Crank asked.

"No," I said.

"Well, that's some help," Crank said.

A blue van with four people in it pulled up out front. Forensics. We went out on the porch to greet them. Three women and a man dressed in white suits with footies and hoods got out and walked up. They were all carrying cases. Crank went with them to show them the location of the bodies.

The rest of us went back inside. Justin looked out the window at Porky, then turned and looked at us. "Crank—I wouldn't trust him too much."

"Yeah?" Brett said.

"We were both cops in Houston. He didn't get fired, but he got walked, ended up here. He's been a deputy for a while, and now he's sheriff. He's smarter than the rest of them, but I don't think trustworthy and honest are high on his personal list of job requirements. He always seemed to be a guy that kept an ace up his sleeve. Played both sides of the fence, not unlike Doolin, only shrewder."

"We all play both sides of the fence," Leonard said.

“Yeah, but for the greater good, right?” Justin smiled. “Crank, I think, does it for personal gain. The rumor in Houston was he had some envelopes to pick up every week. Listen here—I don’t like it much, but while their mother is in the hospital, the kids have to go into foster care.”

“We could have them at our house,” I said.

“No,” Justin said. “It’ll sort out. For now, they have to go. It’s the law.”

Brett called the kids out of the bedroom and explained to them what was about to happen. Right off, Baby Darling asked if they could stay with us. She looked weepy but didn’t cry. I told her we had suggested that, but the law wouldn’t go along with it.

A white van arrived and parked by the blue van. Two nice ladies talked to the kids and soothed them and put them in the van and drove them away. I felt like they were being taken to the pound.

Brett came home late after going to the hospital to check on Belinda. I was waiting up for her in the kitchen, having a glass of milk and some animal crackers. Leonard had long gone home, and the truth was, I enjoyed my time alone in the kitchen slowly eating my animal crackers. I seemed to really have it in for the monkeys and would search through the big bag, find a monkey, and bite its head off.

Every time I did, I said, “Gotcha.”

Brett came into the house, saw me sitting there, said, “I want some animal crackers.”

“Sounds like a personal problem,” I said.

“I’m going to make it really personal if you don’t hand me that bag.”

“The monkeys are mine,” I said.

She ate an elephant. Then she poured a glass of milk and sat down across from me.

“How is Belinda?” I asked.

“Not really that bad. She’s not in great health overall and seeing the bodies hit her hard. Minor heart episode, the doctor said. Luckily, she has insurance. Poor as they are, she’s managed that. Who’d have thought. I remember when my insurance was a box of Band-Aids and a bottle of Tylenol.”

“So, a heart attack? That doesn’t sound minor.”

“No, not a heart attack. A heart episode. She has a leaky valve or some such. Basically, she was shocked and her blood pressure dropped and she fainted. She’s worried about her kids. Come morning, I’ll shake things out and see what’s going on, see if we can get everyone back together. They’re supposed to let Belinda out sometime tomorrow. What do you think about all those bodies?”

“I don’t have any idea, but it certainly could be as suspected, connected to the numb-nuts next door. I think those bodies have been there a while, except for one I saw. Could be people came and partied and died, and the Planters decided to tuck them up tight in the ground and out of the way. Seems like the kind of stupid and simple plan a bunch of tweakers would make. They might have murdered them, I guess, but I bet on the former. Hey, that’s a monkey.”

Brett bit its head off.

“You’ll live,” she said.

17

Next morning Brett went to help Belinda check out of the hospital, locate her kids, and have them returned.

Leonard called and invited me to meet him at the health club—or gym, as he preferred to call it—said he was going there to check it out, box a few rounds against the hanging bag. Said he had a surprise for me. I think he was needing some space from the wedding plans.

I put on my gray sweatpants and a blue T-shirt that really made my eyes stand out, but not like a crazy man's. My eyes were gray, blue, or green. The color shirt I wore dictated how they looked to others. I wore my green tennis shoes that were designed for comfortable walking or running, grabbed a change of clothes for after the workout, and drove over to join Leonard.

When I came in, the place had been altered by carpenters. It had a new coat of beige paint on the walls. The desk was new, mahogany and horseshoe-shaped. Behind it there were shelves with T-shirts and other gym goods for sale.

I knew without asking that Leonard was buying the place. It had his touches. Another clue was the previous owner, who was generally behind the desk, seated on a tall stool, was gone. So was the stool.

Besides the shelves with goods and the mahogany horseshoe-shaped desk, there was a young black man. He didn't have stool. He had a smile that made me feel life was full of promise. It was a nice smile, but the feeling it gave me didn't last. I told him who I was and that Leonard had invited me.

"I know," he said. "I'm Michael." He had a deep voice. He pointed to the gym area.

I walked in there.

I found Leonard in the back pounding a hanging bag. It wasn't one of the real heavy ones; it was smaller and less hard and he was giving it a bit of this and a bit of that. I liked the sound it made when he hit it.

The boxing and kickboxing ring had been revamped with a better matting for the floor. It was no longer roped but had a kind of fencing around it, though the lower parts of it were lined with rubber. The air smelled good in there, not like the usual pasty smell of sweat and farts. I was a little disappointed in that because the familiarity was gone.

Leonard saw me and quit hitting the bag. He grinned at me. "What do you think?"

"You don't hit as hard as you used to."

"Fuck you. The gym. What do you think?"

"It's really nice," I said. "Really is. You're going to tell me you bought it."

"Buying. Think I'm making the right move?"

"Yeah. I do."

"Given any more thought to joining me? Nice job to come to every day. You might actually be able to stay in shape. There's still a weight and exercise room, but I'm adding better equipment."

"Still thinking about it," I said.

"Meaning you're afraid to mention it to Brett."

"Pretty much, yeah. But I'll get around to it."

"Which means you do want to do it?" Leonard said.

"Giving it serious thought."

"My buying the place isn't your only surprise."

"What's the other surprise?"

"That's for later," he said. "Work out or shut up. You're distracting me."

"Is the surprise you're going to hit me when I'm not looking?"

"Just work out for a while."

There was another hanging bag, also light, so I pulled on some bag gloves and went at it. I started slow, dealing with the injury I had acquired trying to capture Porky. It was sore, though there wasn't any deep damage. I could override that as I warmed up. I picked up the pace. Sweat from my body flew out and glowed briefly in the light like tiny bath bubbles. I was trying to tap the primal part of me. I always did that. That's where the truth was, down deep in the reptilian brain.

Soon I was really going at it. I felt disappointment at so many things in my life, and I tried to knock them out of me and into the bag with every punch.

I thought of Belinda, her poverty, and I remembered my own. I thought of Baby Darling working in an aluminum-chair factory with a fat, wife-beater husband who made sure any money she might want to spend on books went for beer. It was all clichéd poor-people thinking, but the reason there are clichés is that many are rooted in truth.

The bag began to swing a little more, but it had a rope at the bottom that was fastened to a hundred-pound barbell weight to keep it from swinging all over the place.

I swayed and dodged an imaginary opponent and added in kicks.

They weren't high kicks. Lately I had lost some of the elevation I had possessed. I had traded high kicking for kicking inside and outside of the legs, ribs, the stomach and sternum. A low side kick if I was being overwhelmed and could find the position.

I could kick hard going low, but the fact that I could no longer kick high and hard made me a little angry. I put that anger into more kicks and punches, added in elbows when the bag swung back my way, and I don't know when I would have stopped had Leonard not put his hand on my shoulder.

"Okay, champ," he said, "let's get some water."

There was bottled water in a cooler in the front room near the desk. We both had a bottle, adding plastic waste to the environment. I was mad about that too. I was pretty much, in that moment, mad about most everything. I might have kicked a puppy. Certainly a kitten.

"Looked like you needed that," Leonard said.

"I was thirsty."

"I mean knocking hell out of the bag. You even scared me."

"Now you know I can still hit hard."

"I was scared because I was thinking you were going to slip and fall and wouldn't be able to get up."

"Ha-ha."

Right then, two young men came into the gym. Leonard knew they were coming, which was why he wanted me to come in. They were my surprise.

They were in their twenties. One white, one black. The white kid was an avid weight lifter. His name was Ernie. The black kid was leaner and lighter. His name was Nemo. He'd told me he was named after the fish in the animated movie. They both were nice-looking kids, injected with eagerness and optimism. We had met them here at the gym before Leonard owned it. They had some training. We had boxed a few rounds with them now and again, showing them we weren't quite as worn out as they'd suspected.

We all went to the main gym, and Leonard climbed into the ring with Ernie. The boys knew a few kicks and had some good basic training in boxing. Later we'd get to locks and grappling and raw ass whipping.

"Boxing instructor we had, before he moved, said boxing was the superior art," Ernie said. "That a good boxer could get in on a man and prevent him from kicking."

"Depends on the man," Leonard said. "There are no absolutes, as Hap will tell you."

"That's right," I said like a Greek chorus.

"All disciplines have their place," Leonard said. "It's best to be well rounded or at least understand what other styles are trying to accomplish. Tell you what—how about I only use kicks and you slide in on me to keep me from doing it."

"Okay," Ernie said. He seemed to have forgotten the lessons we had given them. He had slept and now he was the toughest motherfucker that had ever peeled back his weenie to pee.

"Protect yourself at all times," Leonard said. "It may be a real self-defense situation one day, and you'll want to have your mind where it ought to be. Real thing, you can't just throw your hands up and ask for a stool to sit on. Hear me?"

Ernie nodded. They touched gloves. Ernie threw a quick jab. The jab didn't quite reach Leonard's forehead. The cross that followed had a lot of heat on it, but Leonard stepped to the right and kicked with a left round kick inside Ernie's left leg. The kick made a slapping sound and lifted Ernie's leg off the mat, and down he went. He tried to get up but couldn't. He tried to hold his leg, which was hard with the gloves on. He was moaning.

"Kicks, they got their place," Leonard said, gloves on his hips. "You can reach farther with them, and if you know where to kick, and you've got the aim and the accuracy and know how to throw them with power, they can end a fight before it starts. Right now, state you're in, if I wanted to, I could whip you like a galley slave. You would have a hard time doing anything back, because your brain is distracted by pain. By the way, that was a lesson. Another part of that lesson is there is a difference between pain and injury. What you got there is pain."

I sparred with Nemo after that. He was more cautious than Ernie. He moved back and outside, trying to lure me in. I just kept my spot. I didn't stalk him. Finally, his youth got the better of him—my holding back had made him bold.

When he came in, continuing Leonard's lesson, I kicked. My shot was different, though. I hit him on the outside of his thigh, about where your fingers would hang if you put your hands by your sides.

He went down, said, "Fuck a duck."

"I'd rather not," I said.

He rolled around for a while. Bang that nerve with a kick, and it really stays with you. I knew from experience.

"Now," I said, "you guys get yourself together, and let's go again. Light this time, so the lesson will last a little longer."

It felt good to work out and teach something physical, and doing it made Leonard's offer more appealing. It might be a way to reset my life, to slide into old age more comfortably.

I had stocks and dough in the bank and some cash that was in bills in shoeboxes. To stay cool, all I had to do was avoid buying yachts and enormous mansions.

As for growing older in this job, well, if need be, when I couldn't teach, I could, as Leonard suggested, fold towels.

After a few more, lighter rounds with the boys, I left Leonard to it, showered, and drove over to the office.

Since Belinda hadn't been able to clean that week, I swept and gathered the trash and so on.

I was thinking how in this very room Vanilla Ride had killed Kung Fu Bobby, who up until that moment seemed invincible. She'd killed two others here as well. She saved my life. Then the Sisters, as they were called, were invited in. Jim Bob arranged for them to do their thing.

I never saw the Sisters. They came from Houston in a white van with a house cleaner sign on the side, but what they cleaned up was the blood and scattered brains strewn about the office. They took care of the damage and eliminated DNA, fingerprints, and ruined furniture. They came and went like ghosts, leaving the place looking better than before. I'd never seen the bathroom toilet so clean. They also made some serious money for doing it. I know. It came out of the business's bank account, disguised as repairs.

I was brooming a cobweb out of a ceiling corner when the door opened and in walked the former Sheriff Doolin. He was dressed in a khaki shirt and pants and had on his nice hat and cheap boots. His face hung loose as an empty sack.

"Sheriff Doolin," I said, leaning the broom in the corner.

"Not anymore."

"Not Sheriff Doolin, then." I said this like I didn't know he had been shown the door.

"Come on, man, don't make me feel worse than I do."

"You here for a reason?"

"I wanted to talk to you about hiring you and your partners."

"I find that surprising."

"So do I," he said.

I sat down behind the desk and Doolin sat in one of the client chairs. He took off his hat and placed it on his knee. Except for a few strands of hair the color of dung-tinted straw, he was bald.

"I found out more about you," Doolin said. "Looked you up on the Google. You and your buddy are detectives. My cousins the Planters, I want to find out who killed them. See if the killers can be brought to justice. That should have been my job, but I kind of shit in my oatmeal."

"I have some guesses about what happened," I said. "I assume their boss, the Benefactor, whoever that is, did them in. They might have played their hand too broad, got into trouble over a hog and their meth stash. Maybe they tried to take off with some money they owed their boss. I think a lot of things but don't actually know a goddamn thing."

"Any of that could be. The Benefactor, if we're naming him that. He runs things, and that's that. You pay him tribute or you don't work in the meth business. But I don't really know him. I heard he once hooked up someone skimming his share to a couple of trucks with chains and pulled them apart. Might be a legend. But I'm all about me right now. I may face some charges for putting that shit in the car trunk, but I was trying to help my cousins. Keep them out of jail. That was a stupid move on my part, and I know it. They were family, after all, and I guess I should try and do something about what happened to them."

"I don't know I care who killed them," I said. "They were a menace, and that hog of theirs, they were feeding it meth, making it crazy. Animal abuse, buddy. It was causing Belinda and her children more than a little distress. She's your cousin too, what about her?"

"She isn't as close a cousin. The Planters, I grew up around. We played together. Got in trouble together."

"And you were making money from them."

"Also true, as long as we're not talking outside this office. I want you to find who killed them because this is more of a mess than it seems. I know I'm not the brightest light in the woods, but I wanted to be a good sheriff, just couldn't shake my upbringing, family loyalty, that kind of thing."

"You made your choices," I said.

"I did. Still, this whole business is complex."

"Complex in what way?"

"Being complex is what makes it complex. If I could figure it all, I wouldn't want to hire you. I know about those bodies found in the ditch out back. That wasn't something my cousins would do. What I do know is I'm worried about me. I'm not staying at home, I'm hid out, in case the Benefactor thinks I know something from my cousins that I definitely don't know. Then again, in that line of work, you make a lot of enemies. Could have been someone else."

"Them being cousins made it so you couldn't or wouldn't arrest them? Made it so you just had to take money from them and cover up for them?"

"It makes it what I did, and I can't undo it. I don't want to spend the rest of my life looking over my shoulder. I want you to find out what's going on and keep me out of it."

"You're not giving me much," I said.

"Don't have much. Just that my cousins were part of a drug ring in East Texas, and they were doing all right in that world of commerce until they started dipping into the goods. Then they didn't know their assholes from a water well. It was all about the drugs for them after that. Cooking up in the shed behind the fucking hog pen. Can't get dumber than that."

"Was the bald guy with them a cousin?"

"Just a worker they sometimes hired. They called him Junior. He was the only one didn't dip into the meth for personal use. But he got paid in meth from time to time. They let him sell some of it on his own."

"And what does he do to get paid in meth?"

"Wrecker work," he said. "A bit of this and that. Helping them sell meth."

"Seems like they were creating their own competition," I said.

"State they were in, it was easier to give him meth than money. They had plenty of meth. The money they spent like it didn't matter. Bought stupid shit with it."

I picked a pen off the desk and used it to tap out a drumbeat of sorts. Doolin watched me drum. I don't know if he was impressed with my natural rhythm or not. I considered switching to a pen-and-desk version of "Wipe Out" but put the pen down instead.

"And you can pay for our services?" I asked.

Doolin reached into his pants pocket and pulled out a wad the size of a baseball. It was held together with a thick rubber band. "I got some money I saved up. I can give you a thousand to start."

I wouldn't have thought Doolin would have had five hundred, let alone a thousand dollars.

He peeled a thousand dollars off his wad and pushed the bills across the desk at me. "We in business?"

I straightened out the money and left it on the desktop. That was a lot of money for an ex-sheriff to pass as a partial payment. My guess was it was money from the Planters. I said as much.

He shook his head. “I gamble, and I’m good at it. One of the few things I’m good at. I mean, I got some money from them, all right. They arranged for me and a gal worked for them to have some fun once. That was one way they paid. But I didn’t really make that much from them. A bit here and there, a snatch of ass now and then.”

“A bit here and there really isn’t any different than a lot here and there when it’s crooked money. Who was the gal you were with? That your cousins supplied you? I might find something through her.”

“I think her name was Cherryline. I don’t remember exactly. Wasn’t with her long enough to remember. She hung with my cousins for a while, then she was gone.”

I didn’t let him know I thought he meant Sharoline. Technically, if he had sex with Sharoline, they were committing incest, though if they were cousins removed as many times as he and Belinda suggested, that might be moot.

“Surely you can give me more information than you’ve given,” I said.

Doolin though for a moment.

“Elda Seabrook.”

“Who’s that?”

“A name I heard my cousin Beauford mention. I think she was some kind of contact. I don’t know any more than that, but the name came up a few times when I was around them.”

“Which one was Beauford?”

“One looked like he was about to take a nap.”

That would be Sleepy. “I find something out, how do I contact you?”

“I’ll contact you. Don’t want anyone, not even you, knowing where I am. These people, they can find out things if someone knows something they want to know. Wouldn’t want you letting them know where I am. Just find out if they’re looking for me and, if so, what I can do to shake them off my tail.”

“Who’s ‘them’?”

“Whoever’s after me. Benefactor, someone else. That’s for you to find out.”

“This might take some time, and time means money. More than you’ve put down.”

“I can come up with it. I can gamble at the boats in Shreveport.”

“All right,” I said.

I put the thousand in the desk drawer.

Doolin didn’t shake hands. Didn’t hang out. He was on a mission.

He put on his nice hat, went to the door, opened it, and looked out as if he thought his enemies might be sailing in on hang gliders.

When he was certain they weren’t, he stepped onto the landing and pulled the door closed.

When he was below, I went to the window and looked down at the parking lot and watched him walk rapidly, checking left and right, before climbing into a yellow car and driving off.

The thing I noticed about him in the bright sunshine before he closed his car door was that he looked smaller than I remembered, and his face looked as white as whalebone in the sunlight.

I don't want nothing to do with that business," Leonard said. "I don't care who killed them."

Leonard had on his stupid cap with the feather. He pushed the bill up a bit so that the hat was cocked back on his head.

"One of them was a kid, Leonard."

"Not my kid."

It was afternoon, and we were at our new house. It was furnished, though not well. In the old days, I wouldn't have cared if it had apple crates and a milking stool as furniture. But I had gotten persnickety in my old age.

Brett definitely didn't want to keep our old couch, but I liked it. My butt loved it. Leonard helped me move the couch to the bed of his pickup, and we drove it over to the barn on the new property and put it inside against the wall, next to the wooden bench that was already there.

We sat on the couch as a reward for moving it.

Leonard said, "If you're lucky, there's a cave underneath here. You can rig up your Batmobile to rise on pullies and you can drive out of here at night to do Batman stuff."

"You can be Robin."

"Fuck you. I don't want to be Batman, let alone Robin. I just want to get married, own a gym, and be left alone."

"Look for a pod under your bed, because you've certainly changed."

"Only thing under my bed is common sense. Used to be it was dust bunnies, but now I got common sense under there. I'm telling you, come work for me, and let's grow old at the gym and forget all this shit."

"I've told you, I've considered it," I said. "I'm still considering. If I were to go in with you, I don't know how Brett would feel about running the agency by herself."

"I hear that."

We sat quietly, letting the minutes tick by. Eventually I decided to tell Leonard what was on my mind. After I'd explained about Doolin, I said, "Just ride out with me to where the wrecker was and take a look around. You don't have to get involved beyond that."

"The wrecker will be gone by now. Clues will have been found or stepped on. What's the point?"

"You never know till you know," I said.

"Oh, Yoda, your wisdom makes my ass hurt."

It took a bit more cajoling, but soon we were riding in his pickup out to the spot where the wrecker had been burned up. Leonard called and got directions for the location from Pookie, who was not only his fiancé but our inside man at the cop shop.

It was windy that day, and we drove with the truck windows down. The breeze was a little cool, and the tops of trees were swaying as if in a dance contest.

Finally, we came to the Angelina River. Once upon a time, just before the trail from the long bridge into the woods, there had been a small, greasy strip joint with the stink of an open sewage line out back. The place was a noted drug den. Meth. All manner of pills. The Planters might have done business there.

Politicians and LaBorde law were always trying to close the place down, mostly near election time. It was noted for having a one-armed stripper. She was said to have two pussies, and neither of them were cats. They said she saved one for her boyfriend and used the other for paying customers. She was said to be careful about which was which.

Our agency was once hired to look for a couple of guys who hung out there and owed child-support money. One guy I found, the other I didn't. I didn't see a one-armed stripper. The floor inside was sticky as molasses and my shoes made a sucking sound as I walked across it. The band wasn't any better than if you had handed four lobotomized chimps random musical instruments and let them go at it.

Eventually, the cops and politicians did close the place. The one-armed stripper had swung her last time on the dance pole, and no longer were curious customers trying to figure out what was up with her extra vagina.

Had she considered it for small storage?

Not long after, as the joint sat there lonely and without paint, the ghost of many a lap dance living inside, it somehow caught fire. By the time the fire department bothered to get there—and word was they went to a Dairy Queen drive-through first and ordered ice cream cones—the fire had licked the wooden bones of the place clean and eaten the carpet, leaving only the concrete flooring and a scorched sink and toilet where the bathroom had been.

Nothing left but some sweet redneck memories.

Two pussies indeed.

21

Deep down in the woods there were a number of trails that shot off the larger one we were bouncing along on. One of the trails had broken limbs on both sides of it, and that fit the idea of wrecker being driven down it. Leonard took that one. Water dripped off the leaves and limbs, and the earth was soft with drying mud. Mosquitoes smashed against the windshield as if on suicide missions.

We rolled our windows up in self-defense.

Had one of the tweakers driven there, not knowing what was about to happen, or were they forced to drive there? Or were they killed first and chopped up and their bodies shoved into the wrecker at the riverbank, then set on fire?

The trail filled with light and ahead of us we could see an opening, and beyond the opening was a sandy bank and the brown Angelina River rolling along, carrying leaves and small limbs.

When we came out of the woods and onto the bank, the sky was bright blue with a scattering of white clouds that looked like pulled biscuit dough. Leonard parked us close to the water. We got out and walked about, crunching gravel. There was a spit of thick sand that jutted out from the bank, well into the water. That would be where the wrecker was found. There were still blackened spots on the sandbar where the fuel used to burn the wrecker and its human contents had leaked onto the sandbar. The air smelled of decay. A dead animal somewhere in the woods, most likely.

Across the gurgling river there were thick, green woods, and looking downriver, I saw more of the same on both sides. Looking the other way, I could see the Angelina bridge in the distance and hear cars roaring over it, see fragments of light and metal flashing by.

"Probably brought them here at night," Leonard said. "Too easy to see them down here otherwise. Did what they did, went away in a different ride."

"The fire would have been easy to see."

"But they would light it and go like pyro-bats in the night."

I stood there and looked out at the sandbar and tried to imagine how anyone could be so cold as to do what was done to the Planters. The Earth wouldn't miss them, and they hadn't been doing anyone any good, not even themselves, but still, they were human. And the kid never had a chance. He had been bushwhacked by life.

These days, I often thought about an African antelope I had seen in a film. It was in the water near a riverbank, and hyenas were onshore trying to grab it. They wanted to take the antelope to lunch, so to speak. The antelope used its horns to fight them off and was doing fine because the hyenas didn't want to get in the water, and the antelope knew it was in a good position.

When the hyenas gave up the fight, the antelope took off along the edge of the bank, trotting, almost smiling, having handled itself courageously and honorably.

And then a crocodile rose out of the water and bit the antelope on the hind leg and took it down beneath the water. The antelope's bravery and intelligence were of no importance then.

That was life. It was always waiting to bushwhack you, and it seemed it often did the deed when you were feeling at your best, like the world was your oyster. A moment later, you were the crocodile's oyster and you didn't even get left with the shell.

The moral of the story is: Watch for crocodiles.

We looked around for clues. There was an empty cigarette pack. The cops hadn't bothered with it. It was an odd brand of cigarettes. Red Circle. I looked it up using my phone. They were expensive, and supposedly the tobacco was first soaked in bourbon before it was dried and made into cigarettes. The mouth end of each cigarette had a red band around it. They were starting to be popular up north, but down here in East Texas, they were rare because they cost too much for the average joe to buy.

"What you looking at?" Leonard asked.

I pointed it out to him.

"Could be something, might not be something," he said. "Pack could have washed up here from anywhere."

I leaned over and took a photo of the pack where it lay, then pinched the pack at the top, turned it over, and took another photo.

We looked around a bit more, but there was just more of the same to see. I took the empty cigarette pack with me, put it in a plastic sandwich bag I had brought with me from the house just in case a magnificent clue presented itself. Or maybe a cigarette pack.

Hap Collins, Ace Detective.

We drove away just as the mosquitoes found us and tied on their napkins. When we were back on the highway, Leonard said, "Do you think Belinda, Baby Darling, and those kids are in any danger?"

"Thought about that," I said. "I can't see how they would be. It's not like they've actually done anything. I think they are out of it because they haven't been in it."

We passed a car with a big and beautiful German shepherd in the back seat looking at us. He might have wanted Leonard's baseball cap, and had he asked, I would have suggested Leonard give it to him.

"Looks like Rin Tin Tin," Leonard said.

"The descendant of the original Rin Tin Tin was the one on the TV show we used to watch. Or so they say."

"Yo, Rinty."

"He wasn't very smart."

"Oh, shit. Don't ruin my childhood, Hap. I mean, it's already ruined, but don't shit on the garbage pile."

"That Rinty only did close-ups. He wasn't smart enough to get in out of the rain. He had stunt doubles. I don't remember their names—Bill and Jake will do. I think one of them, let's say Bill, had one eye. You know when they saw Rinty getting his close-ups they were pissed and jealous. They knew they were the ones going to be in the long shots, running into burning buildings, leaping off high rocks, dragging people to safety, some of those people being heavy grown men. The real Rinty was waiting in his trailer being groomed and blow-dried."

"Wasn't just one Rinty?" Leonard said.

"Nope. Jake, the stand-in, probably said, 'Look at that shiny-ass motherfucker getting all those close-ups. He ain't smart enough to lick his own ass.' So now Bill, the other stand-in, one with the eye patch, says, 'No, he isn't. That's your job.'"

"Hap, I worry about you. And please, don't bring up Rin Tin Tin again unless your comments are glorious beyond reason. Let me have my little mythologies of magical dogs."

"The original Rin Tin Tin was truly a genius of a dog. Did you know that?"

"I assumed."

"He didn't have stunt doubles. He had to lick his own ass."

"Kind of like us."

"Without the genius part."

22

We stopped by the office. Brett was there, looking cool in a white shirt, blue jeans with the bottoms rolled up, white tennis shoes without socks. Her red hair was pulled back in a loose ponytail from which strands of hair escaped, likely arranged that way by Brett herself.

I took Doolin's thousand dollars from the desk drawer, placed it on the desk in front of her, told her how I had been hired by Doolin. But except for a name he had given me, Elda Seabrook, I had nothing.

I told her what me and Leonard had done and that we hadn't really learned anything. I showed her the bag with the empty cigarette pack in it.

She took it and put it in the desk drawer. She said, "I'm trying to sort some problems out for Belinda. I learned some things, and one of those things concerns me."

Leonard and I sat down in the client chairs.

"Belinda's older daughter, Sharoline," Brett said.

"Yeah, she mentioned her," I said. "And Doolin mentioned her. Where is this daughter?" I asked.

"Last seen a few years back when she was eighteen. She was arrested a few times for prostitution, drugs, et cetera. Belinda said Sharoline, unfortunately, had the intellect of an unfertilized houseplant."

"Her mother said that?" Leonard said.

"She did," Brett said. "Sharoline was unpopular in school, overweight, needed some dental work, was a shoplifter, and came to think the Planters were her friends. Spent a lot of time with them. She lost weight on the meth diet, got pregnant, had an abortion, which, considering her circumstances, was a blessing. Next thing you know, Sharoline was running dope with her fine friends. She actually cut a few people with a razor for reasons unknown. Belinda said she wouldn't be surprised if she'd killed someone."

"Damn," I said.

"Then she disappeared," Brett said. "Tweakers said she said she was going up north and find a job. Belinda said there wasn't anything she could do up north that she couldn't do here. Not like she had a big skill set. And the body Belinda found out back of her house in the wash—due to the bits of skin and clothes and the hair, Belinda thought it might be Sharoline. That's what made her ill."

I called Justin to see if they could get DNA from Belinda, compare it to the body with skin and hair. I had the phone on speaker so Brett and Leonard could listen.

Justin told me they would. Said, "There used to be a really old black cemetery there until someone bought the land. They bulldozed the headstones and churned up some of the graves, ran cattle there for a while. Now it grows weeds. Meaning it could be an older body that was somehow reasonably well preserved. But I doubt it. My gut tells me Belinda is right. It's Sharoline."

When I ended my phone call with Justin, I said to Brett and Leonard, "The tweakers could have killed her."

"Yeah," Leonard said, "or she and Porky the Party Pig really got ripe on the product one night, and she didn't come out of it. The tweakers, having the brains of a dog turd, might have just buried her, thinking that was the easy answer, and then the flood washed her up."

"We might be filling in things that seem to fit," Brett said. "But it's clear there's a lot more to this whole shebang than we know."

"Like not seeing the alligator but hearing the splashes," I said.

"Do we leave it alone?" Brett asked.

"I'm really not part of the 'we,'" Leonard said. "Not anymore."

We just looked at him.

"What?" he said.

We just kept looking.

Leonard sighed. "Hell, I'm in."

23

I would like to say we rushed out of there ready to crack the case, but that didn't happen. Leonard had to go by the gym and supervise the minor construction work being done. He was having plumbers and carpenters come in to make some changes. He dropped me off at mine and Brett's new place and rolled away.

The day was bright and the sky was clear and blue. The doughy clouds were gone. The sun felt warm on my neck but not uncomfortable. The field where the barn sat had high grass and an old stone bench setting on it. I made a cup of coffee (in my Batman cup, I might add), went there, sat and sipped.

After a while, I reminded myself that the property was almost fifty acres and that the line of woods at the side of the property was something neither me nor Brett had had a look at. We had bought it for the location, the house, and the barn, and we had plenty of woods we hadn't looked through.

I left the cup on the bench and walked to the woods. The grass was thicker near the trees and a little damp. I went into the shadows of the woods, and I could hear water running. There was a stream only a few feet into the trees; it was clear water rolling over white pebbles. I walked up the creek a bit, found a natural rock wall about ten feet high. The bank on either side left a path that could easily be climbed.

The rock wall had a wound in it made by nature. The wound was the source of the little creek's water. It was spurting out like a fountain. I climbed the hill made by the creek bank, maneuvered myself on top of the flat rock, and lay down on the green moss there. I reached down to touch where the water came out. The water was ice cold. I cupped some in my hand and tasted it. When I was a kid, there were lots of springs like that, and not everyone was crapping into the water supply. This water was direct from the Earth's own wells. It was clean and cold and tasted sweet. Some might say water has no taste, but it does. Clear spring water is the most tasteful of all.

I lay on my back on the rock and looked up through the tree boughs. There was some full-on sunlight in spots, but there were mostly shadows from the trees. I felt sleepy.

I closed my eyes and felt more comfortable than I had in a long time. I was one with the rock, the shadows, and the trees. Well, not entirely; my feet sloped somewhat, so I had to readjust myself. As I sat up, I looked down the creek. The water was shiny where the sun crept through and touched it.

Along the bank were a few small uprooted trees, pulled up or knocked over by erosion or storms. The roots were like big fat worms frozen in time, dirt clods hanging from them.

In that moment I had such a deep feeling of nostalgia for my childhood days running the creeks and woods. Sometimes I acquired leeches on my balls from wading in darker and deeper creeks than this one, and I was even nostalgic for the leeches.

I hadn't yet killed anyone back then. I hadn't had to worry about bills and relationships, the idea of growing older and losing one's powers. I hadn't lost mine altogether, but these days it sometimes took more effort to put them together than it once had. I had had such dreams.

Life had offered a number of roads for me to walk down, clear roads full of sunlight and hope, but instead I beat my way through metaphorical briar patch after briar patch with a dull machete, mostly arriving nowhere.

I wanted to go back to being a child, a primitive. I felt like that old Kinks song about how the singer wanted to be an ape man, live in a tree with his ape-man woman and eat bananas all day. I wondered if Brett liked to climb trees. So far in our relationship, it hadn't come up. I was pretty sure she liked bananas.

I watched a small turtle crawl into the water, swim along in the flow of it, around a bend of dirt and trees, and then it was gone. I watched where the turtle had swum for a long time. Birds sang. Water gurgled. There was a wisp of wind blowing through the trees, carrying pine smells and earth smells. The woods were as soothing as a nice bath with fat aromatic pine-scented candles placed on the rim of the tub.

I wanted to lie there until I died.

Maybe I just wanted to die. As of late, my worries and past were almost too heavy to tote.

But I didn't die.

I took a deep breath and climbed down off the rock. A few birds fluttered, and a squirrel yelled at me. The wind sighed once real hard and went silent, like a hospice patient breathing his last. I leaned out and had another handful of spring water and walked back to the bench to get my coffee cup and take it into our new house.

I had no idea how ugly things were about to get.

Over the next few days, I tried to find some connections for the tweakers—the Planters, to be exact—but most of their relatives, except for Doolin and Belinda and even more distant cousins, seemed to have passed on to the great shithole in the sky. As for friends of theirs, I couldn't find any. I damn sure couldn't find the Benefactor. I might as well have looked under my bed for answers.

It didn't surprise me that the Planters' relatives had died of drugs, gunshots, car wrecks, and one of the more stupid ones, a fellow named Guy Planter, had died of complications due to sticking his dick in a hand vacuum. I guess he thought it would suck him off, but instead it tore the skin on his pecker, which became infected. By the time he went in for aid, it had grown green and diseased and it had to be amputated. The dick's owner, the aforementioned Guy Planter, trotted off into the void not long after, hoping, I suppose, to recover his dick in the afterlife and superglue it back into place. What a story he would have to tell around the celestial campfire. He could look Jesus straight in the eye and say, "I was expecting something different."

But it didn't take much for me to find Elda Seabrook, the person Doolin had mentioned. She answered the door without caution, opening it wide. She turned out to be a pleasant-looking middle-aged woman wearing a loose blue pantsuit, living in a nice but not fancy house on the outskirts of Nacogdoches, Texas, with six cats. She had gray streaks in her shoulder-length hair. She looked as if she might have spent her life in academics. But when she moved, I noticed that there was a panther-like grace to her; muscles coiled and stretched under the plain outfit she wore.

She spoke politely, and after I told her why I was there, she let me in.

The house was haunted by cigarette smoke. We went through it, cats trotting almost under Elda's feet, and on through the sliding back door.

We sat at a table in her backyard, which had a tall brick wall around it. The yard was actually a garden and was filled with beautiful flowers and plants, large and succulent-looking. I couldn't help but think of Triffids, or perhaps Audrey Two in Little Shop of Horrors. I noted there was a roll of thick plastic on top of the wall, and it could be pulled over the entire garden if one wanted to bother. Even out there, the air smelled of smoke. The cats probably had lung cancer from the secondary smoke. Elda didn't smoke while we talked, so I was grateful for that. I didn't even see a pack of cigarettes. As we sat there, her prettiness seemed greater than it had at first. There was something stern and thoughtful about her that had tucked her beauty away, but now that she was relaxed, I could see it.

She was baffled by my telling her Doolin had mentioned her. She said she knew Doolin, but only because he had been married to a friend of hers some years back, a lady named Sue Alice Doolin, formerly a Dalton. Being a western history fan, I found that mildly amusing. The Daltons and the Doolins.

She said they didn't have a happy marriage, and she felt Sue Alice had married Doolin because she didn't have many prospects. She wasn't attractive, wasn't a great conversationalist, and was a forty-year-old virgin when she met Doolin. Doolin had been nice enough in the beginning, not bad-looking before he packed on pounds, but, thin or fat, he soon turned into a first-class asshole. Elda was shocked to hear he had been elected sheriff and less shocked to learn he had been removed. He was shady, she said.

Sue Alice Dalton?

Keeping the long list of tragedies I had encountered consistent in their rottenness, Sue Alice had died of a fall from the scenic outlook near Tyler, Texas. It wasn't like that place was much of a cliff or a mountain of great height, but fall off it she did, in the middle of the night. How she ended up there no one knew. No car. Not even a bicycle or an Uber ride. The fall had broken her neck and crushed a small blue glass elephant statue in her coat pocket. Elda suspected Doolin had something to do with her death due to an insurance policy, but Doolin turned out to have an airtight alibi. He'd caught his arm on fire during a backyard cookout and spent a couple days in the burn unit in LaBorde. Elda said the devil was giving him a preview.

It seemed to me the whole mess of these people were cursed.

I was beginning to think good old boy Doolin wasn't telling me all he should be telling me if he wanted me to find something out about a thing he couldn't or wouldn't identify. What the hell was his real game?

And maybe I was just a rotten detective.

We talked a little more, and then I left, leaving Elda, the cats, and the specter of cigarette smoke in the house.

I would have loved to have had Leonard's take on Elda and the stories she told about Doolin and Sue Alice, but he wasn't available. I won't lie to you, it saddened me. Not having him around was like someone had cut off one of my legs.

When I got back to the office, no one was there. I used my key to let myself in. I stood at the window and looked out. The blue sky was fading away as dark clouds rolled in like tumbleweeds. The wind licked the oak next to the parking lot. The leaves on it did the shimmy-shimmy-shake.

I got nervous waiting. I made a phone call to Justin to see if he would tell me anything about the DNA on the woman from the ditch. He surprised me by being forthcoming without my having to get down on my knees and beg. As suspected, it was Sharoline, the daughter of Belinda. They also found out how she'd died: a blow to the head by an unknown object, something with a clawlike shape. She had been buried in the side of that ditch for quite some time, though far less than the other bodies, which had been there for years.

I sat in the office on the couch and thought all manner of thoughts, none of them useful.

When the room darkened, I drove to our original home.

The night was windy, but without rain. The wind slapped the trees on our street around. We still had our bed upstairs, but most of our stuff was now at the new house. Tomorrow the movers would come back for the bed and we would completely relocate to our new location. Leonard was supposed to meet up with me next morning to move things around in the new house. I had yet to tell him about the rock and the spring, but I would, and I'd tell Brett, of course. They would appreciate it. I could still feel its cool shadows and the moss on the rock and I could hear the water shooting out of the rock and splashing in the creek, babbling away.

That night, Brett and I lay in bed under the covers and cuddled. We listened to the wind blow wild and woolly outside the house, whip around the corners squealing as if in pain.

I said, "I don't think there's a real case for me to find anything out about Doolin's fears. He may just be paranoid. Doolin seems to be one of the only relatives of the Planters alive, and he's not actually a close cousin. He's a distant cousin. Elda was friends with Doolin's ex-wife."

"In East Texas, cousins are cousins," Brett said. "And sometimes the cousins are brothers and fathers and uncles and nephews all at the same time."

"Don't be mean." I said this knowing I had thought exactly the same thing earlier—how distant were all those cousins?

"Hap, I'm so tired of seeing ignorance as a profession. Stupidity as a part-time job. After all these years, the mouth-breathers are winning. On both sides of the equation."

"It just seems that way."

"You know why it seems that way?"

“Why?”

“It is that way.”

“Question is, what do I do next for Doolin?”

“I’ll tell you what I would do,” Brett said. “Give him his money back.”

25

Couple days later, I decided to deal with something that didn't have anything to do with Doolin or the dead Planters. I talked to people at a nice petting zoo and they came out to Belinda's to look at Porky. Without his drug habit, he was as passive as a piece of unbuttered toast. The petting-zoo folks patted him.

"We could give him a better home, Mr. Collins."

"He's sort of an inherited pig, and you'd need to talk to the lady in the house there and her kids, but I think if you say how it's best for Porky, they'll be on board."

They did that, and though the kids cried a little and Baby Darling clung to my hand hard enough to rearrange my knuckles, Porky was loaded in a trailer and rolled away, leaving us with nothing more than a satisfied grunt and a whiff of pig shit from the pen.

"You think it's better this way?" Baby Darling said.

"I do. But I left it up to you and your family."

"He'll have a better place to stay, won't he?"

"A porcine paradise," I said.

"Did you know there's a kind of insulin, porcine insulin, obtained from a pig pancreas? Doctors also do porcine skin grafts, skin taken from a pig. I read about it."

"I didn't know either of those things."

"They won't be doing any of that to Porky, will they?"

"Nope. He'll be fine. He'll be better than fine."

Belinda came out and invited me into the house. When we were seated at the kitchen table, glasses of ice tea in front of us, kids out of earshot, I said, "Finding the body must have been quite a shock. But I need you to buck up and be prepared for what I'm about to tell you. The body found out back belongs to your daughter Sharoline. No easy way to say it."

She nodded, her head moving as if heavy on her neck.

"Did Justin already tell you?" I said.

"No."

"She's been buried there a few years, and would still be there had the water not changed course and washed out that ditch."

"Right out back of the house," Belinda said and looked off into some place I couldn't see. "Figured it might be her when they took my DNA. And that bit of hair on the body, it looked like her hair, and the orange tennis shoes. How many people are wearing those things? It's why I ended up in the hospital, thinking it was her. And now I know it was."

Belinda didn't yell or faint or have a heart episode now. One dark surprise and a hospital visit had been enough. She took the news stoically.

"Sharoline was a problem child," Belinda said. "Aggressive. Always stoned or drunk. Started that when she was thirteen. I had her too young, not like the others, and between you and me, I shouldn't have had all them kids. Love them, but I can't take care of them very well. Best thing happened to us was that hog wrecking our house and you, Leonard, and Brett stepping up for me. The kids are not anyone's fault but my own. Never could tell my husband no, and for a long time I thought it was God decided on pregnancy. If my tubes weren't tied due to the last one, I'd be taking pills, and now I support women's right to choose. I never did back then, you know. Killing babies and all that."

I didn't say anything. I just let her run her clock down. Her voice was as flat as the tabletop. All the life had been beaten out of her and laid out to dry so it could turn to dust and blow away.

"I admit to you, Hap," she said, "and I say this sadly, as a Christian woman: I haven't missed her a bit, because anytime she was around or next door with those horrible people, she brought a big tow sack full of drama with her. I loved her, but I didn't like her. She was all wrong in the head, and I don't mean crazy. Just cruel, self-centered, and mean. She spoke to me in terrible ways, made threats.

"When she turned eighteen, she gave me the finger, called me a fat ol' bitch, hit me with a rolled-up magazine, and moved in with them. I looked up one day and she wasn't over there no more and hadn't said anything to anyone about where she was going. Well, up north, they said, but that was it."

It seemed far-fetched, but I decided to ask Belinda something.

"Does the name Elda Seabrook mean anything to you?"

Her face sagged like a soaked washcloth. "Yes. She's the sister of Sue Alice, my cousin's wife."

"The cousin being Doolin, of course."

"Yes. And there were rumors about Doolin and Elda."

"He was cheating on his wife with her sister? Elda? I spoke with Elda. She said Sue Alice was just a friend of hers."

"Sisters," Belinda said. "I can't tell you a lot. I only knew through the grapevine."

"Elda described Sue Alice as shy, retiring, and kind of homely."

“None of those things,” Belinda said. “She was outgoing, gorgeous, and would screw a stick shift while driving around a hairpin curve.”

“So let me be certain of this,” I said. “Elda and Sue Alice were sisters, not friends? And they weren’t even friendly sisters—they hated one another?”

“That’s right.”

The whole business Elda had fed me made me feel like a big donkey’s ass.

26

I was glad we had the money to pay people to move us in the new house, but some of that moving was still going on. I'd thought we were done except for the bed, but nope, Brett reminded me there was stuff in the garage.

Used to be, me and Leonard did all the moving, and there were times when I wanted to just stack some of it up and burn it by the side of the road. Or at least leave it like the old pioneers did when, during their travels, they started up steep inclines and the piano that was to bless their home with music became too heavy in the wagon bed, the chifforobe too cumbersome as it slid from side to side, the iron stove so weighty it pulled down an ascending wagon like a giant hand.

Once, me and Brett went on a vacation in Alaska. We took a horse-riding tour up a long trail in the mountains, a path the old Alaska pioneers had taken, and off to the side of that trail were old wood-burning stoves and rotted possessions. The pioneers couldn't live without these things until they couldn't live with them.

I drove my car out to our new house, a lot of confusion rolling around in my head. I was having a hard time keeping all the stories straight and thinking they might have been more crooked than straight in the first place. Other questions came to mind that I wished I had asked Belinda, but for now they would have to wait.

Brett was already at the new house. She was telling the moving people how the hoss ate the apple, as we used to say. The movers were grumbling, but they were doing as told.

I walked through the house after the movers went out to their truck to add up our bill so far. As I said, there was more to come. It was starting to look nice. The house held more than I thought it would. And as I've noted before, it was bigger than it seemed at first glance. The new furniture smelled like plastic wrap.

It was our plan to turn the barn into a gym and storage area. It was already that way, but we wanted to do more, bring in more exercise equipment. There was enough room in that old thing to build a decent gym, an office, and an aircraft hangar, but only for small jets and helicopters, of course.

Brett said, "Did you give Doolin his money back?"

"I don't know where he is, but when he contacts me, I will."

"You don't sound like you mean it."

"I think I mean it, but maybe not. The whole thing has taken on some new dimensions."

She lifted an eyebrow.

I explained to Brett the new dimensions.

"Maybe that's all the more reason to give him his money back."

"I think I might be too much into it already. You know what I'm wondering? There was this other guy at the wrecker with the Planters. He hasn't turned up again, so he may be dead or he may be in hiding. He might know something about whatever something I need to know about. If I only knew what I needed to know and where that guy was so I could ask him some questions."

The movers came back in, and we signed some papers and gave them a credit card. They stuck the card into an electronic device, gave it back, then drove away in their van.

"Let's you and me go christen the new bed I bought," she said.

"What happened to the old one?"

"Gave it to Goodwill."

"I liked that bed."

"You'll like this one, I promise. I mean, I'm going to be in it."

"That's a very good point," I said.

She was right. I did like the new bed just fine.

27

Come morning we decided not to open the office. We lay in bed and cuddled for a while, then that led to other things. Brett went back to sleep and I got up, pulled my pajama pants on, made coffee, and was scrambling some eggs in butter spray when I heard the flame-haired lioness roar a little. It was Brett's coming-awake roar.

Brett came into the kitchen in her shorty pajamas and a big T-shirt, her hair all ruffled, no makeup. She looked great.

She sat at the table as I put bread in the toaster, then went back to moving the eggs with the spatula. I put the eggs and toast on a plate and placed it in front of her. I got her a fork and knife, put a jar of fig and jalapeño jelly on the table, then fixed my plate. Lastly, I poured two cups of strong coffee and put one at each of our spots, and we sat and smelled the aroma of the food and coffee. It was nice not to be in a hurry.

"Thanks, baby," Brett said.

"If you want, princess, I can chew it for you, spit it into your mouth like you're a baby bird."

"I can handle it from here."

We drank our coffee and had our eggs and toast. Nothing seemed as important as sitting there in silence listening to the morning birds while having our breakfast.

I was looking out the window at the gray morning with wind moving in the trees, thinking it might rain, and in that moment I had a flash of internal lightning.

Nothing real bright, but a crackle of electricity within the brain cells.

I turned and looked at Brett, said, "Why would Doolin tell me about Edna if she was going to tell me he had been married to her best friend who turns out to be her sister? Why would that matter? He acted as if he just knew her name and it might mean something important. Edna suggested he might have killed his ex-wife. He had to have some idea that if I found and talked to her, she would tell me that. That doesn't seem helpful to him. It's not hitting me right all of a sudden. And if Edna lied about who his wife was, didn't admit to me it was her sister, I have to ask why."

“It’s perplexing. Could she have just been stalling?”

“For what? Doolin said to find out if the druggies, or their leader, I guess, were looking for him. He’d know the answer to that without me doing a thing. He’s in hiding, so he has a pretty good idea. I think he wanted me to stumble over something bigger.”

“I’m here if you need me,” Brett said.

“When I figure out what it is I need, then we’ll do it together.”

“You could ask Leonard too.”

“He’s trying to go in another direction and I feel I ought to let him.”

“If you think you two are splitting up, I can assure you, you are not. One way or another, you’ll always be up each other’s asses.”

“I don’t want in his ass, and he doesn’t want in mine.”

“I’m going back to bed,” she said. “You be you.”

28

I put on some sweatpants and sneakers and a ragged T-shirt, and went out to the barn just as the early morning light swelled.

I went in to work on the hanging bag. I got pretty warm. I pulled off my T-shirt and without bag gloves punched the bag. Not hard, but steady. It made my hands hurt a little.

I could feel every blow in my shoulders, and my hips jarred when I hit. I was getting old and not liking it one goddamn bit. The dust that was on the bag filled the air, and sweat was flying off me as I picked up my pace. I hooked the bag over and over, just working on the hooks, no other punches, and then I heard:

"You do all right for an old fart."

I turned and saw Leonard in the doorway of the barn. He looked big and magnificent to me, standing there with the light at his back, the sunlight sliding over his broad shoulders and nestling in the creases in his cowboy hat. Even from that distance, his eyes stood out. No one had eyes like Leonard. They could be scary or amused or, more often than not, both at the same time.

"Brett called. Said you couldn't make it without me."

"Did she?"

"Did."

"Don't see how that could be true."

"She said you were crying your little eyes out."

"You know that ain't right," I said.

"Maybe she didn't put it quite like that, but same thing."

I took a deep breath, threw another low hook, and stepped away from the bag. I pulled on my T-shirt.

"You're looking pretty good there," Leonard said. "You've cut some weight."

"A few pounds."

"I see you still like to throw a hook to the hip area."

"Hurts and immobilizes," I said.

"Or you can break your fist on a hip bone."

"Not so far."

"Want to go up to the house and have a cup of coffee? I can tell you what you're doing wrong."

"Damn, I'm lucky you're here."

"Of course you are."

Brett was out of bed and dressed in jeans and a sweatshirt, barefoot, when we came in. She had coffee going again, and some vanilla cookies on a plate for Leonard. She had some animal crackers for me and her.

We sat down and had coffee and cookies. As was his manner, Leonard pulled the plate of vanilla cookies close to him. I've never known anyone that liked anything like he liked those cookies. If I ate them like he did, I'd weigh three hundred pounds. That was all right. I had my animal crackers, but I didn't go to bed dreaming about them, though the bears were kind of cute.

Brett said to me, "Tell him about what you don't know."

"He knows most of it," I said.

"Tell him the parts he doesn't know."

I did that.

"Well," Leonard said. "You know what the answer is."

"No."

"The elephant of surprise."

"Who am I surprising?"

"Doolin."

"Just said I don't know where he is."

"He's not Casper the Ghost," Leonard said. "Though he is pale enough. He went somewhere to hide from someone he thinks wants to kill him?"

"That's what he said."

"You are a detective," Leonard said.

"Not a good one."

"Oh, I don't know," Brett said. "You have your moments, baby. Remember, you found your missing sock under the bed."

"That's true."

"Okay," Brett said. "Truth is, you're both pretty lousy. But you are determined."

"I'm retired from the detective business, except when I'm not," Leonard said. "Why don't you and me go back and see Elda. Elda worried Doolin. Why? What can she do to him? And she lied to you. Why?"

"It may be because she's used to it," I said. "Lying, I mean. She's certainly good at it."

"Which, considering what you know now, all the connections she and Doolin have, that is some hot bullshit fresh from the bull's ass."

"Been thinking the same," I said.

"Let's see if Elda is up for a visit," Leonard said. "Confront her on the sister stuff. It might throw her off her line of crap, and she might even tell you some truth."

"Sounds like a plan," Brett said. "And I'll go with you. Elda might prefer talking to a woman."

"I got another plan first," Leonard said.

29

After coffee, me and Brett put on some better clothes, and the three of us went over to Belinda's in the Prius.

It was Saturday, so Belinda's kids were out of school.

We knocked and were invited in. Baby Darling came close to us, said, "I'm so glad to see you."

She was such a little grown woman, I almost felt like crying. All that potential. I certainly hoped she'd have a chance to use it.

What Leonard had planned was a trip to the petting zoo. We took two cars, ours and Belinda's. Baby Darling rode with us, the rest with Belinda. We drove there and saw the animals, including Porky. The kids loved on rabbits, goats, a Shetland pony, a loudmouthed donkey, puppies, and kittens. It was soothing.

I liked seeing Baby Darling acting her own age, excited and giggling and petting the animals. I guess if she never got to use her extraordinary intellect to bust atoms or search the solar system, she could run her own petting zoo. At least animals were honest and deserved love.

We spent a couple hours there, and by that time every critter in the place had had its fur creased and stroked by all of us.

"Them's some happy brats," Leonard said.

We took everyone to Dairy Queen for hamburgers and ice cream. The kids ended up wearing ketchup and mustard like war paint, and my heart really felt good to see it.

After the kids and Belinda were dropped off, full of animal love, burgers, French fries, and ice cream, we drove over to pay Elda a visit.

30

When we got to Elda's, Leonard and Brett stayed in the car. I went to the door. I knocked, and when I did, the door swung in and I was looking into the darkness of the house. I could smell something that made the hairs on the back of my neck rise up. It was the biting, coppery smell of drying blood.

I tapped the door wider with my foot and stuck my head inside.

I glanced toward the Prius and saw Leonard and Brett had already eased out of it. Brett had her ASP baton in her hand, her purse slung over her shoulder like an ammunition pack. As for Leonard, his weapon was him.

I heard a rustling, then someone moving through the house; a door creaked. I blindly went in and fell over an ottoman tucked up tight in the shadows.

I got up quick at a tight crouch. My eyes were adjusting to the dark. I pulled the pistol from under my shirt and started moving toward where I had heard the sounds.

On through the house I went, banging into things, out to the back garden where me and Elda had sat. I could see there were marks on the fence where muddy boots had scuffled to get over it.

I jumped, grabbed the top of the fence, and pulled myself up. I hung there and looked in both directions. It was broad daylight so the view was clear. A dirt alleyway with a few small wild trees growing up against the house. Two trash cans circled by flies.

Whoever had just climbed over that fence was gone. It was like they had turned to air.

I dropped back into the garden. Leonard was there by then. I heard Brett say, "Oh, boys. You'll want to see this."

I wasn't sure I did.

Me and Leonard went swiftly through the house and came into the bedroom just as Brett was dropping the ASP into her purse.

On the bed was a bloody mess wearing bloody clothes. At first it looked like a sex doll full of strawberry jelly had exploded. There wasn't any face left. Blood was on the ceiling and sliding off the walls. A shiny blue automatic pistol lay on the floor with an amputated hand still holding it. Elda had pulled the gun from an open drawer in the nightstand but was a little too slow. She had had her hand chopped off by something. Sword or ax or very sharp knife. Whoever had done it had been quick. The rest of what happened to her body came later.

If that wasn't enough, the closet door was open and Sheriff Crank was sitting in it on top of some clothes that had fallen down. His hat was in his lap, and it was filled with gore and brains. The top of his head was missing. It hadn't been shot off but chopped clean. He had a look on his face like "Now this is certainly a surprise."

His hand was on the gun in his holster. His legs were stretched out and his ankles were crossed.

"There's more," Brett said.

We looked into the bathroom off the bedroom. The tub was full of water and the water was full of dead cats, un-chopped.

"What if this fucker is still in the house?" Leonard said.

There was a creepy ticktock moment as time took a vacation. I felt chill bumps pop up all over.

"Perhaps we should step outside," Brett said, pulling the ASP from her purse and snapping it out to its full length.

We cautiously made our way out of the house, stopped outside, and leaned on the Prius. Took in some air that wasn't filled with blood. Still, the smell inside had given me a coppery taste on my tongue and I felt as if the stink of it had been poured over me out of a slop jar.

"What the hell is Sheriff Crank doing here?" I said.

"That is the question, brother," Leonard said.

"And a more important question," Brett said. "Why are they chopped up? And what's with the cats that aren't chopped up?"

"We could just leave," I said.

"Surely some neighbor has seen us," Brett said. "They identify the car, that will make it look worse for us. We have to call it in."

Leonard called 911.

I called Justin directly.

We waited. No one with an ax or a sword came out of the house. The killer could still be in there, but those dirty boot marks on the back fence suggested otherwise. Still, way those bodies looked, there might have been more than one, and maybe they all didn't go over the wall, and one of the killers was in fact hiding in the house. Thought of that made my skin crawl again.

Justin showed up with a crew of folks. Some of those folks were Nacogdoches law. Justin was out of his jurisdiction still, but he came when I called. He could help the Nacogdoches cops, as he had some experience with this case. It all had to be connected, right?

He came over and looked at us. Brett collapsed the baton and put it in her coat pocket.

Justin watched her do this, then said, “You assholes armed?”

“What, us?” I said.

Justin gave Brett the side-eye. “I saw you close your weapon,” he said. “I was going to let it go, but I better not. Give it to me.”

Brett took it from her pocket and handed it to him. He pulled on a disposable glove.

“All right, what kind of messy bullshit have you people stepped into, and why?”

I told him. After all, Doolin was my client and coming here had been in service to that.

“That’s just swell,” he said. “And now you’ve messed up the crime scene. I could have you arrested for that. Breaking and entering too. Nacogdoches cops would gladly clap your asses in their jail. I hear it’s very nice.”

“Door wasn’t locked, was partially open, and I had a feeling something was wrong.”

“A feeling?” he said.

“Call it experience,” I said. “And a smell like a slaughterhouse.”

“That’s wonderful,” Justin said. “You three find bodies easier than flies.”

“Buzz-buzz,” Leonard said.

“That sounded a lot like the carpenter fairies,” I said.

“No,” Leonard said. “It’s a smaller buzz, but similar.”

31

We spent a lot of time at the Nacogdoches police station, through the day and into the night. We had plenty of experience with police stations, but at least the Nacogdoches one was arranged different.

As for the LaBorde station, I felt we frequented it enough, we ought to have had our own chairs with our names on them and our favorite snacks on hand.

I don't remember how many times they separated us and had us tell our stories, always saying to each of us that the others had told a different story.

We knew better than that. Standard cop trick.

Justin and the Nacogdoches cops conferred with one another. I could see them through the open door standing in the hallway talking. It might have been a stunt to make me nervous.

They left me alone so long one time, I got on the table and took a nap. It wasn't a good nap, but it was a nap. It might have been better had they not awakened me so soon after I fell asleep and made me get off the table.

When they let us go, the sun was coming up. I thought it looked sort of tired, like it might want to sleep in and have breakfast in bed.

Outside the station, Justin followed us and took time for some more mean words and insults. Leonard said, "Let us know if you find anything so we can solve it for you."

"Fuck you, smart-ass," Justin said.

"All of me is smart, not just the ass."

We got out of there without Leonard getting us pulled back in for a long day behind bars. They even gave Brett her ASP back. I didn't think those things were legal, but I didn't bring that up. I mean, hell, you could walk around with a machine gun, but an ASP, maybe not.

As Leonard drove me and Brett home, he said, "Call me a curious guy. I was thinking this was about a simple bunch of tweakers, but with what we found today, I'm not so sure. And I got to figure, something like this, with you being old and dilapidated, Hap, old buddy, you might need me to save your ass."

"What about me?" Brett said.

"Not worried about you," Leonard said.

“Oh,” Brett said. “Well, okay. That sounds right.”

32

That afternoon, as I sat at the kitchen table talking to Brett, wondering what was next, some of it got answered for me. My phone buzzed. It was Doolin.

"It's him," I mouthed to Brett. "Where are you, man?" I asked.

"I'd rather not say." He sounded as if he had a gun to his head.

"One thing you better well say is what this is really about. You better say that for sure. You hired me to find out if someone is after you, and you already know there is. Got to be more to it. And Elda. Hell, man, you knew Elda. You were married to her sister."

"You found Elda?"

"Yeah."

"I see," he said.

I tried to decide if he was being coy or just stupid. Maybe he was a bit of both.

I told him what had happened, what me and Brett and Leonard had found.

He turned as quiet as a stuffed and mounted parakeet. I looked at Brett, who was waiting for me to tell her the results of the call. I wanted to put it on speaker but thought that might scare Doolin off. A moth in a jar beating its wings might scare him off.

It took a while, but he finally spoke.

"Elda is dead?"

"Got to figure she's not coming back from that," I said. "So, yes. Dead. You better have something you can tell me. More than you have, or you can come by and collect your thousand. Fact is, I prefer you do that and leave me out of this business, whatever it is. It seems to involve people dying. And don't give me that line about 'I was trying to help my sack-of-shit cousins.' I don't think you'd help an old lady across the street if she offered to blow you."

"What does the old lady look like?" Doolin said.

"Fuck you."

"I don't want my money back."

"Then you better bark like a big dog, buddy."

"What I tell you, I'd like to know you'll keep it close to your chest."

I had already mentioned him to Justin at Elda's house. But fuck him.

"Depends on what you tell me. I'm not making you any promises. Not one at all. I'll say this, I'll do my best to be quiet about it if I feel I can. Best I can offer. Looks bad for me, I'll blab until they have to gag and sedate me."

He gave me the stuffed-parakeet routine again.

Brett reached out and patted my hand. She knew I wasn't particularly patient. Getting better as I aged, but no one was going to confuse me for the Buddha on a meditation retreat.

"Look, man," I said. "Tell me something or get the fuck off the phone. I got laundry to sort."

He took a while to answer. "Can we meet at your office tonight?"

"We can."

"I can sneak better at night."

"Sneak there just after dark. I'll be waiting. I advise you to use throwaway phones if you really think some bad folks are following you. But you do you."

When I hung up, Brett said, "I'll be there too."

"He sounded odd," I said. "Almost like someone was feeding him lines."

"Think so?"

"Not sure."

I called Leonard, told him what Doolin had said.

"I wouldn't trust him."

"I don't. Why I called you."

"I'll be outside the office waitin in case it looks wrong. I can park out back, then walk around to the side, hide behind the edge of the building. I'll be carrying a gun. You might want to do the same."

"Bet Doolin parks out back," I said. "Maybe you should park down the street and walk up. Otherwise he'll see your truck, and he's seen it before. He's seen you."

"Better plan, for sure. Hey, y'all have any vanilla cookies around? Pookie, that cocksucker, ate mine. The wedding might be off."

"I'll bring some," I said.

33

The wind was still and the night was sliding down softly when me and Brett started out. She had her ASP. I had a .32 revolver in my coat pocket. It was too warm for a coat, but I often wore a light one because it gave me extra pockets. I had a box of vanilla wafers with me.

We arrived when it was solid dark. There was no one that we could see. If the night had been any more still, we'd have been in an oil painting. The parking lot had enough lights to make me feel a little secure.

A little.

We got out of the car and I led upstairs, Brett holding the box of cookies. I slipped the .32 snub-nosed revolver from my pocket, hoping I wouldn't have to shoot anyone, but if I had to, I was kind of hoping it would be Doolin.

I didn't see Leonard anywhere, but that didn't mean he wasn't around. Maybe out behind the dumpster near the bottom of the stairs. He was reasonably stealthy if he didn't trip over something.

I climbed up and checked the doorknob. Locked. Of course, but if someone were really sneaky, he could have picked the lock, gone inside, locked it back with the push lock. He could be sitting on our couch with a shotgun or maybe even a small antiaircraft gun.

I unlocked the door, put out my hand to hold Brett back, pushed the door. It swung into the dark. I flipped on the light.

Nothing.

All right, then.

We slipped inside and Brett closed and locked the door. I looked in the bathroom and the closet. Nothing there other than what should be there. I made a mental note to put another roll of toilet paper in the bathroom, as that one was looking low. When I was nervous, worried, or scared, my mind picked up minutiae, like needing toilet paper, and there wasn't a thing I could do about it.

"Do you really think Doolin might be up to something?" Brett said.

"He could be."

I was thinking about how he sounded on the phone. Trying to pass a few cute lines but sounding as if the lines were bumping over potholes.

I turned on the desk lamp and turned off the overhead, eased to the curtains, pushed one of them aside. I rolled the blinds open. Nice well-lit parking lot with one car in it. Ours.

I looked left and right. If there was anyone out there, they were ghosts. I pulled the curtains closed.

We sat on the couch. I looked at my watch. Still early.

While we waited upstairs, Leonard could be wrestling a racoon in the parking lot. Fighting a possum for something from the dumpster. Maybe he was peeing into the hedges that separated us from an apartment complex.

Beneath us was an empty store that for a long time had been a bicycle shop owned by a lady who wore very short blue jean shorts most of the time and looked good in them.

She eventually sold out. Several businesses had passed through that space without sticking anywhere near as long as the bicycle shop. I wondered if jean-shorts lady had opened another shop. Or had she gone into high finance? Maybe she was married with a kid now. Maybe she had moved to Arizona. I hoped she still had her blue-jean shorts and they fit her.

All of this was something to play around in my mind while we waited. I heard the slight noise of a motor. We slipped over to the window and I looked out one side while Brett looked out the other. There was a car parked beside ours. It was baby-shit yellow. The lights from the parking lot were bright enough for me to see it could use a full run-through at the car wash.

A white Ford van hummed into the lot and parked behind it. A young woman got out of the baby-shit yellow car and walked out to meet the van.

Three young women, athletic in a shot-put-tossing kind of way, got out of the van. They were all wearing dark jeans, T-shirts, and sneakers. They had their hair pulled back and had black greasepaint stripes on their faces. They were heading toward the stairs. Two were carrying hatchets, one an ax. I doubted they were freelance volunteer firewomen.

We could hear them coming up the steps. Then there was a pause; I could almost feel their weight on the stairs. Brett and I moved to stand in front of the couch.

Someone knocked politely.

I looked at Brett and shook my head.

“Of course not, they have axes,” she said.

There was a tremendous sound as something hit the door, then we heard the stairs shake. They were rushing back down. I peeled back the curtain, looked out the window. The women were getting in the van. The one that had had the ax no longer had it.

The Ford van went away, gliding as slick as if it were sliding on greased Teflon.

I opened the door. The big ax was stuck in it. There was a note between the blade of the ax and the door. I pulled the note loose. The parking-lot lights let me see it clearly.

It read: It's best to leave this one alone.

My cell rang. It was Leonard.

"Had my eye on them," he said. "I'm back in my truck, following them now. You brought the cookies?"

"Yes. Stay focused. They looked like they meant business, so be careful."

"Don't forget to take the cookies home with you. I'll be looking for a reward for finding out where they're going. I'll meet you at your house. Maybe you could make sure you have milk. Know what I'm saying?"

"Yeah," I said. "You want cookies and milk."

"My man," Leonard said.

We took a peek in the baby-shit yellow car. The back seat had a naked body on it. It was chopped into chunky pieces and they had loosely been put back into position, as if about to be sew together. The body was on top of several black trash bags. Blood had run down the side of the bags and onto the floorboards. The car smelled like a butcher shop.

There was enough left of one side of the body's face to tell it was Doolin. His dick was in his mouth; his balls dangled on his chin. His body was so gory, I didn't realize at first that his skin was missing. There were a few rags of flesh still hanging off him, like poorly stripped wallpaper. I would have hated to be the lady who drove that car, way it smelled. I think I would have called in that I had a headache, maybe gout. Told them my driver's license had expired. Anything to stay out of that car.

Of course, driving that car beat being Doolin.

"I guess we get to keep the thousand," Brett said.

"Guess so."

We called Justin. He came out himself with none other than Pookie. Pookie was in plain clothes, as his new detective position warranted. He nodded at us.

"There's a body in the car," I told Justin as he walked up, hands in his pockets.

"Ah, my body magnets. So good to see you."

He and Pookie looked in the car. Justin said, "Friend of yours?"

"You know him," I said.

Justin pulled on gloves, opened the back door on the passenger's side, leaned in, scrunched up his nose, and studied the face in the parking lot's lights.

"Oh," he said. "Cowboy Doolin, mostly peeled with a mouthful of his own dick. Very Deep Throat."

"Yep."

"Someone killed him and just happened to leave him and his dick in the parking lot next to your car?" Justin said.

"Not exactly."

We told him why we were there. I didn't hide anything. I told him

I'd thought I was meeting with Doolin. But most likely the Hatchet Girls had arranged it, had found Doolin, had him call and ask me to come to the office so they could warn me off things. Maybe they meant to kill me, but the locked door gave them a bit of pause. Of course, before they arrived, they had trimmed Doolin up a bit. I told Justin there was an ax in the door and a note if he'd like to look at it.

By this time, other law and secondary help had arrived. They were carefully removing the body and placing it in a meat wagon while others hooked Doolin's car to a wrecker. A lot of photos were taken.

The four of us went up to our office. Me and Brett sat on the couch. Pookie stood nearby, hands clasped in front of him. Justin sat on a corner of the desk, legs crossed, showing us a well-polished shoe sole. He took our official statement. We told him the same thing we told him in the parking lot. He recorded us this time, with our permission.

Justin didn't bother to take us in for questioning. He'd had enough of that.

Not for a moment did I think Justin thought we killed Doolin. He might have thought we knew more than we did, but us murdering Doolin, putting his chopped-up body in the back seat of his car, then calling the law seemed unlikely.

"Just go home," Justin said. "If you decide to move out of state, that would be nice."

Justin went out. He took the ax and the note with him.

Pookie followed. He paused at the door, looked back, and nodded. I gave him a little wave, said, "Leonard isn't here," and let it go at that.

Brett and I sat for a moment and stared at each other. I don't know if we were confused or relieved or what.

We locked up and went downstairs, watching carefully for women with hatchets. Brett had her ASP extended and ready to go. I had my hand on the revolver in my pocket.

Nothing, thank goodness.

35

Me and Brett were sitting up half-assed watching a television show, worried about Leonard, waiting to hear from him, when he called. He sounded a little shaky. Said he was almost to our house, and if we were minus pants, we might want to put some on. We had pants on.

I felt relieved. I couldn't have told you what we had been watching on TV if my life depended on it. I was so deep in worry for what the hatchet ladies might do to Leonard should they catch him, I couldn't concentrate on much. But perhaps I should have been worried about them.

I turned off the TV and moved into the kitchen. I had Leonard's box of vanilla cookies out. Brett made hot chocolate and put our cups on the table an instant before Leonard arrived. We had milk too if he still wanted that.

When he came in, his head was bloody, as were his shoulders. The blood had soaked into his clothes. He was walking all right, but damn.

"What happened to you?" Brett said.

"Girls with hatchets. Turns out there were more than three. There were five. Now they are back to three."

"Sit down," I said. I told him about us finding Doolin in the back seat of his car, skinned and chopped up.

"That's some gory shit," Leonard said.

Brett got a hand towel and a bottle of alcohol and used them to clean a wound on his face. He had a thin cut from the bottom of his ear down to his chin. His shoulder was bleeding. Brett put the towel under his shirt and pressed against the wound.

"That's pretty deep," Brett said.

Leonard said, "Yep. Feels that way."

As he ate cookies and sipped hot chocolate, Brett, without saying a word, cut his shirt off of him with scissors, removed the formerly white but now red towel, and looked at the wound. Once upon a time she had worked as a nurse.

"It's a mess," she said.

"Packed some mud on it to help stop the bleeding. Makes it look worse than it really is."

She cleaned the wound with water, then alcohol. Leonard took no notice of it, having his true love at hand—vanilla wafers.

"You need to go to the hospital," Brett said. "I've done all I can do with what I have."

"That might be a bad idea," Leonard said. "How do I explain this wound?"

"Freelance lumberjack thought you were a tree?" I said.

"Don't see that flying," he said.

"You didn't do anything wrong," I said. "You followed them. You are a private detective sometimes, and we wanted to know who was coming to see us. You followed and were attacked. That flies fine."

Leonard sat silent for a moment. Then: "There's a bit more than following to it. If you go out along Highway Seven, take a turn at Seven-Two-Four, go down that road a good bit, and on the left, there's a barn and an old house. There's a cattle guard and a pasture full of dead coastal hay. Behind the barn is a water drain. A ditch, essentially. One of the Hatchet Girls is lying there with a gunshot wound in the head. I was aiming for her chest, but either way, it worked out. I go to the hospital, Justin starts nosing around, finds out I shot her with an unregistered gun, things could get sticky, even if it was self-defense. He might be fine with it in the long run, and then again, maybe not."

"I don't know they care one way or the other about registered or unregistered guns these days," I said.

Somehow what he said about leaving one in a ditch hadn't fully registered until a heartbeat later. I was too deep in worry about that shoulder wound.

"Had to. Wanted to. Would do it again. Listen, Jim Bob's veterinarian, one that works off the books, isn't far from here. You remember, we used him before. You know the one I mean. Place smells like a tobacco barn. I think I'm going to need him. I'm feeling a little weak, even though I'm sustaining my magnificent body with vanilla cookies. Vanilla heals wounds."

"I don't think so," Brett said.

I stepped over and looked at Leonard's wound. I couldn't tell if it was as bad as I first thought or worse. Even though Brett had cleaned it, there were still mud chunks in the wound.

"At least you stopped bleeding, but it still looks messy," I said.

"I can do only so much with a damp towel," Brett said.

"You did fine," Leonard said, "and I appreciate it."

"How did you end up being a chopping block?" I asked.

"Those bitches outsmarted me. I followed them and thought I had them figured out. Reckoned I'd find where they hung out, then we'd have their location known. But it was me that got snookerflaugened."

"What the hell is snookerflaugened?" Brett said.

“German word for messing up,” Leonard said.

“You just made that up,” I said. “Only word you know in German is ‘bratwurst.’”

“Maybe, but its meaning is clear. They turned the tables on me.”

“Hold that story,” Brett said. “We need to call that vet. You’ve started bleeding again.”

He had indeed.

“It’s beginning to smart a mite since the adrenaline wore off. Besides the one I shot, I hit one of them so hard, I knocked her through a door and into another room. Small woman. Lost some teeth. I felt bad about it for about three seconds. She was the bitch that chopped me. Frankly, I wouldn’t have cared if she was eight years old, weighed twenty pounds soaking wet, was in leg braces, and had to stand on a stool to hack me. I hope I hit her so hard they have to replace not only her teeth but her face and buy her a new personality.”

I called the vet. He coughed for a while before he said yes, he was Flannagan. I told him who gave us his home number, which was Jim Bob. He said it would cost us.

Of course it would. Everything did.

When we heard the car come up, I went to the door and held it open. Flannagan came out of his car with a cigarette dangling from his mouth, coughing a little. He was carrying a black bag like an old-time doctor. He was nearly bald, bony, and slumped. He walked like he had rocks in his shoes. He had a face like fifty miles of bad road that ended at a bomb crater.

Just before coming through, he thumped his cigarette into the dirt. He flowed into the house like a wraith. He smelled strongly of tobacco and slightly of alcohol—and I don't mean the rubbing kind.

He went over and glanced at Leonard's wound. "Uh-huh," he said. He washed his hands at the sink and set the doctor's bag on the table.

"Had a German shepherd with a bad cut not too unlike this. Got in a dogfight. Damn Chihuahua was relentless. Shepherd got hold of that bastard by the ear, but that little dog just shook like a maraca, landed on its feet, and attacked again. Shepherd was traumatized. I bet he never had another day when he could hold his head up. A big rat whipped his ass. Let's see. Ax wound, right?"

"You got good eyes," Leonard said.

"Lots of experience."

"Wait," I said. "So you're saying the big dog had an ax wound on account of the Chihuahua used an ax on him?"

"That's some funny shit," Leonard said.

Flannagan said: "I've seen real ax wounds. Humans aren't exactly my prime example for who should survive a nuclear war. Dogs and cats should rule the world. Well, dogs. Cats are a bit too pragmatic. I've seen some nasty stuff humans do. Once sewed the head back on a poodle. I mean, it was still attached and the throat was good, but I had to do a lot of work. That was an ax wound. His master did that on account of the dog crapped on his new carpet. Took it outside, tried to chop its head off. Jim Bob knew the guy in passing, was coming to his house to get back his lawn mower the guy had borrowed. Jim Bob seen what was happening, took the ax from the guy, beat him like he was the French army, saved the dog, got him to me just in time. He was so pissed off, he went back to the guy's house, kicked in the door, and beat him again. The law was not called.

"When it was over, Jim Bob could say, 'Hop like a frog,' and that asshole would have said, 'How high, master?' Guy wasn't going to be calling any cops or borrowing Jim Bob's lawn mower again. When Jim Bob got the mower, he started it up and mowed down the fellow's flower bed. Said the guy just stood at the window and watched him like he had hired him to do it.

"Found a home for the dog. Dog lived another ten years, just couldn't look over its shoulder on the left side. Needed a wing mirror."

"Am I going to need a wing mirror?" Leonard asked.

"No, but you're going to be sore as all get-out for a while."

"I heal fast," Leonard said.

"Then you got that on your side," Flannagan said. "You put this mud in the wound?"

"Did."

"Not a smart idea. I'm going to need to clean you up really good before anything else. Strong enough to take a shower?"

"Strong enough to tell King Kong to wipe my ass and make sure the job was done," Leonard said.

"Go shower. Use warm water and soap."

"I'll find you a shirt and pants," I said, "though they won't fit so good."

When Leonard came out, Flannagan was telling us about the time a fellow brought in a puppy he'd found and wanted to keep it. Turned out to be a little bear cub. It survived and ended up in the zoo, which was better than in that guy's bedroom, him trying to teach it to sit and play fetch.

"At first and second glance," Flannagan said, "it did look like a dog. Shit, even I was fooled for a while."

Leonard had on a pair of my sweatpants, which fit better than I'd expected, but he had yet to put the shirt on. He was barefoot. The doctor had him sit, then went back at the shoulder. He gave him a shot to numb the area and started sewing Leonard up. Brett and I found something to do in the living room. I hate seeing people sewed up. I once sewed myself up, but that doesn't mean I liked it. I did what I had to do.

The doctor was there another hour or so, making sure all seemed good. When he had Leonard sewn up and bandaged, he gave him a couple of pills, then sat and drank a cup of coffee I made for him. By this time Leonard had on my shirt and we were all sitting at the table. The doctor helped himself to some of Leonard's cookies. I could see a dark cloud move over Leonard's face.

I said, "So, Doc, how much do we owe you?"

"Call it a thousand."

“How about we call it five hundred and that cup of coffee.”

“I’m working illegally. I’m not even a human doctor. I could do jail time for this, lose my vet license. I’m also leaving him some pain pills. They aren’t cheap. I have a feeling you boys might need me again. I get that feeling from knowing Jim Bob. I got you on my list. You’re on my list, I show up when you need me. One thousand smackers.”

He left with eight hundred smackers. I keep some bills stashed in the cookie jar for just such emergencies.

Me and Brett wanted the rest of Leonard’s story, but the pills Flannagan had given him were starting to kick in. We waltzed him to the couch. He went to sleep almost immediately. Brett put a blanket over him.

I called Pookie. I told him what we’d learned, knowing it wasn’t going to go to Justin.

“I’ll come get him,” Pookie said.

“If you like, but he’s fine here.”

“Except for getting chopped in the shoulder with a hatchet.”

“There’s that. My advice, it’s late, let him sleep. He’s had some pills and is out like a light. Can you come get him in the morning?”

“After ten, I can. I have to look at a wedding venue at eight. I’m off work tomorrow.”

“I’ll watch over him.”

“I know you will. Give him a kiss for me.”

“Not happening.”

37

It was closer to ten thirty the next morning when Pookie arrived. He brought with him a very large, unhealthy box of doughnuts.

Leonard had gotten up before we did. He was sitting at the table. The box of vanilla cookies was gone. He either ate all of them or tucked them away somewhere. Maybe in his pickup. Vanilla cookies were definitely his kryptonite. Dr Pepper was a close second. I like both, but not together.

Pookie put the doughnuts on the table, gave Leonard a kiss. "You had me worried. But you look like the same asshole as always."

"I assure you, I am, and I have the same asshole you know in the same place."

"Oh, a queer joke," Pookie said. "Very good, Leonard. Snap."

We ate some doughnuts and Leonard told us in greater detail what had happened to him.

"I was peeking out from behind a dumpster, swatting at flies and mosquitoes. I was starting to consider changing positions, then I saw the women with hatchets show up, go upstairs, then I saw them running back down the stairs toward their car. I ran to my truck. Had it parked down the street a ways. I drove in the direction they had gone and pretty soon caught up with them.

"They went out of LaBorde on Highway Seven. They turned right at a blinking yellow light and rode along on that road for a while. Took a left off the road, across a cattle guard, toward a barn about the size of the one here. A few weak lights came on in a couple of windows.

"Being sneaky, I stopped outside the pasture and watched as they drove their van behind the barn. I got my pistol and walked from there. It was a pretty good hike. I wanted to know what kind of setup they had.

"When I got to the edge of the barn, I peeked around the corner and a hatchet came whizzing toward me. Jerked my head back enough it missed. Just barely. They had been onto me all along.

"Looked back around the corner of the barn. The girl threw the ax, black girl with dreads, pulled a pistol from her belt, shot at me as I was moving toward her. She missed. I didn't. She rolled in front of their van, down a hill, and into a ditch.

"The door at the back of the barn was open. I looked in. The place had been fixed up with rooms. Someone had turned it into a rough home. I slipped inside. That's when Miss Chops a Lot came out of the shadows yelling. She hit me in the shoulder with the hatchet. She was a solid girl with enough meat on her to generate a solid strike. I almost went to the floor but somehow kept my footing. I like to think the reason was my extreme manliness.

"I hit her with a left, knocked her so hard against a closed door, it came off the hinges. She went tumbling into the other room. I was going to shoot her but paused when I saw she was out and her nose was on her cheek. I stepped inside the room, saw an open door that led outside.

"When I turned around, the one I'd hit was being pulled away by her feet. I couldn't see who had her, just saw her pulled around the corner. I fired a shot for the hell of it, hit the wall by the door. I heard some scuffling in the other room. Fired another shot so they didn't think I was napping.

"I waited a few moments, watching to see if a head poked back in. It didn't. Made my way to the open door where I had come in. They were in the van, blew by me on their way out. An older lady was driving. Not real old, but older than the girls. Can't say as I got a really good look at her.

"By the time I pulled myself together, I wasn't feeling so good. I walked down to the ditch and saw they hadn't found the one I shot. She lay facedown in shallow water. Her dreads were spread out and floating around her head. I got over close, used my phone light. My shot had gone out the back of her head, made a hole I could have put my fist through. I didn't roll her over, but she looked really young, early twenties maybe.

"I scooped a handful of mud, put it in my wound, walked down to my truck, and came here.

"For the record, I don't think that old barn was where they were staying. I didn't see much in the way of furniture or goods. But there was electricity. I figured the barn was a place they knew, lured me there to kill me. But they didn't know what a badass I am."

38

Poor baby,” Pookie said.

“Am I going to get some sympathy loving later?” Leonard asked.

“Absolutely,” Pookie said. “After you shower and use a lot of soap.”

“Since you didn’t get a good look at the inside of the place,” I said, “I think I should drive out there and check it over.”

“Probably safe now,” Leonard said, “but they could come back. I’m going with you.”

“You’re bandaged up,” I said.

“Hap’s right,” Pookie said. “You should give it a rest.”

“Does that sound like me?” Leonard said.

“No,” Pookie said. “But it might be time for it to start sounding like you. Time to start resting more.”

“Don’t play the old-man card on me. I can still fight and fuck and eat cookies all night if I took a mind to do it. I’d just be a little more tired come morning.”

Pookie knew he was defeated. He said, “Hap, watch over him.”

“I will,” I said.

“I’m going too,” Brett said.

“I’d go,” Pookie said, “but as a cop, if I was found out, I could end up with my dick in a vise. I’m better being your eyes and ears in the department. I’ll see if there’s anything on these Hatchet Girls.”

“That would be nice,” I said. “I’m still trying to figure out why Elda and Sheriff Crank were killed. The Hatchet Girls seem responsible, but the question is why. And who was the older lady you saw, Leonard?”

“Damn sure wasn’t Mother Teresa risen from the grave,” he said.

“Girl Scout leader?” Pookie said.

“Hell of a night they had if they were selling cookies,” Brett said.

39

Brett bounced the car over the cattle guard and drove up behind the place. No vans were present.

It was windy. Shingles flapped in the wind like gossiping tongues. Boards squeaked. The back door was open.

“Let’s check for the body,” Leonard said.

We made our way to the ditch and looked. No body. But there was an imprint in the mud where someone had lain and drag marks from where they had been hauled up the hill.

“They came back for her,” Leonard said. “Points for loyalty.”

“Here,” Brett said, and handed us each a pair of disposable gloves. We put them on, then we put on paper footies. She had come prepared. “And we should wipe down any places you think you touched, Leonard.”

Inside the house, sunlight slipped through gaps in the boards and decorated the floor with strips of gold. Dust floated about. I had to clear a spiderweb out of my hair.

Leonard stood by the entrance, said, “This is where that girl put the hatchet to me.”

“We can put up a shrine on that spot,” I said.

“Would you?” Leonard said.

We looked where Leonard had knocked the Hatchet Girl against the door. It was a goodly distance. The door he had punched her through lay on the floor. There were a couple of teeth and some blood on the flattened door.

We split up to check out the rest of the place. Leonard used a wipe Brett had given him to clean all the areas he thought he had touched.

Brett called to us from another room. Me and Leonard found her in a bedroom that had nothing but a bed frame. One of the walls was gouged with gashes and splinters.

“They’ve been practicing against the wall,” Brett said. “Throwing hatchets.”

I looked into the next room, the kitchen. The sink was full of empty Red Circle cigarette packs and cigarette butts. I leaned over and studied the cigarette packs. Same as the one I had found on the bank of the Trinity River, near where the burned bodies of the Planter family were found. That's what I call a clue. I told Brett and Leonard.

"Maybe they just smoke the same brand," Brett said. "Though it is a pretty big coincidence."

"It's a rare brand," I said.

In another room there was a cardboard box with a half a dozen hatchets in it. There were also a few skinning knives and a meat cleaver. They were crusted with blood.

There was a plank table off to the side of the room, near a window. The table was glazed with dried blood. The blood was decorated with large bluebottle flies. They rested and buzzed on the gore and on the blood-spattered wall, which looked like a Jackson Pollock painting. The room smelled like a dead armadillo rotting in the deep woods. There was a pile of clothes at one end of the table, some nice boots, and Doolin's once nice hat. Now it was dappled with blood.

"They killed him here," Brett said.

"Deep-tissue massage gone wrong," Leonard said.

"There's a strip of skin nailed to the wall," I said and pointed to it.

A long ribbon of fly-covered skin. It looked to have been stripped from hip to foot. That had to hurt. They might have nailed it there for him to see. What were they after? Information or just a bit of entertainment?

I looked a little closer. At the end of the skin was a pinkie toe. In a cardboard box near the wall there were more strips of skin and half a face that had been peeled off Doolin's skull.

"Shit," I said, and they came and looked.

"Shit indeed," Leonard said.

"I don't think they were living here," Brett said. "But I think they came here from time to time. Maybe just to throw hatchets and cut Doolin up. We should see who owns this land. That might reveal something, give us some kind of connection."

"Good idea," I said.

We checked the place out a little more, but there was nothing else to be found. We didn't call Justin. We didn't call anyone. We went outside and took off our gloves, and Brett took them all and slipped them into a plastic baggie. A few flies followed us around just to stay friendly.

As we climbed into the car, we remained quiet. My right hand was shaking a little. I was nauseous. Whenever I thought I had seen the worst humans could do, there was always something to top it. The torture—it could have taken hours if they wanted to be slow about it.

Even someone who deserved killing ought to go quickly. Not stripped and chopped and humiliated.

Did they talk to him while they mutilated him? Did they laugh?

Certainly if he wasn't gagged, he must have screamed. His body in our parking lot, that ax and note in the door, they were letting us know what happened to him could happen to us.

That was an ugly thing to consider.

I could have let it go. I had Doolin's money. Leonard was hurt. And we had been given a severe warning. It could be a threat worth heeding. We could duck out of this without guilt.

Then again, you have a client and someone kills him and in such a horrible manner, you ought to do something about it. You ought to at least know why he died.

As Brett drove us away, I rolled down my window and let the outside air fill the car. As we moved along, the wind hit my face and I breathed it in deep. It helped. Under the circumstances it was better for my stomach than the air-conditioning.

When we were home, I pulled one of our toss-away phones from a drawer and called Justin's number. I put my hand over my mouth and said where the barn was and how bloody it was and said he should have a look. I didn't give my name, of course. I was talking in a gruff voice behind my hand. I was one sneaky son of a bitch.

Justin said, "Hap, you got a cold?"

"Goddamn it," I said.

"I think I better come see you after I look in that barn. What the fuck, man? You've found more dead bodies than the population of Rhode Island."

I dropped the false voice and said, "I thought I did a good voice. I didn't think I sounded like me."

"You were almost good, but then again, I gave you my private number. Few people have it. Fewer sound like you with a pound of shit in their mouth. Where are you?"

"Home."

"Go to your office and sit there, and after I have a look at the address you gave me, I'll come see you."

"All right."

Leonard and Brett were standing near me.

"And the master of voice impressions shows off his skills, and we are not impressed," Leonard said.

"Told you it was a bad idea," Brett said.

We went to the office, ordered pizza for a late lunch, and waited on it and Justin. The pizza came first. It was a little like cardboard coated in ketchup, and the melted cheese was so greasy, if you turned the pizza too fast, it would slide off the crust.

It was quite a while before Justin showed. Pookie wasn't with him this time. Some other cop was; he looked like he had just graduated from kindergarten and had been given bigger pencils.

Justin sat on the couch. The cop stood.

"This is Officer Tom Weller," Justin said. "We looked at the barn, house, whatever it is. I'm going to make a leap here and say the skin on the wall and in the box belongs to Doolin. I know that was his hat and clothes."

"That's why you're chief," I said. "Your ability to find out things after we tell you."

"Don't push it," Justin said. "I could run you in for hours, lock you in a cell for going over to that place. Tramping around in a crime scene."

"We wore gloves," Brett said.

Justin didn't appear impressed.

We didn't mention that Leonard had killed a Hatchet Girl the night before and given another a punch so hard, she might have to drink her meals through a straw. Neither did we mention he had a wound and was probably in more pain than he let on.

"Once upon a time," Justin said, "I let you guys run a little wild because you could do what I couldn't. Meaning you could be a little illegal. I could give you some more room again."

He waited for us to be impressed and relieved.

Justin said, "What if I tell you some things you don't know, and you look into those things in your inimitable way?"

"I'm thinking we might want to be out of this one," I said. "Bodies keep showing up. Next time it might be ours."

Justin nodded. "Tom, will you go out to the car for a bit?"

"Yes indeed," Tom said, and away he went, not wanting to be in on what could be an illegal conversation.

When Tom was gone, I looked at Justin. "All right."

"The dead lady in the house, one on the bed with Crank in the closet—it wasn't Elda."

"You messing with us?" Leonard said.

"Nope," Justin said.

"All right," I said. "I'll bite. Who was she?"

"Doolin's ex-wife."

"Wait," Leonard said. "How many ex-wives did he have? One jumped off a scenic overlook."

"After you told me that, I looked into it. Someone did jump from there, but it wasn't his ex-wife. It was a downhearted woman named Ellen May who found out she had six months to live. Turned out later, the doctor had been looking at the wrong chart. It wasn't hers. She was healthy as a mongoose."

"Did she have a small blue glass elephant in her coat pocket?" I asked.

"She had a pocketful of blue glass is what she had," Justin said. "It was a nice detail you were told, but anyone could have gotten that off the news. Woman you talked to used that woman's tragedy to give you a story. The jumper had a thing for elephants. Her son had given her the elephant for Mother's Day when he was a child. She cherished it because he died young."

"That saddens it up," Brett said.

"Uh-huh," Justin said. "I know something else. Behind the barn there's a ditch. In that ditch are drag marks and blood. Like a body had been pulled from it. There's also a boot mark in the mud that fits those boots you're wearing, Leonard. Other shoe marks are down there. Some might even match your shoes, Hap. Yours too, Brett."

"You're just fishing," Leonard said.

"No, I'm not."

We were pretty sure by then he wasn't fishing.

"I could take those prints, put them into evidence. I could do that and tie them to you three, maybe prove your presence at the barn, for sure in that ditch where a body had been."

"I hate someone that actually passed the sergeants' test," Leonard said.

"I even have a college education," Justin said. "And, not to brag, just to lay out facts, I was number one in all my classes at the University of Texas."

"Can I see your diploma?" I said.

He smiled at me. It was the kind of grin a wolf gives a rabbit just before it bites the little bunny's throat out.

"I don't want you to quit this case. I want you to keep digging. I think, clumsy as you are, you can find out some things, because you tend to do that by sheer hardheadedness. You can keep pushing until you know enough to tell me something that matters, then you can drop out. Or I could put all these bodies you've found together and cause you trouble. Might not prove you did anything, but it would be time-consuming. Would make you three look bad."

"That sounds a whole lot like blackmail," Brett said.

"Ah, you're the smart one. But I'll deny it if I'm asked. I'll just say there's enough evidence out there to make me think you three did all this."

"Why would we do any of this?" I asked.

"I don't have your motive figured out yet, but I can make up something if I need to," Justin said, and he offered us the wolfy smile again. "I'll repeat this. Take note. Elda wasn't in the house. It wasn't an ex-wife of Doolin's that jumped off the scenic overlook. Where the hell is Elda, and what, if anything, does she have to do with this? Why was Doolin's ex-wife chopped up and left on the bed? What was Crank doing there? Find some answers to some of my questions and you stay loose and free, won't have to go through a circus where people think you did it. Even if it's proven you didn't, they don't remember that. Once you're branded, rightly or wrongly, it leaves a mark."

"Helping you out could get us killed," Brett said.

"That is a possibility," Justin said. "And I promise, that happens, I'll look into it."

He gave us his magazine-model smile, which was sweeter than the wolf smile.

I really hated that guy.

When Justin left, Brett said, “We don’t have to do a thing if we don’t want to. In spite of his threats.”

“I think what he knows about us is we don’t like to quit,” I said. “And if we solve a few things, he gets the gravy.”

“Just don’t like being bullied by a slick asshole,” Brett said. “But you’re right, we’re in, and we’ll stay in. It’s personal now.”

Back at our house, Pookie was waiting. A black cloud floated over him, rolling thunder, flashing lightning.

“Justin is a prick,” Pookie said, and kissed Leonard on the cheek. It was one of those rare times when Leonard looked vulnerable.

“We’re all in agreement,” I said.

“Tom, he told me Justin sent him outside while he talked to you, but Tom could already see the drift of the conversation. He didn’t like it, and I don’t like it.”

“We’re not exactly ecstatic,” Brett said.

“I’d like to see him fired,” Pookie said. “He’s sort of ignored me since he realized me and Leonard are getting married. He only wants me to know what he wants you to know.”

“So that’s why Tom was with him,” Brett said. “He’s your replacement.”

“That’s right,” Pookie said. “I get the shitty jobs. Domestic disturbances, that sort of thing. I was promoted to detective, but I’m doing rookie work. For the record, Tom, he’s all right, just green as grass. But not so green he wanted to be in on that conversation Justin had with y’all.”

“Justin wants us to do what he can’t, and that gives us a lot of latitude,” Leonard said. “We got him by the short hairs as much as he has us.”

“Only you three are more likely than him to be the ones that get killed,” Pookie said.

“It’s a crummy trade-off,” I said.

“Since I know you’re going to stick with this,” Pookie said, “I got some stuff for you. Police been on the Planters’ trail for a while. I pulled up some computer files and read them. Learned some of the major flies buzzing around the central shit pile. The sheriffs are a line of corruption; in that county, it's like a law enforcement tradition. They all get a bite of the cake the major criminal groups bake. Meth money especially. Money like that, there can be a lot of it, and the meth suppliers can spread it around for protection. Law enforcement there makes more money from payoffs than from their salary. If you aren't worth a shit, you're willing to play that game, and they pick and choose enablers, because that money trickles down to deputies, community officials, and so on."

"What about Crank?" Leonard said. "He in the same tradition?"

"Jury's still out, but word was he could be tough and maybe a bit more than tough. Before he was sheriff, he was known as that kind of deputy. Had a chip on his shoulder. I got that information from some cops used to work in the sheriff's department. They didn't like him much. Thought he might be taking graft. For all I know, they were taking graft too but didn't like him because he got a bigger chunk.

"But let me tell you about Elda. I did a deep dive on her, talked to some of her friends. I want you to appreciate the work I've done here. It's a series of suppers you owe me. Elda was popular in school, but everyone I talked to, about five former students who knew her, felt that behind the smile and helpfulness was a bitter woman just waiting to let her mean out. I found the students in an old yearbook I tapped into online. With them all being in the marching band with Elda, I believed they must have gotten to know each other a little. Another word was she was a bit self-righteous. She wasn't a musician. She was a baton-twirling expert. Fact was, give her anything she could twirl or juggle and she'd make a show of it. She did cool demonstrations at football halftimes. She was also a cowgirl. Did rodeo, popped whips, threw knives, and excelled at all of it. They said she was all right, but at times she was distant, 'like she was tuned into a radio station on Mars'—exact words of one of the female friends. She could have sudden bouts of anger when things weren't perfect.

"She went on to be a first-grade teacher in LaBorde for about fifteen years. She was the pride of her community. Always helping to do this or that, trying to set a good example. I tracked down a couple of the teachers who worked with her, both still teaching. One of them said Elda was a seeker of perfection, but she was also a bit strange, and the real reason she left teaching wasn't for a change of weather. A female student put gum in her chair, and it stuck to Elda's pantsuit. Elda found out who the kid was and paid two older boys she taught in another class—paid them quite well—to beat the shit out of the gum girl off school grounds and stick some well-chewed Dubble Bubble into her hair when they finished. They carried it pretty far, gave her a severe thrashing that landed her in the hospital. One of the boys felt bad about it, admitted it to his parents, and word got back to the school. They quietly fired Elda after she paid the little girl's parents some considerable money, which she had plenty of, as her husband had enough money from his oil business to buy a small country. Teacher told me that Elda was always certain she was certain and was all about good deeds and Christian living, at least verbally, but there was a hole in her moral wall and sometimes the real her leaked out of it and it was ugly to look at.

"Then Elda's husband died, shot himself in his office late at night. Was the only one in the place. Decorated the wall with brains and blood. And the daughter, Beth, didn't turn out the way an outside viewer would've expected. But considering who her mother really was, it might have been hell for her at home. And her father dying when she was a teenager, and by suicide, it had to affect the daughter, of course. Beth took to drugs like a fish takes to water. She had it so bad she was called Meth Beth. I got that from a couple of cops worked vice and murders back then. They work the couch and Gunsmoke reruns now.

"But the cops' thinking was the husband's arms had to be a lot longer to do what he did. It was thought he was shot from across the room, but nothing got proved, so it was ruled a suicide."

"Were they thinking Elda did it for the money, maybe blamed him for how things had turned out in her life? In Beth's?" I said.

Pookie said, "It was a suspicion. We cops always think the spouse did it because it usually is the spouse. Eventually, Beth was so hooked on the bad stuff, she sold herself into prostitution. Her reward for hauling older men's ashes was meth. She was one of several young women doing the same thing. By that point the women would have fucked a donkey and carried it back to the pasture on their backs for a big bump of the good stuff.

"Beth eventually had a clear moment, grew a conscience, got clean, and began informing on her suppliers to the sheriff's department. Her mom, Elda, despite their personal problems, was helping Beth do that, perhaps trying to make up for being a shitty parent. Whatever, good or bad parent, she loved her child. Sheriff's office had Beth listed as an informant, but I got a look at those files, and there wasn't anything there that seemed to be ace information. It was all general."

"Do you buy that?" Leonard asked.

"What I'm thinking is the information was getting a little too close to the sheriff at that time. Sheriff probably took some of it out. Could be he tells the bunch she runs with, bunch he's getting his kickbacks from, 'This bitch has to go.' What's certain is Beth's body turned up in a junkyard behind the wheel of a rusted Cadillac. They figured she had been dead for a couple of days before they found her. Cause of death: too much meth. But there were marks on her body that indicated she might have been held captive, although there wasn't enough to draw solid conclusions. Maybe she slipped back into her old lifestyle, let someone tie her up for a fetish fuck, then later crawled up in the car, took a big dose on purpose or by accident, and died. But why go to the trouble to screw in an old car in a junkyard and then overdose?

"Elda had a nervous breakdown after Beth's death. Bad one. She was already broken, and then that happened. She'd doted on her daughter, even though they had their issues. She always thought Beth was destined for great things. Elda had to be institutionalized for a while. When she came out, she was no longer about putting up a perfect front. She felt the community, law enforcement in particular, had failed Beth. There were three major players among the dope sellers Beth ran with, all men. Possibly the ones responsible for her death. Elda thought so. She told the law about them and where to find them. They lived out in the county. Sheriff's department didn't do a thing. Then the dealers turned up dead."

"Are you suggesting Elda did it?" Brett asked.

"Can't say, but she was asking a lot of questions, and people who knew her said she seemed to be hanging by a thread. After those three dealers were killed, all of them shot and ax-chopped, the sheriff decided whoever did it might also consider him part of the drug problem, which he was, so he retired and moved to Seattle. A new sheriff came in and it started all over again, the sheriff taking a bite of criminal rewards. He was Doolin's predecessor. I was told he had break-ins at his house, had his car vandalized, got threats in the form of dead animals. You'll like this: They were chopped up and put on his porch."

"Hard to believe Elda could have done such a thing," I said.

"Note her bathtub was full of dead cats," Leonard said. "She was ready to move on, so she got rid of them. Left someone else in her bed, Crank in the closet."

"Quiet, unassuming Lizzie Borden one sweet morning took an ax to her father and stepmother and made pudding of their heads," Pookie said. "So I'm going to say yes, she could have done any of it. One more piece of information. Elda's friend Sue Alice, one married to Doolin. She's the body in the house. Justin says she's Elda's sister."

"Justin told me that much," I said.

"Here's something you don't have," Pookie said. "Solid rumor is Sheriff Crank, when he was a deputy, had a fuck-buddy relationship with Doolin's wife before she was the ex-wife. It seems to have continued, and that just might explain why they were found together in the bedroom, chopped up like stew meat."

“But why would they be in Elda’s house?” Brett said. “And none of it explains where Elda is now or why she told Hap her friend jumped off a scenic overlook with a glass elephant in her pocket.”

“No, it doesn’t,” Pookie said. “I got a little bit more, though. Elda worked in a women’s shelter after Beth died. She had enough credentials for the job. Lots of girls came there, some of them dopers and forced hookers, others trying to escape domestic violence. Some of them were deeply disturbed by what they had been through. Lady runs the shelter told me Elda was close to the girls, that she served as a kind of den mother, confessor, and therapist for them. Elda left, and some of the girls went with her. Matron there said one of those girls, Marion, came back.”

“Interesting,” I said.

“The shelter is called the Holloway House and is in downtown LaBorde. That’s all I got, but I’m proud of myself. That’s quite a lot, isn’t it?”

“You been a busy little Pookie-boo, haven’t you,” Leonard said.

“You know I have,” Pookie said. “I wanted to help my little honey pup finish this case and start running his gym.”

I poked my finger in my open mouth and made a gagging sound.

“Ah, now, Sugar Bear,” Brett said, hugging on me. “Don’t be rude. Pookie and Lenny are being sweeties and it is so enormously precious. Especially that honey-pup part.”

I stuck my finger in mouth again.

“Fuck you, Sugar Bear,” Leonard said.

“Fuck you back, Honey Pup,” I said.

42

Next morning was humid and bright, and me with a pistol under my shirttail and Brett with her ASP in her light lavender coat pocket went over to the Holloway House to speak to the matron there.

Honey Pup wasn't with us. He was at his gym, but we had plans to meet up later.

When we got there, I put the pistol in the glove box. Brett kept the ASP in her pocket.

Holloway House and its large front and backyard were wrapped around by a metal bar fence with a spear point at the top of each bar. There was a tall and impressively built gate made of interwoven twists of metal at the front of the house. It was a few feet from the street, and there was a call box next to it. The house was an enormous two stories with lots of windows upstairs and downstairs and the vibe of a bed-and-breakfast version of Hill House.

The porch that went around the house was wide and comfortable-looking with cloth-covered gliders, all of which clashed with the rather Gothic look of the rest of the place. When I was a kid, I would have loved to sit out there during a thunderstorm pretending I was on a ship confidently crossing the ocean, and damn the weather because I was a fearless pirate. Later, my mom would supply lunch.

We buzzed the speaker on the post by the gate, and the matron talked to us from it with a voice as soft as a goose-down pillow. Yet underneath that goose down, I sensed a Rock of Gibraltar firmness. There was a video screen in the speaker, about the size of a credit card, and we could see her face in it, though the screen was warped some and looked as if someone might have put out a cigarette on it.

The matron was named Jewel, and we said we were there with the hope of speaking to Marion. I thought Marion, having left with Elda and then coming back, might have information for us.

On the screen Jewel looked a little warped and shiny with cotton-candy hair, silvery as a new-minted dime. I guessed her to be sixty or so.

She wasn't overly pleased that we wanted to speak with Marion. The idea of the shelter was to keep everyone out except for the abused women who stayed there. It was an understandable reluctance on her part. You never knew who might be there to convince an abused woman to go back to her husband so he could apologize and then, shortly thereafter, abuse her again.

We showed Jewel our driver's licenses to prove who we were, and Brett even had a grown-up private-eye identification. Brett talked to Jewel for a few moments, explaining we were hoping to solve an important case and Marion just might have information that would help.

It took some serious talk, but Brett did good, and Jewel buzzed us through the gate. We came to the porch, we saw the door into the house had metal netting over the slit of window glass running down the center of it. When the door opened, there was Jewel, looking much better in person than she looked on the surveillance screen.

Jewel let us in and led us to her office but not to Marion. The office was large and had a desk you could have played table tennis on, leather chairs, a leather couch, a rocking chair, and a swivel chair behind her desk. Two comfortable-looking cloth-colored chairs were in front of it. A healthy-looking fern sat on a round table near the picture window. The curtains that went with the large picture window were pulled aside. You could see the side yard through the window. It was nice and green and cut as evenly as if it had been done blade by blade with nail clippers.

Jewel settled in behind her desk. We sat in the cloth chairs that weren't as comfortable as they looked. We went over what we had already told her and she took it in. The sunlight behind her brightened her silver hair.

"You must understand why I'm reluctant to let you see her. There are the other girls as well. I call them girls, though several are middle-aged women. Husbands and boyfriends come here trying to get in to hurt someone or convince them that whatever happened won't happen again. It will, of course. Sometimes the ladies do leave and return home, and sometimes they end up dead, or back here, or somewhere else. It's my job to take care of them."

"Marion may be able to help solve some crimes we're investigating."

"A nice policeman was here already," Jewel said. "He hinted at the same thing."

That would be Pookie. We told her we knew him. We didn't go into the crimes we felt Elda was involved in, because in truth, we didn't know for sure that she was. She could have been a victim, but that's not how I was feeling it.

"Elda used to help here," Jewel said. "She was a teacher and a counselor. She volunteered. I thought she would be a real aid, and she was at first, but in the end, it didn't turn out quite like I expected."

"How's that?" Brett said.

"Elda was charismatic when she wanted to be," Jewel said. "And she could be as bland as a concrete slab if she chose. She had a way of twisting the truth. I didn't notice it right away, but over time I realized it. She had a lot of the girls depending on her. I thought maybe I was starting not to like her because of my ego. You know. The girls relying on her, not me. And this bunch, they were all girls, by the way. Not a one over twenty-five. At my age, I consider them girls if they're under fifty."

"Hear that," Brett said.

"She formed a little clique. The girls talked to her, told her what had happened to them, cried a little, laughed a little, and pretty soon she had them in the palm of her hand. She had answers for them, or claimed to."

"Marion too?" I said.

"Yes, but Marion came back not long after she left. I guess Elda was here for about eight months, then she left with some of the girls, them trailing behind her like little ducks in a row. I will say they did seem emboldened, less frightened. I give Elda that. Anyway, Marion returned. I was able to give Marion her old room back. I tried to find out what had gone on with Elda and the girls, but Marion was tight with her experience. I don't know the whole story, because Marion didn't offer it, but I can tell you this: Whatever Elda was selling, in the end, Marion wasn't buying. She seemed nervous and cautious and maybe it was more than nerves. Might have been fear. I think that's why she came back here, where she's locked in and they're locked out. She asked me not to let any of the former residents back in, because they had bad intentions."

"Bad intentions?" I said. "How?"

"I think she wanted to be loyal to Elda because she had liked her but now feared her. She was short on details. It may have been nothing more than her feeling of discomfort. For Marion, that can feel like a lot more than it is at times. I didn't push. She's fragile. Why I'm not crazy about you talking to her, pushing at memories that might be too harsh, might not be good for her."

"What she knows might be harsh for her to consider," Brett said, "but if we can get her to reveal a few things, if she has anything to reveal, it might help us keep people from being hurt. Hurt in a way that's more than harsh."

Jewel said, "Hurt?"

"Some have already been hurt," I said. "All I can say at this point is we think it might be due to Elda, and Marion might know something about her that would help keep others from being hurt."

43

That did it. Jewel left us in her office and went out into the hall. I heard her punching buttons on a doorway pad, and when she punched them, they made little beeping sounds, and then I heard the door open and close.

"I like that she's no pushover," Brett said. "She really protects her wards."

"Seems that way," I said.

We waited for what seemed like enough time for the construction of the Tower of Babel, even with the language problems, and finally we heard the opening and closing of a door, and then the office door opened and in came Jewel.

"She'll see you," she said. "She prefers to speak to you in her room. She feels more comfortable there."

"That's fine," Brett said.

"You can both go up, but I think it's best if Ms. Sawyer does the talking."

I nodded at that. A moment later we were following Jewel out of the office. We stood at a set of double doors while Jewel punched in numbers, hovering over the keypad in a way that would keep us from seeing the entry code. Then the doors unlocked, and we were pushing through into a wide foyer. There were stairs across the way, climbing up to the second-floor landing. The foyer and stairs were well lit.

Jewel went up the stairs and we trailed behind her. On the second floor, she turned left and went down the carpeted hall to an open door on the right. She didn't go inside the room.

"Keep it pleasant," Jewel said, and she walked back along the hallway, quiet as a mouse, and down the stairs.

A small voice in the room said, "Come in."

It was a dark room for a bright day, but the brightest part of the room was a window that was letting in sunlight, and the light was resting on a woman sitting in a rocking chair. She was dressed in jeans and a loose white blouse and she was barefoot. She had her hair pulled back and pinned up.

We went over and introduced ourselves. No hands were shaken, and Marion didn't lift her head to look us in the eye. She was a pretty girl who had the air of someone born to hide.

There was an old-fashioned window seat with cushions, and without asking, Brett and I sat there. I could feel the warm sun on the back of my neck.

“I don’t know I should say anything,” Marion said.

“Understood,” Brett said, “but let me put it like this: You may have information that could save lives.”

The next few minutes ticked by without response from Marion or commentary from us. Brett was a master of waiting for someone to respond.

When Marion finally spoke, she was hard to hear, and her little voice was cracked and raw.

“Elda said if I said anything, it could turn out bad for me,” she said.

“Who’s to know that you’ve told anyone anything?” Brett said.

“It might not matter if she knows or doesn’t know. I think I’m marked. I think my time is coming.”

“Why is that?” Brett asked.

“I went with her and the girls when they left this place, but I came back. Left one step ahead of obsession turning into dark actions. I know how melodramatic that sounds, but I believe that was the case. I truly do. At night, lying in bed, I think I hear them creeping about in the room, and I’m terrified. I feel certain they’re coming for me.”

“Can you tell us about Elda and why you believe you should be frightened?”

“I suppose I need to tell it. I think getting it out of me might help. Good for the soul, as they say.” Marion looked at Brett. “Do you think?”

“It’s a kind of therapy to get things like that off your chest. And you may help others avoid what you fear could happen to you. You can be safe. We can arrange that. But we need to know what we’re dealing with.”

“Could you close the blinds a little?” Marion said. “Not all the way, but a little.”

I got up and closed them to where it wasn’t completely dark, but the slanted blinds made bars of shadow, and now there were long shadows striping the bed, and on the back wall there were darker slat shadows and far less light.

Marion lifted her head but didn’t look at us. She looked over Brett’s shoulder at the thin slits of light coming through the blinds.

She took a deep breath.

And she began to talk.

44

I wanted to be a teacher and a poet," Marion said, "but instead, here I am, sitting in a dark room, my mind floating, held loosely by a frayed kite string that could break at any moment.

"I went to college, you know. Graduated with high marks, have a degree in literature, a minor in creative writing. Then I met Junior, and the future I'd planned jumped off a cliff with an anvil under its arm. My degree might as well be on a toilet roll.

"When Elda came here as a kind of assistant matron, I had been here for quite some time already. Jewel lets us stay for as long as we need to. She only turns women away when this place runs out of rooms, and it has a lot of rooms. Right now, there are only a few girls here. Many of them left with Elda. Did you know in the early 1900s this was a hotel?"

"No," Brett said.

"It was."

Marion paused. The air was still.

"I'd been here hiding from my boyfriend. He knew I was here, tracked me down somehow, and tried more than once to come inside, climbing over the fence, reaching the porch, trying the door. I feared he would break a window and come in that way. All the lower windows and doors have alarm systems, and the police station isn't far away, so that's some comfort. But Junior—that's his nickname—can be determined."

Junior, I thought. The guy at the wrecker that was yet to be found was called Junior. Another piece of the puzzle snapped into place.

"I was so afraid of him, I hired a big man to have a conversation with him, and the man I hired was good at what he did. He put Junior out of commission for a while, and I am ashamed to say I sent him a bouquet of dead roses when he was in the hospital. But in the long run, it just made him more savage.

"I felt a little safer here, because Jewel would shoot him, of that I have no doubt. She has a gun license and a gun or two to go with it. I hate guns, but in a place like this, I'm glad she has them. I live on pins and needles. Beatings and tongue-lashings eventually wear a person down, you know, and I'm worn almost to the floor."

Marion took slow breaths. It was as if she had turned heavy as a bundle of stones in her chair. Brett reached out, touched her hand, held it. Marion seemed to like that. She started talking again.

"Jewel has us prepare our own meals in the big kitchen downstairs. You have to work with the other girls to do it, and if you don't help prepare food, you don't eat. There's a small movie theater and other services. Has a college-campus vibe.

"Sales from the Holloway House thrift store downtown go right back into this house. Jewel has money of her own. Investments. Property. Along with what the thrift store makes. But she finances a lot of this place right out of her pocket.

"But about Elda. She came and stayed awhile. She was confident, attentive, and she knew how to ask the right questions and how to listen, so even when you had no intention of doing so, soon you are telling her all about yourself. I let go of some things I thought I'd hold on to forever. Not nice things. I told her what Junior had done to me. I won't tell you what I told her. I'll just say it wasn't nice, and my self-esteem was so low, I did as he said, and what he said is something I won't repeat.

"What I didn't get then was Elda was merely taking his place. She had a kinder touch, a sweeter voice, and when she looked at you, you were the only person in the world. It gave you confidence but then she took it away from you again, packed it up for her keeping. It was something she would give back to you from time to time. But after a certain point, you knew it was on loan. You had to depend on Elda to get a taste of it. She knew how to work us. Gradually she became our everything. I woke up thinking of her, went to bed thinking of her. It was like a religious conversion. Like falling madly in love when the pheromones are high and your need for attention is astronomical. Elda was everything a cult leader is. I would say she was a top instructor in Cult Leader 101. She was damn near a god to me.

"Every male became the enemy. Every male was toxic. Every move they made was poisonous. It was easy to be convinced when the males in your life—Junior, specifically—were just that way. Junior could raise toxic to new levels. He owned you. But so did Elda. She bought you on a gentler installment plan.

"She had an unusual perspective on drugs. She hated them. She told us how they had killed her daughter, Beth, and how Beth had been pimped for a taste of the stuff. How she had been corrupted. How men took advantage of her. Then, when Beth tried to get away from it all, tried to get them arrested, she ended up dead, overdosed on the front seat of a car in a junkyard. Discarded the way the cars were, but without usable spare parts, Elda would say.

"Elda remembered her husband as controlling. Said he made her count her pennies, spend exactly what he allowed, although he was rich as King Midas, she said. He hit her, abused her, denigrated her intelligence.

"When her husband died, and she inherited the money, she felt free. When Beth died, she felt less free. But then she had a revelation. God sent an angel to her and told her she had to rid the world of those toxic men who sold drugs, and I think, though she never said it directly, she had already started doing just that. She said women and children that got in the way were the men's concubines and enablers. This seemed in conflict with what she said about the women being used, but I couldn't see it that way at the time. I sit here now in this room and I think about all she said, and I can't quite understand how it all made a kind of sense to me then. Some of the girls worshipped her more than I did, but I revered her enough that it took away my ability to think as clearly as I can now. And I'm still not as clear as I need to be.

"And then she told us we should go with her. That we should live with her. That we should join her mission, because she knew what needed to be done, and she would lead us.

"She had been recruiting all along. I went away with her, along with the other girls, and we lived in her house for a time. It was a big house full of cats, and we camped out in the spare bedroom and the living room. Every day we had sessions. Elda had us group up in the living room, and she told us what she had planned, and then we had individual sessions with her. Not so much come-to-Jesus meetings as come-to-Elda meetings. I realize now Elda needed our praise as much as we needed hers, and what we gave her was real, and what she gave us was false. Mostly. I can't let go of some of the good things she said. The good moments she gave me before she took them back and held them hostage.

"She would take us out to an old barn she owned and have us throw hatchets. She was very good at it, and she said it was a form of therapy, that to throw the hatchets and become accurate with them empowered us. Some people punch pillows. We threw hatchets. We were handling what could be a deadly weapon and learning to control it.

"Most of the girls took to it like Peking duck on a platter. I took to it myself. It all seemed so odd. And then she took that big turn. Elda said we who had been abused, many by drugs, some specifically by meth, some by a family called the Planters, ought to flip the script."

"Elda said we should take over the manufacturing and selling of the drug, take it out of the control of abusive men. Get them out of the picture one at a time. Flip it all on its head. She said there was someone called the Benefactor that was head of all the operations, and the Benefactor had to go. I wasn't sure what she meant. Who and what was the Benefactor?

"The girls embraced the idea and I almost did. And that's what scared me. I almost did. I realized Jewel, who Elda had dismissed as a warden, was better for me than Elda. I don't know why I couldn't see it before, but one morning I got up and it was as if Elda's spell was a bubble that had popped and dissolved. Suddenly she didn't make any sense at all. I tried not to let on that my mind had changed. Kept it to myself, waiting for my moment to escape.

"Elda's right-hand girl, Heaven, had been with the Planters for a while. Had been so hooked on drugs, she said she would have made a bestiality tape with a horse had they asked just for one night of meth ecstasy. She was easy prey for Elda. Heaven was hot to get even. She was so far up Elda's butt, she couldn't have been extracted by a winch truck and a promise to God.

"One night Elda said she would help Heaven get even and that the group would begin their transition to drug dealers; the current dealers were the evil ones with money and power. But they lacked intelligence, and Elda assured us she was smarter than them all and that we would be forming our own kind of cartel.

"At the barn Elda owned, the girls loaded the van with hatchets and full gas cans. Elda took a gun and gave one to Heaven. Knowing I was wavering, Elda said all I had to do was be a lookout while they took the family from their home with a brutal execution in their future. No one seemed to blink at that plan. Heaven delighted in it.

"I didn't like the dealers, but I had learned they had a kid with them, and the woman in the Planter group, as described to me by Heaven, was just as much a victim as the women with Elda. The men had grown up in a family as raw as poison ivy blisters. They operated a string of low-level meth factories run by a variety of morons who now and then blew themselves up. The cookers and dealers did this for the Benefactor. The Benefactor arranged sales and equipment and so on. All the Planters were addicted to meth and no telling what all else. But Elda and Heaven didn't care about any of that. Collateral damage was discussed. They meant the woman and the child.

"I ended up so close to being part of Elda's plan, I could almost smell blood. And now Elda was talking about slaughtering humans. With hatchets and gas cans, she had more in her plans than just shooting them in the head, which was bad enough. She was out to make a brutal point.

"I had never been hooked on meth like the others. My problems were self-esteem and boyfriends, especially Junior, who himself worked in meth. The girls had turned their addiction from meth to Elda. She was their high and partly mine.

“When we were at the barn preparing, I said I had to pee, slipped away into the woods. I found a place not too far from the barn, a place where I wouldn’t get lost in the night, trip over a log, get bit by a snake. I hunkered down and looked back at the lights glowing jack-o’-lantern-like in the barn windows. I saw their shadows move across the lights. I almost went back to them but didn’t.

“In short time, they missed me. They came outside and called for me. It was hard not to answer. Especially when Elda’s voice called. I was used to obeying.

“You could tell they were growing frustrated. By then they knew I had bailed. I heard Heaven say that I was going to turn them in.

“‘I don’t believe so,’ I heard Elda say. Then she called out to the woods: ‘Marion. You better come out. You don’t, then I’m going to assume you might tell someone what we have planned, and I wouldn’t like that, Marion.’

“The girls came into the woods, slashed about in the bushes with their hatchets. I lay down in a thick grove of brush and trees and tried not to breathe too heavy. Heaven walked right by me. And I mean right by me. The edge of her tennis shoe pinched the flesh on my forearm. But she didn’t see me.

“They searched for some time. Heaven was yelling into the woods, cussing me, standing right beside me, hatchet in her hand, and it was all I could do to control my breathing and not cry out.

“Finally, Elda called them in. I could see her standing near the barn, the yellow barn light over one shoulder, the moon on her face. When the girls were back at the barn, Elda yelled out at the woods, ‘Remember who I am and what I’ll do, Marion. Remember that. You’re always welcome back if you keep your mouth shut, and I believe you will. Am I right?’

“Once again, I nearly answered, that’s how deeply I felt her power, because it was power. Cold power.

“I heard her say to the girls, ‘I’ll talk to her later.’ I doubted there would be much talk. Finally, they turned out the barn lights and went away in the van with their hatchets and cans of gas, and even then, I waited, and that was good, because in fifteen minutes or so, the van came back and the girls got out quick, and Elda, who was driving, got out as well. They stood looking out at the woods, and they called my name again, and of course I still didn’t answer.

“Elda held a pistol and she was patting it against her leg as she looked out. I watched her a minute, then put my head down on the ground again. I almost feared that, like an owl, she could peer into the dark and see me. Elda and the girls waited around a few minutes, climbed back in the van, and drove away.

“I stayed where I was awhile, then finally got brave enough to come out of the trees and brush. I walked out to the road. A couple cars came by, and they scared me. I thought it might be Elda and the girls coming back, but it wasn't.

"I made it out to the highway, and before morning broke, I caught a ride with an old couple who were sweet but wanted to bring me to Jesus. I had had enough of authority figures who knew the 'truth.' I just wanted to get back to Jewel and the home. And that's what I did.

"But I don't feel as safe here as I used to. Jewel knows all my concerns, and the two girls left here do as well, so we are all on high alert. One of the girls is moving out next week because the whole thing has spooked her. I told Jewel I would move out to keep the place from being like a haunted house waiting on the ghosts to arrive, but she wouldn't have it. I can't believe I thought, even for a short time, that Elda was the good in my life, and Jewel wasn't. I'm deeply ashamed of myself for that."

"It's easy to get turned around in life," Brett said. "We've all done it in one form or another."

"I suppose," Marion said. "But there's a difference between being turned around and spun around, and I was spun around, and I let myself be.

"And then, when I looked at the news feed on my phone next day after I left them, I saw about the murders of the Planter family, and of course I knew it had been Elda and the girls. For them it was the beginning of a new way of life. More to come, you can bet on that. Soon Elda will run the meth business, all of it, and her girls will be ready to chop.

"I should have told the police, but I didn't. I thought maybe if I stayed out of it, Elda would leave me alone. Naive, I admit, but my thinking was way off. Maybe it still is."

"Seems to be clearing up," I said.

"Another reason I said nothing was a few days after, I got a series of photos on my phone. They came from a cell number unknown to me, a throwaway phone, I suppose. Looking at the photos, I knew they came from Elda. They were daylight photos, quite a few of them. They were taken from different positions. Front, sides, back. They were of a dead body, a man squatting in the woods, no clothes, his skin peeled off, his body dark with blood. Flies were all over him. His head was mostly a bloodstained skull. There were patches of sunlight in the photos, and through gaps in the trees and brush, I could see the river, and I could see the burned-out wrecker from the news, the one stuffed with the burned bodies of that family. I couldn't tell who the squatting man was until the last photo. It wasn't another photo of the squatting body. It was a photo of a skinned face hanging on a limb. I was shocked and sick. I recognized the man's face.

“It was Junior.”

The cops hadn’t discovered Junior out there because they weren’t looking for him. The wrecker packed with crispy, chopped, and gunshot folks seemed to be plenty enough for them to find.

Marion took out her phone and showed us the photos, and it was as she described. That face dangling from a limb was limp and messy, but it was identifiable. It was the guy we had seen at the Planters’ that day, trying to look cool, leaning against the wrecker. Now he looked like something out of The Texas Chain Saw Massacre.

It was easy to put together now. Junior had been Marion’s abusive boyfriend. Even so, man, that wasn’t a death I would have wished on anyone.

Well, I don’t know. More I thought about it, I might could think of a few exceptions.

Marion said, “I couldn’t figure why Junior was there at first, but it came together in time. Junior worked in the drug business, if ‘work’ is the right term. Stood to reason he would know the Planters. Stood to reason that when Elda and the Hatchet Girls came to the Planters’ home, Junior was there.”

My guess was they took all of them out to the river and shot them. But the shot to Junior wasn’t so good, didn’t put him down right away. Junior made a break for it. Made it into the woods and collapsed. They caught up with him, skinned him. Alive, if the bullet hadn’t killed him. They placed him on his knees to humiliate him. Didn’t bother to burn him like the others. Maybe they were out of gasoline. I didn’t mention any of this to Marion, but some things and some people were beginning to fall into place.

“Elda knew what Junior looked like,” Marion said. “I showed her a picture when we were both here. When she saw him, after me running away from her the way I had, for her that was nothing but gravy. A way of punishing me. I shouldn’t say it, but that didn’t hurt me as much as she’d hoped.”

“I’d like to give you my email and have you send those photos to me,” Brett said.

Marion got the email and sent the photos, then we talked a little more. But it was obvious Marion was winding down, sinking into the dark. The sunlight had changed and the light coming through the blinds was different. We stood up to go.

“You’ll stop them, won’t you?” Marion said.

“The police should do that,” Brett said. She said that like she meant it.

“Of course,” Marion said. “That’s their job. That’s not your job. I shouldn’t have asked.”

Brett patted Marion’s shoulder. “We’ll contact the police for you.”

“I feel so silly and lost,” Marion said.

“You’re not silly or lost,” Brett said. “Listen, don’t leave here until we can get some things straight. Okay?”

“Okay,” Marion said.

We said our goodbyes and went downstairs.

“Oh, yeah,” Brett said when we reached the bottom of the stairs. “No use spreading it around, but we’re going to stop them one way or another, aren’t we?”

“Absolutely,” I said.

When we reached the hallway and started toward the door that led to Jewel's office, Brett said, "I believe I understand what happened to Crank and Elda's sister."

We stopped walking and Brett said, "Crank was getting his regular taste from the meth sales, and then he wasn't. Elda killed his supply. He might have had others, but the Planters seemed to be a major source. I think Sue Alice, maybe through Sharoline, knew about the meth bit, and she knew Crank was peeling off some bills, and she wanted in or she wanted him out. Think about it. The whole family and a string of sheriffs have been in on the sweet-treat train for a long time, and it seems likely Sue Alice wanted to do something to end it all or profit from it. Could be either way. Elda doesn't strike me as a loving sister. I think her daughter was all that held her to the ground, and when she was gone, she lost her footing. After that, she was about control, power, and she felt she should call the shots, not be intimidated by a sister and the sheriff.

"Anyway, it caused a stir in Elda and her troops. She invited Crank and Sue Alice over, maybe to tell them they could both do better if she was head of it all, the program she'd laid out to her girls about taking over the business. They came to see her to talk terms, and the girls were waiting. They might have let Crank and Sue Alice spend the night to get their defenses down. Crank had a gun, of course, and if I understand right, he was sizable."

"That's right."

"Next morning, after Crank had dressed and maybe Sue Alice is still lounging in bed, the Hatchet Girls jumped them. Took them by surprise, but not with breakfast in bed. They were there when we got there, or at least the last of them were. They went over the back wall. It could have been a sharp time had we arrived a few minutes earlier."

"Fits," I said. "Crank almost pulled his gun, but 'almost' doesn't matter. And I thought I heard someone going over the garden wall, and that ties with your idea. I think it's close enough."

We pushed a button on the pad by the doors leading into the office area, and before long we heard Jewel on the other side, punching buttons. There was a snick sound. The doors came open.

Jewel was standing there looking at us with a slight grin on her face.

"I'm truly surprised Marion talked to you that long," she said. "That may be the longest conversation she's had since she came here."

"She was ready," Brett said.

We went into Jewel's office and assumed our previous positions. I said, "I think we need to get Marion a guard. It would be a good idea for everyone here. I don't think Marion's enemies distinguish that hard between who's who."

"We have the fence, we have cameras and alarms, everything is locked up."

"I don't think they would have trouble scaling the fence," I said. "They would come prepared. Over the fence, break some glass, they're in. They'd chop down doors if needed. They'd be in and done by the time the cops put their doughnuts down."

"I have my gun," Jewel said, "and I'm a crack shot."

"Don't doubt it," I said. "But it may not be enough against more than one assailant."

I took a moment to explain about Elda and the Hatchet Girls. I told her more than I should have, but I wanted some protection for Marion and whoever else might fall into the path of the Chop-Chop League. I felt it was necessary to convince her.

"Oh," Jewel said. "That's more than I expected."

"It's more than anyone expected," Brett said.

"I suggest we talk to the police, see if they'll put a guard on things," I said. "They would be the proper ones to do it. Legal and all. That way, you might not have to shoot anyone and you could avoid a bunch of questions about self-defense versus murder."

"So far I haven't had to shoot anyone, and I'd like to keep it that way," Jewel said.

"There you go," I said. "Look, we should set up something now. We'll talk to the chief of police, see if we can get him to swing it."

"Do you think these Hatchet Girls are inevitable?" Jewel asked.

"We do," Brett said.

Jewel nodded. "All right, then. Do what you can."

47

Justin was sitting in his office, and so were me and Brett. He had a nicer chair than Hanson had owned. He rocked back in it and put both hands behind his head, his lips pursed, and looked at us as if he were a principal about to decide our punishment for skipping school.

"I understand we have the same goals," he said, "but if what you told me is right, the shelter is well protected by a fence and an alarm, and the old lady has a registered gun. And Marion may not be telling a straight story."

"You're pulling my wiener," I said.

"I don't think I am. No. I'm sure I'm not."

"After all your talk, now you're saying no. You know, same as we do, that these women are dangerous, and you want the meth business stopped as much as it can be stopped, and I'm sitting here with Brett, and we're telling you that this lady, Marion, has been threatened, that she has evidence, most of which we've explained to you, and you're not willing to put a guard on the shelter until the situation changes?"

"I know it's a bad answer, but we actually work other cases, and a lot of cops are involved in those cases, and some of what they are doing relate to this same case. Besides, as long as they're chopping up meth dealers, I'm not crying. I have to look at priorities."

"Priorities?" Brett said. "Marion is a priority. She's not a meth dealer. She's an abused woman that's possibly being hunted by a psychopath and her henchwomen."

"'Possibly' is all you can honestly give me."

"The threat is more than implied," Brett said.

"Or so you see it," Justin said. "And she has protection of a sort."

"Of a sort," I said. "A fence, some locks, an elderly lady with a pistol, and your best wishes. That's not protection."

Justin pursed his lips again. He paused long enough to take his hands off the back of his head. He settled the chair, put his hands on the desk. They were nicely manicured hands.

"Fair enough," he said. "I got two offers. Maybe I can find some officers willing to do some spare-time work, but we can't pay them for it. They have to volunteer. Or maybe you and your agency can provide security at your own risk."

"You're one sweet fellow, aren't you?" Brett said.

"I like to think so."

I said, "Maybe you got a police dog can watch the place and run back to the station if something goes down. Come on, man. We need something solid."

"I will ask. All I can promise."

"We need them day and night," I said.

"I don't work for you," Justin said. "I don't respond to your every whim."

"Yet you tell us you need our help, and if we don't help, you're going to put us in a frame."

"I merely said you people show up where there are dead bodies. A lot. A whole lot."

The guy was exasperating. I thought he was being difficult just to be difficult.

We had been saving the icing on the cake, validation of Marion and her story.

"Here's how you can believe Marion's story," I said. "Go out to the lake where the Planters were found in their wrecker, face the river, and go right, up into the woods some. You'll find a skinned body if animals haven't eaten it. You can probably find it by the buzz of the flies laying eggs in the meat."

That got Justin's attention.

"Also," Brett said, "photos of the body were sent to Marion's phone."

"Could be because she was in on it," Justin said. "Why would Elda send pictures like that if she's such a mastermind?"

"She's no mastermind," I said. "But she thinks she is, like most criminals do. She wants revenge for what was done to her daughter, Beth. She might have seen Marion as a kind of replacement for Beth, but Marion didn't work out. She had too much of a conscience. She wants revenge on meth dealers, and stealing their business is her idea of it. She plans to become the main supplier by killing the other dealers. Including a person called the Benefactor. She's decided if she can't beat them or join them, she'll eliminate them. That being the case, you should protect your only good witness, and that's Marion."

"I'll send someone out to see if the body is there," Justin said. "As for them taking over all the business in East Texas, that's a big dump truck to fill."

"I think they can fill it," I said.

"Some rough customers in that business," Justin said.

"Yeah," I said. "The Hatchet Girls would be at the top of those tough customers. They killed, chopped, burned, and skinned some folks, and that didn't seem to cause them a lot of trouble."

"The dealers they hit were surprised."

"That's what they do, Justin," I said. "They surprise people."

"As for Marion, help or no help?" Brett said.

"Again, I can ask."

"When will this asking happen?" I said.

"Soon as you leave my office."

We went out to the car and didn't get in. We talked across the roof of it to each other. It was hot out there and you couldn't put your hands on the roof for fear of the hot metal cooking them like breakfast ham. East Texas weather can be weird. Windy one moment, still as Mount Rushmore the next, wet as the ocean, then dry as the desert, if the desert had trees.

"Think he'll ask?" Brett said.

"Probably."

"We can talk to Pookie and Leonard, ask for their help," Brett said.

"We can. We will."

48

We drove over to Leonard's gym. It was cool inside. I could feel the sweat drying on me. I love air-conditioning.

Leonard was in the back room with Nemo and Ernie. The boys were on opposite sides of the same bag, working it with punches. Leonard was encouraging them. They looked pretty good.

Leonard said, "Okay, boys. Go cool off with some walking around the ring, say ten minutes, then shower. See you tomorrow."

The boys nodded at me, smiled at Brett, and quickstepped to the boxing ring and started walking around it.

I said, "And there he is, Honey Pup his own self."

"Fuck you, Booger Bear. I have a feeling you're not here for the gym. Neither of you are wearing workout clothes, and Hap, you have that constipated look on your face that always spells trouble."

"It's Sugar Bear, by the way," I said.

"I distinctly remember it as Booger Bear," Leonard said.

"How's the shoulder?" I said.

"Sore, but it's healing fast. So, give. What is it? I know you two think I can't deny you whatever you want."

"Of course not," Brett said. "Look how cute and charming we look."

"And if this isn't enough," I said, "we'll go home and put on matching outfits and sweet little hats and come back. That'll cinch it."

"No outfits necessary. Can I assume this has to do with the Hatchet Girls? Already said I would help, so, you know, I'm in."

"We're going to need you to talk to Pookie," I said. "This might require reinforcements and long nights or long days or both, depending on who and how many we get and what time they have available. We'll need at least a couple of badasses. Whatever we do, we should do it as rapidly, because if we don't, I believe there could be an ugly outcome."

I filled Leonard in on what we had learned from Marion.

"What about Nemo and Ernie?" Leonard said.

"You've dealt with the Hatchet Girls," I said. "Do you really think we should put those two against them?"

"I suppose they are pretty green. We could get Jim Bob," Leonard said.

“Words I never expected to come out of your mouth,” Brett said.

“Changing times,” Leonard said.

“I think we can depend on local talent as long as some of that talent is you and me, the others as backup,” I said.

“You got a plan?”

“Lay it on me,” Leonard said.

49

By next morning, Pookie had volunteered to do some side work, as had Tom, the cop we had met with Justin. Tom was trying to grow a mustache, but so far it just made his upper lip look dirty. Tom parked across from the shelter house. Justin had allowed him to use a squad car.

Justin had come around a bit. Might have had something to do with them finding Junior where we said they would find him. Tom told me Junior's body had fallen over on its side, but animals, insects, and humidity hadn't totally destroyed it yet. The face on the bush had been severely pecked by birds.

The police car sitting across from the shelter house was conspicuous. That was the plan. We wanted Elda to know the house was being protected. Tom had a bunch of bananas on the car seat that he planned to eat before the night was over. That car, him sitting there him eating bananas, could be all the deterrent we needed to keep Elda from bothering Marion.

But I doubted it.

Of course I had no idea what Elda planned to do. By this point Elda and the Hatchet Girls might not have cared what Marion knew. But my guess was it mattered to Elda. She was long past allowing anyone to disobey her.

Pookie took the inside shift, pulled up a chair, and sat in the foyer where the stairs were, a shotgun across his lap. He had a thermos of coffee next to the chair. The ceiling light made his bald head look like a vanilla-colored bowling ball.

A female cop named Jillian Solomon was upstairs in Marion's room. She was in plain clothes. Jilly had been on the LaBorde police force for only a few months but had been a cop for a few years in Dallas. She had a no-nonsense expression that rarely wavered, and her dirty-blond hair was pulled back and fastened so tightly, I bet when she blinked, her asshole pulled in. I think she volunteered when Pookie asked because she liked the idea of doing something other than giving tickets, even if helping at the shelter wasn't going to result in payment.

She sat in the room with Marion, who by this time had gone from scared to terrified. That wasn't my intent, but it couldn't be avoided.

Jewel stayed close to her office. She had a couch in there, some blankets, and had been sleeping there for quite some time, since her help quit and went away. Elda being that help. Jewel didn't like leaving her ladies alone, so the couch was the logical choice as far as she was concerned. She kept her pistol near her.

"I don't understand why I couldn't see who Elda really was," Jewel said.

"She fools everyone," I said. "Right now, I think she's through fooling."

By that point, I thought Elda might consider herself invincible.

But Elda wasn't invincible. Neither were me and Leonard or Brett or anyone associated with us. We were in the danger business. Oh, shit. I liked that. We'd have to put that on our cards: WE ARE IN THE DANGER BUSINESS. Or DANGER IS OUR BUSINESS. Or DANGER IS US.

Maybe not.

The other ladies had left at Jewel's insistence. She'd found rooms for them in a motel in the next town over. She gave them money for food. She called them daily. They weren't the target, but we agreed with Jewel that they didn't need to be in the house in case things turned nasty. The exact reason for them being removed from the house wasn't explained to them. The idea was they were to remain safe, not reengage with abusive boyfriends or abusive husbands or, in one woman's case, an abusive wife.

I brought a big rolling suitcase into the shelter. I asked for Marion to come downstairs. When she did, Jilly came with her. I opened up the suitcase and placed it on the floor.

I had explained the plan to Marion, so she was ready. Ready and scared. She took a deep breath and crawled into the suitcase. She was petite, and the suitcase was large.

"You'll only be in there a short time," I said.

I zipped up the suitcase but not all the way—I left it partially open for air—stood it up, and rolled it out of the shelter and to my car. It was easy.

I opened up the back hatch lid, and without blowing out my hip or knees or getting a hernia, I boosted the suitcase containing Marion into the back of my car. It wasn't an old-fashioned car trunk, but there was space there, enough for a large suitcase, not enough for a pygmy elephant. The suitcase went up against the back seat. The suitcase wiggled a bit.

I didn't see anyone around, but taking Marion out in the suitcase seemed like a precaution that was worthwhile. I had to hope if there were Hatchet Girls watching, they would merely think clothes or some such were being taken away.

For now, I wanted them to think she was still in the shelter. If they decided to leave her alone because the shelter had a cop out front, all the better. I doubted they had seen Pookie and Jilly, but they could have, and they might have seen me roll the suitcase in and out. They might have seen that and had some idea what I was doing. But where would they be hiding? In the pecan trees in the park, dressed as squirrels?

I drove Marion to our house. I rolled the suitcase inside, and me and Brett helped her out. She unwound and stretched her back.

“That was awful,” Marion said.

“You’ll be safe here,” I said.

“Elda, she’s crafty,” Marion said.

“So are we,” Brett said.

I wasn’t so sure how crafty we actually were.

Next few days, when I was home, when I slept, I had night sweats, tossed and turned, dreamed of young women yelling and wielding hatchets, chopping at me, holding me down and skinning me with the sharp edges of those hatchets, hacking off my dick and balls and shoving them into my mouth.

When I awoke, I brought back with me a baggage of dread. I could almost taste my balls on my tongue. No, I didn’t have experience, but I had ideas about the taste, fleshy and sweaty, bloody and raw.

Marion had taken it on herself to get up early and make coffee for us. We’d told her that was unnecessary, but she did it anyway. It wasn’t like making coffee required much, though. Some water in the plastic container, a Keurig pod, and we were off to the races. But it was nice of her.

I wasn’t always there to partake of the coffee, and sometimes I slept only a few hours before swapping out with the others on guard at the shelter. Between Tom and his daily bananas, Jilly, me, Leonard, Pookie, and Jewel, we had someone at the shelter just about twenty-four/seven. We weren’t overly sneaky, because if they knew we were there, it might discourage them. Same with the squad car parked across the street.

I was starting to think Elda wasn’t interested in Marion. That was good. Also good was that Brett and Marion got along well, which really helped Marion settle into our home and feel slightly more confident. Brett instilled confidence. I think she enjoyed the female company.

After a few days, I wondered if it was time for us to call off the vigil. Elda didn’t seem inclined to take the bait; I had no idea if she was even considering it. There was no way to properly know. I knew a lot about what we didn’t know, and we didn’t know a lot.

We decided to give it a couple more days, then Marion could go back, or she could stay with us awhile. As another alternative, we could put her up in our old house, which we had put up for sale. We could pull guard duty there if the trap at the shelter house didn’t work.

Once we were able to determine Elda was no longer a threat, perhaps Marion could move on. Write a few poems. Get a job she liked. If she wanted to be a poet, that job part mattered. No one read poetry much, not even poets. I could understand that. Ever been to a poetry reading? It's frequently like having your bare feet dipped in salt water and licked by a goat.

One late morning, after a shower, a cup of coffee, a bowl of oatmeal, and some brief conversation with Brett and Marion, I started off for the shelter. I wasn't far on the road when Leonard called.

All he said before hanging up was "We have a major problem."

51

When I got to the shelter, I saw Leonard’s truck parked behind Tom’s squad car. A cop I didn’t know was standing beside the car. He looked as if he were having a hard time holding his head up. The glass on the driver’s-side window was knocked out of Tom’s car, and I could see blood on the inside windshield. It was odd to hear birds cheerfully singing in the trees, see bees buzzing about their business in the yellow and red flowers planted around the edge of the park. It seemed as if it ought to be a dark day with no birds, no bees, no flowers, and rain on the horizon. I hoped things weren’t as bad as I feared they were, but an ambulance was driving away slowly. Not a good sign.

There were three cop cars on the shelter side of the street, parked all along the curve. Chief Justin was inside the fence by the gate. Leonard was standing near him.

When I got to the gate, Leonard stepped over and opened it.

I looked at him. “Bad?”

“Yeah, buddy. Bad as bad can be,” he said.

“Pookie okay?”

“Wasn’t his time or mine on the clock,” Leonard said. “He’s home sleeping. He doesn’t even know about this. Only Jilly and Tom and Jewel were on guard.”

“Another of your brilliant ideas turned to shit,” Justin said.

“Not that you did a fucking thing to help,” Leonard said.

“Two of my officers are dead. I provided them.”

“They provided themselves,” Leonard said.

I knew then Tom and Jilly had not survived. They were the only two officers on this gig.

Justin turned to me. “Jewel says you have Marion.”

“We have her in hiding,” I said.

“I hope you don’t mind keeping her for a while,” he said.

“It’s fine,” I said. “How’s Jewel?”

“See for yourself,” Justin said.

We went into the shelter. Jewel was sitting behind her desk. Her gun was on top of it. The window behind her was broken out. There were a few shards of glass hanging in the frame and the rest was sprinkled around a like chunks of ice. There was a bandage wrapped thick around the top of Jewel's head. She looked like the attack had aged her another decade.

Justin told me and Leonard to sit. He sounded like a dog trainer. We sat, but no treat followed.

"I'm letting these two in on it," Justin said to Jewel. "Ought not to, but they're already responsible for two deaths, so I want them to hear what you know."

"They're not responsible," Jewel said. "They're trying to help. Wasn't for Hap, Marion would have been here and she'd be dead now. I lucked out."

"I'll decide what they've done and haven't done," Justin said. "Let's hear it again, what you know, how it went down."

"I've told you what I know."

"Tell me what you know again. I like hearing a story time and again in case one time it's different."

Jewel almost snarled at Justin. "You have one hell of a bedside manner."

"Work around it," Justin said.

I wanted to jump up and punch him in the head, but to tell the truth, in that moment, I was so upset, I wasn't sure I could get out of the chair. The heat wafting in from the broken window made the air feel heavy to breathe.

52

This is the story as best I got it from Jewel. Some of what Jewel said was guesswork. I've added in my own guesses to make more sense of it.

I believe it happened something like this.

It was less than an hour before daylight. It had been a warm night. The air was still. They came dressed in black pants and shirts and tennis shoes. They came from up the street, where they had parked the van. One of them crept up and busted the window of the law car. One or two smacks, and the window was done. The Hatchet Girl then struck inside at Tom. He was found clutching a half-eaten banana in his left hand, his right hand resting on the hilt of his gun. Before he could pull it, the Hatchet Girl had leaned inside and chopped him across the forehead. The hatchet blade was buried deep in his skull.

It happened so fast—one, two, three—Tom's taste buds were probably still embracing the taste of the banana. The windshield was cracked from the inside where the killer had drawn the hatchet back, busting it before giving Tom the coup de grâce.

Finally, the Hatchet Girls ended up in front of the shelter. One girl tossed a long, segmented metal pole with a hook on one end over the fence. Then they scrambled over the fence like windblown wraiths, hatchets in their belts. Elda was with them. She was older, but she had an athlete's body and was up to the task. She wouldn't want to miss personal vengeance.

On the other side of the fence, one of the girls picked up the metal pole with a hook on it. She ran under the fire escape, pushed the pole up the side of the house, hooked the fire escape ladder, and pulled it down.

They went up the ladder single file and swiftly, vibrating it only slightly. My guess was Elda was right behind the lead. They came to the escape landing and used hatchets to smash through the window glass that led into Marion's bedroom.

They slipped through the shattered window, a shadow at a time.

Jewel, sleeping on the couch in her office, heard the breaking of the glass, picked up her gun, and rushed out of her office into the foyer that led to the double doors. She punched the buttons. The doors opened. Jewel stepped into the larger foyer near the stairs that led up to Marion's room, where, instead of Marion, there was Jilly.

Upstairs a gun barked; there was a shriek followed by lots of horrible sounds.

At the bottom of the stairs, Jewel, scared out of her wits, looked up, saw the door to Marion's bedroom flung open so hard, the knob knocked a hole in the drywall. Out and down came the girls, Elda second in line, the whole of them bouncing on the stairs like angry kangaroos.

The girl in the lead had a metal rig on her face, kind you wore if your jaw was broken. She had her mouth slightly open, and Jewel saw she was missing some of her teeth.

The girl raised her hatchet, and just as she threw it, Jewel fired and hit her, and the girl tumbled down the stairs. But the hatchet glanced against Jewel's head, and by the time Metal Mouth hit the bottom step and came to rest, Jewel was near boarding a boat to the River Styx herself. She stumbled back and fell down.

The lights from houses on either side of the shelter came on, throwing brass-colored beams through the windows and into the foyer. Elda must have yelled for them to get gone. One of the girls paused at Jewel's open office door and tossed a hatchet over the desk and through the large window, reason unknown. An anger expression, is my guess. The window glass exploded.

The women banged the keypad and the door lock with their hatchets. The door came open. They hurried onto the porch, down the sidewalk, over the gate, and were gone.

Justin said his cops asked the neighbors what they had heard and seen. One lady said she'd heard a gunshot. Turned on the lights, stepped onto her porch, saw women running along the sidewalk in front of her house. A slightly older woman was in the lead, brandishing a hatchet. The woman shook the hatchet at her as they ran by. The sound of their feet, soft and in sync, was heard for a moment, then, like a bad dream, they were gone. The neighbor heard a motor hum to life, then growl away.

Jewel's trip down the River Styx was delayed. She awoke with a headache, a bloody forehead, and the pistol clutched in her hand. She managed to stand up and, holding the gun before her, went up the stairs and into Marion's room.

She switched on the lights. In the dark, perhaps they thought they had killed Marion. Both Marion and Jilly were petite. Jilly was chopped and hacked, broken and bloody. Jillian's gun was on the floor. She had drawn it and shot at her assailants, but even though she was prepared for them, she hadn't thought about anyone lowering the fire escape. But Elda and the girls had lived there. They knew the layout. They came at Jillian so fast, she was only able to pull her pistol and pop off one shot. As good a shot as she was, under pressure she'd snap-fired, and the bullet buried itself in the wall next to the windowsill.

And then the Hatchet Girls were on her.

Sick to her stomach, Jewel went back down the stairs. Lying on the bottom step, Metal Mouth moaned. Jewel kicked Metal Mouth off the stairs. The metal rig was bent in front. Jewel's bullet had hit it instead of the wired-up Hatchet Girl. The impact must have vibrated through that girl's head like an earthquake, and out she went, her nose bloody, either from the impact of the bullet on her mouth rig or from hitting her face on the stairs.

She was waking up now. Jewel kicked away the hatchet Metal Mouth had thrown, made the girl get to her feet, and marched her at gunpoint into her office. There she got a pair of handcuffs out of a drawer, left over from her probation officer days, spun Metal Mouth around, and cuffed her. The girl hardly knew where she was. She tried to say something, but blood bubbled out of her mouth and she sat down rapidly on the couch. She wasn't one of the girls who had stayed in the home. Jewel didn't recognize her. The girl oozed a nasty attitude.

Jewel dialed 911.

I’m the one found Tom in his squad car,” Justin said.

“I’m sorry,” I said, and meant it.

“He was a good kid,” Justin said.

By now, Pookie had arrived. Leonard had called him after I showed up.

Pookie didn’t say anything, but his face said a lot.

“Jewel,” Justin said, “going to need you downtown. Got some questions.”

“I just answered everything.”

“I know, but we need to put it in a report.”

“You really believe I had anything to do with this?”

“No. But you might remember something more with a bit of space between you and where it all happened.”

“I can’t just leave the place,” she said.

“No one here to be hurt now,” Justin said. “Besides, before I talk to you again, we need to run you by the hospital. We promised the EMT, remember?”

“She was sweet, but I know how hard my head is,” Jewel said. “I’m fine.”

“We’ll go to the hospital first anyway,” Justin said. “You might see the sweet little girl you shot in the face, one with the metal apparatus.”

“That has to be the girl I punched,” Leonard said. “I certainly hope so.”

“Bullet hit the metal so hard, it broke her jaw again,” Justin said.

“Good,” Leonard said. “I must be getting old. I was trying to kill her and just broke her jaw.”

Jewel said, “Let me call my insurance company. I got to get this window closed up.”

Justin let her. Leonard, Pookie, and I went outside, stood by the gate.

“Leonard,” Pookie said, “I want you to know, I don’t appreciate you calling Hap first, then me. Is that how it’s always going to be?”

Leonard hesitated only a moment. “Probably.”

Pookie shook his head. He opened the gate, walked to his patrol car, and drove away, to the cop shop, most likely.

“In some cases,” I said, “you should learn to lie.”

“Wouldn’t keep me from calling you first.”

“I don’t need to be first in line for something like that.”

“I’m picking out china or some such shit, I’ll ask Pookie first. I’m dealing with this kind of shit, it’s me and you.”

“He’s capable of dealing with things. We know his experience, how tough and loyal he is.”

“I know, brother, but it’s a hard thing to shake. For so many years it’s just been you and me. Maybe I would have called Pookie on another day. I can’t explain it. But not this one.”

“For the record,” I said, “I probably would have called you first too, Honey Pup.”

54

We stood in the shelter's yard for a few more moments. Leonard wasn't eager to go anywhere near Pookie. He said he didn't feel like the gym either. He was considering my advice that there were indeed times to lie.

"I'm wondering if there will still be a wedding," he said.

"Give it time. There will be," I said.

We met again at the new house and filled Brett and Marion in on what had happened. I knew Marion was fragile, but this wasn't the kind of thing that would go away or that she wouldn't find out about.

"It's my fault those police were killed," Marion said.

"No," Brett said. "That was Elda's fault. Even more than the girls she's brainwashed. Not that they should get a get-out-of-jail-free card for being gullible and stupid, no matter how rough their backgrounds and experiences. You still make your choices."

"Smart people get bamboozled," I said.

"Hear that all the time," Leonard said, "but how fucking smart are you to fall for that kind of horseshit. It's worse than a bunch of Holy Rollers waiting to be sucked up to Jesus. At least they aren't killing people with hatchets. Well, most of the time they aren't."

"She's like an evangelist," Marion said. "She gets in your head, and if your head isn't just right at that time, you start to listen, then you really start to hear, then you begin to believe, and before you know it, you're throwing axes and wanting to kill anybody that proves to be a problem, especially men."

"Got to tell you," Brett said, "I like men. I like my man. It's just assholes I don't like, and assholes come in all sexes, shapes, and colors."

"Leonard, aka Honey Pup, is proof of that," I said.

"Jealousy is an ugly thing," Leonard said.

"And there's this, Marion," I said. "You didn't succumb to that shit. It might have tugged at you, but you tugged back."

"I suppose," Marion said.

"What I'm wondering," Leonard said, "is in the dark, in your room with Jillian there, did they think Jillian was Marion? That it was her they killed?"

“Could be,” I said.

“Either way, you’re staying with me for now,” Brett said to Marion. “I got a few work things to take care of, but I can do them by laptop and phone.”

“I don’t think they know about this place,” I said, “but let’s keep the doors locked at all times.”

“But you are going out, aren’t you?” Marion said.

“Me and Leonard, yeah. We want to find Elda and her crew. I doubt they’ll be using the barn, since you were there, and they might think you told the cops instead of us. But they know Leonard was there. And now we have told the cops. Any idea at all where Elda and the girls might be hiding out?”

Marion thought for a moment, shook her head. “Sorry. No. Her house and the barn was all I knew of. But she had a lot of properties all over the place. In town and out, close by and far away.”

Me and Leonard got in his pickup and drove to the hospital in LaBorde. As we drove, Leonard said, “You do know if Elda wants to find where you live, she can. Computer shit. It can count your pubic hairs, so it can certainly find your house, new ownership or not.”

“We have it listed under an LLC not connected to Brett’s agency, so it might take some time for them to find that out. But they can find out. It delays their search a little, nothing more.”

We arrived at the hospital, and the lady at the desk didn’t offer to let us know what room the Hatchet Girl was in. We thanked her, stepped outside in the hall. Leonard finally broke down, walked away, and called Pookie.

“Was it civil?” I said when Leonard came back.

“It was like dropping my dick in a bucket of ice water.”

“That would have to be a deep bucket.”

“You got that right. He says she’s on the third floor and we’ll see a cop sitting outside the room.”

Lo and behold, sitting in a chair by the captured Hatchet Girl’s room was Pookie.

“Ah,” Leonard said. “That was sneaky.”

“Hello, dickhead,” Pookie said.

“Damn, Pookie, I didn’t mean to hurt your feelings,” Leonard said. “Truly.”

“I’m still mad, but I know that you didn’t,” Pookie said.

“I love you, Pookie.”

“I know that too, but you need to give me some time. Which means stay out of my face for a few hours.”

“Noted,” Leonard said. “Does this mean I’m not going to get any ass tonight?”

“Really, Leonard,” Pookie said.

"Yeah, Leonard," I said. "Really. Timing, my man. Timing."

"Anyway, yeah," Pookie said, "that's exactly what it means. And you're on the couch tonight."

"Just checking," Leonard said. "Sheesh."

"Can we see her?" I asked.

"Technically, no. But I'll let you slip in for a few moments. She may still be under. They had to redo her jaw."

"I can't tell you how happy I am about that," Leonard said. "My shoulder is still stiff."

We slipped in.

She lay in the bed, propped up so that her head was elevated. She was awake, but her eyes were narrow and her face was swollen. She had chipmunk cheeks and a broad piece of tape over her nose. She had a cuff on her right wrist with a long chain that was fastened to the bed. She had another cuff and chain on her ankle. Both cuffs were lined with brown padding.

Leonard hopped around and threw a few punches in the air.

Hatchet Girl trembled slightly.

"Hi, baby," Leonard said. "So good to see you again, you hunk of pig shit."

"So that's the one you hit for sure?" I said.

"Yep. Right in the kisser. Or the jaw. Whatever. But, boy, did it fuck her up. Of course, she tried to kill me."

"That could make anyone mad," I said.

"Ain't that the truth."

We were beside her bed now. I had brought a small pad and pen with me. I pulled the pad out of my back pocket, the pen from my front shirt pocket.

"Why don't you tell us where Elda is, and things might go better for you. We know the chief of police, and we could really paint a bright picture about your cooperation."

That was unlikely, but I didn't mind lying to the bitch.

She held out a hand. I handed the pad and pen to her.

She held it rested on her chest, wrote on it, handed it back.

It read: Go fuck yourself. Him too. Especially him.

Leonard, looking over my shoulder, read it. "Oh, girl, that's not nice."

55

How did it go?" Pookie asked when we came out.

"Very well," Leonard said. "She gave us some nice life advice that involved an anatomical impossibility."

"Look at you, using big words," I said.

"Just one, I think. 'Anatomical.' I've used 'impossibility' many times."

"Not good, then?" Pookie said.

"Nope," Leonard said. "Not really. So, the no-ass and the sleep-on-the-couch rules haven't changed?"

"It's only been about five minutes, dumbass," Pookie said.

56

Marion stayed with us for a few weeks, and she was a good guest, but I must admit, I was looking forward to her leaving so Brett and I could get back to normal.

Our house was a good place to be, though I didn't stick to the house, and neither did Brett. Marion did. A cop was assigned to her. Justin didn't need to be pushed this time to provide a guard. No matter how much he blamed me, he knew he was also responsible. We left Marion with her cell phone and a seasoned lady cop named Wilson. When we came in for the night, Wilson went home.

Funerals were held for Jillian and Tom, and they were announced in the newspaper. We were able to convince the editors not to mention how they'd died. We hoped Elda and the girls wouldn't know Marion was alive, but I didn't know how long the newspaper would maintain its silence. It was a pretty juicy story. I was just hoping Elda didn't pay attention to online papers. Justin convinced them to keep it off the local TV news.

I guess you could say so far, so good.

Jewel was recovering from her hatchet graze, and though no one but her was in the shelter house now, she insisted on staying there alone, not believing she was in Elda's sights. I thought there was a good chance she was right.

One thing for certain, Elda was taking over the meth business. Dealers were being found chopped and skinned and sometimes burned. Her pyro tendencies seemed to ebb and flow, but her love of the hatchet did not abate. Her twisted view of how to handle the death of her daughter and her vendetta against drugs that led to her selling drugs was beyond weird, and I had a feeling being male didn't exactly put someone on her Christmas list either. She'd stop anyone in her way, but she might go out of her way to get a man that had ticked her off. I felt people like me and Leonard fit perfectly in her sights.

After supper one night, Marion having gone to bed in the guest room, and us in our bedroom, cuddling, Brett said, "So you want to quit the agency?"

"What? I never said that."

"Not to me you didn't, but Leonard told Pookie, and Pookie called and told me. He's a blabbermouth."

"Look, it was just a thought. I was asked, and I politely said I would consider it."

"You mean do it."

"I haven't committed."

"Listen, love. I want you to be happy."

"I'm here to support you. You need me."

"I do, but at the agency, maybe not. I'm thinking I want to avoid the kinds of messes we get into and do less heavy work. Just simple stuff, basic divorce cases, that sort of thing."

"How many times has a simple job fooled us," I said. "We didn't know until we knew. Think about this current business. It started with a drugged pig."

"That's true. Another thing—Pookie said he's leaving the cops."

"What?"

"He hates Justin. Pookie is supposed to be a detective, but Justin has him doing grunt work like before. Pookie wants to go to work for me, Hap."

"At the agency?"

"No, I'm starting a lawn service. Yes, the agency."

"I see."

"I'm thinking since Leonard is leaving, and you're considering it, he might be a nice addition, along with me trying to pull back on the more dangerous jobs."

"I'll be there if they turn dangerous. So will Leonard."

"I know. But I think the gym is a good idea for you, Hap. You are being eat up by all the death and sadness, and the world isn't just about that, though it seems like it sometimes. Believe it or not, there's a bright side out there."

"What about you?"

"I like the business. I might stay in it for a long time. I might not. But right now, I like it, even the dark side of it. I like being boss. I admit I don't suffer much angst. And Pookie, he's a good man to have on the payroll."

"He is. When is he quitting the cops?"

"Not sure," Brett said. "I told him I'm not in any big rush. I was giving you time to make up your mind about the gym, and I think you already have."

"I was trying to decide when to tell you that I was seriously considering it."

"You can tell me anything anytime, Sugar Bear."

"I know. Just wasn't sure how to tell it. We'll finish this out with Elda, make sure Marion's safe, and then we'll talk about it again."

"You should do it. You're not old yet, but their fifties are when people start to top out. Your hair has a lot of gray in it, and it’s not just you. I know I look damn good, but the other day I discovered I had a gray pubic hair.”

“Can I see?”

Metal Mouth turned out to be a young woman named Charlie Norwood, known among the Hatchet Girls as Heaven. After a few weeks, her jaw was healing. She was still in the hospital under guard, but she could speak a little.

Justin, who hadn't found out anything from her since the shelter incident, was desperate, so he allowed me and Brett, with Pookie—the cop representative—to interview her.

We thought about bringing Marion to talk to Charlie but decided that was a bad idea times two. Charlie hated her, plus she might still think she had killed Marion—or at least that Elda and the Hatchet Girls had. It would be to Marion's advantage to be thought dead.

Leonard said he'd pass on the visit as he'd just want to punch her again, and besides, she didn't want him in the room. She didn't want us in the room either, but we came anyway. When we stood by her bed, her eyes narrowed and what could be seen of them looked like little black rabbit turds.

"Fug oo," Charlie said around the metal rig in her mouth.

"Fug oo back," I said.

"Hap, be good," Brett said.

"I was just returning her greeting."

"I ade all oo," Charlie said.

"We hate you too," I said.

"Hap!" Brett said. "Sorry, Charlie."

That reminded me of an old commercial about a stupid tuna named Charlie that wanted to be caught so he could be made into tuna fish. That fish's parents needed to give him a real talking-to and maybe some therapy for self-esteem issues.

"You're in serious trouble," Brett said. "You could make it less serious by talking to us. We have an officer of the law here with us to make it official if you want to talk."

"That would be me," Pookie said.

"Fug oo," Charlie said.

"Do you ever stop and think how silly and horrible all this is?" Brett said. "The things you've done at Elda's request? You've killed people. Chopped them up, skinned them, tortured them. Is that something you saw yourself doing as a little girl? Growing up to be a murderer?"

"Ad ed gumming," Charlie said.

"What?" I said.

"I believe she said, 'Had it coming,'" Pookie said.

"Oh," I said.

"The meth dealers, maybe they weren't the best, but shooting them, chopping them up, and burning them, that seems excessive," Brett said.

"Fug 'em," Charlie said.

"And now you're selling the same shit that messed a lot of you girls up," I said. "You can see that's not only ironic but downright nut balls?"

"Fug oo."

"Talk to us, and we'll go to bat for you," Brett said. "Say you were cooperative. It won't get you off, but it will get you a lighter sentence, I think. Some kind of tit for tat."

"Hell," I said, "they might give you immunity. You might be the horrid little shit that goes free while the other shits get flushed."

"I don't think that sounds as positive as Brett is trying to sound," Pookie said.

"Fug oo," Charlie said. "I won el oo it."

"What was that last part?" Pookie asked her.

"I won el oo it, mugerfuger."

"Let's see, six, maybe seven words," I said.

"Fug oo, weese of it."

"That one I got," Pookie said. "'Fuck you,' which we've already established, and the rest, I'm guessing a bit, but I think she called you a piece of shit, although the reference may have been broader to include all of us."

"Ad ight."

"She said that's right," Brett said.

"That confirms it," Pookie said. "She was referring to all of us."

"Oh, snap," I said. "I got it. What she said earlier that I couldn't understand. Charlie? Was it 'I won't tell you shit, motherfucker'?"

"Ad ight," she said.

"There you go," I said to Pookie. "You just have to get in her fucked-up frame of mind and pretend you too have been punched in the mouth by Leonard."

Charlie glared at me with her rabbit-turd eyes.

"If you decide you want to talk," Brett said, "want to consider talking to us or the cops, making some kind of deal about where Elda and the girls are, just reach out. We'll do what we can for you, within the realm of the law."

"Fug oo," Charlie said.

"At least she's consistent," Pookie said.

"Ask for me," Brett said. "Brett Sawyer."

Brett took a pad off the nightstand by Charlie's bed, pulled a pen from her purse, and wrote her name and information on it. She gave the number we use for the office. She carefully placed the pad on the nightstand. "There it is if you change your mind," Brett said.

"Fug oo. I ob er ut ack stigs to er laig."

On that mystery, we left.

We passed her guard in the chair. Chief Justin had certainly become more serious now. He had a plainclothes cop downstairs and another in a chair near the elevator. Just in case the Hatchet Girls decided to rescue her. Then again, did they know Charlie had survived, been captured?

Out in the hallway, waiting on the elevator, Pookie suddenly snapped his fingers and raised his hand like a kid in class about to ask if he can go to the bathroom. "Got it," he said. "I know what she said. She said, 'Fuck you. I hope your nutsack sticks to your leg.'"

"That's not very nice," I said.

"No, it isn't," Pookie said.

"At least I don't have to worry about that," Brett said.

"You got that going for you, baby," I said.

The elevator arrived.

That night, I read the online hometown newspaper and felt a knot tie itself in my stomach. Someone had leaked more details to the paper. Wrote that a lady had survived an attack on the women's shelter. It didn't mention her name, but it would be obvious to Elda who it was. It mentioned that police officers were killed in the attack and that one of the attackers had been wounded and was recovering under guard in the hospital.

This was all stuff Elda might already know, but now it was out there. It would be on the TV news in a short time.

Maybe between all the chopping and meth dealing, she might not have noticed. Even angry hatchet killers and drug poisoners need a rest now and then.

The article was written by a reporter named Markie Chambers. The newspaper had held back for a few weeks, but perhaps fearing other news outlets had the story, they didn't want to be scooped, so they went with the information. It really sucks when a scoop is more important than protecting someone's life. It wasn't like we hadn't explained the importance of silence to them.

We felt we should tell Marion about it, let her know she could still be a target. We told her at the kitchen table after a lunch of tuna fish sandwiches with crumbled potato chips and thinly sliced apples all mixed into the tuna with mayonnaise and smeared on wheat bread. It's better than you might think.

"I feel terrible staying here and keeping you in their sights."

"What they did is not your fault, and we want you to be safe," Brett said.

Later in the day, Leonard came over to visit. He too had seen the news. Pookie told him that Justin wanted to put Marion up somewhere in Houston with friends of his. He wanted her out of LaBorde. He was damn sure double cautious now. Me and Leonard went out to the barn and worked the bag. We went at it slow, but we threw hard and accurate punches. Leonard was trying to loosen up his shoulder, so on his wounded side he didn't throw as hard.

As we worked, I told Leonard that Pookie was a blabbermouth, that he'd told Brett I was thinking of leaving the agency.

“That gossip,” Leonard said.

“Yes, but Blabbermouth Pookie got that information from Blabbermouth Leonard.”

“He’s my soon-to-be spouse. I should be able to share things with him without him sharing with everyone else.”

“He and Brett are friends too. What I will say is I’m leaving for sure. Brett thinks I should. She knows I want to. But not right away. If Brett needs me, I’ll be there no matter what I’m doing.”

“Same. But I’m wanting to move away from it, just be a gym owner and husband, and we may adopt a kid.”

“Adopt? You, a dad?”

“I’m thinking about it. Pookie is all in.”

“I’m thinking of adopting an underprivileged white kid from an Aryan Nation family that hates queers.”

“That sounds perfect.”

Leonard chuckled. “Don’t it? I hope I can do this marriage business. People sure divorce a lot.”

“They do. I think being able to have a marriage work is less about working to make it work than it is about being lucky and finding the right person. Brett and I have had a few moments, but on the whole, we get along well.”

“I watch you two. I’m trying to learn how to make my marriage work.”

“It has to do with couples being able to understand that people are who they are, and they aren’t going to change much. But they have to be willing to change some. Still, I think if it’s like a part-time job or full-time job to maintain, you’ve got the wrong person. It’s better to be alone.”

“That actually sounded about half-ass wise,” Leonard said.

“Just call me guru.”

“I’d rather not.”

“I will say this. You shouldn’t jump into anything blind, and you’re not, but it’s better, as the old adage goes, to have loved and failed than to not loved at all. I think I bungled that line up.”

“That business with Raul still hurts. I damn sure picked wrong there.”

“I still hurt from Trudy now and then, but not much. And Raul, he wasn’t like Pookie. He wasn’t a particularly good fit for you.”

“He was not. Neither was Trudy for you. I never liked her.”

“I know. She knew.”

We hit the bag for a while longer. We stopped talking and started hitting faster. Leonard was letting his punches come a little quicker, a little stronger, even on his injured side.

I was taking out my frustrations with Elda and her girls on the bag. I felt I was as much responsible for Jilly's and Tom's deaths as anyone other than Elda and the girls themselves. It had been my plan to set protection up there, and it hadn't been enough.

When we had decided to go out to the barn and hit the bag, I ran water into some metal water bottles after putting ice chips in them. We had those to drink from when we finally wore out and were heavy with sweat. It was really too hot to be doing what we were doing, but it felt good to have worked out. The water was satisfying. It made me think about the good water coming from the rock in the creek in the woods.

I considered showing the place to Leonard, then thought I wouldn't. Not yet, anyway. I had other plans.

59

Marion was taken away by Justin and a cop, and they drove her to Houston. They didn't tell us where she would be located. That was all right. We didn't need to know.

We remained on high alert, however. We tried to talk to Charlie again, but it didn't go any better than it had before. She was gaining the ability to talk better. There was less guesswork when she insulted us.

More meth dealers were being taken out and more customers were being poisoned by fentanyl, and Pookie was pretty certain one of the Hatchet Girls had been executed by someone else in the business, perhaps the Benefactor. They had killed her, decapitated her, shit in her mouth, and left her in the woods. The head was found on a stump with a meth pipe tucked in her crap-filled jaws. It definitely seemed like a message.

A needed rain had blown in earlier that day and had cooled things off by nightfall. I told Brett I had something to show her. She said that was good and she had something to show me.

She pushed down her shorts to display where her pubic hair had been. "I decided I didn't like the gray hair and shaved my pussy. I know you like it fine with the foliage, but it's my pussy."

"I think it looks very nice bald. Which is something I think I should say even if I already miss the carpet."

"I thought if I tried to dye it the same color as my hair, I might burn something down there."

"Something?"

"You know what I mean." She pulled her shorts up. "Now, what do you want to show me?" she said. "Did you shave your balls?"

"I did not. Let's get a few blankets and a pillow."

"What for?"

"Wouldn't be a surprise if I told you."

I also got a flashlight, as the light on my phone wasn't bright enough. We took pistols with us, knowing we were not yet out of the woods with Elda and the girls. I guided Brett with the light out of the house, across the pasture, into the woods, and to the bank of the creek.

“This hasn’t got anything to do with devil worship, does it?” Brett asked.

“No.”

“Snipe hunt?”

“No.”

I kept leading her along the bank, and finally we came to the rock with the water leaping out of it. I shone the light on the rock. That and moonlight slipping in through breaks in the trees gave it a silver, molten-lava glow.

“Found this place and was waiting for the right time to show it to you.”

“After you showed, Leonard.”

“No, you’re the first.”

“That’s nice, Hap.”

I spread the blankets on top of the rock and put the pillow in place. We took off our clothes and climbed on the rock and lay down on our blankets. The moonlight gave Brett’s long red hair a coppery appearance. She looked like a goddess that had come down from Olympus to hang out with an unworthy mortal.

We lay on the rock and listened to the water gurgle, felt the wind on our skin made cool from the rain. We kissed and made love on the rock, and it was good, but it was also a hard rock, blankets or no blankets.

Brett said, “I loved that, but I don’t want to do it twice. When I was on top, it was all right, but on bottom, that was a bit of a bitch.”

“You should have said something.”

“It’s beautiful in the day too. Nice the mosquitoes stayed home. I was worried they might be thick here.”

“I’m sure sometimes they are,” she said.

We lay in each other’s arms for a while. The wind was still cool, the water still gurgled, the moonlight was still silver. I felt young in that moment and wiped clean of the mistakes I had made in life. Something that would obviously not last. But the joy of being with Brett would.

“You know,” I said, “nice as this is, I prefer our bed.”

“So do I,” Brett said.

We put on our clothes, gathered our goods, and with me leading with the flashlight, we headed back to the house.

We went inside and went to bed. We made love again, and this time it wasn’t so hard on the back.

60

As the weeks passed, we continued to visit Charlie in the hospital. We were trying to wear her down. Justin kept her there because there were problems with her leg. It wasn't healing correctly. She had some kind of infection and they were pumping her full of antibiotics. They didn't want to move her to jail facilities because the things the docs needed were not easily available there. They had increased her guard. Now there were four cops guarding her. Two downstairs instead of one.

Charlie was not friendly, but she did seem to appreciate the few magazines and books we brought in. Turned out she was a reader. Who knew a Hatchet Girl would like a good mystery and a People magazine?

One late morning, me and Brett were there with her. Leonard was still on Charlie's shit list, and it was my belief that there he would remain.

I felt that Charlie might be loosening up some. Time away from Elda and her propaganda might not have cured her of her cultish beliefs, but I think it had taken the shine off of them. She could speak pretty well now, but she still wore the metal mouth, though certain screws had been adjusted.

Brett said, "Charlie, I know you are dedicated to Elda, but really, what has she done for you besides turn you into a murderer and a prisoner? You've been punched, shot, and generally messed up by all this. What do you gain by supporting Elda? She has moved on from you, girl."

"You don't know that," Charlie said.

"I know she sees you as a liability," Brett said.

"You don't know that."

"Okay, guesswork, but I think that's the case."

A nurse came in carrying a black bag. She was pretty, dressed in a blue uniform, and when she came in, Charlie sat up a little.

The nurse smiled at Charlie, then at us.

Brett said, "I used to be a nurse."

"Oh," said the nurse.

"I've never seen a nurse that carried a bag like that."

"It's a new idea. We carry things for checking the vitals in the bag. Much easier to move it around from patient to patient."

Brett studied the nurse. "That's unique."

"I don't know when you were last a nurse," the nurse said, "but there have been a lot of changes."

"I see," Brett said. "It has been a while."

"It might be good if you two could leave. Some of this needs to be private."

"I see," Brett said, and stood up.

I stood up too.

Still standing, Brett said, "I think we'll stay."

"You can't. Hospital policy. I have to check places she might not want you to see."

"That's all right," Brett said. "We'll look away."

The nurse started to argue, but then didn't.

"Okay, then," the nurse said, opening the black bag. Her face became bland. She looked at Charlie. "Actions have consequences."

"What actions?" Charlie said.

By then I understood what Brett had understood first.

This was no nurse, and what she was pulling out of her bag was no stethoscope.

Lissie, don't," Charlie said as the nurse pulled a hatchet from the bag and raised it to strike Charlie in the head.

Brett leaned over the bed and grabbed Lissie's wrist but Lissie got free and swung the ax sideways at us but missed. I put a knee on the bed when she came back with the hatchet, caught her wrist.

I kept crawling over Charlie, trying to get a better grip on Lissie, but it was hard work. That girl was strong. She too had put her knee on the bed so she was better able to control my efforts. Charlie was trying to get out of bed, but with both me and Lissie on top of her, the cuffs, and the messed-up leg, she wasn't making any headway.

By this time Brett had made it to the other side of the bed where Lissa was. She grabbed Lissie's shoulder, pushed her so that her side was exposed, and began to hammer punch after punch into Lissie's kidneys. She had found her target, and she didn't let up or change her fists' destination.

I bet Brett hit that girl ten or twelve times. Quick rabbit punches. Lissie made a puking noise but didn't puke. Out from under her nurse dress, she peed on the bed, a yellow, ammonia-smelling stream. She kept peeing. It was like a dam had been opened. Now there was a bloody wet spot on the bed from those kidney punches. Lissie leaned forward enough that I was able to punch her in the face and twist the hatchet from her hand.

Lissa struggled off the bed and put her feet on the floor. She was less than a foot away from Brett, who in that moment, moving quick, her red hair swinging around her head, looked like a Valkyrie.

Brett slapped both her hands over Lissie's ears. Lissie cried out.

In response, Brett slapped her hands over Lissie's ears again. This time Lissie screamed and the door burst open and in came the cop from the chair by the door and not far behind him the lady cop that had been seated by the elevator.

They grabbed Lissie and threw her facedown on the floor and cuffed her. I saw the cops wrinkle their noses.

"She had a big wee-wee," I said.

62

The cops took Lissie away, and Charlie, still in the pee-stinking bed, said, “I thought she had come to save me, but she hadn’t.”

“Elda sent her,” I said.

“I don’t know that’s true,” Charlie said.

“You should,” I said. “She convinced them you would talk. Probably told tales that she didn’t really trust you. Maybe you were trying to gain power, take over. She could have said anything, but you can bet Lissie didn’t decide to do that on her own. She thought she’d come in as a nurse, chop you, and escape. She didn’t expect us here, but once she was on the mission, she couldn’t stop and went for it. They may have called you Heaven, but now you’re Hell to them.”

“You don’t know that,” Charlie said.

“I know this,” I said. “She was going to part your hair with that goddamn hatchet.”

By now the two plainclothes police from downstairs had come in and not long after that Justin showed up in all his spit-shined glory, and then some legitimate nurses came in and Charlie was moved out of her bed and onto a gurney. One of the male officers went with them, and you can bet after the fiasco, he was on his toes.

Justin glared at him as he walked by with the gurney being pushed by the nurses. The officer tried not to look at him. He was probably wondering if he could manage a night watchman’s job somewhere. I actually thought he had responded as quickly as possible. That nurse outfit had duped him.

We went out with Justin, walking behind the gurney, the nurses, and the officer. They put Charlie in a bigger room and moved one cop inside; the other, the one that had walked with the gurney, was placed outside the door. Justin said no one, not even a nurse or doctor, went into her room unless they could prove who they were. Information on the doctors and nurses that would tend to Charlie were to be given, and the cops at the door and elevator were to be changed later in the day. By tomorrow the original guardians might all be looking for night watchmen jobs. Or night watchwoman, in one case.

We hung around downstairs because Justin asked us to wait for him. After some time, he came down and had us ride up with him again.

On the ride up, Justin said Lissa wasn't talking, but then again, she couldn't hear to talk. Brett had busted her eardrums. The girl's equilibrium was messed up too, and she couldn't stand up without falling over.

When Justin told Brett that, she said, "That's some tough shit."

Now Lissa was in the hospital as well, and Justin put guards on her, and without his former reluctance. Charlie had been trouble enough, but now he had another and he was determined to cease the screwups.

When Lissa didn't come back, I was pretty sure Elda would determine that trying to kill Charlie in the hospital was no longer a good plan. The one good thing about it was another Hatchet Girl was down and Elda would have no idea if she had reached Charlie before she was taken down. I think Elda by this point felt the Hatchet Girls were expendable.

But how many were left? Could she gain new recruits in a short time? I thought not. The girls she had were ones she had indoctrinated at the shelter. She may have started with some bold plan to eliminate the meth dealers and the sex traffickers, but that had gone to hell in a bucket of shit, and now she was just a meth dealer and a murderer. She had become a kind of female Charlie Manson. Would she pretty soon let the girls take meth to control them even more, the way the male meth dealers had done?

Inquiring minds wanted to know.

The hospital loaned Justin an office, and that was where he was taking us. He even asked politely if we would come in and sit with him. He played with a pen on the desk and doodled on a notepad for a few minutes. We sat and let him. I watched the light dance on his shiny hair. Then, to pass the time, I did multiplication tables in my head. I was surprised to find I didn't really remember them that well anymore. Was it due to age or lack of usage? As you get older, you start wondering if everything you used to do and can't do now is due to age.

Finally, Justin put the pen down, pulled the paper off the pad, and threw it in the wastebasket. He said, "You think Charlie was cracking?"

"No," I said. "But now she might. Being away from Elda, the other girls, she might be starting to think for herself. If just a little. She was Elda's second in command, and now she's got to be thinking she isn't exactly thought highly of. Nearly being chopped by a former comrade may have cleared her mind some."

"What I'm wanting to know is why Elda would plan such a thing," Justin said. "Trying to kill someone in a guarded hospital doesn't seem smart.”

“Lissa almost did it,” I said. “Brett saw through her.”

“I don’t doubt Elda planned it,” Brett said. “She knows when the girls get away from her, they have room to think, and doubt. She’s worried one of them might reveal where they stay or the places they stay, how their business works. Seems clear to me she planned for Lissa to kill Charlie, then walk out before anyone discovered Charlie dead. Me and Hap being there put Lissa in a crisis, but she was so programmed to follow orders, she went ahead with what Elda wanted. Probably thought she’d take us all out. It’s a stupid plan. Elda is paranoid. I don’t think she’s thinking so smart as she was at first. If she were any more mentally ill, she would be an entire asylum.”

Justin nodded, did his lip-pursing thing.

“You’re still talking to us,” I said, “so I figure you still want us in the loop and maybe to do things you can’t do, as always.”

“I didn’t say that,” Justin said.

“You don’t have to,” I said.

Justin gave us his wolf-smiling-at-a-rabbit look.

“No. I don’t have to.”

63

Now that Marion was safe somewhere in Houston, we decided we had hidden out enough.

We were still being cautious but not entirely secretive. Me and Brett started going to the office. Leonard showed up every morning, just in case someone arrived with a polished hatchet and a bad attitude. He had the gym set up well enough it practically ran itself. Besides, Leonard said, “It’s only temporary, then I’m out of here.”

One morning, Brett said, “By the way, Belinda has stopped working for us. She got a better night job, working at a nursing home.”

“Good for her,” I said.

“I agree,” Brett said. “Not much here we really need her for. And it’ll save money.”

I had a package of peanut butter crackers. When I finished eating, as I was trying to explain to Leonard why Batman, not Spider-Man, was the coolest of heroes, as if this should require explanation, four men came through the door in a row, like ducks on their way to the pond. They were dressed in casual clothes and desert boots; they looked like they all shopped at the same store.

Well, three of them were dressed that way. The fourth, guy in the lead, wore a Hawaiian shirt with a variety of bright surfboards on it, as well as some tropical trees leaning left and right as if they were reacting to brisk winds competing with one another. The base color of the shirt was green. He wore a green ball cap that he took off as he entered the office. His blond hair was close cut. He had bright blue eyes.

He was about six five and was slightly pink-faced from shaving. He held his cap with both hands, wore a gold necklace with a cross on it. He didn’t really look like a fellow who loved Jesus. He looked as solid as a brick wall.

One of the men with him had yellow nubs for teeth and greasy hair and was skinny as an earthworm. He kind of bounced on one foot, then the other, like he had to pee. The other two guys were husky, bright-eyed, and angry-looking. Unlike Skinny they appeared to wash their hair and maybe even use shampoo. I was certain they were tough enough to wipe their asses with a wire brush.

They all looked ready to fight. I hadn't even had my coffee yet.

Brett opened her desk drawer. There was a pistol in there. She kept her hand close to it.

Leonard said, "Has anyone ever told you guys how cute you are?"

The big man laughed. "Constantly."

"What can we do for you, or to you?" I asked.

"Mind if we sit down?"

"Not at all," Leonard said, and stood up from the couch and sat on the edge of the desk, but not in the way of Brett's aim if she had to shoot someone. I was already standing, about to make coffee. I kept at it.

The big man sat down, but the others stayed where they were.

"I got some people know some things, and they came to us and told us stuff," the big man said.

"Hot damn," Leonard said, "a stuff meeting."

"And you've come here to tell us that stuff?" I said, watching coffee pour into my cup.

"I think I might."

"Why so many of you?" Leonard asked.

"Oh, we travel in packs. It's habit. There's guys and girls don't like us, right now mostly girls. We thought who doesn't like us might interest you guys."

"You thought that, did you?" Leonard said.

"I think all kinds of things, not all of them decent. I see that lady there, and my mind kind of wanders."

"Don't let it get lost in the weeds," I said. "I might have to get mad about it and mow your goddamn grass."

"Naw, it's cool," the big man said. "Cool, right, boys?"

They all made a noise that sounded like agreement.

"We have a business," the big man said. "People call me the Benefactor."

Ah, I thought.

"Could your business be illegal?" Brett asked.

"It could be, a little bit."

"How about a lot of bit?" I said.

"Fair enough. We got the biggest business doing the business we do here in East Texas, but that business is a little smaller than it used to be."

Things were starting to click.

"Could it have to do with a few lumber-jills with shiny hatchets?" Brett said.

"It could have to do with that," he said.

"Can we get an amen on that?" Leonard said. "Does it or doesn't it?"

Big man nodded. "Yeah. Who'd ever think some guys like us in the business we're in, selling go-juice and pussy, would be afraid of some little girls and a middle-aged woman, but I got to say, it's kind of come to that. Sales are down. And there's that fentanyl shit. It's killing the customers, which is slowing our business down even if we're not the ones selling that shit. We all get lumped in the same pile."

"Because you only use good ol' meth without the fentanyl," I said. "Sort of the health-food version."

"You might say that," the Benefactor said.

"Of course, it's just a slower death, like Skinny there," I said. "He's jonesing so hard the floor is vibrating. Or maybe he wants to try out our restroom."

"A family hire," the Benefactor said. "Whatcha gonna do? But these witches, they sell shit they know will kill, make some money, but mostly they're trying to kill our business with theirs."

"Can't you take care of them?" Brett said.

"We don't know where they are exactly. They show up now and then, kill our people, chop them up. You probably heard about the bodies popping up."

"Good to see you're concerned about your employees," I said. "Or at least the money they make you."

"You're like lawyers or priests, right?" the Benefactor said. "I tell you something, I have confidentiality."

"Not like that at all," Brett said. "That's a TV myth."

"Well, that's disappointing."

"What I can tell you," I said, "we're not blabbermouths about something you tell us in confidence. We get our tits in a wringer, we'll squeal like a teenage girl on a roller coaster."

The Benefactor sat silent and his lips moved around like they were trying to find a comfortable place to lie down.

"I guess we can leak a little and keep a little back," he said.

"That's up to you," I said. "Thing I want to know is, why us?"

"Doolin was our inside man," Benefactor said. "Kept an eye out, so to speak. Told us how you had a run-in with our people, the Planters. At first, Doolin thought it might be you three doing the chopping and burning, but about five minutes of research got rid of that idea. We thought the girls might be a myth. Doolin was checking into it. He found out they weren't no myth. They fucked him up, way I hear it."

"We saw what they did, and yes, you could call it fucked up," I said.

"Then solid word got around about the witches, what they were doing. They don't really hide what they're doing. My take is they want to bring me out in the open, cut my business off at the head. They've had more girls join in with them. I guess they got a team of ten now."

That was news we didn't know. More disenfranchised women joining the nut brigade. Not good. I hadn't expected her to recruit that easily.

"What you're saying is you're afraid," Leonard said.

"We ain't afraid," Skinny said. "Not of no women."

I ignored Skinny, said to Benefactor, "So you guys aren't afraid, but you've come to us?"

"We just want to hire some side help," he said. "We're running our business, a good business, and these girls show up with hatchets, surprise my people, skin them, chop them up, sometimes burn them. Then they take over the juice. That isn't good for business. No one wants to get skinned. These fucking women have become kind of like booger bears. Scaring our customers, killing our customers. We want that to stop. We want you to help us find them."

"Haven't you looked?" I said.

"Yes, but no cigar. We're not detectives. We're your local drug dealers. I got to get business right again. I hear you guys know how to get rough."

"Only if we need to," I said.

"Oh, I don't know," Leonard said. "I was born rough. Need to be or not, I'm rough. I got skin like an alligator, a dick like a corncob, and I'm vicious as a badger with turpentined balls."

Benefactor laughed. The others laughed because he did. Skinny laughed last, like he was the only guy in a theater.

"I guess you people will do," said Benefactor.

"Didn't say we'd do it," I said.

"Well, we need you because you can detect and already probably know a few things about them, but we can decide to make your life uncomfortable."

"We don't want your drug money," Leonard said. "And as for making us uncomfortable, I can make you more uncomfortable. Listen here, Benefactor. I'll stick you up one of those big guys' asses, then the other up his ass. By then, Skinny, it might be too tight for you, so I'll just stomp a mud hole in your ass."

"That's a lot for one man to do," Benefactor said, standing up.

"Oh, I got backup if I need it."

I smiled at Benefactor. Brett cocked her revolver. She did it while it was still in the drawer, but everyone in the room knew what that sound was.

Benefactor and the others had sour expressions, like they had mistaken a turd for a cookie.

They stood there awhile. No one moved.

"All right," Benefactor said. "Tell you what. We'll let it go, but if you change your mind and want to make about thirty thousand, I'm going to leave info. This number only works on one phone. Call it, you get me. I don't keep the phone long, so it's got to be pretty soon."

"No plans to call," Brett said.

"Just in case," Benefactor said and took a little booklet out of his back pocket, a pen from the front of his Hawaiian shirt. He wrote down a number, tore out the page, placed it on the desk.

"We'll go now."

"You do that," Leonard said, "unless you want to try some shit."

"Not today," Benefactor said.

They went out the door the same way they came in, like ducks in a row. They left the door open. I went over and closed it, but before I did, I watched them get into a big black 4Runner and drive away.

We were back on our toes again. I didn't think the Benefactor would bother us, not when he was hoping for our help, but you never knew with people like that. Truth was he wasn't the big shit after all, and he was scared. Elda and her crew by this point weren't amateurs. They had turned their kind of murder into an art.

There was a bit of potentially good news, however. Charlie, aka Heaven, had sent word through the police, the messenger being Pookie, that she wanted to talk to me and Brett. Leonard still wasn't invited. As for Lissie, we got news she wasn't doing so good. Those slaps had shattered her eardrums, or at least messed them up, and she couldn't tell if she was standing or lying down. She would heal, but she might need a hearing aid or to play her music loud.

Me and Brett drove over to the hospital. The guards knew to let us pass. In Charlie's room, the bed was raised and she was raised with it. She had been showered. She had some color in her skin and her hair was combed out. Before it had looked like a briar patch with a rabbit in it. Her injured leg stuck out from under the sheet. It had a wrap on it.

She had a tray on a stand that went across the bed. It had food on it. The hospital food was the sort only starving people ate, then after eating wished they had starved to death. Her utensils were made of plastic.

There were two chairs by the bed. Brett and I sat down in them. The overhead lights in the room were sharp, and the blinds were split and more light came in from outside.

When we were seated, Charlie said, "I been thinking."

"Yeah," Brett said.

"Yeah. Maybe you're right. Maybe Elda doesn't trust me so much. Not that I've given her reason not to."

"I doubt she really trusts anyone," Brett said.

Charlie nodded in agreement, then sat silently for a moment.

The moment passed. "She tried to have me killed."

"Did indeed," Brett said.

"I don't deserve that."

I wasn't so sure, but I kept my mouth shut.

"What hurts a little is Lissie couldn't tie two strings together and they sent her to kill me."

"Maybe she was easy to convince," Brett said.

"She was always jealous."

"That's probably it," Brett said.

"Has to be, but Elda could have sent someone good. Sending Lissie shows what she thinks of me."

"Sent someone good, you might not be here enjoying that wonderful meal in front of you," I said.

Charlie looked down at her tray. Only a bite or two had been cut out of a Salisbury steak. It looked like a tumor that had been pressed with a laundry iron.

"Elda has lots of money. She moved us around. She finally bought a place using a false identity. She has a lot of those. It's a nice place and was supposed to be for some kind of business retreat for bigwigs, but the business that built it didn't last through COVID. It was for sale and Elda bought it. It's off the beaten path. We mostly stayed there.

"I'm thinking I ought to tell you where it is, but I got to wonder if maybe Elda came after me because she was misinformed. Thought I wasn't loyal. That I did something I didn't do."

"Informed, misinformed," Brett said, "she was quick to think you were disloyal. She didn't give you much room for consideration. Seems to me that shows she never did trust you. All she was concerned with was the possibility. She thought Lissie would kill you, but she also thought Lissie might not walk out of here. Good chance she would end up shot full of holes. I think if Lissie got away, good, and if she did get shot up, that was good too. Both of you were expendable as far as Elda was concerned."

"I thought Lissie might have come on her own."

"Do you think she'd do something like that without consulting Elda?" Brett asked.

"No. I don't think so."

"There you have it," Brett said.

"Guess I'm going to tell you where she stays, then. Guess I will."

We waited to see if she was just guessing or meant it.

"That place I was telling you about," she said. "I don't know an address, but get me a pen and paper and have them take away this tray of swill, and I'll draw you a map. And remember, I do this, you're going to talk to the law, right? Say I cooperated."

"We'll talk to the law," Brett said. "We promise you that. Pinkie swear."

They didn't actually wrap their pinkies together.

I went to get paper and a pen.

65

We met Leonard at his gym, showed him the map, told him what Charlie had said.

"You're going to give this to Justin?"

"Seems the way," I said.

"You trust Charlie?"

"Not all that much," I said.

"I don't see it would do her any good to lie about this," Brett said. "I think she's starting to see the light and realize a train is behind it."

"She wants to not spend her entire life in prison," I said. "I don't know if the law will do what she wants, but it'll do better than she expects. Better than she deserves even if they only cut a week off her sentence."

"You've gotten more hard core than me," Leonard said. "Almost."

"They chopped my friend."

"I'm doing fine," Leonard said, "but a truck ran over her, I wouldn't bother to scrape her up if she was in my driveway. I wouldn't want her on my shovel."

"It's agreed," Brett said. "Nobody likes her."

"There's something wants me to hesitate here," I said. "Maybe not tell Justin right away."

"Is that something holding you back the Benefactor?" Leonard said.

"Ah," Brett said. "I see this coming. We tell the Benefactor first and let his people collide with the Hatchet Girls, but we don't mention that to Justin."

"What I'm thinking," I said. "Then we tell Justin a slight bit behind telling Benefactor. Tell Justin there might be some serious shit going down, so be extra-ready. We don't want them to walk into more than they expect, but we want the Benefactor to get there ahead of him and let those jackasses do to each other what we'd like to do."

"It wouldn't bother me if they did a bit of tribal warfare," Leonard said. "Maybe we end up there too. Armed and vengeful for Tom and Jilly and for chopping at me. I really don't like them, Hap. I really don't."

"Not a fan myself, but as to ending up there, no need."

"But maybe we do, as I'd like to see that shit go down," Leonard said. "It's more than a little bit personal. I want to bust some heads and crap down some necks."

"I'm saying we stay out of it, or we might get cross-fired by Benefactor, Elda, and Justin. No need for us to take chances at all, and maybe the law will get justice instead of vengeance. I'm tired of being the Angel of Death. We get both groups squeezed by the law, we've done a good thing and none of us get hurt. You've got a wedding to attend, Leonard. Best to not show up dead."

Brett drove us home. I was feeling worn out. The world kept getting heavier and I kept getting weaker. I wanted to sleep on the water rock in the woods. I wanted to sleep there when it was night and the cool wind was blowing and the leaves were crackling and the limbs were shaking and the water was splashing and gurgling. I wanted to sleep there on thick blankets with Brett. I also wanted to be twenty years younger and twenty pounds lighter and, just to throw it in, I needed a haircut.

I looked in the wing mirror while Brett drove. A car was close behind us, blue, a Prius. A woman was driving. I started to wonder if we were being followed. Then, as we passed a middle school, the car pulled in line behind other cars waiting to pick their kids up.

Okay, Hap. Here we are possibly on the tail end of all this crazy business, and you're starting to get paranoid.

"You okay, Hap?" Brett said. "You look a bit pale."

"I'm fine. Brett, are you happy?"

She grinned. "Yes. I'm not euphoric every second of the day, but I'm okay at my worst moments and really good at my best. You?"

"I don't know," I said. "You make me happy."

"Of course I do," she said. "I'm me."

66

Next morning, I woke up a little late. There was a note from Brett. She had gone to the office and had let me sleep. The note said she thought I needed it. To take my time.

She wasn't wrong there.

I made a cup of coffee and decided to get my mind off things. I read awhile, then walked down to the rock in the woods, but this time I wasn't as filled with wonder as before.

Too much on my mind. In fact, there was something at the back of my brain I couldn't quite identify. It felt as if it were surfacing from a deep pond, like a bloated, drowned body.

I walked back home, sat on the couch with the book again, and when I looked up, midday had passed and the book was nearly read.

I called Benefactor and told him that tomorrow he should take a look at the address Charlie had given me. Ought to go early tomorrow morning, before daylight. I said that way he could catch them napping. To keep him from smelling a trap, I told him he could give us that money he promised, that we wanted it.

He said, "What I'm thinking is my posse is kind of watered down, and from what I hear from survivors of their attacks, my employees, so to speak, the girls have added members and given them brand-new hatchets. I would go in if I had some help. I'm thinking that money I promised goes with that. You and Leonard coming in on it. I don't know about your lady. I think she looks too soft for that."

"You're wrong," I said. "But we never said anything about going in with you."

"Why I'm thinking maybe you ought to, to put some skin in the game for the dough."

"I can slide out of this any way and anytime I want. I gave you what you wanted, where they are and when they can be surprised. I said tomorrow morning before daylight because they change residences a lot. I know where they are now, but maybe not in a day or so."

"Still not to my advantage with the number of men I got to go in after them. They're a bunch of women, but they're crazy women with guns and hatchets and probably some full gas cans. They got the numbers on us, so I'm saying thanks but no thanks."

I could tell he was scared of those women and trying to find excuses despite wanting to put them down. He had come to appreciate their deadliness.

"That's up to you," I said.

"The money stays with me."

I didn't want the money, but I wanted him to think I did. It made it seem more real.

"I should have gotten the money before I told you the address," I said.

"That's right. You should have."

I let him think I was considering his plan. I watched the clock's second hand move around the numbers. After thirty seconds I said, "We can meet you there tomorrow morning, say four a.m."

"And then you no-show? No, thanks. We meet up and go in together."

"Let me ask Leonard," I said.

"Ask him. This money, this deal, has an expiration date."

What he didn't know is neither me nor Leonard wanted his money or his deal. Well, maybe Leonard would have gone through with it. In spite of his retirement talk, gym owning and being a husband and having plans to adopt a kid, I could tell earlier at the gym that he was ready to fuck someone up. At the back of it all, he was addicted to action of all kinds; it built up in him like boiling water and then it would boil over. He was on the right track with his life. And I didn't want to be an enabler when it came to violence.

I would first talk to Brett about it, then Leonard, then we'd go to Justin. We could plan a meet with Benefactor, have Justin arrive instead. But to do what? Benefactor and his boys wouldn't be caught making or dealing drugs, just assembling. And the way Texans were about guns, no one would be legally bothered that they were armed to the teeth. They could just say it was their right to tote guns without permits.

I had guns myself, but I had avoided a love affair with them.

Still, I was a hypocrite, and it pained me. Like Leonard, and even Brett, I was a killer. A self-righteous one, but a killer.

I thought over my plan and how Benefactor had thrown a monkey wrench into it. Decided we had to play it his way, at least for a while. I needed someone else to improve on my flawed idea.

It was late afternoon by the time I drove into town to tell Brett and Leonard how things were, see what they could add to the idea of meeting up with Benefactor and his boys. When I was about fifteen minutes out, I called Brett to tell her I was on the way, then Leonard. I told them what the Benefactor's plan was about and how we needed to talk and consider.

I was starting to feel paranoid. Saw the blue car again, same one I thought was following me before. Or maybe it was just another blue Prius and not the same car.

The car pulled over at a Dollar General. I glanced at it in the rearview mirror. A young woman got out and went inside the store. There were others in the car.

I let my breath out in a relieved sigh and drove on.

Random thoughts jumped about.

Did they know where I lived? Was that Prius following me and had they dodged into the store to trick me? I was no longer relieved.

How could they follow me if they didn't know where I was coming from? I considered on that, pulled over to the side of the road by an abandoned filling station. I got out and crawled under the car and used my phone light to look around. There was a little beeping light. I took hold of the source of the light and pulled at the magnet that held it to the frame of my car.

A tracker. They had probably put it there the night they had come to the office to bury a hatchet in our door. It had been quick and easy. Drop down, stick it on, then drive away in their van. Maybe another time when we were at the office one of them had cruised into the lot and put the tracker there.

They had known where we were all along. Just waiting for the moment. But I wasn't going to give them that moment.

No, sir, not me.

I wiggled out from under the car and stood up facing it, dropped the tracker on the ground, and crushed it under my heel.

A shadow fell over me. I turned, and there were three women with hatchets. The blue car was nearby with three car doors open. A Prius, its engine quiet as a mouse in house shoes. The one that had stopped at the Dollar Store. They had pulled up on me while I was under the car. They were stealthy bitches, that was for sure.

The first I kicked in the crotch and made her stagger. She went down and grabbed my legs, knocking me off balance. I went for my gun in a holster clipped under my shirt at the back of my pants. I managed to get hold of it but dropped it.

Nice.

The one holding my legs had one hell of a grip. As I was losing my balance, one of the other Hatchet Girls swung the back end of her hatchet at my head.

I tried to duck, but I was a bit late with that plan.

I swear I could hear the wind whistling just before the flat end of that hatchet caught up with me.

My head hurt so bad, I thought something angry was living inside of it, kicking the furniture about, tossing the dishes. Then I was suddenly wet and chilled and then the chill went away and I opened my eyes.

The room was full of light and women with hatchets. Six women, anyway. I recognized a couple of them from the time they had been in our parking lot and from when they had attacked me and nabbed me. One was the woman I had seen go into the Dollar General, accomplishing the equivalent of a head fake.

Then I realized there were seven women, counting Elda, who was standing close to me with a plastic bucket in her hands.

I had been splashed awake. Water dripped from my hair and down my shirt front.

Elda looked leaner than when I had seen her last. Her hair was tied back so tight the flesh in her face was pulled taut as a boat sail in a hurricane wind. The bones in her cheeks were sharp enough to use for letter openers. There was something about her eyes that appeared different. They seemed darker and deeper and merciless, like the eyes of a shark.

The windows outside showed me that it was solidly night. I had been out for a while. To my right, one window looked out over a yard, and there was a yard light that gave the grass an emerald appearance. Beyond that was a patch of trees, and the trees were thick and shadowy.

“I thought you’d be harder to corner,” Elda said.

“Me too,” I said. My voice seemed way too loud and rang in my head like a church bell.

My arms and legs were widely spread. My wrists were fastened to a wall with cuffs that were screwed into the wood. My ankles were secured the same way.

I had what you might understatedly call a bad feeling.

Elda moved close to me, her face almost touching mine. I did everything I could not to seem scared, as I felt that would delight her. It would be like throwing gas on a fire. But that doesn’t mean I wasn’t scared. I was terrified.

“What do you think, big shot?” she said.

"I think you have a very nice place."

"Does your voice tremble, Mr. Pine?"

It had indeed.

One of the girls, thin and anxious, dressed in jeans and a loose shirt, said, "This is Collins."

"Oh, my mistake," Elda said. "One man is the same as another to me."

"Poor experiences?" I said.

"Oh, you are precious. Poor experiences? There's not enough bandwidth to list them all. When you walk down the street and a woman is approaching you, do you fear she might attack you, rape you, perhaps strangle you? Of course not, but women feel that way when men approach. They know who the aggressors are. They know who the users are. They know who thinks they are less than human because they are female, not male."

"I agree with all that," I said. "Secondhand, of course."

"Agreeing doesn't change things, Collins. Women will always be a pretty package to your breed. Something to open like a Christmas present and then discard. Someone to control and do their bidding. But today, Collins, we are going to open you up and throw you away. Like my daughter was thrown away."

I didn't think a few words on how I wasn't like those men was appropriate. Her mind was made up that all men were vermin. But I wasn't anxious to be a stand-in for her empowerment or the empowerment of her Hatchet Girls. The whole speech was designed to torture me mentally and emotionally, make me anticipate the part that was coming, the physical torture, followed by slow death, cut and peeled, eventually chopped, possibly burned like an old tire.

It was effective. I felt like I was about to pee on myself.

Therefore, I couldn't believe what came out of my mouth. "You do what you must. It's bound to be better than a fucked-up villain lecture."

Elda turned her head to the side. "Do you not see you are the villain, little man?"

"Not that little. Six foot even," I said.

I think I'm actually just short of that without boots or shoes, but hey, what the hell. I figured what was about to happen was going to make me somewhat shorter anyway.

"Men's egos," she said. "You just had to let me know you're a real man with an adequate height. Do you want to talk about your dick size?"

"I don't want to say complimentary things in front of it. It already has a big head."

Elda tossed the plastic bucket aside.

"I can guarantee you it will fit nicely in your mouth. Darla, will you bring Mama a hatchet?"

Darla was the thin nervous girl. She came forward and gave Elda her hatchet. The light winked off the blade as Elda turned it over and over in her hands. She had the itch to use it, and I was absolutely certain she was about to scratch that itch.

She tossed the hatchet up, and the light made a shadow of it and the shadow was big on the wall, and when the hatchet fell, Elda caught it almost without looking, and she swung it behind her back and pushed her other hand behind her to take it, and now she was swinging it with that hand, over her head, between her legs. She flipped it and caught it a few more times. As she did this, my dick and nutsack tried to crawl up inside of me.

"I was a twirler at football games, exhibitions. Quite good. I did it for my daddy, who liked the twirlers and cheerleaders and liked me too, but not in a good way, as they say these days. My mother died young. My father decided I should take her place in all things that he deemed female.

"I twirled for him, and I twirled for them. The boys in the stands. I tried to express sex appeal as I did it. That was my job. My father always told me that was my job. To look pretty. To be sexy. I tried so hard to be pretty. Perfect in my little shorts and tight top and sequins and boots with fringe at the top. Fortunately for me, he died before I finished high school.

"And then came the knives and axes. I saw a TV show with a female knife thrower. She had axes too. And she could hit a penny from across the room by throwing either an ax or knife. She had a male assistant. And he was fastened to a spinning wheel, and she could throw weapons so close, she pinned his clothes to him but didn't touch him. Before I had only seen women targets. That's what they called them: targets. Seeing that, something in me said, 'You can do this,' and with lots of practice, pretty soon I could. But I confess to you, Mr. Collins, I didn't want to miss my male targets. I wanted to end my act by splitting open the bastard's head. I thought about that a lot. I used to watch my abusive husband sleeping in bed, and I had a butcher knife, and I thought what it might be like to stick him, maybe stand back and throw it at him. Poorly balanced knife, though, so sticking was more practical. I didn't do it, but that's okay, he died and I inherited his money. So much money. Hard for a woman to earn that kind of money, not being able to talk shit with the boys and such, swing a dick around.

"Being good with deadly weapons felt good. It gave me a power I hadn't had before. I went back to practicing with them after my husband departed, and I hope he went straight to hell where the devil will skin him and burn him with the help of female demons. I dreamed many times of chopping and sticking men, the ones who make this world sour as curdled milk. And when my daughter was killed, eventually I saw how that might happen. I've taught my girls. My young women. Some are better than others. All are lethal, Mr. Collins. Shall we see what they can do?"

"I don't guess that's truly a question," I said.

"It is not."

"What I thought."

"I believe you do not understand the glory on which I stand. The empowerment I give to myself and other women."

"A handful of murderous women with hatchets isn't the kind of empowerment that means anything more than death or life in prison. Most women go through whole days not chopping somebody and being glad for it."

"That's a simple way to look at things, Collins."

"It is indeed."

"Assemble," she said.

It was like she was the head of the Avengers from the comics. And in a way, I guess she was. Except these characters were not made of paper, ink, and colors. They were flesh-and-blood and angry, a cult of vengeance against males. They were not without some justification, but in my view, not enough for this.

I considered, just out of spite, screaming, "I love pussy," but I didn't see that as constructive.

The women made a line along the back wall. The one in the lead stepped forward a couple of feet and slapped her hatchet in her hand a few times.

"When you're ready, Eloise," Elda said.

And before I could imagine Eloise moving, the hatchet was in flight, tumbling over and over, and to me it looked like it was heading straight for my head.

68

There was a thud as the hatchet blade stuck in the wall. I could feel a sting on my ear, and then there was warm blood rushing across my cheek, rolling down my chin, dripping onto my shirt. I could smell the blood.

"Eloise is pretty good," Elda said. "Some, like Darla, have promise, but sometimes Darla misses the target. If she tries to throw a hatchet between your legs, she might just take your balls with it. But how else will she get practice?"

"A paper target?" I said. I wasn't being brave. It was one of those things that had cursed me since youth: a big mouth. But it wasn't like pleading would help. This deal was done. The Comanche warriors used to taunt their torturers to show their mettle. But I was no Comanche warrior. Just a frightened bag of flesh with a smart mouth that I couldn't help using.

"Darla?" Elda said. "Just nip him if you can."

Darla stepped forward. She was grinning as she moved into place. She had a shiny hatchet blade with a red handle. She wore an oversize yellow T-shirt that said YOGA IS A WAY OF LIFE, shorts, and heavy brown boots with white socks poking out at the tops.

She shook her ass a little, adjusted her feet. The grin was gone. She narrowed her eyes.

Elda had moved to the side and back of the room. She said, "Aim for someplace so that if you miss, it may not kill him. Right away anyway. I like for us cats to play with our mouse."

I tried not to flinch. It wouldn't help, and if she truly was trying only to wound me, it would be better not to move even a little bit. Still, pinned to the wall as I was, staring at a face that had shifted its expression and appeared fiendish, I could put all my hopes into a sack and throw them over the fence and down a canyon. Now or later, they were going to do horrible things to me. Maybe it would be better if she didn't just wound me and got it over with.

The ax was thrown so quickly, the movement surprised me. It tumbled over and over and dropped low, and the blade caught my pants leg inside near my groin and pinched my flesh, and once again, I could feel warm blood trickling, this time in my pants leg, running quickly down to my shoe and inside it, dampening my sock.

Elda laughed. “Too low. More practice. Charm. Your turn.”

Charm was a stocky woman with a flat-top haircut and no expression. She could have been sawing the head off a puppy or buying toilet paper; you couldn’t tell with that face.

She stepped into position and looked at me and took a deep breath.

Elda said, “Take one of the ears off this time. By the way, Collins, Charm can do it. She’s the best I’ve got. Almost as good as me. Take the left ear. Can you do it?”

“Yes, ma’am,” Charm said.

I got the feeling Charm would do anything Elda asked, from sticking an electric toothbrush up her ass to eating a live mouse dipped in dog shit.

I waited for it.

Charm leaned back a little, readjusted her feet, lifted her arm. I hadn’t turned my head, but out of the corner of my eye I saw a shadow move in the light in the yard, and then the shadow lifted something and the window blew out and Charm’s head blew off.

69

Parts of Charm's head moved apart fast and splashed on one of the Hatchet Girls and some of it hit the wall, including a piece of her scalp with her hair attached. It slid slowly down the wall like a creeping animal. Charm was on the ground with her ankles crossed. She lay there oozing blood and brains out of what was left of her skull.

The door was kicked in. It slammed against the wall. Leonard glided into the room like Dracula. He had a twelve-gauge pump shotgun. He said, "Howdy, asswipes. Drop the fucking hatchets."

Hesitation on their part.

Leonard blew a hole in the ceiling.

"That will be my only wasted shot," he said and lowered the barrel of the shotgun at Elda.

Leonard was being measured. Normally he would have come in shooting, cutting everyone down until he was out of ammunition.

Elda moved as if to pick up the hatchet Charm had dropped. "Don't shoot, Leonard," I heard Brett say. "This one's mine."

Brett was at the window poking a double barrel through the gap. Jagged glass protruded all around the frame. The Hatchet Girls dropped their weapons. The axes thudded onto the floor.

"I got one more barrel just for you, you brain-dead cunt," Brett said, staring at Elda. Brett looked like a Viking berserker as she stood at the shattered window poking the shotgun inside. Her flaming-red hair framed her face like frozen blood.

While she pointed her shotgun, Leonard came over and jerked the wrist-cuff screws out of the wall like they were darts. The ankle ones were more difficult. He tugged at them, then stood up and threw the barrel of the shotgun over his left arm and aimed it at Elda with his right.

"Come up with a key or I start shooting, bitch."

"See how easy it is to call a woman a bitch," Elda said. "Or a cunt."

"Just solid identification in this case," Leonard said.

Elda dug in her pocket, produced a key. She came over to Leonard and handed it to him. He took it in one hand and with the other he poked the shotgun's barrel into her chest and pushed her back.

Brett moved away from the window and a moment later came through the door Leonard had kicked down on the opposite side of the room.

Leonard placed his shotgun on the floor and used the key to unlock the ankle cuffs while Brett pointed the barrel of her gun in the direction of the women, who had now bunched together like sheep.

When the ankle cuffs were free, Leonard picked his gun up off the floor and stood up. He gave me the key to finish with unlocking the cuffs on my wrists.

I did that; the cuffs and the short chains and attachment screws clattered to the floor.

Headlights shone through the woods. They were coming closer, dancing around the tree trunks like will-o'-the-wisps. The lights kept moving, circled into the driveway, stopped. The lights were pointing at the house, which was lit up like an operating room.

Leonard said, "I hope you clowns can run fast or you got guns somewhere, 'cause you're gonna need them."

The three of us hustled through the broken-down door and moved across the back of the property and into the trees. We found spots in the woods not directly behind the house but off to the side of it. In that position we could see the cars and trucks in the yard, beams still pointing at the house. Doors slammed. Shadows moved in front of the vehicle lights.

One of the shadows was easy for me to identify.

Benefactor.

Elda and the Hatchet Girls did in fact have guns stored somewhere, and they seemed to find them just in time. They started firing out windows, but there were too many men, and they were all men. They came around the sides of the house. Elda went out the back door and stumbled onto the bit of grass out there.

She had been hit. A clean shot through a window, or perhaps the wall had been breached by heavy-duty ammunition. She had a gun in one hand, hatchet in the other.

Benefactor came around back. When he saw Elda, he lifted a pistol and fired at her. Elda jumped a little but still stood. She fired at Benefactor and the bullet appeared to miss. Then she threw the hatchet as he fired again. His bullet hit her solid and she doubled over, then moved toward the woods.

Benefactor had a hatchet between the eyes. He dropped his gun and walked a few paces, stopped, tried to pull the hatchet out of his head. That didn't happen. He fell face-first, driving the hatchet in deeper.

Elda staggered into the woods. She came along the trail we had used to get to the side of the house. She walked right up to us and fell over.

I eased over to her and looked at her face in the dark. I couldn't see well enough to describe the expression on her face. She said, "If only…" and then was silent.

Everyone was now in the yard. The women died quick. Too many guns on the men's side, not enough on the women's side.

Pretty soon the guns stopped firing and the night went quiet and still. There were two of the Benefactor's men left. They were going to be leaving a lot of cars and trucks. They still had their guns. One of them was Skinny. I didn't see the other guys who had come to our office. They were probably lying on the ground with mouths full of dirt. The one with Skinny was new to me.

Skinny had an injured arm and had stuck his hand into his shirt front to support it.

The men looked about, as if surprised any of this had happened. They looked at Benefactor lying facedown on the ground. The man that wasn't Skinny used his foot to roll Benefactor over. The hatchet was buried deep now. Benefactor was well beyond a remarkable recovery.

Skinny fell to one knee. The other man helped him up. They went to the front of the house and got in a car, backed it up, and drove away.

The other headlights shone bright in the night.

I could hear sirens in the distance.

71

Brett led us through the woods and then out of them and finally into another patch of trees that broke open onto a narrow clay road. Leonard's truck was parked there.

The house had certainly been off the beaten path.

Leonard and Brett slid their shotguns behind the seat. Leonard got behind the wheel, Brett slipped into the middle, and I rode shotgun. Considering I was the only one without a shotgun, that was slightly ironic.

I turned and looked over my shoulder. At the mouth of the road where it hit a blacktop, a cop car whizzed by with the lights flickering colors, and then it was gone.

The law wasn't exactly sneaking up on anyone.

Leonard waited awhile, then turned the truck around with the lights off. Once turned around, he eased down the road toward the blacktop. It was hard to see, but he was managing.

When we were within fifty feet or so of the blacktop, Leonard parked, got out, walked to the blacktop, and carefully looked both ways.

He came back, climbed into the truck, and drove us out of there. We were pretty far down the blacktop before Leonard turned on the headlights, and we cruised home as if we had merely been out for an evening drive.

72

At the house, my ear wearing a Band-Aid, I sat at the kitchen table watching Leonard eat vanilla cookies like a cookie-eating machine. Brett told me how things had gone down and why.

"When you didn't show up, I got worried, of course. I tried calling and texting. But I have a tracker on my phone. I called Leonard and we went to where the tracker led us.

"We found your car and the crushed tracker and your phone where you dropped it. Seemed obvious you had been Hap-napped.

"Since we had talked about the Hatchet Girls' place with Charlie, it seemed likely you had been taken there. They wouldn't know we knew where it was. Or at least I didn't think so. It was iffy, but we were right."

"You were right," Leonard said. "I just agreed with you it was likely."

"We drove out there, and on the way, hoping you were there, I called Benefactor, told him that you and I talked and we weren't going to help him, but if he wanted them, he ought to immediately go to the address I gave him. We had intel they were packing up. Benefactor said he didn't want to give us the money unless we showed up there. Said he had put together a larger crew than he'd thought he could, but if we came on, joined him, we could profit financially. Pretty sure he planned to get us there and kill us after we helped him take down the women. I told him we wouldn't be there. Me and Leonard thought we could find you, and if you weren't chopped up in a bucket, we'd take you away and let Benefactor and Elda deal with each other."

"If you were chopped and in a bucket, we'd bring the bucket home and bury what was left of you in the flower bed," Leonard said.

"That's nice of you."

"But it worked out just the way Brett planned. Got any milk?"

"Where do you think milk would be if we had any? The oven?"

"Right," he said, got up, and pulled a carton out of the refrigerator.

"You know where the glasses are," I said. "What about the law? How did they know to show up?"

"Just before we pulled up, I called Justin, told him I heard Elda and Benefactor, the dope kings, were about to have it out, and here was his chance to get them both. I didn't mention we were going to be there."

"All very nifty," I said. "Of course, I'm sure he's wondering how you knew all about that little rendezvous."

"I got answers for that," Brett said.

"Bet you do," I said. "For God's sake, Leonard. Don't choke on the cookies."

"I've been deprived at home. Pookie only allows so many boxes a week. I mean, hell, I work out. I'm not fat. He says it's too much sugar, not good for me. Thing is, vanilla cookies make me happy. I get through with these, I'll top it off with a Dr Pepper."

"Don't have any," I said.

"You Philistine," he said.

73

Justin invited us out for breakfast and coffee at a little diner that looked to be on its last legs. I had forgotten it existed. It smelled like fried eggs, grease, melted sugar, and a poorly kept hospice.

I had two scrambled eggs and two strips of bacon, coffee so weak it wore a back brace. Me and Brett, Leonard, and Justin were seated at a back booth that gave us some privacy. There were three others in the place, and they looked disappointed with themselves for showing up there.

Justin said, “Do you have an idea why I invited you here?”

“You love our company?” Leonard said.

“No,” Justin said.

“Eating here is part of our punishment?” Brett said.

“You wanted me to show you my dick,” Leonard said.

“Again, no and no.”

“Because you want to talk to us about something you don’t want to say at the police station?” Brett said.

“That’s it.”

I stirred my fork around in my eggs, managed to get the last runny bites to settle on top of the tines, and ate it. It wasn’t good but I was hungry. By the time we had arrived at nine a.m. I could have eaten the ass out of a menstruating horse.

“There was some activity on the Hatchet Girl case,” Justin said.

“Really?” I said.

“You three can stop acting innocent. Brett, you told me something was going on and where to go, and when we got there, there were nearly enough bodies to cover the lawn like a carpet. Shot and chopped people lay all over the place.”

“How big was the lawn?” I asked.

“Again, don’t act innocent.”

“We knew about the place from when we talked to Charlie. We didn’t tell you about it because we wanted to check the address and see if there was a house there, and there was. We were sneaky.”

We hadn’t done this, but I thought it was probably the right thing to say. Even if Justin was some kind of ally, not letting him know we were there was most likely a good move.

"So you knew this was going down how?" Justin said.

"Some things Charlie said gave us an idea it might, and soon."

That was an enormous lie.

"Look, a fly," Leonard said. A big fat one landed on Leonard's cleaned plate and skated in the grease. A fly Olympian skating for the gold.

Justin sighed.

"I'm saying I know you three were there. I know that as sure as I know how to point to the sky."

"You know what I learned recently," Leonard said. "They squeeze dogs' anal glands and it's good for them. It's not random anal-gland squeezing."

"What the hell?" Justin said.

"You can tell they need it because they get stinky breath and smell like someone overturned a tuna boat. I didn't know that. I've had dogs a lot of my life and never once did I do any anal-glad squeezing and wasn't aware if my veterinarian stuck his hand up their butt to do some squeezing or not. I'm going to ask next time I see a vet."

"What?" I said.

"Yep," Leonard said. "It's a real thing."

"It is," Brett said. "Jesus, Hap. Didn't you know that?"

"My dog has had it done," Justin said. "But to get back to why you're here, it would be helpful for me to know a few things about that night."

"You just hope we were there so you have another thing to hold over our heads, blackmail us with if something new comes along and you need us to break the law for you," Brett said.

"You think I'd do that?"

"Absolutely," Leonard said.

We found out more from Justin than he got from us. Bottom line was the Hatchet Girls were all dead and so were all the members of the drug gang. Of course, Justin didn't know we had seen Skinny and one of the members of the gang drive away.

What had happened wouldn't end drugs being sold in and around LaBorde, but it would put a dent in it for a while, and it had certainly disrupted the Hatchet Girls.

Justin, obviously frustrated with us, had the tired middle-aged waitress fill his coffee cup again. The fly had finally finished its skating performance. It settled in the waitress's hair as she walked away.

"I wonder if we humans need our anal glands squeezed," Leonard said. "I'm going to see if Pookie will squeeze mine."

"Trying to have breakfast here," Justin said.

"I wasn't talking about him doing it here at the table," Leonard

said.

Justin, realizing that he was getting nothing from us, drank his coffee with a frown on his face and called for the check.

"Why, thanks, Justin."

"I'm just paying mine," Justin said. "You're on your own. You can go when you want or squeeze anal glands here in the booth after I'm gone. Come on, though. Were you there? Did you see if anyone escaped?"

We said nothing.

The waitress brought the check over. Justin gave her his credit card, said, "They'll pay theirs."

She went away with the card and bill.

Justin said, "Don't expect any favors from me."

"And expect none from us," I said.

"Well, I got none from you."

"Exactly," I said.

"Actually, depends on how you look at it," Brett said.

The check came back and Justin filled out the tip amount and signed it. I could see he went for 10 percent. Cheap bastard.

"What about Charlie?" I said. "She gave us the information we gave you. We told her you might put a good word in for her."

"Brett gave me a call and we went out there. That's slight."

"Bullshit," I said.

"Shit, hang her," Leonard said. "And there was another little skank, wasn't there?"

"Lissie," Brett said.

"Noose her up too."

"They don't use nooses anymore," Justin said.

"Bring back that custom is what I say," Leonard said.

"Don't listen to him," I said.

"I don't."

"Mark my words," Leonard said. "You get a dog, you'll be glad I told you about anal-gland squeezing."

Justin ignored Leonard.

"I'll tell the DA Charlie gave me valuable information through you. He'll do what he does. It's not like we owe it to her. You weren't in any position to make a deal for her. Maybe I can take execution off the table and she can spend her life in prison without parole. The one tried to kill her will get a harsher sentence. You know, I could tell the DA another thing, that you withheld information you got from Charlie."

"But you got that information," Brett said. "Once we were sure the place she told us existed, you were told."

"That's splitting hairs," Justin said.

“Why should we want you to go on a wild-goose chase and waste the time and money of our valuable police department?” Leonard said.

“That’s weak,” Justin said.

“Oh, I don’t know. I think it’ll hold up pretty well,” I said.

I could tell from Justin’s expression that he actually thought it might.

Justin got up to leave, stood by the table looking down at us. He said, “I really hate you guys.”

When he walked away, Leonard said, “That wasn’t very nice, now, was it? I mean, ‘hate’ is a strong word. Right?”

“Right,” Brett and I said at the same time.

Now that the business with the Hatchet Girls was out of the way, the thing that had been bothering me for quite some time tried to resurface. I was beginning to see pieces of it and they were large enough to take hold of and I was starting to click them together. But there were still gaps.

On an afternoon while Brett was at the office, I went over to the gym and officially agreed I was coming in with Leonard, but first I was going to take a week off.

“So you’re in, but first you want a vacation?”

“I haven’t started yet,” I said. “I’m telling you I can start a week from now. Make that eight days.”

“Hell, Hap. Make it ten, and maybe I can give you a bonus for the delay.”

“Just got some things to do.”

“You’re having your anal glands checked for squeezing, right?”

“See you later, Leonard.”

I drove over to Belinda’s, asked if she and the kids wanted to go to the petting zoo. They did. All except Baby Darling rode in Belinda’s car.

At the petting zoo Belinda wanted to make small talk. I wasn’t up to it. I still had things on my mind. I went over to Porky’s spot while the kids and Belinda loved on goats, rabbits, and the like. Porky was preoccupied with the food in his trough.

Finally, Baby Darling came over.

“I like science,” she said out of the blue.

“That’s good.”

“I like so much science, I don’t know which kind I prefer.”

“Study as much of it as you can. That ought to sort it for you.”

“Mama said going to college might not be in the cards due to money.”

“Perhaps you could get a scholarship if you do well in school. You got time. You’re still a kid.”

“I know. I don’t feel like one, though. Still, Mama can’t see where the money is coming from.”

“You might get a job when you’re older, in high school, stick enough back to get going. Scholarship on top of it, which wouldn't be hard for you, you'd be cruising."

"Think?"

"I do. You've got what it takes, kid. You can do it."

She nodded, but I could see she was doubtful. That wasn't an unreasonable position to take.

Porky finished up his chow, recognized us, and trotted over, snorting. I reached through the wide board fencing and patted him on the head, scratched his nose. Baby Darling patted him too. He grunted with pleasure.

Baby Darling joined her siblings and they went all in on a bunch of sheep. I watched them for a bit, then turned back to Porky.

"You know something bad, Porky, do you think you should always reveal it?"

Porky didn't seem to have an opinion on the matter.

When all the animals were well patted, we left. I drove Baby Darling back and dropped her off with Belinda and the kids. I told them goodbye and drove away, still thinking about some things that were bothering me.

I had to make a decision.

Before I made a definitive decision, I decided to go to Half Price Books in Tyler, Texas. I bought a Stephen Graham Jones novel. I went across the lot to a Thai place and had some spicy soup. I sat there and sipped and thought.

When I was finished with that, I drove over to Barnes & Noble. I looked around. I didn't buy anything and at that moment in time there didn't seem to be anything I wanted. I went into the little bar where they served Starbucks coffee, had a venti decaf with soy milk and two artificial sweeteners that I'd heard might cause a cancer. There were painted images of famous writers on the wall. I sipped my coffee and tried to see if I knew them all.

I did.

The coffee was good. I took my time and drank it slowly.

I went out and sat in my car, turned on the air conditioner, and read some of the Jones book while I was in the Barnes & Noble parking lot.

After a while, I drove to a clothing store and bought some socks. I didn't need socks and could have bought them in LaBorde.

The puzzle pieces I had been considering were now all present and they clicked together.

It was just falling night when I got to Belinda's house.

The house next door was still empty. Porky's former home, the pen and the shack we had built for him, looked ready for a new resident. I parked in front of Belinda's place and got out.

The air had turned coolish. I walked up on Belinda's porch and stood in front of the door. I could hear the TV going. Sounded like a game show. Someone had just won a car and there was much clapping and playing of loud music. I stood there on the porch until the music and clapping went away, and then I stood there some more and listened to some talking on the TV.

Finally, I knocked.

Belinda came to the door in one of her classic muumuus. This one was blue with large yellow flowers on it. It looked new. She had lost a bit of weight.

"Hap. I wasn't expecting you."

"I know. But I needed to talk to you."

"If it's about me going to work somewhere else, it's not personal. I just needed more money."

"It's not about that at all," I said.

"Come in."

"The kids here?"

"They're having an overnight with friends in town. They are making more friends, doing good in school, and Baby Darling is killing it. They moved her into a gifted class."

"As they should. Can we sit on the porch and talk?"

"Let me turn off the TV."

She did that. I went and sat on the glider and waited for her.

She came out, closed her new door gently, seated herself on the glider.

I said, "Let me say it right out. When they found your daughter out back. You said she had on orange shoes. Right?"

"That's right."

"She had been killed by blunt-force trauma. Something clawlike hit her head."

"How I remember it. Yes."

"When you found the body, and when me, Leonard, and the others went out and looked at it down there, slipping out of the ditch wall, it came to me that I didn't see any tennis shoes. Her feet were covered in dirt. You said you saw them. You made a point of it. But you couldn't have."

"I could have imagined it. Expecting it. Knowing she wore them all the time."

"I suppose that's possible."

"What are you saying?"

"I'm saying that Sharoline had gone rogue, and you and her had a dreadful argument. You got mad, grabbed the tourist back scratcher off the wall, and struck her with it. Hard enough to kill her. Might have been a lucky shot, but that's my take. You buried her. You remembered the shoes and assumed they would be seen. That's because you knew she was wearing them because you were the last one to see her while she was alive. Right before she died."

The glider moved slightly as Belinda shifted.

"You're calling me a murderer?"

"Here's the thing. I doubt you did it on purpose. But you did it."

"She was definitely a sociopath," Belinda said.

"You killed her and buried her because you feared she might hurt your other children, and I can understand that. If that's true. I just have your word for it. And a few stories here and there about Sharoline from others."

"Are you going to try and prove I did it?"

"Thought about it. I did. I really did. I'll put it like this. You maybe did all you knew to do to protect your kids and yourself. That's what I'd like to believe. Don't speak, please. Listen. I'm setting up a college fund for Baby Darling. I'll have it arranged to go to her when she turns eighteen. If she goes off the rails before then, I can cancel it, but there's no reason she should."

"Meaning you don't think I'm going to kill her with a back scratcher."

"Listen to me, Belinda. I'm going to go away and will never say I told you this. I didn't tell my wife or Leonard. I haven't told anyone. Don't make me regret this choice."

"I'm a good mother, Hap."

"Except for that whole killed-one-kid-with-a-back-scratcher-and-buried-her-in-a-ditch part."

"Except for that. But I swear, she gave me no choice. She was going to hurt me, maybe kill me. She shoved me against the wall and I grabbed the back scratcher, swung it, and caught her upside the head. She went down and didn't get up. I panicked. I buried her out back. Poorly, because I was in a hurry. I meant to go and bury her better, but I couldn't make myself do it. I loved her, Hap. But I didn't like her. I knew in the end she would do something really bad."

We sat there for a while listening to crickets and frogs in the ditch out back.

"Baby Darling needs something, or the other kids, you can contact me," I said. "Best by phone. Otherwise, you and me are done."

I stood up from the glider.

"Goodbye, Hap."

"Goodbye, Belinda."

I walked out to the car and drove away. I felt dampness on my cheeks. What the hell was that from?

Pookie and Leonard surprised us by nixing a traditional wedding venue. They invited us to their wedding conducted by a justice of the peace at the courthouse in a small room with a few juror seats. There were a handful of other people there; some I knew, some I didn't.

Pookie's relatives, my daughter, Chance. and her ward, Reba, were among them. Chance looked like a very mature young woman. Reba looked like a sassy teenager instead of the sassy child she had been. There's only a slight bit of difference in those two states.

After the brief ceremony, Leonard was talking to one of the guests I didn't know. Me and Brett took that moment to pull Pookie aside and ask about their decision, the dropping of a venue search.

He said, "It was just too much. That kind of thing turns into a nightmare. I wanted it to be a certain way, and Leonard didn't care what kind of way it was."

"Sound exactly right," I said.

"I was getting caught up in the wedding more than being married, and in the end, I agreed with Leonard. It didn't matter. I think we only legalized it because now we can. I like us pissing in the faces of those rednecks that think marriage is only for a man and a woman."

"I know this," I said. "Leonard loves you."

Brett seconded that.

"And I love him," Pookie said.

For a celebration, we all went to a Mexican restaurant, paid for by me. Small talk was made. Pookie and Leonard sat so close, they could have used one chair.

Leonard truly looked happy.

It made me happy. I reached out and held Brett's hand for a moment. She smiled at me.

Reba sat to my right. She was looking down at her food, not eating. "You okay, girl?" I asked.

Her dark, shiny face showed very little until she narrowed her eyes. "Could have gone to McDonald's," she said.

"Could have. But didn't."

"They got them pies."

"They certainly do."

Chance sat across from her. "We finish here, we'll go through the drive-through and I'll buy you a pie."

Reba said, "That works."

"But you have to eat your lunch."

"I'm a grown woman, and you're telling me to eat my lunch?"

"You're not that grown," Chance said.

Leonard smiled, said, "So, the Four-Hundred-Year-Old Vampire still runs the show."

"Know what you can do," Reba said.

"Yes, but I think instead, I'll have another taco. Later, Pookie can do to me what you think I should do to myself."

"Shut that up," Pookie said to Leonard. "Have some manners for a change. She's a child."

"Not really," Leonard said.

There was more juvenile joshing, and then it was over, and Brett and I were driving home.

"What do you think?" Brett asked me.

"About what?"

"About Leonard and Pookie. That going to work out?"

"I think so, but who the hell knows."

"Lots of changes going on," Brett said.

"That's for sure the truth," I said.

That night me and Brett went down to my rock. We didn't have sex this time, because we didn't want our backs to hurt. There was a time when I could have fucked on a bed of nails and not been bothered. Now dust in the bed irritated my skin. I was like "The Princess and the Pea."

We sat on the rock and listened to the water and looked up through the splits in the boughs at the stars. They were bright. The air was cool.

I said, "Killing that girl at the Hatchet Girls' house. How do you feel about that?"

"Better her than you."

"Does it bother you?"

"You know it doesn't. A thing like that is done, nothing I can do one way or another about it. I don't regret it. I move on. I'm fine."

I didn't say anything to that. There was truly nothing to say. I believed her. I wished I was that way.

We sat there for a long time before we gave it up and walked back to the house using my phone light. We went to bed. No sexual activities were involved.

I could hear a night bird singing in a nearby tree. Frogs and crickets seemed to have formed a band. Thank goodness they didn't have drums.

We held one another until we drifted off asleep.

JOE R. LANSDALE

"A true American original."
—Joe Hill, author of Heart-Shaped Box

Praise for Hap and Leonard

[Starred] “Last seen in the novel Honky Tonk Samurai, Lansdale’s incomparable East Texas crime fighting duo show their chops in this remarkable story collection. Hap Collins, a straight, white liberal, and Leonard Pine, a black, gay conservative, have long challenged genre conventions, and the friendship and camaraderie between these two hard cases as they suit up against injustice and hypocrisy is at the heart of these seven tales. In the novella “Hyenas,” the boys help save a client’s impressionable younger brother from the clutches of a group of psychotic robbers. “Dead Aim” finds the pair taking on the Dixie Mafia after a seemingly straightforward cheating spouse case gets a tad more complicated. “Not Our Kind” is set against the backdrop of the late 1960s, when a teenage Hap first befriends Leonard and faces the racism and intolerance of his peers up close. Readers can also look forward to the debut of the TV show Hap and Leonard on the Sundance Channel in March.
—Publishers Weekly, starred review

——Kirkus

“As Mr. Lansdale might say, 'This was more fun than rolling down a hill with a bunch of armadillos.'”
—Horror Novel Reviews

—Horror Drive-In

“It has all the hard to find short stories featuring Hap and Leonard, the most enjoyable mismatched pair of private eyes since Spenser and Hawk.”
—Sons of Spade

“East Texas charm, profane wit, and strong characterization, with enough snappy dialogue to keep a smile on your face . . . excellent entertainment, edge-of-your-seat action one minute, gut-busting humor”
—Adventures in Genre Fiction

“This collection is crime/pulp fiction at its best and most captivating.”
—Risingshadow

“short, concentrated bursts of everything that makes the series so good.”
—October Country

“If you find yourself on the wrong side of Hap and Leonard, be cautious, because they are quicker than a rattlesnake, and their bite

is just as bad. If you find yourself an innocent bystander looking for a great book to read, you've come to the right place."
—Killer Nashville

"If you are a fan of the genre and looking for a new character to get into, Hap and Leonard won't steer you wrong."
—LitReactor

"For those new to either Lansdale or the series, this latest collection is an excellent introduction to the kind of trouble these two often find themselves in; all the while exchanging some of the funniest, lovingly antagonistic, and memorial dialogue of any crime series."
—Bookgasm

"If you haven't read any of the dozen or so Hap and Leonard novels, start here."
—Lone Star Literary

"A perfect introduction"

Praise for Joe R. Lansdale's Hap and Leonard series

"Hap and Leonard function as a sort of Holmes and Watson—if Holmes and Watson had had more lusty appetites and less refined educations and spent their lives in East Texas. . . . Not only funny, but also slyly offers acute commentary on matters of race, friendship and love in small-town America.”

—New York Times

“Lansdale reveals the human condition—our darkest secrets and our proudest moments, all within the unlikely confines of an East Texas adventure featuring the two scruffiest protagonists in modern crime fiction.”
—Booklist

“Hilarious. . . . Addictively scarfable. . . . Lansdale excels at dialogue, especially Hap and Leonard’s lewd insult-a-thons. . . . Two thumbs-up, and pardon the barbecue smears.”
—Texas Monthly

“As usual, the dialogue is deadpan tart and the action extreme but convincing. . . . Lansdale once again proves he’s the East Texas master of redneck noir.”
—Publishers Weekly (on Hyenas)

Praise for Joe R. Lansdale

“There’s no bullshit in a Joe Lansdale book. There’s everything a good story needs, and nothing it doesn’t.”
—Christopher Moore, author of Secondhand Souls

"[Joe Lansdale has] a folklorist's eye for telling detail and a front-porch raconteur's sense of pace . . . a considerable literary intelligence at work."
—New York Times Book Review

"Joe Lansdale is a born storyteller."
—Robert Bloch, author of Psycho

"Joe Lansdale simply must be read."
—Robert Crais, author of the Elvis Cole and Joe Pike novels

"Read Joe Lansdale and see the true writer's gift."
—Andrew Vachss, author of Shockwave

"Among the best fiction writers in America today, Joe Lansdale turns on the juice and cuts the damn thing loose. Enjoy the ride!"
—Kinky Friedman, author of Ten Little New Yorkers

"Hunter S. Thompson meets Stephen King."
—Charles de Lint, author of The Onion Girl

"A master at taking a simple everyday event and turning reality upside down."
—Mystery Scene

"Lansdale reaches the reader on a gut level . . . a terrific writer."
—Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine

About the Author

Foreword

by Rick Klaw

Joe R. Lansdale can be a pain in the ass. That's why this book exists.

Hap and Leonard collected all of the not-so-dynamic duo's previously published shorter adventures (circa 2016) plus the original story "Not Our Kind," basically everything that's not a novel, in one handsome volume. This being the 21st century and all, an ebook edition was required. And therein lies the problem.

Seems Joe had promised the digital rights to the novellas "Hyenas," "Dead Aim," and the short story "The Boy Who Became Invisible" to another publisher than Tachyon. So we could wait until 2018 for the ebook, when the rights reverted, or figure out something else. We opted for the latter.

The ebook Hap and Leonard Ride Again contained all of the material present in Hap and Leonard except for the trio of stories mentioned above. Since the remaining material scarcely made for a book, we added the original short story "The Oak and the Pond," the Marvin Hanson novella "A Bone Dead Sadness," Joe's comic script adaptation of "The Boy Who Became Invisible," my interview with Joe, and an original remembrance about the creation of Hap and Leonard by Bill Crider, who sadly died while we were putting together The Big Book of Hap and Leonard.

When Joe offered us the rights to “Hyenas,” “Dead Aim,” and “The Boy Who Became Invisible,” we decided it was best to combine the two editions into this one super—dare I say big—book you hold in your virtual hands.

Sometimes a pain in the ass leads to gold. Not sure if this qualifies as such but if not, it’s damn close.

An Appreciation of Joe R. Lansdale

by Michael Koryta

Different writers have different goals, but there are—or should be—some constants. Here are a few: memorable characters, original voice, stories that make the reader feel something.

I can think of many writers who have achieved those things. Then I think of Joe Lansdale, who has achieved them, lapped them, and redefined them. This wonderful collection of the tales of Hap Collins and Leonard Pine is—somehow—just a taste of the Lansdale oeuvre, but it is a delicious one.

Memorable characters? Meet Hap, a former social activist and a “white trash rebel,” and Leonard, a black, gay, Vietnam veteran and Republican voter. In the hands of many writers, this mix would be disastrous, an overwrought pairing designed to conceal inauthentic storytelling. In Lansdale’s hands, not only does the duo work, but they seem natural together, playing off each other in beautiful fashion. The dialogue exchanges between these two, as typified in the novella “Hyenas,” are filled with more gems than a jewelry store:

“Well,” Leonard said, “in cases like that, the gut is often right. We still know a shark when we see one. That's why we crawled out of the water and became men in the first place. Only thing is, some of the sharks crawled out after us."

"That would be the lawyers," I said.

There's a smile on every page and an outright howler on every other, but it's in the momentum of the stories that I've always found the true genius. Hap and Leonard do a lot of chatting, sure, a unique patter that seasons their adventures, but they're always in motion, and the dialogue is truly in service of the story, not the other way around. A lot of writers with a gifted ear for dialogue—and Joe has one of the best ears around—can get caught in a trap built by their own abilities, creating wandering exchanges that don't do much except show off. Joe's stories are constantly in motion, and the dialogue reflects that:

"Ready?" I said.

"I was born ready." Leonard said.

"Scared?"

"I don't get scared."

"Bullshit."

"Okay, I'm a little scared. Let's get it done before I get more scared."

We started walking.

There you go—they started walking. They're going somewhere, these two, and you'll find yourself turning pages at paper-cut speed to keep up, watching a remarkable feat where Joe Lansdale balances violence and humor, tension and howling laughter, in a way that feels organic, unforced, and perfectly original. Each story or novel seems to begin in mid-sentence, with the sense that you'd best hustle along and catch up or you're going to be left behind. There's a confidence to the prose that is simply masterful, a trust in both voice and reader.

There is also—and I think this is overlooked in the Hap and Leonard stories—a hell of a lot of wisdom. Amid the fun and between the punches, there's the voice of a writer who at times resembles Twain himself—and, yes, I really mean that, and, no, I do not say it lightly or easily.

In "The Boy Who Became Invisible," a story of Hap in his early years, Lansdale does more than make the reader feel something—he makes you hurt. The early pages, a story of seemingly casual schoolyard bullying, show the making of the man we will know as Hap.

That hit me pretty hard, but I'm ashamed to say not hard enough, Hap thinks of his own role, his moral acquiescence to something beneath him. His one-time friend, Jesse, is becoming a target of ridicule, and what Lansdale has to say about it speaks not just to schoolyard torment but to the dangers of group think, of what happens when you compromise personal integrity to just go along with the flow. When the kids laugh at Jesse, you'll hurt for him, and hurt for Hap, I assure you. But better than that, and more impressive—you'll hurt because of Hap. And because of yourself. That is when the character-reader bond has reached an emotional height, and it's a special experience.

When Jesse spoke to me, if no one was looking, I would nod.

We all carry memories of shame, embarrassment over our own conduct. Lansdale isn't directing you to examine them; he's too good a writer for that. The reflection is a product of the story, and all the great things—laughter, fear, profundity—that come from his work will always come from the story. While many writers repeat the show don't tell cliché, Joe Lansdale lives it. If you don't believe me, wait until you get to the last line of "The Boy Who Became Invisible." See how long that one lingers.

Again, this is merely a taste of a remarkable body of work. That's staggering to consider, and inspiring.

I just have a knack to aim at something and hit it, Hap reflects on his shooting ability in "Hyenas," and that's the way reading Lansdale feels—effortless talent, a knack so natural that he just leans back in his chair, puts his feet up, and spins a yarn. Meet him in person, and you'll leave thinking the same thing, that this stuff comes easily, that he shares great storytelling as naturally as most of us exhale.

And I'm here to tell you it's bullshit.

Does Joe Lansdale, like Hap Collins, have one hell of a lot of natural talent, a "knack" for hitting stories out of the park and dropping one-liners that are the envy of professional comedians? Sure. Does it come easily? No. It comes from a lifetime of dedicated work, a man committed to craft, a man so aware of how story works and why that he can fool us into thinking it's effortless. William Blundell once said, "Easy writing makes hard reading. Hard writing makes easy reading."

I think of that line when I read Hap and Leonard, and when I read Joe Lansdale in general. I think about how smooth these stories go down, each line so razor-edged, each action scene so perfectly choreographed, and I think—this guy has worked awfully hard so the reader doesn't have to.

You have in your hands a collection by a master. Enjoy it, treasure it, and as you breeze through with a smile on your face and some head-nodding over bits of polished wisdom, be damn grateful that Joe Lansdale has put in the work to deliver it so well. I assure you, the writing is not easy.

But the reading? It's an absolute joy. You'd best get started. Hap and Leonard are already in motion, I assure you, and you're going to want to catch up.

Joe R. Lansdale, Hap and Leonard, and Me

by Bill Crider

I like to tell people that I'm so old I can remember when Joe Lansdale said he didn't think he'd ever write a series. He may deny he said that, and I can't prove that he did because I wasn't wearing a wire at the time. But that's the way I remember it, and I should put a disclaimer in right here. Everything that I remember is suspect and might not even be true. I'll paraphrase Mark Twain here (I'll get back to Twain later) and say that my memory is so good that I can remember things that didn't even happen. Those things are true to me, however, and I think it's worth setting some of them down so that future literary critics can mine my comments for information. They're a little bit of the history of Texas writing from the perspective of someone who was around to witness it, whether his memory is reliable or not.

Let me start from the beginning.

I first met Joe R. Lansdale on April Fools Day back in 1979. He may not recall that, either, but I'm certain on this point. It was probably an appropriate day for us to meet, too, though I thought nothing about it at the time. We were both at the AggieCon X, a science-fiction convention at Texas A&M University. The guests of honor that year were Theodore Sturgeon and Boris Vallejo. Wilson Tucker was the toastmaster, and he told us that the War of 1812 was fought in 1814. You could look it up.

Neither Joe nor I was a well-known writer at the time. I'd published pretty much nothing except a lot of reviews of crime fiction and a few essays about it in various fanzines. Joe might well have been selling fiction and nonfiction by that time, but it wasn't anything anybody would have heard of. As incredible as it may seem, some of it might not even have been reprinted. However, in spite of his relative obscurity at the time, I'd seen Joe's name attached to a few reviews and letters in some of the same fanzines I was publishing in, primarily one called The Mystery FANcier, and because he was from Texas, his name stuck with me.

I didn't cross Joe's path during the convention itself, or if I did, I don't remember it. On the final day of the con, my late wife, Judy, and I were in the Memorial Student Center where the convention was held in those days. We were getting ready to leave and had headed back to our room to get our luggage. As we walked down a hallway near one of the entrances to the dealers' room (I could take you to the exact spot even today), we stopped near a young man and woman. I was trying to decide whether to make one final run through the dealers' room, and I didn't really notice the man because the woman was (and still is) much better looking. Judy told me to forget the dealers' room, and we were about to move on when I happened to glance at the man's name tag and saw that he was claiming to be Joe Lansdale.

I'm not usually a guy who'll open a conversation with a stranger. I'm socially awkward and the very picture of an introvert (quite the opposite of Joe, as I learned), but Judy and I had been wandering around the convention all weekend without speaking to anyone, and I thought we might as well get acquainted with one person. So I introduced myself. Joe seemed a little suspicious at first when I told him that I knew him from another fandom. Maybe he thought it was some kind of April Fools joke. However, after I told him that I'd read his letters and reviews in The Mystery FANcier, he relaxed and pretended that he recognized my name, too. He introduced his wife, Karen, and we talked for a few minutes. Not long, but long enough to exchange addresses. Almost as soon as we got home, we began a correspondence.

This correspondence was conducted in the quaint manner of the time, by means of typewritten letters on paper that was folded, placed in envelopes, and put in the U.S. mail, after which time the letter would reach the recipient within a few days. It seems like a tedious process compared to email, but it worked just fine for me and Joe. We became friends by way of our letters, and every year we'd get together at AggieCon and talk about the same things we wrote about in the letters: writing, reading, movies, TV, and just about anything that interested us. There was hardly anything that didn't interest us, to be honest, and the discussions were wide-ranging, indeed. We covered just about everything, from why Mars needs chickens to why Winston Churchill said (or didn't say) that the British naval tradition was nothing but "rum, sodomy, and the lash." Shoes and ships and sealing wax probably got into the conversation, too.

Many more people than Joe and I got involved in these discussions. A number of couches lined the hallway where we met, and often two or three other couches would be dragged to where we were. People sat on the floor, as well. The core group for many years consisted of me and Judy, Joe, Scott Cupp, Willie Siros, and Neal Barrett, Jr. I can't remember all of the others who dropped by, but I know that Tom Knowles, Lewis Shiner, Henry Melton, Kurt Baty, Bill Page, and Jayme Lynn Blaschke showed up at one time or another. Sometimes the convention guests would stop and talk, too. I know that Greg Bear and David Drake did when they were the guests of honor.

Whatever else we talked about, the main topic was always writing. Not that everybody there wanted to write and publish, but most of us did, and a lot of us succeeded. Neal, of course, had succeeded already, and Joe and I were working on it. In 1981, both he and I published novels. His was Act of Love, a novel about a serial killer on the loose in Houston. It was published by Zebra Books, with one of its many fondly remembered knives-in-fresh-fruit covers. Joe's had an impaled strawberry, I believe. Mine was The Coyote Connection, one of hundreds of Nick Carter novels in that long-running series. It was written in collaboration with a friend, and here's a big difference between me and Joe. I would have been quite content to spend the rest of my life writing Nick Carter novels, and I might well have done just that had the editor who liked the proposals my co-author and I sent her not moved on. Joe, on the other hand, had no intention of spending the rest of his life writing novels about serial killers.

That was because Joe had more than talent. He had ambition, and he had a powerful confidence in his writing. I had neither one, and after the new Nick Carter editor nixed the proposals my co-author and I had sent to the previous editor, I took a look at the other novel I'd been working on and stuck it in a desk drawer and forgot it.

Joe kept writing, but he didn't stick to crime. From the very start, he was mashing up genres and selling a good many stories while also writing all kinds of things that nobody would buy. He didn't let the things that didn't sell bother him. He was too busy with books like The Nightrunners, The Drive-In, and The Magic Wagon to worry. In 1989, he published Cold in July, which I think of as something of a breakthrough novel. It was a crime novel, but it wasn't like Act of Love. It was about ordinary people in East Texas who found themselves in an extraordinary situation, with some savage violence but with some humor and a core of humanity and decency that would distinguish Joe's books from then on.

A few years before Cold in July, I'd pulled my abortive novel out of my desk drawer because Joe had suggested we collaborate on a book. I sent him the fifty pages I'd written, but he soon sent them back. His career had started to take off. All those things that nobody would buy were selling now, and he didn't have time for a lengthy collaboration. And he said that the manuscript was fine just like it was and didn't need anything from him to help it along. I eventually finished the book on my own and sold it.

When I got the acceptance letter for my novel, the editor concluded by saying, "You are working on a sequel, aren't you?" The honest answer to that question would have been, "Nope. I never dreamed I'd sell that book, much less another one." This wasn't the answer I gave, however. I said, "Of course I'm working on a sequel." Soon after I sent that letter, I was at the typewriter (this was a long time ago, remember), and the Sheriff Dan Rhodes series is still going as I write this, with nearly twenty-five books and a lot of short stories in it now.

Which brings me at last to Hap Collins and Leonard Pine, the dynamic duo of East Texas who first appeared in Savage Season in 1990. It was a paperback original, and nobody who's seen the cover with its dramatic painting of a woman's hand with a nail driven right through the middle is likely to forget it. I remember considerable discussion of that cover at the AggieCon after the book appeared. Would people buy a book with a cover like that, or would they be put off by it? We never came up with a definitive answer, though we all agreed that it was an accurate depiction of the contents.

The other topic of discussion related to the book was about series characters. By that time, I'd published five books in the Sheriff Rhodes series, so I considered myself an expert on the topic. Joe said he didn't like the idea of writing a series. It was too confining. He had too many ideas, too many different books he wanted to write, too many genres he wanted to explore and mash together and generally manhandle. I expect that explains at least in part why it was four years before a second Hap and Leonard novel appeared. By that time a lot of people must have thought the first one was a stand-alone instead of just a great first act.

But I know how it is with writers and characters. When you write a book, the characters don't just go away. They hang around in your head, and sometimes they talk to you. Sometimes they tell you such good stuff that you can't resist sitting down and writing a few sentences about them, and before long you find out you're forty or fifty pages along in what's about to become a much longer manuscript. So you keep writing things down until the characters shut up for a while.

Hap and Leonard must have been pretty insistent talkers, because after Mucho Mojo appeared in 1994, the books about them came out with some regularity: The Two-Bear Mambo (1995), Bad Chili (1997), Rumble Tumble (1998), and Captains Outrageous (2001). Then the guys went quiet for eight years. It's not that Joe wasn't writing. He was writing a lot, winning about every award there was, including the Edgar presented by the Mystery Writers of America for Best Novel. His bibliography is mighty impressive.

The boys were back at last in 2009 in Vanilla Ride, followed by Devil Red in 2011, and a couple of novellas, Hyenas in 2011 and Dead Aim in 2013. A new novel, Honky Tonk Samurai, is out in 2016. Not to mention the short stories, several of which are included in this volume. For someone who didn't think he wanted to write a series, Joe's done very well by his characters, and they've done well by him.

And what characters they are. Hap Collins is a working-class kind of guy who, by what must be the merest coincidence, shares a little bit of Lansdale's own background. Joe didn't go to prison for refusing to go to Vietnam as Hap did, but he did oppose the war on moral grounds, and he did refuse to be drafted. Once he makes up his mind, he's like another famous Texan, David Crockett, whose motto was "Be sure you're right, then go ahead." Joe never backed down, and he didn't go off to war. You could probably look up the court case if you were so inclined. Hap didn't back down, either, and served his time in prison. He's still a peaceable sort most of the time, and he doesn't much like guns. Leonard once told him that he had "more bleeding heart than the Democratic Congress." But hurt one of his friends or threaten them, and it's another story. Readers can be forgiven if they get the feeling that had Hap gone to Vietnam, he'd have kicked out the Viet Cong in a few weeks, especially if he'd had Leonard to help him.

Leonard Pine, unlike Hap, isn't a peaceable sort at all. He's black, gay, and often angry, eager to kick anybody's ass at the least excuse. He did go to Vietnam, and when you think about it, that would make both him and Hap about ready to go on Medicare and draw Social Security, assuming they ever paid into those programs, which isn't entirely likely considering their occupations, or lack of them. It's a good thing that fictional characters don't age like us mere mortals, or Hap and Leonard would be having a tough time keeping up their active lifestyles.

Although they sometimes find themselves working as unlicensed investigators for P.I.s named Marvin Hanson or Jim Bob Luke, Hap and Leonard have most often taken on jobs for friends or helped each other work out personal problems that have turned seriously bad and require some heavy lifting to set right. However, both of them have had real jobs on occasion. Hap has worked in the Tyler rose fields, like his creator; at an aluminum chair factory; and on an offshore oil platform. He also works as a bouncer at various bars now and then, although it's a bit embarrassing to him to be doing work that requires him to beat up grown men. He and Leonard have worked security at a poultry plant, too, although Leonard would prefer to be a bouncer. He's not embarrassed by the work and doesn't mind beating up on anybody at all. As a bouncer, he can work out his anger issues in a more or less acceptable and legal fashion. Leonard also likes to burn down crack houses, but that's not really an occupation. It's more of a hobby.

What Hap and Leonard have instead of steady jobs is a talent for getting into trouble. They can't even take an ocean cruise without getting kicked off the ship and marooned in Mexico. We readers wouldn't have it any other way, of course. If they just sat around and led boring lives, they wouldn't be any fun to read about.

Or maybe they would. One thing that distinguishes the books and makes them so readable is Lansdale's use of language. Or maybe I should say that it's Hap's use of language. Hap is the first-person narrator of his own adventures, after all, and he has a way with a simile. When it's humid, for example, Hap might say that it's "humid as a monkey's armpit." A man's not just fast on the draw. He produces a pistol "quick as a bunny fucks."

I have a theory that you can draw a straight line from Mark Twain's use of the American vernacular to Joe Lansdale's use of it. Here's what Twain says in his explanatory note to The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn: "In this book a number of dialects are used, to wit: the Missouri negro dialect; the extremest form of the backwoods Southwestern dialect; the ordinary 'Pike County' dialect; and four modified varieties of this last. The shadings have not been done in a hap-hazard fashion, or by guesswork; but painstakingly, and with the trustworthy guidance and support of personal familiarity with these several forms of speech.

"I make this explanation for the reason that without it many readers would suppose that all these characters were trying to talk alike and not succeeding."

Lansdale's use of dialect is equally masterful, although instead of Pike County his territory is East Texas. If I were really going to get far out in my literary theorizing, I'd seize on Twain's "hap-hazard" comment and write a paper for the Modern Language Association's annual meeting about how Hap Collins' first name was derived from Twain's note. But I'm not teaching anymore, and I don't have time for high-falutin literary essays. Besides, I might be wrong.

I do know for sure that there’s nothing haphazard about what Lansdale does with words. He’s not just making up the language that appears in Hap’s narratives. He has, or had at one time, people who’d scout around for good phrases to use in his novels. At one of those late-night sessions at a long-ago AggieCon, Joe said that a friend had recently come to him and said, “I got you one.” When Joe asked what it was, the friend said, “It’s hotter than two rats fucking in a wool sock.” Sure enough, that expression turned up on one of the books not long afterward. It’s too bad nobody recorded those gab sessions. History in the making.

And like Twain, Lansdale’s not afraid to use what’s now called “the n-word.” In fact, there might be more instances of it in one of Lansdale’s books than in Twain’s. Lansdale’s despicably racist characters, of which there are many, find nothing offensive about the word, and it just comes naturally to them, as it does to one in The Two-Bear Mambo, who has fond memories of minstrel shows and who thinks Leonard is funny: “I didn’t realize how much I’d missed being around funny niggers. And what I got here is not just some white man in blackface playing nigger, I got the real thing. I got me a genuine, born-of-black-hole nigger.” If you think a situation containing comments like this doesn’t end happily, you’d be right on the money.

Here’s something else. Terrible things are being said in this scene, and terrible things are happening, with even worse things to come, but it’s still very funny in a horrible way. Lansdale can wring humor out of any situation, even this one. You might hate yourself for laughing, you might look back and wish you hadn’t laughed, but you’re going to laugh. It’s the language that does it, as when a man describes Chihuahuas: "Sonofabitches would rather bark and piss than fornicate and eat. That's the thing about 'em. They got no priorities. My sister had one of them little poots, and she use to jack him off once a week 'cause he was tense. Never could figure out what was wrong with the sonofabitch lickin' his noodle like any other respectable dog." You're not going to find a passage like that in anybody else's books.

Hap and Leonard deal out a lot of punishment over the course of the series, but they take a lot of punishment, too. More than most men could handle, I think. After the scene from The Two-Bear Mambo I quote above, for example, there's a brawl in which the two come out on the bad end of a serious beating. In Bad Chili, we find out about Hap's first meeting with Jim Bob Luke, just after Hap has been tied to a chair with a car battery attached to his testicles. He's had a jolt from the battery, too, and if you can't imagine what something like that might to do a fellow, Lansdale is quite happy to tell you. And he does.

It should be pretty obvious by now that the entire series is not exactly what a reader would want to dip into when looking for some polite, politically correct fiction or for something to read aloud at a Sunday School picnic. Every book is full of cussing, sex, and heavy-duty violence. Not to mention a lot of laughs. It's a tough act to pull off, but Lansdale is a master at doing it. The opening of Bad Chili, which describes Hap and Leonard's battle with the rabid squirrel, is downright hilarious, even though it's also frightening and doesn't end well for the squirrel. Or Hap, for that matter.

No one should get the idea that books full of cussing, sex, and heavy-duty violence can't be socially conscious or present serious ideas and thoughtful commentary. Lansdale's Hap and Leonard works, besides containing all of the above and being funny besides, are also full of thoughtful social commentary, but it’s couched in such a fast-moving narrative that some of it would be easy to overlook. Not the criticism of racism, of course. That’s everywhere in the books, but you don’t have to look too hard to find comments on the environment, politics, relationships, and friendships. Nothing about any of this is obtrusive, but it’s all there if you want it.

Hap and Leonard are always true to themselves and to their friends, and while they’re willing to use violence if they have to, and kill if they have to, they do have a code of sorts. They believe in sticking up for each other, their friends, and people who need their help. They don’t take kindly to insults, and they believe in payback. They’re tough, resourceful, and all too human. What’s not to like?

I have one other theory about the books and stories about Hap and Leonard. It’s that nobody really cares about the plots. (I think this is true of a lot of crime novels, in fact, maybe even my own.) The plot is just the writer’s excuse for setting down a tale that ties the pages together. What people really care about is the characters and the writing, or, as Robert B. Parker put it about his own novels, “They like the sound of the words on the page.” Those two things are what make series books a success. Readers want to find out more about the characters and what they’re up to. It’s almost as if they’re real people, old friends whom you like to hear from every now and then. It doesn’t matter how long the series becomes. Readers don’t want it to end. They want their old friends to endure.

And readers want to keep hearing the author’s voice. It becomes a familiar comfort, and from the first page of each story, you know that you’re hearing something unique to an individual, a way of writing that comes from a particular place within a particular person, something that nobody else can duplicate.

It’s true that people try. A series can continue even after an author’s death if the estate finds a writer to carry it forward. Most often I find these continuations remind me of another story about Mark Twain, when his wife tried to shame him about his cussing by repeating what he said. He told her that she had the words but not the tune. Lansdale has his own tune, and it’s not like anyone else’s. It’s unique, his alone, and it carries the reader along with a sound that nobody else can duplicate. He’s been around for a while now, easily long enough for other writers to try to capture some of the magic that appears on his pages, but if they have the words, they don’t have the tune. Lansdale’s still out there singing his own song, and that’s what we want to hear.

Being an old guy, considerably older than Joe Lansdale, as he’s always quick to remind me, I sometimes get a little nostalgic. It’s been a good many years since we sat up on the second floor of the Memorial Student Center during AggieCon and talked about our books and our editors and how things were going in the writing game. Who knew that Joe Lansdale would become a bestselling writer with movies and a TV series based on his work or that he’d become a literary god in Italy? (I’m not making that up. You can ask him.)

I was lucky to be around for the birth of Hap and Leonard, and we’ve all been lucky enough to read the books. This new story collection is a good reason for celebration, as it collects a number of the stories into one volume. Anyone experiencing them for the first time is in for a rare treat. Those of us who have read them before are ready to hear from the guys again and to hear that voice that’s like no other. It doesn’t get much better than that.

Hyenas

“The hyenas are hungry—they howl for food.”

—King Solomon’s Mines, H. Rider Haggard

When I drove over to the nightclub, Leonard was sitting on the curb holding a bloody rag to his head. Two police cruisers were parked just down from where he sat. One of the cops, Jane Bowden, a stout woman with her blonde hair tied back, was standing by Leonard. I knew her a little. She was a friend of my girlfriend, Brett. There was a guy stretched out in the parking lot on his back.

I parked and walked over, glanced at the man on the ground.

He didn’t look so good, like a poisoned insect on its way out. His eyes, which could be barely seen through the swelling, were roaming around in his head like maybe they were about to go down a drain. His mouth was bloody, but no bloodier than his nose and cheekbones. He was missing teeth. I knew that because quite a few of them were on his chest, like Chiclets he had spat out. I saw what looked like a chunk of his hair lying near by. The parking lot light made the hunk of blond hairappear bronze. He was missing a shoe. I saw it just under one of the cop cars. It was still tied.

I went over and tried not to look too grim or too happy. Truth was I didn't know how to play it, because I didn't know the situation. I didn't know who had started what, and why.

Jane had called and told me to come down to the Big Frog Club because Leonard was in trouble. Since she didn't say he was in jail, I was thinking positive on the way over.

When Leonard saw me, he said, "Hey, Hap."

"Hey," I said. I looked at Jane. "Well, what happened?"

"It's a little complicated," Jane said. "Seems Leonard here was in the club, and one of the guys said something, and Leonard said something, and then the two guys inside—"

"Inside?"

"You'll immediately know who they are if you go in the club. One of them actually had his head shoved through the Sheetrock, and the other guy got his hair parted with a chair. He's behind the bar taking a nap."

"Ouch."

"That's what he said," Jane said.

"So . . . I hate to ask . . . but how bad a trouble is Leonard in?"

"There's paperwork, and that puts me off of him," Jane said, "but everyone says the three guys started it, and Leonard ended it, and, well, there were three of them and one of him."

"How come this one is out in the parking lot?" I said, pointing to the fellow with his teeth on his chest.

Leonard looked over at me, but didn't say anything. Sometimes he knew when to keep his mouth shut, but you could put those times on the head of a pin and have enough left over to engrave the first page of the King James Bible and a couple of fart jokes.

"Reason that guy's here, and the other two are inside," Jane said, “is he could run faster.”

“But not fast enough?” I said.

“That’s where we got a little problem. You see, that guy, he’s knocked out so hard his astral self took a trip to somewhere far away. Maybe interplanetary. He’s really out of here, and he hasn’t shown signs of reentry.”

No sooner had she said that then an ambulance pulled up. A guy and a woman got out and went over and looked at the guy on the ground. The male attendant said, “I guess clubbing doesn’t agree with him.”

“Either kind of clubbing didn’t agree with him,” the female EMT said.

It took me a minute to get what she meant. To do their job, I guess you have to have a sense of humor, lame as it might be.

They looked him over where he lay, and I was glad to hear him come around. He said something that sounded like a whale farting underwater, and then he said, “Nigger,” quite clearly.

Leonard said, “I can hear that, motherfucker.”

The guy went silent.

They loaded him in the ambulance.

“Don’t forget his shoe,” I said, pointing at it. But they didn’t pay me any mind. Hell, they worked for the city.

“We got a bit of a problem here,” Jane said. “You see, once this guy ran for it, and Leonard chased him, it couldn’t quite be called self-defense.”

“I didn’t want him to come back,” Leonard said. “I was chasing him down because I was in fear of my life.”

“Uh-huh,” Jane said.

“He turned on me when I caught up with him,” Leonard said.

"Just be quiet, Leonard," she said. "Things will go better. You see, the part that's hard to reconcile, as we in the law business say, is Leonard turning him around and then beating him like a bongo drum. Leonard grabbed him by the throat and hit him a lot."

"A few times," Leonard said. "He called me nigger."

"You called him asshole," Jane said. "That's what the witnesses said."

"He started it," Leonard said. "And there's that whole deep cultural wound associated with the word nigger, and me being black and all. That's how it is. Look it up."

"No joke," she said. "You're black?"

"To the bone," Leonard said.

Jane turned her attention back to me. "A guy watching all this," she pointed to a fellow standing over by the open door of the club, "he said Leonard hit that guy a lot."

"Define a lot," I said.

"After the nose was broke and the cheekbones were crushed, and that's just my analysis, Leonard set about knocking out his teeth, said while he was doing it, according to the gentleman over there, and I quote, 'All the better to suck dick with, you sonofabitch,' unquote."

"So, Leonard's going to jail?"

"What Leonard has going for him is yon man in yon ambulance —"

I looked to see it drive off with the lights on, but it wasn't speeding and there wasn't any siren.

"—hit Leonard with a chair first, and he did call him the Nigger word."

"You mean the N word. When you say Nigger word, well, you've said nigger."

"Did I say the Nigger word instead of the N word?"

"You did."

"If you're quoting someone said Nigger, isn't that different?"

"I think so."

"Hey," Leonard said. "Sitting right here."

"Well, hell, I've pulled two shifts," Jane said. "Another hour on the job and I'll be calling everybody sweetie baby. Anyway, back to Leonard. Somewhere between the N word and him chasing the track star out into the lot, he hit one of the other attackers with a chair and slammed the other guy's head into the wall. Ralph, that's my partner, he's in there right now trying to get the fellow's head out of the wall without breaking something. Either wall or victim."

"Actually," I said, "Leonard had to have been provoked. He's normally very sweet."

"No shit?" Jane said.

"No shit."

"I don't think so. But here's what we're going to do. You bring Leonard by the station tomorrow morning, not the crack of dawn, but before lunch, and we'll fill out some papers. I won't be there. I'll be snoozing. But I got my notes and I got statements, and I'm going to turn those in, so they'll be there. And, just as a sidenote, I really did enjoy seeing that fellow's head stuck in the wall. Before you go, you need to go in there and take a peek, if they haven't got his head loose. They haven't, then you don't want to miss this. It's a fucking classic."

I did take a look inside the Big Frog Club before I drove Leonard home, and the cop trying to work the guy's head out of the Sheetrock was snickering. He looked at me and lost it, made a spitting sound, and let go of him and wandered off, bent over and hooting.

Another cop, smiling, went over and, without a whole lot of conviction, pulled one of the guy's ears—the other one wasn't visible—said, "Come on out, now."

The guy's head was pretty far through the wall. It was poking into a bathroom. He must have turned his back to escape and found a wall, and then Leonard shoved the back of his head, pushing the front of it through the wall and into the bathroom. He was all scratched up, like a cat had been sharpening its claws on his face.

The bathroom walls had never really been laid out, just Sheetrocked, so it hadn't been too hard to push the guy's head through. I took a good look at him. His chin had locked behind a support board, and the back of his head was locked behind another. He had fit in there easily enough, but in such a way he couldn't get out, and the cops didn't seem to be working that hard to release him.

I said, "You had some antlers, we could just leave you there and tell folks you're a deer."

"Fuck you," he said, but it was weak and without conviction, so I didn't take offense.

I used the urinal, which was just under him and smiled as I peed. I didn't flush. I went back in the main room and saw the back of the guy. He was bent slightly with his butt in the air, standing on his tip-toes, probably getting a good bracing from the piss in the urinal.

I went over to the bar, leaned and peeked over. The other guy

Leonard had hit was awake and had his back against the bar. A broken chair was on the floor next to him.

I said, “You put your dick in a beehive, my friend.”

“Tell me about it,” he said. “We was just funnin’.”

“Yeah, how fun was it?”

“Not so much,” he said.

I got Leonard and drove him home.

When we were at my place, I sat Leonard in a chair in the kitchen. Brett, my gorgeous redhead, came downstairs. She was wearing a pair of my pajamas and she looked cute in them, as they were oversized. She was barefoot and her red painted toenails stood out like miniature Easter eggs. She came over and looked at Leonard.

“Anyone check you over?” she said.

“Wouldn’t let them,” he said.

Brett made him move his hand and the bloody rag. She checked out the wound. She’s a nurse, so she was the right one to do it.

“It’s not as bad as it looks,” she said. “I think you can get by without stitches.”

“Yeah, well, it feels bad,” Leonard said.

“Would some vanilla cookies and cold milk make it feel better?” she said.

“Hell, yeah,” Leonard said. “Maybe after the milk, a Dr. Pepper.”

“That can be arranged,” Brett said, “but first, come in the bathroom and let me patch you up.”

When that was finished, Leonard came in with a bandage on his head. Brett got him a plate with some cookies on it and a big glass of cold milk. Leonard sat and smiled and dipped the cookies in the milk.

I said, “So, what happened?”

“They called me a queer.”

“You are a queer,” I said.

“It was their tone of voice,” he said.

“How did they know?” Brett said.

“I made a very delicate pass at one of them,” Leonard said.

“How delicate?” I asked.

“I merely asked him if he was gay, because he looked it, and then the shit hit the fan.”

“Actually, you hit a guy with a chair, shoved another guy’s head through some Sheetrock, and beat the cold dead dog shit out of the other guy in the parking lot. No fan was involved.”

“Yeah, that was pretty much it,” Leonard said, and bit into a cookie.

Next morning we went down to the cop shop. They sent us in to see the chief. He was in his office. There was a cop I had never seen before in there with him. They had a bunch of photos spread out on the desk, and the cop was laughing.

I glanced at the photos. They were of the guy with his head through the Sheetrock.

The cop was trying to get hold of himself, trying to quit laughing.

The chief said, “You can’t act professional, you can just leave.”

The cop went past us and out of the room. He was giggling as he went, trying to hold it in, making a sound like a kid spitting water.

“Have a seat,” said the chief.

There were two chairs on our side, and we took them. The chief said, “We can’t have this, fellows. It’s keeping all my officers from doing their jobs. They keep coming in here to look at the crime scene photos.”

He held up one of the photos.

It was of the guy’s face thrust through the Sheetrock.

“This one,” he said, “is especially precious.”

I made the spitting water sound the cop had made.

“And then,” he said, “there’s this one.”

This was an extreme close-up of the fellow’s face, casting a baleful eye out at us.

The chief even laughed this time. He put the photo down on the desk.

“Everyone in the department had copies made. Officer Jane Bowden took them, in the name of efficiency and coverage of a crime scene.”

“Do you have any wallet size?” I asked.

“No, but we’re having some made up. Listen here, Leonard. You’re lucky. Witnesses said they started it and you had to defend yourself. Bar owner is pressing charges against them. Thing is, them starting it, that’s probably right, but sometimes, it don’t hurt to walk away.”

“It was the chair upside my head kept me from walking,” Leonard said. “It knocked me down for a minute, and then when I got up, I was perturbed.”

“Point taken,” said the chief. “Not only were there witnesses, but one of the three you whipped is a witness himself. In your favor. He's going to have to pay a fine and some repairs at the club, but he's admitting they started it."

"Which one would that be," Leonard said, "Mr. Sheetrock?"

"No."

"I'm betting it isn't Toothless," I said.

"That would be a good bet."

"So, that leaves the one I knocked over the bar with a chair," Leonard said.

"Bingo."

When we went out, we saw the guy who had been knocked behind the bar. He was sitting in the waiting room. He hadn't been there when we came in.

Leonard touched two fingers to the edge of his eyebrow in salute as we passed.

The guy was about thirty, blond, and in good shape. He might be nice looking when he healed up. His left eye was closed and swollen and black, his lips were red and meaty like rubber fishing worms. As he followed us out into the parking lot, he had a limp.

We were about to get in my car when he came toward us.

Leonard turned, said, "You and me not finished?"

The man held up his hands. "We are. Mr. Pine—that's right isn't it? Pine?"

Leonard nodded.

"I want to apologize," the man said.

"Accepted," Leonard said. "Good-bye."

"Wait. Please."

I had been at the driver's side, about to get in, but now I went around on Leonard’s side and we both leaned against the car.

“My name is Kelly Smith. I want to hire you.” He was looking at Leonard when he said it.

“Hire me?” Leonard said. “What for? You like to take beatings?”

“Nothing like that. I have this problem. That’s why I was at the bar.”

“Drinking problem?” I said.

“No,” he said, looking at me. “And who are you?”

“A friend,” I said.

He nodded, spoke to Leonard. “Could we talk private?”

“You got something to say, say it,” Leonard said. “Me and Hap can hear it together and no one will cry. We’re not criers.”

“I don’t know,” I said. “There was that movie. You know the one.”

“Oh, The Last Airbender,” Leonard said. “Yeah. That sucked. That could make anyone cry. And what was up with that 3-D? It should have been in Smell-O-Vision.”

Kelly stood there while we went through our act. When we finished he said, “What I need is someone to do something tough that’s a little against the law.”

“How little?” Leonard asked.

“Well,” he said, “maybe a lot more than a little.”

We went to a coffee place and got a table near the back wall. There was music playing, and there were a few people at tables, and a nice-looking woman in very short shorts came in. Never been a fan of the heat, but for some things, you had to love summer.

Leonard said, “Hap, pay attention.”

"Right with you," I said.

"I'll tell Brett," he said.

"I'm back, just watching the scenery, not trying to move it around."

Kelly had been looking at her too. Now he looked at us. He said, "I wasn't really with those guys last night."

"Sure looked a lot like you," Leonard said.

"I know," Kelly said. "I meant they aren't friends."

"You fought like they were your buddies," Leonard said.

"We didn't fight well," he said. "You kind of walked through us."

"I staggered a little," Leonard said. "That chair hurt."

"You went down and you came up like a jack-in-the-box," Kelly said. "When you did that, I thought you were fucking Dracula."

"Actually, I would have been Blacula. Ever see that old movie?"

Kelly shook his head.

"Never mind," Leonard said. "Look, it's nice, you buying us coffee and a Danish—"

"I'm having an apple fritter," I said.

"Okay," Leonard said. "Danish and fritters, but if you've got something to say besides I'm sorry and let me buy you coffee, then let's move on. Me and Hap are busy men. We got places to go, things to do, and people to see."

"Not really," I said. "Our day is pretty open."

Leonard gave me a sour face.

"I'll pay you to help me out," Kelly said.

"We talking about moving a piano?" Leonard said.

"No," he said. "We're talking about maybe you having to rough someone up."

“First off,” Leonard said. “Why? And how much?”

“It’s my brother, Donny. He’s in deep doo-doo,” Kelly said.

“What kind of doo-doo?” I asked.

“He got in with these fellas that rob armored cars,” Kelly said.

We all sat there for a moment and let that statement hang between us like a carcass.

“This is starting to sound like doo-doo that’s too deep,” I said.

“Except for wanting to rob an armored car,” I said. “I would consider that a possible blemish on his character.”

Kelly nodded.

I said, “He’s twenty-one, you’re like, what, thirty? You guys are some years apart, aren’t you?”

“Thirty-one, and yeah, he was like a surprise,” Kelly said. “Dad wasn’t all that good about hanging around anyway, but that little surprise, Donny, it was more than he could handle. He took the car out for an oil change, and just kept going.”

“So what’s this got to do with me?” Leonard asked.

“You know that robbery took place in LaBorde last year, the armored car guards at the bank?”

“Yeah, I remember,” Leonard said. “They got the guards when they were transporting the money out of the bank to the truck. Just walked up with masks on and had guns and locked the guards in the back of the truck. It was maybe, what, two hundred thousand dollars they got?”

“About four hundred thousand,” Kelly said. “They must have had someone waiting that drove up, picked them up, and took them away. No one knows. All they know is they were there with Halloween masks on one minute, then they had the money, and then they were gone. That was it. Took the guards' guns and put the guards in the back of the armored car and put plastic cuffs on them. Fastened one cuff to their left ankle, one to their right wrist. Then had them put an arm behind their back and fixed it there and pulled the plastic down to the other ankle, linked it from behind. That way they couldn't move well, damn sure couldn't run."

"That's cute," I said.

"Was your brother one of them?" Leonard asked.

"No, but I think he's about to be."

"And, pray tell, why do you think that?" I asked.

"Because in his room he's got some articles about the heist," he said.

"That doesn't mean anything," Leonard said. "Hap has books about Satan, but he ain't a Satanist. At least, as far as we know."

"Those damn books and that rap music," I said. "They can change a man."

Kelly ignored me. Sometimes it's all you can do. He said, "Yeah, but Donny, he has these friends come around, and they lock themselves in the back room for hours. I know they're smoking dope. I can smell it. But what I really worry about is I think these friends are the robbers and they want to pull my brother in."

"That's a big guess," I said. "Any reason to have it?"

"These guys, they're a real tough bunch," Kelly said. "And as you can know, I'm not so tough."

"You take a good fall, though," Leonard said.

"You still don't have any serious reason we should believe your brother is about to be part of a robbery."

"I heard them talking. I was sort of sneaking around, and I heard them say they needed a driver. The guy talking was the one Donny calls Smoke Stack. That's the name they all call him. I guess 'cause he smokes all the time. I don't allow it in the house, but he smokes anyway. I asked him not to once, and he just lit up and smiled at me, went in the back room with Donny. Hell, even Donny is tougher than me. He grew up different. He grew up tough. I can almost guarantee you these guys are going to rob another armored car, and they're going to pull Donny into it."

"Still a little lame," I said. "But, if you think you got something, go to the police. We know the chief over there. I'm not sure he likes us, but he did get some humor out of the photos of your buddy with his head through the Sheetrock. So right this minute, he sees Leonard as a comedian."

"I go to the police, they're going to run Donny in, and he's a good kid, really. He was living at home, and our mom died. A heart attack. She was overweight, didn't take care of herself. Went to hell after our dad ran off with another woman and went up North somewhere. She died, I moved back home. But I wasn't able to do it right away. I had a job in Austin, and I had to find another one up this area. I work at the university, doing janitor work."

"What did you do before?" I asked.

"I was a computer specialist, and I made half a mil a year. Now, I got just enough to buy gas for the car and bread for the table. I kind of thought Donny wasn't doing so good and needed me here. Last time I saw him, before Mom died, I could tell he was making some bad decisions. But the bottom line is these friends of his, I don't like them, and I'm sure they're the guys."

"That's your instinct?" I said.

"Yeah."

"Well," Leonard said, "instinct is all right, but it can be you telling yourself something and thinking you're enlightened. Gut instinct tells people to believe lots of things, and most of them are wrong. And, Kelly, this isn't our problem. It's a police problem."

He shook his head. "No. The police pick up Donny, his life is ruined."

"He robs an armored car, a bank, he might get a bullet through his head," Leonard said. "That ruins things too."

"Yeah, that can cut a career short," I said.

"Last night, I went to that bar looking for help. I didn't tell the details to those guys, but I said I was looking for someone could do a little roughhouse work. Those guys were recommended to me by a fellow I know. And then there was that whole thing about one of them calling you a name, and it all getting started . . . I think they started it just to show me how tough they were. Next thing I knew, I was in it with them, you know, part of the pack, and then I'm down, and one guy's got his head through the Sheetrock, and you're chasing the other guy outside. And you're older than them."

"Watch it," Leonard said.

"All I'm saying is, after I saw that, I decided maybe you were the guy instead of them."

"I don't know," Leonard said.

"Donny, he really looks up to this Smoke Stack. He wants to impress him. The guy's got muscles on muscles and he's just mean. Just mean."

"The gut instinct again?" Leonard said.

"Yeah."

"Well," Leonard said, "in cases like that, the gut is often right. We still know a shark when we see one. That's why we crawled out of the water and became men in the first place. Only thing is, some of the sharks crawled out after us."

"That would be the lawyers," I said.

"I told Smoke Stack and his buddies not to come back, but it doesn't matter," Kelly said. "They come around anyway, and if they don't, Donny goes to meet them. Him being twenty-one, I can't legally tell him squat."

"You wouldn't know where he goes to meet them, would you?" I asked.

"No," Kelly said. "And I'm embarrassed to tell you, I'm afraid to follow. I'm afraid they'll catch me. I think Smoke Stack and those guys would do anything."

"What about the other guys, his pals?"

"Three of them. They're followers. It's Smoke Stack runs the program, that's easy to see. I don't know their names, anything about them. Hell, I don't really know anything about Smoke Stack."

"Say we looked into it, found Donny was just smoking dope, or maybe he was selling drugs. What then?"

"I don't know. Maybe you can discourage him. It's such a mess. I wanted to be a big brother to him, but he doesn't care what I think. This Smoke Stack, I think he's like a tough father figure. And he looks like he could wad up a wrench. Again, I think he's like a father for Donny."

"Fathers just need to be tough in will," I said. "It don't hurt if they can bend a tire tool over their knee, but it's not part of the job description."

"Yeah," Kelly said, "but Donny doesn't know that. Look, really, he's a good kid. He's just got to get straight. He gets into this, his life is ruined. I got some money. It's from my savings, saved up before I moved here. I'll give you ten thousand apiece."

I looked at Leonard. He sighed.

I said, "Look, for right now, hang onto your money. Let us think about it, maybe look things over, and then, if we think we can help, we'll talk. If not, we'll still talk. But you might not like the conversation."

"Sure," Kelly said. "Sure, that's all right. That's good."

That afternoon, we went over to the gym to work out. Our gym sucks. It's small and it's hot and it has a small mat room. The mat is thin as paper and smells like sweaty feet. The owner isn't someone who is much into gym work himself. He's a guy with a physique akin to a rubber apple. He sits on a stool by the door so he can get some wind from outside, meaning there's no air conditioning. The door's always open, except dead of winter. Flies are always fluttering about.

He sits there to check memberships. The only advantage his gym has is his memberships are cheap, and he's not that far from the house. The only conversation I remember having with him was him saying, "That'll be thirty dollars a month, apiece."

But, it's all right. We bring our own gloves when we spar. When we spar we use fists a lot, but in real situations I like to use an open hand along with fists. You can use open hands with the gloves we have, but we're friends, and that kind of business can sometimes be worse than fists. Nothing says, "Oh, shit," like sticking a finger in your buddy's eye.

We moved around a little, flicking punches, throwing kicks. We were gym fighting, not really fighting. The two should never be confused. The first is like a swim in a heated pool, the other is like being dropped into a stormy, shark-infested ocean.

So, we were moving around, getting a workout, popping each other a little, and I said, “You believe him?”

“I don’t know,” Leonard said, pausing a little, putting his hands on his hips, taking a deep breath. “Maybe. A story like that, it’s so stupid it’s bound to have some reality about it. I mean, a guy has a problem with his younger brother hanging with thugs that might be bank robbers, so he goes into a bar to get someone to beat the robbers up.”

“You think that’s all he wanted?”

“I don’t know. Maybe he wants us to do something more permanent with these guys.”

“That, I don’t want to do.”

“We may not need to. Here’s the thing, Hap. I think the guy is serious about being worried about his brother, but maybe we can look into it and solve it better than him. We don’t, he’s going to hire someone like that guy I left in the parking lot. Then things will turn messy, and before it’s over Kelly and his brother both might go to prison.”

“Usually, you’re talking me out of stupid shit like this.”

“Does it ever work?”

“Not so much. This guy got to you a little, didn’t he?”

“A little.”

We moved around some more. Leonard hit me a good snap on the forehead. I hooked low, then switched to an overhand right and caught him on the cheek.

He said, “Ouch, I’ve had enough for the day. That was right on my wound.”

"That was your cheek," I said.

"I don't mean the taped part of my head, I mean the bruise. I am so wonderfully black you just can't see it."

"If you say so."

There was no place to take a shower, and as part of our workout, we had jogged from my house, into town and to the gym.

As we jogged back to my place, I said, "We can check into things, see the lay of the land. If it's not lying right, and we don't like it, we can step out. Call the law if we choose."

"Then we'll have some explaining to do."

"We say we thought the guy was full of it, and just wanted us to straighten his brother out."

"You think these guys really are bank robbers?" Leonard said.

"I don't know," I said. "Anything is possible. Say they are robbers. Kid comes along, they see a new recruit. Someone to drive the car is my guess. They start buttering him up with all their King Robber stories, tell him how he'll be rich and his own man, that kind of stuff. The kid, not having a father around and his mother dead, his brother not being around before, maybe not having the relationship they could have had, Donny's ripe for bad business."

"Sure, it could be like that."

We jogged along, silent for awhile. I could tell Leonard was thinking things over, and I let him.

Finally, I said, "So, are we going to check it out?"

"Say we take it easy. We determine if the kid really is in trouble. If these guys really are robbers, and if there's anything we can do about it without getting locked up. I reckon we ought to do that much."

"That's how it is then," I said, and we bumped fists.

We got our friend Marvin Hanson to come in with us. He runs a private investigation agency, and he was once a cop. Sometimes we work for him. Last job we did was simple and we didn't get paid because the client didn't like the outcome. He didn't pay Marvin, so Marvin couldn't pay us.

Because of that, Marvin owed us a favor.

We had him meet Kelly. We had him watch Kelly and Donny's house, see where the kid went, and when he went, and if he went with some guys that looked tough.

When he finished a shift, I took over, and then Leonard took over. We had been at this for a couple of days. We were posted down from the house twenty-four seven, near an empty soccer field with grown-up grass and missing goal nets.

So, it was Marvin's watch, and I'm home with Brett, and we're upstairs in bed reading, and Leonard is snoozing on the couch downstairs, having finished his shift watching Kelly's place not too long back. I put the Western I was reading down, glanced at the clock. Twelve midnight.

I was about to turn in, get some sleep before I went on at eight a.m., and the doorbell dinged. I don't like it when the doorbell dings that late.

I got my automatic out of the drawer by the nightstand, and Brett got her revolver.

"I'll check," I said. "Leonard's down there, and if it's anything nasty, you call the cops."

I went downstairs, but the door was already open. Leonard was letting in Marvin.

I said, "Man, that was a short shift."

"Yeah," Marvin said.

Marvin has a limp and a cane. He was quick to find a chair. He took off his hat, which had once belonged to a friend of ours, and rested it on his knee. He said, “Things went a way I thought maybe you ought to know about.”

“So, about nine thirty I’m sitting in the car, thinking I’d like to be home in bed with the wife, when I see a car pull up at the curb. Four guys get out. One of them looks like he lifts weights. Lots of weights, big weights, heavy weights.”

“That would be the loveable Smoke Stack.”

“Yeah, for all that muscle business, he’s smoking like the proverbial smoke stack.”

“Oh, Marvin,” I said. “That is good. Him smoking like a smoke stack and having the name Smoke Stack. You are so clever.”

“Yep. They go around back, and then coming back from around the house I see all of them again, and this younger guy that I figure is Donny. They got in the car, tight as coins in a miser’s wallet, and drive away. I followed. They went out to the warehouse district, and I went with them, but sneaky like. They never saw me. They went down where the rentals are. It’s one of those cheap places. No cameras, no security gate. You just drive in and take your padlock off your shed. I couldn’t follow them in, so I drove across the street and looked. I could see through the fence and I could see them park, and I could see which storage building they opened. I could see a car in there. An older car, a muscle car. Something that could run like a spotted-ass ape if needed.”

“Ah, the old spotted-ass ape,” Leonard said. “How fast do they run?”

“They are very fast,” Marvin said. “So, they’re there awhile with the door pulled shut, and I could see they had a light on because it was shining under a crack at the bottom of the door.”

“That is some of that ace detective work you’re famous for,” I said.

“My guess is, if they’re planning a robbery, that storage shed is their villains’ lair.”

“Probably has a basement in there, test tubes and shit,” Leonard said. “It’s like the evil Fortress of Solitude.”

“I got another guess too,” Marvin said. “When the other robbery went down, the one with the guards, about a month later they found a guy in a car out in the woods with a bullet through his head. He’d been dead for awhile. At the time it was unexplained. Just a random murder. But, I been thinking maybe the dead guy was their getaway man. And when he got them away, they put him away. My guess is Donny is next on the list. They get some young guy doesn’t know squat, they use him for the robbery, for the driving, then they pop him and the cut is bigger. Next time they got plans, they recruit again. Each new driver doesn’t know about the other. It works until the word gets out they’re finding lots of dead people in stolen cars with false license plates.”

“So Donny is just a tool for them to use and then destroy,” I said.

“That’s my guess. Another thing, I followed them after they left the warehouse. They didn’t take Donny home. They drove him to a house on the edge of town. Most of the block there is burned out, and beyond it the town quits and the woods starts. It’s a run-down place where the back acres have been sawed over by pulp woodworkers. I parked there for a little while, then drove to the warehouse and got closer to the building they were in. It’s number fifteen. Then I came here. I could go back and finish my shift, but I don’t know I need to now.”

“Probably not,” I said. “We know where they keep the getaway car, and we know where they live. And that they may have sold pulp wood.”

“That pulp wood money could be the way they financed the first robbery,” Marvin said. “Bought the getaway car. Now they got money from the first robbery to pull another. They aren’t living high on the hog out there, so they’re keeping what loot they got tamped down for now, which is smart.”

“Marvin,” I said, “your work is done.”

“So we’re even on what I owe you two?” he said.

“We are,” I said.

“Good luck to you,” Marvin said, got up, and picked up his hat and cane. “If you need me for anything, even or not, give me a call.”

Marvin went out and closed the door.

I looked up and saw Brett was sitting on the top stair looking down, listening. I smiled at her and she waved. She was wearing those oversized pajamas and my bunny slippers with the ears on them.

She said, “How about we have some milk and cookies?”

“Hell, yeah,” Leonard said.

We sat at the kitchen table and had our milk and vanilla cookies and thought on the matter. Way we saw it, if we waited until they decided to rob an armored car, it would be too late.

First off, we didn’t know when they had their little heist planned, and we didn’t know if they might tire of Donny and pop him. We didn’t even know if they were actually the robbers, but it sure seemed likely, and we were going to play it that way.

We thought about a number of cool ways to go at it, and we explained them to Brett, and she said, “Why don’t you just go over and confront them, tell Donny how things went with their past driver. Otherwise, while you’re making your plans, he could already be the wheel man and dead and under some log in a creek somewhere.”

“There’s a logic to that,” I said.

“And it fits what you’ve done in the past,” Brett said.

“You mean strong-armed our way through?” Leonard said.

“Yeah,” Brett said. “You guys are smart enough, but you don’t have the patience to be masterminds.”

“Yeah,” Leonard said, “and it’s boring, and yucky, and I don’t want to do it.”

“So there,” I said. “If we go over, confront them, and if we convince and save Donny, they could still commit the crime and they could kill another idiot driver. I know that’s not supposed to be our problem. Our problem is supposed to be just Donny, but I don’t like it.”

“If you convince Donny to leave,” Brett said, “then you can give an anonymous tip about the car, say it’s stolen or something, because most likely it is, and put the cops on it.”

“They’ll need more proof than that to go take a look,” Leonard said.

Brett crossed a pajama-clothed leg, dangled a rabbit shoe from her foot, picked up her glass of milk, and sipped. When she sat the glass down, she had a thick, beaded, white milk mustache that made me smile.

“That’s right,” Brett said, “they will need more proof, but that tip could start movement in the right direction. After that, you get stuck on what to do, just come to me and I’ll figure it out from there.”

Next day we went over to the university and drove around for awhile before we could find a visitor’s parking spot that wasn’t filled, and walked over to the building where Kelly worked as a janitor. On the bottom floor students moved about, and an older woman in a janitor’s uniform was pushing a trash cart. She looked about as excited as a corpse.

We asked her about Kelly, and what she told us sent us by elevator to the fourth floor. Leonard wanted to push the button, and I had to let him, or I would never hear the end of it. He likes pushing buttons on elevators. I can’t explain it. But every time he gets to do it, for several minutes afterward, I must admit, I feel slightly deprived.

There were no students on the top floor. I went to one of the windows and looked out. I had gone to the university for awhile. I had been a good student. I enjoyed it. I still liked the atmosphere of a university, but I was too lazy to finish up my education, and most likely the classes I’d taken long ago in stalking the woolly mammoth and how to build a fire with flint and steel and a gust of wind were no longer valid.

We looked around a while and found an open door and heard some clattering, went in there and discovered Kelly banging a garbage can against the inside of his cart so it would empty.

Kelly looked up at us. The swelling around his eyes had gone down. He said, “You wouldn’t believe the stuff you find in these cans.”

I leaned my ass into the desk up front, and Leonard took a seat at one of the standard desks in the front row. Kelly put the garbage can back in place by the teacher’s desk, said, “Well.”

“We reckon you’re right,” Leonard said. “Those people Donny is running with, they’re not up to any good, and that means neither is Donny.”

“Can you do something about it?”

“Maybe,” I said. “But here’s the thing. We do what we’re talking about doing, you might not be safe. You might not want to go home for awhile.”

“How long’s awhile?”

I shook my head.

“I see,” he said. “And you can get Donny out of this?”

“You can’t make a man believe what he doesn’t want to believe,” I said. “But we can try and show Donny that things aren’t as good as he might think. In fact, they’re really worse than we thought.”

“How?” Kelly asked.

We told him about the dead man in the car, what we suspected. When we finished, Kelly found a desk and sat down. He said, “Shit, how does stuff like this happen?”

“Humans,” I said.

“Yeah,” Leonard said, “they can be pesky.”

“So,” I said, “what we’re asking is, do we go ahead with things? ’Cause if we do, it might make it hot around the old hacienda.

Meaning, you need to not be there. And the job here, I don't know how safe it keeps you."

Kelly nodded slowly. "I got some place I can go for awhile. I mean, I can figure that out. But the job, I need this job. I need it bad. I can't just walk away."

"We can't guarantee your safety, you stay on the job," I said. "We don't recommend it. We didn't have any trouble getting to you, and if they decide to find you, it won't just be to talk."

"I'll leave the house," Kelly said. "But I'll stay with the job. Go ahead and do what you need to do."

"We'll need a photo of Donny," I said.

"I can do that, after work," Kelly said. "But, you will try to save him, won't you?"

"We'll do what we can," Leonard said, "and more often than not, that's a lot."

Marvin was out of it now, and we didn't work in shifts after that. We just drove over together and parked down the street from where Kelly lived. Ever now and then we would move the car to a new position, so no one in a house nearby would call the law on us.

Kelly had followed our advice and found a new place to stay. We told him not to tell us where. That way we didn't have information we didn't need and wouldn't want to accidentally spill.

We also had something else. A last gift from Marvin. Having been a former cop, he had good connections. He got us information on Smoke Stack. Once Marvin knew where he lived, and what his car license was, it wasn't so hard. Marvin wasn't sure about the other guys, but he was sure about Smoke Stack. The license led to the car, and that led to a description, and that led to a rap sheet. I had that with me. And a grainy photo that had been faxed to Marvin and that he gave to us. Smoke Stack's real name was Trey Manton.

Leonard had a small flashlight on and he was using it to look the photo over again and read the rap sheet. We had already done that, but it was a way to pass the time. Leonard spent a lot of time looking at the bad photo. He clicked off the light and closed the folder and put it on the seat between us, said, "Man, that guy looks like he tried to roller skate in a buffalo herd."

"I'm going to guess the buffalo may not have turned out so well. And he's done time for drugs, and he is, shall we say, a violent person, as his prison time shows."

"We are violent ourselves," Leonard said. "But we're the good guys."

"I guess that's one way of looking at it," I said.

"Rather us as tough guys than people like Smoke Stack as tough guys."

"And yet another way of looking at it."

Leonard gave me Smoke Stack's photo. I looked at it again just to have something to do. I gave it back, and took the photo of Donny and looked it over. He looked like the usual, pimple-faced, sassy ass kid. It was a full body shot, and it made me think of the photos I'd seen of Billy the Kid, only without the cowboy hat, the rifle, and the six-gun on his hip. But it had the same attitude about it. The rifle and six-gun had been replaced by sagging pants and tennis shoes that looked too big for his feet. The strings were untied. That's showing them.

As it got dark and they didn't show up, we decided to go to their place and have a chat. Maybe Donny was already with them. With Kelly gone, maybe he no longer saw a need to go home. Next thing was they'd move into Kelly's house and never let him come back. They were the type. I had seen it before.

When we got over to the address Marvin had given us, we parked down from their house in the lot of an abandoned convenience store. It was about three blocks from their house, but seemed the best place to park. Everything there was as Marvin said. The houses and most of the convenience store were burned out and you could smell the dead fire still. Something had set the whole block on fire. Where the burned buildings ended, the woods took over, and up on a hill with some logged-out acres behind it was the house.

I opened the glove box and got out my automatic and gave Leonard his. They were both in black holsters, but the guns themselves did not match. Brett thought it would be cute if we got matching guns with our initials on them.

We got out of the car and Leonard pulled out his shirt and lifted it up and clipped on his holster. He arranged his shirt around it. It was only hidden if you weren't looking for it or you were blind in one eye and couldn't see out the other. I clipped mine to my belt. I was wearing a loose T-shirt, so it didn't cover much.

"Ready?" I said.

"I was born ready," Leonard said.

"Scared?"

"I never get scared."

"Bullshit."

"Okay, I'm a little scared. Let's get it done before I get more scared."

We started walking.

The house had a car out front, and we had to climb up the hill to get there. We stayed to the right side where there was still a line of trees just behind a barbed-wire fence, and then there was a pasture, and more trees, and then the house with the logged-out area behind it.

The house was not well lit and there wasn't much you could tell about it in the dark, but there seemed to be a sadness that came from it. All old uncared for houses seem that way to me. As if they are living things dying slowly from neglect. It's like they're old people no one will visit, or if they do, it's out of obligation or even spite.

There were a series of walking stones that led from a place near the road to the front porch, but grass had mostly covered them. There were a few shingles lying like scales in the yard; they had blown off the roof in a high wind. The rest of the yard had grass growing tall enough to hide a rhinoceros if he crouched a little. There was a washing machine in the yard, tipped on its side, and it looked to have been a popular model about the turn of the century. An old stone bird feeder was still standing. Grass seeds had gotten in it along with enough blown dirt and dust to make a bed, and blades of grass had grown up in a manner that made it look as if someone had used Butch Wax on them.

There was a thin beam of light escaping from under a window to the right of the door. I went up and bent down and looked through the window. There were three guys on the couch passing a joint back and forth. The light of a television strobed across their faces. One of them was Smoke Stack. He was hard to miss. He took up about a third of the couch. He was wearing a T-shirt with the sleeves rolled up so folks could get a look at his biceps, which looked like bowling balls in tight rubber tubing. There were tattoos on his arms, some kind of Chinese writing. I figured Smoke Stack was doing well to read English, let alone Chinese. The tats looked like they had been made by a blowtorch and a fountain pen.

I didn't see Donny.

I stepped back and Leonard took my place. After he took a look, he said, "Rock and roll."

I went up on the porch and Leonard went around back. We didn't say that we should do this. We just knew it. It wasn't our first rodeo.

I carefully pulled back the screen, which had so many holes punched through it, it might as well have just been a frame. It squeaked a little, like a dog toy.

I waited. No one shot at me through the door. No one jerked the door open. I could hear the TV. It was some kind of music show. Music videos, I guess. The music playing was rap, the only kind of music I can't stand, unless it's bagpipe music, which, with the exception of "Amazing Grace," always sounds to me like someone starting up a lawn mower.

I heard the back door breaking open, and when I did, I kicked the front door with all my might. It hurt my foot a little, but the door sagged back, which spoke not so much for my manliness as it did for the geriatric state of the house.

Rushing inside, I had my gun drawn. I was wearing my badass smile. I know it's bad ass, because I practice it in front of a mirror.

As we came in, me from the front, Leonard from the back, I focused on the three on the couch. As I said, one of them was Smoke Stack. The thugs on either side of him were almost interchangeable. Lanky with pot bellies and greasy hair, arms branded with tattoos, their heads wreathed in cigarette smoke. They looked like the kind of guys that might share a brain, and today the brain had a day off.

Sitting in chairs to the side were Donny and another guy. Leonard was watching them. Donny looked like a dumb kid, thin-faced, big-eyed, his chin bristling with a few hairs and competing pimples. The guy next to him was dark and short and stout and sunburned. He had his hair cut in a military do, probably because the hair on top was as thin as dirty water. Overall, he gave the impression of someone who had lived on a planet with heavy gravity and too much sunlight.

They jumped up and went for guns they had in their pants. Except Donny. He just sat there with his mouth hanging open.

Leonard waved his gun, said, “Who do I shoot first?”

There were no volunteers. They stopped moving.

I had my gun pointed too. I said, “Okay, boys, let’s keep standing, and take them out one at a time, starting with you, Smoke Stack. Put them on the floor. And I’m not talking about your dicks.”

“Do I know you?” Smoke Stack said.

“No,” I said. “But you’re about to know a little about me, and my guess is you aren’t going to like it.”

When they had the guns on the floor, I told them to kick them lightly away. Leonard held his gun on them, collected theirs, and took them outside. I watched through the open door as he threw them under the porch and came back inside.

“Nice night,” I said to no one in particular.

Leonard turned off the TV.

“What you guys want?” Smoke Stack said. “We ain’t got nothing for you to rob.”

“I think maybe you got some money from a bank robbery somewhere,” Leonard said.

Smoke Stack looked at Leonard, then me, then they all looked at Donny. They just kept staring, like they were waiting for him to break out into a little dance.

“No, man,” Donny said. “I didn’t tell them anything. I don’t even know these guys.”

“He ain’t lying,” I said. “He doesn’t know us. But, we are here for Donny’s benefit. We want that you should quit this group, Donny. Come home and quit acting like a gangster wanta-be. Or what we refer to in the privacies of our home as a dumb dick.”

“My brother,” Donny said. “He sent you. That’s it, isn’t it? Well, he and you both can keep your nose out of my business.”

“Just come home and forget these guys,” I said. “You do that, life will be a lot better for you, and so will the air. Man, you guys could use a bath. Or is it because you’re shitting behind the couch?”

“Ha!” Smoke Stack said. He looked at us and our guns like he was looking at kids with suckers. “You ain’t so much.”

“We got guns,” I said. “That puts us way ahead of you. We took yours away from you. And you know what? We might not give it back.”

Smoke Stack looked at Donny. “Who are these guys, kid?”

“I tell you, I ain’t had nothin’ to do with them. I tell you, I don’t know these guys.”

“They know you,” he said.

“Actually, we know who he is,” I said. “He doesn’t know us, and we don't know him. But we have a nice photograph. And we know this. You are planning to pull a heist, and the kid here, you want to get him in on it, and then when it's over, you'll pop him, and we're not talking about with a wet towel."

Smoke Stack let that revelation roam around in his head for awhile. It went on for so long you could see it cross behind his eyes, like someone moving past a window. I glanced at Donny. There was something roaming around in his head as well. Suspicion, I hoped.

"What the hell you talking about?" Smoke Stack said.

"That doesn't sound all that convincing," I said. "The part where you try to act like you don't know what's going on, and you've don't remember how you clowns shot your last wheel man and left him in the woods for the ants."

"What's he talking about?" Donny said, looking at Smoke Stack.

"They don't know nothing," Smoke Stack said. "They're just talking air. Don't pay them no mind. You really don't know them, then just keep your mouth shut."

"What they like to do," Leonard said, looking right at Donny, "is they hire some dumbass to drive their car, and then they kill him and split it between themselves."

"What, for one less split we kill a guy?" Smoke Stack said.

"Yep," I said. "And, hey, you fellas, what makes you think one of you isn't next? Were you all in on the previous job? Are there some bodies in the woods somewhere?"

I could tell from the way a couple guys looked at Smoke Stack that I had hit a chord.

"You guys don't listen to this shit," Smoke Stack said. "And you, Donny. Ain't I treated you right? I been more of brother to you than your own brother."

“You mean you’ve kind of let him do what he wants,” I said, “because at the bottom of it all, you don’t care about him. He’s just a pawn. It’s tough being a father or mother or big brother, ’cause they got to tell you stuff you don’t want to hear, make you do stuff you don’t want to do. But you, you can just tell him everything’s all right, even when it isn’t.”

“I ain’t got to do nothing,” Donny said. “My brother, he ain’t much of a man.”

“And Smoke Stack is?” I said. “Your brother works his ass off for you. Butt-wipe here steals what he wants and hangs out. Not a whole lot of manly in that.”

“I could snap you like a stick,” Smoke Stack said.

“No,” I said. “No, you couldn’t.”

“You talk tough with a gun,” Donny said. “I’ve seen what he can do. You ain’t so tough.”

“What?” Leonard said, grinning at Donny. “Smoke Stack? Tough? With some drunk, maybe? Some poor guy half in the bag. You think he’s bad because he has muscles and tattoos and cigarette breath. Hap here, on his worst day, could turn him inside out and make him say how much he likes it.”

“Ha!” Smoke Stack said.

I went over and gave Leonard my gun. Now he had one in either hand. I took off my jacket, hung it over the doorknob of the door I’d kicked open.

“Why don’t I show you that he’s not so tough?” I said.

“That’ll be the goddamn day,” Smoke Stack said.

“This is, in fact, that day,” Leonard said.

Smoke Stack grinned at Leonard. “I get through mopping the floor with him, you’re next, nigger.”

“Oh, don’t make me wet,” Leonard said, then he waved the guns at the others. “All you assholes, except Smoke Stack, and you, Donny, all of you over here and on your bellies. Make like fucking run-over snakes.”

They did what they were told. They lay on the floor on their bellies by the wall, lifted their heads up to see what was going on.

Leonard looked at them, said, “All you dick cheeses, all you move is your heads, savvy? Donny, you sit on the couch. You get a bird’s-eye view.”

“Why we doing this?” Smoke Stack said.

“Because we can,” I said. “And because you think you’re tough as an old saddle.”

“You’re too old for me,” Smoke Stack said to me.

“Yeah, well, I’ll try not to hurt you too bad.”

“I think tough guy is starting to waffle, Hap,” Leonard said. “I think he’s looking for a hole to run into.”

Smoke Stack said to me, “We get started, it goes bad for you, your man will step in with the guns?”

“He’s got the guns to keep your friends in line. It goes bad for me, I’ll take my beating, and then we’ll leave.”

“Shit,” Donny said. “Think you can beat Smoke Stack, you’re crazy. I seen him whip two guys once, and one of them with a board.”

I felt a little nervous right then, because that old adage about how bullies are always cowards isn’t true. Sometimes they’re bullies simply because they can do what they say they can do, and they enjoy doing it.

Leonard said, “Yeah, but it ain’t how many guys he whipped, it’s the guys. Hap, he wasn’t one of those guys.”

"He whips Smoke Stack, hell, I'll go with you," Donny said. "That's how much faith I got in him."

Smoke Stack looked at the kid and nodded.

"All right," I said. "I don't whip him. You stay, and we'll go, and we're out of your life. You rob banks, you fuck goats, you do what you like. We're done."

"You'll be saying stuff to folks you shouldn't, like we're going to rob a bank," Smoke Stack said. "We wouldn't want people believing something like that. You ain't got no proof of nothing that way."

"We'll make it simple for you," Leonard said. "You whip Hap, we'll leave, and then, so you don't cry at night, you can always come and try to kill us before we let the cat out of the bag. We'll give you a whole two days. You got our word, and that's better than yours, I'm sure."

"I whip him," Smoke Stack said, nodding at me, "then I'm coming for you. That's gonna be a treat."

"You don't even know me," Leonard said, then smiled at him. "And you don't want to. But if Hap slips on a banana peel, then I'll put the gun away, and me and you can dance all over this place."

"Hey, Smoke Stack," I said. "You gonna talk us to death, or you gonna show me what you got?"

There was a clearing between the people on the floor and the couch where Donny sat. Leonard was by the open door, pointing the guns. Smoke Stack moved forward, and as he did he crouched a little and put his fists up. He smiled at me, came closer.

He hooked a big right. I could have seen it coming with a bag over my head. I stepped into him at an angle and the punch went around me. I popped a jab in Smoke Stack's eye, hooked him to the throat. He had his chin down, so the hook was a so-so shot. Still, he didn’t like it. He stepped back with a sputter, coughed a little, and came at me windmilling. I leaned way right when he was right on me, put out my foot, and caught his ankle as he rushed. It catapulted him forward and into the wall and caused him to knock a hole in the Sheetrock with his head, then to roll on top of his gang members.

When he got himself straight and turned, I kicked Smoke Stack in the balls so hard people in China had heart pains. I stepped in quick and gave him a left-hand Three-Stooges poke in the eyes, hit him with a right cross that came from hell without a bus ticket and that smacked against the ridge of his jaw. He twisted and went down and started to get up, but didn’t.

“You waitin’ on reinforcements, Smoke Stack?” I said.

“What he needs to get up,” Leonard said, “is a fucking winch truck.”

Smoke Stack finally got upright, rushed me with his head down, bellowing like a bull. I hooked my arm under his neck as he came and went back on my hips and kicked him in the nuts again and lifted him over me so that he hit hard on his back on the floor. I could hear the breath go out of him, loud as an elephant fart.

I flipped back so that I landed straddling him, slammed my forearm into his nose and chin. Once. Twice. Three times.

He quit struggling. I got up and looked down at him. His face was bloody. He rolled over on his stomach and started crawling away, like a roach that had had its rear end stepped on. Then he collapsed, quit crawling. He was unconscious.

Donny was looking at me with his mouth open so wide you could have turned a semitruck around in there.

Donny said, “Did you kill him?”

"Just his pride," I said. "And maybe one of the two brain cells he had. That leaves him one so he knows how not to shit himself. Now, come on."

Donny looked at Smoke Stack, then at me. "I don't know."

"We had a deal. You can come, or Leonard here will pistol-whip the goddamn shit out of you and we'll take you anyway. You can go without knots and bruises, or we can fix you up. You get to choose. And you get to choose right now."

Donny nodded.

"We'll be taking all your guns," Leonard said. "We're gonna make Donny crawl under the porch and bring them out. He's going to do that without pulling one, so that way we don't have to shoot him. You can check for your pistols at the bottom of assorted lakes, creeks, and rivers. And if you follow us, I will personally shoot holes in your head, and when they find you, your guns will be shoved up your asses."

When we were in the car, with Donny seated in back, he said, "But he was so much bigger."

"David and Goliath," I said. "Ever read that passage in the Bible?"

"No. What's it mean?"

"It means David got lucky," I said.

"Only Hap wasn't lucky," Leonard said. "He was skilled. Smoke Stack, he's got big arms and a big mouth, but he was gonna get you killed, kid. We done you a favor, and you don't even know it."

"I don't believe that," Donny said, but his voice didn't hold a lot of conviction.

“Yeah, well, you can be stupid, or you can be lucky, and right now, you’re goddamn lucky,” Leonard said.

“I didn’t think anyone could do that to Smoke Stack,” Donny said.

“Your problem, kid,” Leonard said, “is you haven’t been doing a whole lot thinkin’, just reactin’, and you haven’t been around long enough to know life ain’t like the movies. I get the whole lost your parents thing. Been there. But that don’t have to turn you stupid. That’s a choice, like wearing green stretch pants. You don’t have to do it.”

“My brother shouldn’t have done this,” he said. “He shouldn’t have asked you guys to do this.”

“Woulda, shoulda, coulda,” I said. “We’re trying to save you from yourself. But, we got a time limit, boy. You fuck it up later, then we done what we could. You can go back to being stupid and probably shot to death in a car out in the woods. But, for right now, we got other plans.”

“What plans?” Donny said.

“Pancakes,” Leonard said.

We went to my place and made pancakes. It was late by the time we did, and Brett came in. She was carrying a newspaper. She saw Donny sitting at the kitchen table with a large glass of milk and a plate of pancakes covered in syrup. He was eating heartily. Leonard sat across from him with a Dr. Pepper. Leonard thought Dr. Pepper went with most anything. Brett nodded at Leonard and Donny, said to me, “So, you found a child in the yard and took him in to raise.”

“Found him under a rock,” I said. “Can we keep him? We’ll build him a pen out back."

She smiled at me. "We'll think it over. You got any more pancake batter?"

"Coming right up, banana pancakes," I said. "I should work at IHOP, I'm so good at this."

I went about making her pancakes. While I did, she sat at the table and looked at Leonard for an explanation. Leonard told her all about it.

Brett looked at Donny, said, "Honey, you could have been in some real trouble."

"I just wanted to make some money," he said, and the way he looked at her it was hard to determine if he was seeing a sister figure, a mother, or someone he wished he was old enough to date. Brett had that effect on people.

"So taking someone else's money is okay so you can have some?" she said.

"Smoke Stack said it's not someone's money if they can't keep it," Donny said. "And besides, that bank money, it's insured."

"Someone pays out the insurance, baby boy," she said, "and that might be me if I bank there." She picked up the newspaper and hit him a pretty good whack in the back of the head. "Bad dog. Bad, bad dog."

Donny lowered his eyes, said, "I didn't think about it like that."

"You haven't been thinking," she said. "You been hearing some bullshit, is what you been hearing, and I got to say, for you to take it as fact, you must want to believe it. There's people born stupid, but you're one of those Hap calls the Happily Stupid. They believe what they hear, not what they investigate or think about. They're the ones that don't listen to news, they listen to opinions and editorials and think it's news. Rumors and lies and sometimes the truth. It's all the same to them."

"I haven't had it so good," Donny said.

"So, you're like a special case?" Leonard said.

"Ain't no one matters but yourself," Donny said. "That's what Smoke Stack told me."

"Then that means you don't matter much to him," I said. "He's telling you the truth when it comes to his philosophy. He doesn't care about you or anyone else. You're just a cog in the machine, and he wouldn't mind replacing you with another cog at the drop of a hat."

I put Brett's pancakes in front of her and heated up the syrup a little in the microwave. I brought it to her and then got her a cold glass of milk. I sat down across from her.

When I sat, I put my hands in front of me, clasped together, and Brett said, "You okay, Hap?"

"I cut my knuckles."

I held them out for her to see.

"So you did."

"I think I can use some sympathy."

"We'll talk about it when we go to bed," Brett said.

What we ended up doing was not going to bed right away, but calling Marvin, and getting him out of bed, and pissing him off, but he came over anyway. He came over with the information about the body found in the woods, and in fact, he had gotten a copy of a photograph from one of his cop friends, had it in a big yellow envelope. We didn't look at it right away.

Once he had some of my pancakes, his attitude was better. We went into the living room, and Marvin told Donny some of what he knew. He took the photo out of the envelope and showed it to Donny. It was a clear photo of a man behind the wheel of a car. He had a hole in his forehead, and he was swollen up so bad his shirt collar had rolled into the swell of his neck. Insects had been at him, and a string of ants were clearly visible crawling into his nose.

“No gun was found,” Marvin said. “He didn’t shoot himself.”

“That could be anyone at anytime,” Donny said.

“Yeah, it could,” Marvin said. “It’s a possibility it is someone unrelated to your buddy Smoke Stack. It could be a pumpkin painted up to look like a man. But I don’t think so. Timing’s right, the description of the car fits.”

“There’s lots of cars like that one,” Donny said.

“You got me there, kid. You’re bound and determined to get yourself killed. So have at it. You want to take the chance it’s not connected, that’s your bailiwick. Me, I’m going home.”

Marvin stood up, leaving the photograph on the coffee table.

On his way out, Marvin picked his hat and cane off the back of a chair, said, “Nice knowing you, kid. Next time I see you, it’ll be in a photograph like that one.”

Marvin went out and closed the door.

“Bullshit,” Donny said.

“He’s just trying to help,” Brett said.

“He’s trying to scare me,” Donny said.

“Yeah,” I said, “he is. I hope it’s working. You damn well better be scared. This is some serious business we’re talking about. Smoke Stack, he’s a loser. He’s so cool and important, why’s he live in that shithole where he lives and have a bunch of other losers hanging around him, and that includes you. But it doesn't have to."

"He does all right," Donny said.

"Yeah," Leonard said. "Well, he don't keep his left hand up worth a shit."

"Or his right," I said.

That night we put Donny in the little guest bedroom we had built of recent for Leonard. It wasn't very big, but we had built it onto the back of the house. There was a window that Donny could climb out of if he were ambitious. The only thing was, Leonard was sleeping in the bed under the window and near the door. Donny was sleeping on a pallet on the floor. Donny would have had to have been a ninja to get out that window and Leonard not know it.

As we walked him to the bedroom and I laid out his pallet, Brett brought him pajamas and a towel for a shower, Leonard said, "I'm a light sleeper. And if you wake me up, thinking you're going to sneak out, I'm going to beat the hell out of you. That's as simple as I can put it."

Donny looked at me.

"He will," I said.

"Here," Brett said, handing him the towel and pajamas. "Baby, you ought to listen to these boys. They know what they're talking about. Like your brother, they just want to help you."

"My brother is a loser," Donny said.

"Your brother quit a good job to come here and take care of you," Leonard said. "He went from high living to low living. He's a janitor. Good honest work, but not work of his choosing. He did that for you. He may not be perfect, but he did it for you. That means something."

Donny didn't say anything to that.

Brett said, "You should listen. Those people you were with, hell, not people . . . those beasts you were with. They aren't human. They're hyenas. They might have been people once, but they're hyenas now. You don't have to be one too. You get to choose. That's the difference between you and a natural-born hyena. There's a choice for you. For the animal there isn't, but for humans to choose not to be animals, there is."

"Actually," Leonard said, "I like the hyenas better than humans."

"I don't know what you mean," Donny said.

"That's what scares us," I said.

"He knows," Brett said, and took hold of Donny's chin with her thumb and forefinger. "He's just not ready to admit it. . . . And Donny, honey, be sure and take that shower before you lay down to sleep. You'll sleep better, and you won't stink."

Donny looked as if someone had just stuck a hot shot to his balls.

"Not trying to hurt your feelings," Brett said, "just fact. Girls sure don't want to be around some stinker. And you're kind of cute, if you'd clean yourself up."

"Really?" Donny said.

"Really."

"Smoke Stack said if you got money, you got the girls."

"Did he?" Brett said. "That's like saying if you got corn you get the pigs. Thing is, who wants pigs? Look here, kid. Get a shower, and let's see we can do something about those pimples. You just aren't washing your face good. And I got some stuff you can put on them. Even a natural beauty, a goddamn goddess like me, sometimes gets a bump.”

Next morning Brett slept in, and I went downstairs and woke Leonard and Donny. I called Kelly and told him we had his little brother, and that we would try and hang onto him for a few days, to see if common sense soaked in. I didn’t offer him any guarantees.

We called Marvin about seeing if he could drop a word to the police about the car in the shed, and so on. He did. They didn’t really have enough cause, but they went out and cut the lock anyway. The car inside was gone. The place was empty. They went out to the house where Smoke Stack lived. It was cleaned up and only Smoke Stack was home. He told them the bruises on his face were from falling down in the driveway.

It was an iffy move, putting them on the alert like that, but me and Leonard figured it was best to make them a little nervous.

After we got the news, Leonard said, “Smoke Stack and his swinging-dick friends are done tidying up. There’s nothing left for the cops to find. I think we should have shot them all last night. I think we should have shot Smoke Stack twice.”

Donny was sitting on the couch, listening.

“That includes you,” Leonard said.

“He’s just testy,” I said. “He hasn’t had his morning coffee. And his boyfriend isn’t talking to him.”

“You’re gay?” Donny said to Leonard.

“You don’t act gay.”

“How do they act?”

“I don’t know. . . .”

“Look here, kid. We come in all shapes, sizes, and attitudes. But it’s pretty much a given we all have big dicks.”

“Yeah,” I said, “but he doesn’t have an ounce of fashion sense.”

“No Barbra Streisand records either,” Leonard said. “I just prefer men to women. And just for the record, I can whip your ass and pretty much anyone else’s on any day of the week, provided the moon is in Leo.”

“What?” Donny said.

“He’s fucking with you,” I said. “About the moon in Leo part.”

We went to the gym and took Donny with us. When we got there we put the bag gloves on him and showed him how to work the heavy bag. He didn’t want to do it at first, but Leonard persuaded him with a threat. After Donny hit the bag a few times, he got into it. He started asking questions on how to throw punches. He had seen us do it, seen how we moved the bag, and he wanted to learn it. I think he was also thinking about that ass-whipping I had given his hero.

Leonard said, “You got to come from the hip. But, you get older, you get more experience, you realize this bag don’t mean shit. Hitting a person, you don’t have to be able to move this bag. You got to hit a man when he’s in the void, when he’s stepping, when he’s trying to shift or recover his balance. Catch him then, you can take down a big guy with a simple punch, a kick. Catching someone off balance, or controlling their balance, makes them easier to throw.”

We spent two hours at the gym, then went back home.

We pulled up in the drive, and I saw the front door was open. Leonard and I were in the front seat. He turned and looked over his shoulder, said, “Donny, you stay in the car. If anyone comes out shooting, or you hear shooting, you run like a motherfucker. But, you don’t hear shooting, I come out, and you’re gone, I will track you down—”

“And beat the shit out of me,” Donny said.

“That’s right.”

We had guns in the glove box and we got them out. Leonard went around back, and I went up on the porch and moved the open front door wider with my foot, peeked inside.

I didn’t see anyone. I moved in slowly, and then I heard the back door lock click, and Leonard was in.

Leonard took the kitchen, and I took his room. We checked the bathrooms. I went upstairs. The bedcovers were pulled back, and the big red T-shirt she had slept in was lying on the floor. On the end of the bed was a note.

I picked it up and read it.

WE GOT YOUR REDHEAD. WE GOT DONNY'S BROTHER.
WE GOT YOUR LADY'S CELL PHONE,
AND WE GOT YOUR NUMBER.
GO TO THE COPS, THEY'RE BOTH DEAD.
WAIT FOR OUR CALL.

There’s no way to describe the emptiness I felt. I went downstairs with the note and gave it to Leonard. He read it and went upstairs and came down with a shotgun, two pistols, and a single-shot .22 rifle. None of them are registered. I keep them in a special place in the closet where the ceiling tiles can be moved and the guns can be stored.

I sat at the table, stunned, and Leonard went out and got Donny and brought him in.

Donny looked at me, said, “What’s wrong?”

Leonard gave him the note, said, “That’s your man, Donny. He’s got Brett and your brother. That’s what cowards do.”

Donny put the note down. “Smoke Stack said no one would get hurt. He said we’d just end up making some money.”

“Someone will get hurt all right,” Leonard said. “Smoke Stack. And anyone with him. If he hurts Brett, we’ll kill them all and shit on their graves on a weekly basis.”

“Brett didn’t have anything to do with this,” Donny said.

“Yeah, and that mattered, didn’t it?” Leonard said.

I was thinking on what to do next when the cell rang.

When I answered, Smoke Stack said, “All right, bad ass. We got your woman and she’s going to drive the getaway car for us. That’s ironic, ain’t it, asshole? It didn’t take all that much work to figure who you guys were, ’cause first off, we got the brother, and it didn’t take more than a few burning cigarettes on his chest and he talked right up, told us who you were. How you like that?”

“Peachy,” I said.

“We nabbed Donny’s brother at his job just before he started to clean a toilet. Now listen up tight ’cause I ain’t gonna repeat it. We hit the First Commercial Bank at one thirty today. Anyone should get tipped off before then, or at all, we’ll kill the chick and the brother too. What we’re gonna have the redhead do is drive the getaway car. Ain’t that classic? You take our wheel man, and we take your girl, and now she’s our wheel man. Pardon my goddamn fucking manners. Wheel woman. I hope she can drive, ’cause if she can’t, got to just go on and pop her.”

"She can drive," I said. "Don't hurt her."

"Man, that would be a shame, wouldn't it? Fox like that. She's fine, man. I don't know how you got something like that. I see her, and I see you, I got to wonder you got some kind of Love Potion thing going."

"Just don't hurt her. . . . How do I get her back?"

"You didn't mention getting the brother back. So, we'll keep him. We'll keep him until we're gone for some time. We give the redhead back, you tell who we are, then he's toast. Otherwise, a week from now we'll let him go . . . no. I don't like that. You see, I'm thinking since you didn't even ask about him, he's not such a big worry for you. You get the woman back, then what do you care? We'll do it the other way. We'll keep the redhead and give you the brother. A week from now, we'll let her go. Just so you know, we caught her sleeping. Just sprang the lock and found her upstairs. I made her change, and I watched while she did it. It's good to know she's a natural redhead. It's good to know what she's got under the hood, so to speak."

"Fuck you," I said.

"Don't get rowdy. It might not do to get me mad. And let me tell you something. Other night, you got lucky. I was high as a kite."

"Yeah, and you can't fight either."

"Maybe we'll get another chance and I can show you what I can do when I'm straight."

"Maybe we will."

"Tell you what. We keep her a week, we'll give her back, but in the meantime, we might try and put out that little fire between her legs. I'm a regular fireman."

"You hurt her, you touch her, you're dead," I said.

"I wouldn't talk like that, if I was you. There's all kinds of things can happen between now and then. You could be looking for her for twenty years and not so much as find a hair. That body we left in the woods, in the car, that was a mistake. From now on, there won't be bodies to find. So you better pay attention to me. You sit quiet. We'll hit the bank. We'll leave the brother somewhere, and then we'll let your woman go in a week. That way, we got plenty of time to do what we want and get where we want. You don't believe me, call the police. Show up and cause trouble. You might get me, but you won't get her back. Least not alive. Have a nice fucking day, asshole."

I put the cell away and told Leonard what Smoke Stack said.

I said to Donny, "He won't let your brother go, and he won't let Brett go. He knows we know who he is, and he's determined to pull the armored car job anyway. Out of spite. He's trying to prove he's smart."

"I'm so sorry," Donny said. "I guess I haven't been thinking."

"You ought to be sorry, kid," Leonard said. "You've stirred up the goddamn bees' nest."

"He might let them go," Donny said.

"No," I said. "His pride is what this is about. He knows at some point we'll tell somebody, so I figure he'll do the robbery, then tell us he's going to let the brother go, and we can pick him up at such and such a place, but neither brother nor Brett will be alive by then. And they'll be waiting for us. They'll ask that you come along, like they're gonna take you back. But you know what? They plan to kill us all. No witnesses, and then they're back in business. Cops will know it's them that did it because of circumstantial evidence, but thinking and proving, that's two different things. They could lay low for a year or two and then launder the money somewhere, come out good. And my figure is everyone in that group, except Smoke Stack, will turn up dead. He'll end up with all the money and no one to talk about how things were done."

"You know, it's not a nice thing to say," Leonard said, looking at Donny, "but this is all your fault."

"It is, isn't it?" Donny said.

"Damn straight," Leonard said.

"It's not all your fault," I said. "I was Kelly, I'd have told too. No one is as tough as they show in the movies. I should have thought that angle. We tried to play this one too nice."

"Hap likes being nice," Leonard said. "Me, I don't care for nice."

"Will you go to the police?" Donny asked.

"We could take that chance, but we won't," I said.

Donny looked at the floor, then up at me. "It's not an armored car this time."

"No?"

"They're just going to hit the bank. Two inside, and then they'll come out and the getaway car will be waiting. I wanted to tell you that. He shouldn't have bothered Kelly and Brett."

"I bet Smoke Stack stays in the car," Leonard said.

"Yeah," Donny said. "Him and one of the others. And the driver."

"And now that driver is Brett, and your brother will be in the car too," Leonard said.

"All right," I said. "That doesn't change much, it might make it easier, no armored car guys to worry with."

"Yeah, it really doesn't matter," Leonard said. "But you showed some balls by telling us, by stepping farther away from that asshole Smoke Stack.”

“What will you do?” Donny asked.

“What Leonard said earlier. We’ll kill them all and shit on their graves.”

It was still early in the day. My guess was they would keep Brett and Kelly alive until they were finished with the job. That would be their insurance until they didn’t need them anymore. I had to hold onto that idea. It was my only comfort. Still, it wouldn’t be long after the job was over that both Brett and Kelly would end up dead.

I called Marvin and told him the situation.

“So, how about I park somewhere where I can see them do the robbery. The asshole even told you the bank.”

“He thinks he’s untouchable.”

“I can be an eyewitness later. Say I saw them. Right after I shoot the living hell out of them.”

“Just be a witness,” I said. “Don’t get involved. Leonard and I will take care of them.”

“I know that,” Marvin said. “I never thought otherwise. But I can do my part.”

“Not for us you won’t,” I said.

“I didn’t say anything about it being for you and Leonard. It’s Brett I’m talking about.”

“And I appreciate it, but just watch what goes down so you can say you saw them there. If you see us, kind of forget that you did.”

“If they call me on the witness stand later and ask if I saw you two?”

“Lie under oath.”

“Certainly. I just wanted to make sure we were on the same page.”

We met Marvin at a drive-through eatery about noon, had some coffee. I don’t remember if I drank mine or not. We were sitting in Marvin’s car. Leonard’s car was parked beside it. Donny was sitting with us.

“Donny, you stay with Marvin,” I said.

“You don’t have to worry about me running,” Donny said. “I want my brother back. I want you to get Brett back. She was right. I do get to choose.”

“Yeah, well,” Leonard said, “talk is cheap.”

“By the way,” I said, “in case you choose wrong, I’m not worrying about you running. Marvin will shoot you.”

“I will,” Marvin said. “A whole lot.”

“Maybe somebody ought to shoot me,” Donny said. It was a little dramatic, but right then I think he meant it.

Leonard raised his hand. “Who’s for it?”

“Right now you just stay out of trouble, Donny,” I said. “This kind of stuff is our business.”

“Yeah, like we don’t fuck up regularly,” Leonard said.

“Not this time,” I said.

“But they said for you not to come,” Donny said. “That if you did they’d kill her.”

“They’ll kill her anyway,” Marvin said. “So, it’s then or not at all.”

Leonard and I got in his car. We had put false license plates on it that morning, and we had a roll of false pinstripe to use. It was a stick-on thing you could remove easily, then wipe the sides of the car with some rubbing alcohol and it was like it had never been there. It was a little thing, but it was something that might throw an observer off.

Just to keep the disguise theme going, Leonard and I were going to wear hats.

Marvin was to drive to a spot across from the bank. A hotel parking lot. It would be quite a coincidence, him being at the hotel parking lot at the same time as the robbery, considering he'd turned in information about them earlier. Information that didn't pan out. But, he planned to tell them the hotel had a hell of a catfish buffet, and that he liked to take it in now and again, just happened to be there when the whole thing went down. Donny being there might take a bit more explaining, but in the end, truthfully, I didn't think it would matter. Not with what I had in mind.

We stopped in a lot behind a closed supermarket and got out and quickly put the pinstripes on the car. We put our hats on and drove to a place across the street from the bank. It used to be a mercantile store, but like most things downtown, it had gone the way of the dodo bird. From where we were, we could see the bank and we could see the hotel across the way. Marvin and Donny were parked in the lot.

The little mercantile lot was now a free parking lot, and it was full of cars. Mostly people who worked for the bank. We didn't try to find a parking spot, we just drove to the rear of where all the cars were and pulled up there. As we sat, a police patrol car came by on the street between us and the bank. He didn't look our way. Which was good. I had the .22 bolt-action rifle in my lap; it held one shot at a time. In the backseat was a shotgun. We had pistols in the glove box. No land mines or golf clubs.

I opened the door quietly and got out of the car and looked over the roof, and over the roofs of the other cars in the lot. From there I had a clear shot.

I got back in the car.

I looked at my watch. One fifteen.

I took a deep breath. Leonard said, “It’ll be all right.”

“It’ll be all right when it’s all right,” I said.

“We’ll get them.”

“He could have lied about the time,” I said. “He could have done that.”

“Yep,” Leonard said, “but I think he feels safe. The coward’s way is to be brave when he holds the cards. Not when he doesn’t.”

“I just hope I’m not the one to hurt her.”

“Hell, Hap, when was the last time you missed a shot?”

I tried not to remember when that was, tried not to imagine I could miss.

“Listen, brother,” Leonard said, “I can do the shooting for you. I’m not like you. You know, in Vietnam I killed a lot of men. The only ones I feel bad about are the ones I tried to kill, shot at, and missed. I remember them better than the dead ones ’cause all I can think about is they may have gone on to kill one of us. I’m not like you. I don’t carry the burdens of popping off a bad guy. I can get closer somehow, and I can do it.”

“No you can’t. You’re an all right shot, but when it comes to this business I’m the one to do it. And it needs to be done from as much distance as the shot will allow.”

“You got me there.”

I nodded. “Yeah. I do.”

I never learned to love guns. Didn’t sit around and talk about how big a hole they can put in something and from how far. I didn’t need bigger, better, and more. I don’t enjoy the smell of gun oil, don’t even like cleaning them. I don’t know all the brand names and all the calibers and such.

But I can shoot a long rifle better than damn near anybody outside of a trained sniper, and I’m okay with a handgun if it’s not too extreme a shot. I just have a knack to aim at something and hit it. Put a long gun in my hands and I can normally put a shot up a gnat’s ass, and that’s without the gnat bending over and pointing to the target.

Right then, however, all I could think about was that I might miss. I had certainly missed before, but I didn’t want this to be one of those times.

Leonard knew what I was thinking. He often does.

“You won’t miss, Hap.”

We didn’t say another word. Just sat there and watched and listened to each other breathe. I paused once and looked in the mirror on the back of the sun visor. I should note I looked pretty cool in my hat, a brown fedora. Leonard didn’t look so sharp in his. He loved hats, but like I keep telling him, he isn’t a hat person. Every hat he wears looks like something left on a scarecrow.

One thirty came and they didn’t. Had Smoke Stack given me a line of shit? I felt like I was going to burst out crying.

Five minutes later we saw a car with two of the guys that had been with Smoke Stack in the house that night. The skinny, potbellied guys.

The car was a replacement for the one they had originally stored in the shed Marvin told us about. A brown, speedy model. They parked it in a spot and sat for a moment. I got out of the car with the .22 and laid it over the roof. I was a good distance away, and I had a limited shot over the roofs of parked cars. My stomach fluttered.

Way I figured, those guys in the brown late model would hit the bank, rush out and into the getaway car as it arrived. Smoke Stack, Brett and Kelly, and Stumpy would be in that car. Brett would be at the wheel. When the robbery was done, the others would jump in the getaway car and go. Brett would have to drive them out of there. I hoped like hell she didn't try to get cute, wreck the car. She did, they'd kill her or the wreck might. With Brett, you never knew. She was a fighter.

Way they planned it, if things went wrong with the pickup, they had a spare car in the lot. But the best thing was to have a getaway driver waiting so the robbers wouldn't have to start up and back out. It wasn't elaborate. It was simple. Simple was what worked.

The two shitheads got out of the car, ready to go in the bank. They had on gloves and jackets under which I was sure there were guns.

I had the .22 beaded on the back of the head of one of them. A .22 isn't a heavy firing weapon, but it doesn't recoil much and in matters like this, it isn't firepower, it's aim. The .22 had another advantage. It wasn't particularly loud.

I took a deep breath, two more, then slowly let out all my air, steadied the rifle. My face was beaded with sweat and a drop ran into my eye. I wiped it away quickly with my arm. The sweat had spoiled my aim.

They paused, and the one I hadn't sighted talked on his cell phone. That would be the call for the getaway car, which would be nearby. And that would be the pause I needed to set my shot again.

They started walking toward the bank entrance. I sighted down the barrel, took three deep breaths again, let out all my air, and gently tugged the trigger. The sound of the shot was like someone snapping a whip. The guy I was aiming at folded his legs under him and sat down quickly like he was about to start meditation. I knew there would be a small hole in the back of his head, but the front would have one the size of a half-dollar. There would be a punch out of bone, an explosion of blood and brains on the concrete. As I watched, slowly, he leaned forward, his forehead hitting the cement.

The other man with him wheeled and pulled a gun and darted back toward his car. I shot and hit him in the side before he made it. He went down. I could hear him scream from there. He threw the pistol aside and got up on his knees and held both hands up in surrender; he was a professional quitter.

I could tell he hadn't seen me yet, had no idea where the shot had come from. He was rapidly turning his head from left to right, front to back, holding his hands up.

He yelled out to no one in particular, "I haven't got a gun. I give up. I quit."

All I could think about was Brett.

I timed the turn of his head and shot him between the eyes. He fell back. I tossed the .22 in the backseat and climbed back in the car. About that time, people came out of the bank. They gathered around the bodies.

We sat where we were. People were looking in all directions. I took deep breaths and let them out.

“Easy,” Leonard said. “Two down.”

Then we saw a black SUV pull into the lot.

Brett was at the wheel. Smoke Stack was beside her. One of the other shits was in the back, the one Smoke Stack called Stumpy. I didn’t see Kelly.

I got out of the car again with the .22, keeping it held down low. But when Smoke Stack saw the situation at the bank, the crowd, his boys down in the lot, he had Brett drive on. Nothing speedy. She just eased out of the lot. So far, no one even knew the SUV was supposed to be part of what was going on.

I was sure neither Smoke Stack nor Stumpy had seen me. I got in the car, and we eased out of the lot with our hats pulled down low and followed the SUV.

It went slow as it turned down the street toward the square, and then it hit South Street and turned. Holding a ways back, but not too far.

My cell rang. I answered.

It was Marvin. “You on them?” he asked.

“On them,” I said.

They went along for a few lights, driving casual, then they turned on Highway 7. We pulled down a little dirt road and got out and pulled off the pinstriping and threw it and our hats into the bushes. It was most likely wasted energy, but it was the only clever thing we had had time to plan, and frankly, it wasn’t that damn clever.

We got back in the car and went after them, finally caught up and stayed behind them at a goodly distance. Another car passed and got between us. But that was all right. It was a kind of camouflage. We all three drove out Highway 7.

We went on for quite some time, and then the car between us turned off, and we fell back a little. There was road work ahead, and they fanned the SUV through, but stopped us. We sat there and waited. It was a cool day, but I was sweating. They were getting ahead of us.

“Should we run it?” I said.

“Stay cool,” Leonard said.

That was like asking a polar bear to stay cool in Albuquerque in mid-July.

Finally they waved us through. Leonard put his foot to the floor. We didn’t see them. We had lost them.

I called Marvin.

“Man, we lost them. We’re gonna need you out here to help look. We got to do back roads. Shit, I don’t know what we got to do.”

“Take it easy,” Marvin said.

“Easier said than done. Goddamn road work. It got us hung up.”

“Where are you?”

“Out Highway 7.”

“Highway 7. We’re coming . . . wait. Donny. He wants to talk to you.”

“Fuck him.”

“Then put him on.”

“Hap,” Donny said, “I want to help.”

"Then you better not be wasting my time with a chat."

"Smoke Stack, if he's out Highway 7, he's going to the Take Off. That's what he calls a pasture out there. I think his family might have owned it. It's about twenty acres, used to be a hayfield, has some aluminum buildings. He keeps an ultralight there. That's why he calls it the Take Off. He uses the pasture as a kind of airport. He could be going there. I was there with him once. Went out to help him get a car from one of the sheds. One we had stored for the getaway, before you found out about it. He could have stored the car back there."

"For a trade-off?"

"Maybe. But that's a place he could be. Maybe they're just hiding out there. I don't know. But it makes sense."

He gave me the directions. It was down a county road. We had passed it. Leonard wheeled the car and we drove back.

The place wasn't hard to find, not once we knew which road to take. Donny explained all that over the phone. There was a line of trees, and then a pasture. From the directions, we concluded we were at the right place.

We parked by a small bridge. I spoke into the cell. "We're here."

"Good luck," Donny said.

"Luck has got nothing to do with it," I said, and turned off the phone.

I took the .22 out and Leonard took the shotgun. We walked over the bridge and along the side of the road behind the trees for about a hundred feet. We stopped near the road and jumped over a ditch and looked through a gap in a patch of pines.

From there we could see a grown-up pasture and about a hundred yards out, a long low aluminum shed. It had two large double doors on it. One set of doors was wide open. I could see the ultralight Donny had mentioned. I had been up in one once, a two-seater. I was the passenger. It was like riding in a winged lawn mower.

The SUV was parked near the shed.

If Smoke Stack and Stumpy were going out of there in the ultralight, then there wouldn't be any room for Brett and Kelly. They'd either leave them, or pop them. I suspected the latter. But they hadn't done it yet because I could see Brett and Kelly by the shed. It looked as if they might be wearing handcuffs; their hands were tucked behind their backs and they were leaning against the building. The only way into the pasture, which was fenced with barbed wire, was over a cattle guard.

Smoke Stack and Stumpy were tugging the ultralight out of the shed.

"Looks like they aren't going to bother with a car," Leonard said.

"Go start the car," I said.

"You can shoot from here."

"I can. But I'm going through the trees and through the fence, and I'm going to walk straight toward them. I need to be closer and surer. You drive over that cattle guard like your ass is on fire, distract them. I'll take my shot then. It'll be Smoke Stack first. Then I reload and it's the other one."

"That's slow reloading with all that's going on, you and that single-shot squirrel rifle," Leonard said.

"I'm quick and it's a little late to upgrade."

Leonard walked back to the car and I started through the trees and through the wire. I heard the car engine start. It wasn't loud enough to startle anyone, far back as he was. And then I heard the car coming, like the proverbial bat out of hell.

I hurried across the pasture. Smoke Stack hadn't seen me yet. He was preoccupied with another part of his plan. He hadn't wanted to share the two-seater at all. And I knew why. All that money had to have a place to sit.

He had an automatic pistol drawn, and he turned and shot his partner right through the head. I saw him heave something in a bag into the ultralight, then he started over toward Brett and Kelly, the automatic hanging from his hand. He was partially hidden by the ultralight. I could only get glimpses of him through the wings and the motor and the seating. He hadn't seen me yet. He was preoccupied.

I stopped and dropped to one knee and took my shot.

I saw his hair lift a little, my shot was so close.

But I missed. I NEVER FUCKING MISSED. And I had missed.

My heart sank.

Smoke Stack wheeled. And when he did, Brett jumped up, and, with her hands against her back, she leaped at him, hit him with a body slam, and knocked him spinning backwards, his gun flying from his hand. I dropped the .22 and started running toward him. Leonard was flying through the cattle guard then, bearing down on Smoke Stack.

Smoke Stack got up and out from under Brett, who struggled to her feet and tried to jump at him again. But Smoke Stack dodged her like a quarterback on the run and leapt into the ultralight. I heard the motor start up and a moment later the machine was bouncing over the field. I was running on a collision course with Leonard. He slammed on the brakes and I slid over the hood and jumped in on the other side.

“Go,” I said.

The ultralight was gaining some speed. Its bounces were becoming higher. In a moment it would hop and then leap to the sky.

But the motor on that thing wasn’t a match for a car. We were closing. As we passed Brett, who had struggled to her feet, she looked at me.

I waved.

The car bounced along until it was almost even with the ultralight. I hung myself out of the open window, eased out until I was sitting on the edge of it with my legs dangling, my arms inside, keeping me lodged. And then I eased on arm out.

“Closer,” I said.

Leonard did that. I cocked one foot up until it was on the window support, and I shoved off just as the ultralight was making its big jump.

I hit the wing of the ultralight, scrambling for a grip, and my weight nodded it toward the ground. The wing hit. The propeller gnawed at the pasture. There was a sudden whirl as the sky came down and then went up again, followed by a close look at, and a hard impact with, the ground.

I heard a noise like someone dragging a rake through gravel. It was the ultralight spinning in circles like a confused idiot. The money had come loose of the bag and some of it was spinning in the air and some had been caught in the propeller and chopped up. It looked like the last hurrah of a parade, the last bits of confetti thrown.

On my feet, I saw Smoke Stack coming toward me. He was so angry he was actually foaming at the mouth. His face was scratched up.

“Now you get your shot, buddy,” I said.

“I’ll fucking kill you.”

He was like a locomotive. It wasn’t like that night in his house. He was crazed with anger and maybe he had been on drugs, or most likely had just underestimated me. That happens a lot. But he was dead serious now.

I dodged his rush and kicked out. I was trying to hit him in the solar plexus, but he instinctively crunched his body and took the shot on his upraised forearms. The impact, the disorientation of the crash, had me off a bit, so the impact of hitting him like that knocked me down. He leaped on me like a big frog.

I heard Leonard slam the car door and start over. But me and Smoke Stack were into it. I spread my legs and got him between them. He tried to hit me. I put up my arms. I was deflecting most of the blows, but I was taking some of it. Finally I cupped one of his arms at the elbow and swung a leg to the side of his neck. I was trying to pull him into a triangle choke, but the angle wasn’t right. He pushed my leg back so that it was being mashed across my face. It was damn uncomfortable. I used my other leg to kick at his hip, knocking him back a bit, loosening him. It allowed me to swing my leg free. I poked him in the eyes with my fingers, and when he went back and put a hand to his face, I rolled out from under him.

Now I was on my feet, where I preferred to be. I saw Leonard leaning against the car, the shotgun lying on the fender.

“You got him,” Leonard said.

Smoke Stack came in swinging. I ducked him and came up with an uppercut that knocked him back. I kicked him in the nuts then, but he was too high on adrenaline for it to matter. He came swinging again. I glanced the blows off my forearms and got inside and grabbed his head and kneed him inside of the leg. Adrenaline wasn't enough to stop that pain.

His leg went out from under him. I swung a downward right cross, and back he went. He rolled onto his hands and knees and scuttled and finally got to his feet. He put a hand to his pocket, and when he brought it out, he had a knife.

He crouched, eased toward me. There was sound like a cannon going off and Smoke Stack's head disappeared in a blur of red and gray and flying white fragments. Within a blink of an eye, what was left of him was lying on the ground.

I looked at Leonard. He was lowering the shotgun.

"You proved your point, and you got your licks in," he said. "But that knife, that could have been a problem."

We found that Brett's and Kelly's hands were bound with plastic cuffs. We cut those off. I said to Brett, "You all right, baby?"

"Yeah," Brett said. "I'm fine. All they did was get an unauthorized look at my nubile body. A look like they got, I should have been paid money."

I grinned at her and we kissed.

I walked back and got the .22. The shell casing was still in it.

We packed up and drove out of there in Leonard's car, left the money and the bodies.

It was a few weeks later.

A tip had led the police to the bodies in the field. Way it looked was there had been a problem between thieves. Smoke Stack had shot his partner and tried to escape, but crashed. Someone had blown his head off. They took this to be another partner. They were glad to get most of the money back. I don't know about the shredded stuff. I envisioned some bank clerk gluing the pieces back together like an archaeologist reuniting shards of pottery. It was a silly thought, but it hung in my head.

The other partner, of course, wouldn't be found. Neither would the .22 that killed the two would-be robbers in the bank lot. The cops had an idea that one of the partners went rogue, first with a .22, then a shotgun. It was a silly theory, but thank goodness they liked that story and were sticking to it. They're not dumb, just arrogant.

It was a nice afternoon with a clear sky and a light wind. We were in the backyard grilling burgers, me and Brett and Leonard. The doorbell rang. That would be our guests.

I went through the house and let Marvin and Kelly and Donny in, walked them out back.

Leonard was flipping the burgers.

We greeted each other, talked.

Donny said, "I haven't said nothing, and I never will."

"I believe you," I said.

"I wouldn't want you mad at me," Donny said.

"That's good thinking," Leonard said.

"But I wouldn't say anyway. I . . . I can't thank you guys enough. You hadn't done what you did, I'd be dead."

"Absolutely," Leonard said.

“Thanks again for saving my little brother,” Kelly said, “and thanks for passing on the payment I owed you guys. I can use the dough.”

“Man,” Leonard said. “You’re the hero. You put yourself on the line. Changed your life, got your ass whipped by me, and thoroughly, I might add, and then you didn’t even have any protection from those guys and still you went to work.”

“You warned me,” Kelly said. “You told me not to stay on the job.”

“Yep,” Leonard said. “We did.”

“And, I sort of squealed when they put those cigarettes on me. I thought I could take it. I was sure I could. One burn and I was already starting to loosen my tongue.”

“It hurts,” Leonard said. “You’re not a professional tough guy. We don’t begrudge you trying to make the pain stop. Besides, in the long run it worked out.”

“Well,” Brett said, stretching out in a lawn chair, her long legs poking sweetly out of her shorts. “All’s well that ends well and doesn’t make mess on the rug.”

“Here, here,” Marvin said.

“You said it right, Brett,” Donny said. “They were hyenas. And I don’t want to be like that.”

“Good thinking,” Brett said.

“I find a woman I care about,” Donny said, “I hope she’s half the woman you are, Brett.”

“Oh, honey,” Brett said smiling. “That’s so sweet. But too optimistic. You can’t find anyone half as good as me. A quarter of my worth maybe, if you’re having a good day. But half, don’t be silly.”

Veil’s Visit

with Andrew Vachss

1.

Leonard eyed Veil for a long, hard moment and said, “If you’re a lawyer, then I can shit a perfectly round turd through a hoop at twenty paces. Blindfolded.”

“I am a lawyer,” Veil said. “But I’ll let your accomplishments speak for themselves.”

Veil was average height, dark hair touched with gray, one good eye. The other one roamed a little. He had a beard that could have been used as a Brillo pad, and he was dressed in an expensive suit and shiny shoes, a fancy wristwatch, and ring. He was the only guy I’d ever seen with the kind of presence Leonard has. Scary.

“You still don’t look like any kind of lawyer to me,” Leonard said.

“He means that as a compliment,” I said to Veil. “Leonard doesn’t think real highly of your brethren at the bar.”

“Oh, you’re a bigot?” Veil asked pleasantly, looking directly at Leonard with his one good eye. A very icy eye indeed—I remembered it well.

“The fuck you talking about? Lawyers are all right. They got their purpose. You never know when you might want one of them to weigh down a rock at the bottom of a lake.” Leonard’s tone had shifted from mildly inquisitive to that of a man who might like to perform a live dissection.

“You think all lawyers are alike, right? But if I said all blacks are alike, you’d think you know something about me, right?”

“I knew you were coming to that,” Leonard said.

“Well,” I said. “I think this is really going well. What about you boys?”

Veil and Leonard may not have bonded as well as I had hoped, but they certainly had some things in common. In a way, they were both assholes. I, of course, exist on a higher plane.

“You wearing an Armani suit, must have set you back a thousand dollars—” Leonard said.

“You know a joint where I can get suits like this for a lousy one grand, I’ll stop there on my way back and pick up a couple dozen,” Veil said.

“Yeah, fine,” Leonard said. “Gold Rolex, diamond ring . . . how much all that set you back?”

“It was a gift,” Veil said.

“Sure,” Leonard said. “You know what you look like?”

“What’s that?”

“You look like Central Casting for a mob movie.”

“And you look like a candidate for a chain gang. Which is kind of why I’m here.”

“You gonna defend me? How you gonna do that? I may not know exactly what you are, but I can bet the farm on this—you ain’t no Texas lawyer. Hell, you ain’t no Texan, period.”

“No problem. I can just go pro hac vice.”

“I hope that isn’t some kind of sexual act,” Leonard said. “Especially if it involves me and you.”

"It just means I get admitted to the bar for one case. For the specific litigation. I'll need local counsel to handle the pleadings, of course. . . ."

"Do I look like a goddamned pleader to you? And you best not say yes."

"'Pleadings' just means the papers," Veil said, his voice a model of patience. "Motions, applications . . . stuff like that. You wanted to cop a plea to this, Hap wouldn't need me. I don't do that kind of thing. And by the way, I'm doing this for Hap, not you."

"What is it makes you so special to Hap?" Leonard asked, studying Veil's face carefully. "What is it that you do do?"

"Fight," Veil said.

"Yeah," I said. "He can do that."

"Yeah, so can you and me, but that and a rubber will get us a jack-off without mess." Leonard sighed. He said to Veil, "You know what my problem is?"

"Besides attitude, sure. Says so right on the indictment. You burned down a crack house. For at least the . . . what was it, fourth time? That's first-degree arson, malicious destruction of property, attempted murder—"

"I didn't—"

"What? Know anyone was home when you firebombed the dump? Doesn't matter—the charge is still valid."

"Yeah, well they can valid this," Leonard said, making a gesture appropriate to his speech.

"You're looking at a flat dime down in Huntsville," Veil told him. "That a good enough summary of your 'problem?'"

"No, it ain't close," Leonard said. "Here's my problem. You come in here wearing a few thousand bucks of fancy stuff, tell me you're a fighter, but your face looks like you lost a lot more fights than you won. You don't know jack about Texas law, but you're gonna work a local jury. And that's still not my big problem. You know what my big problem is?"

"I figure you're going to tell me sometime before visiting hours are over," Veil said.

"My problem is this: Why the hell should I trust you?"

"I trust him," I said.

"I know, brother. And I trust you. What I don't trust, on the other hand, is your judgment. The two ain't necessarily the same thing."

"Try this, then." Veil told him. "Homicide. A murder. And nobody's said a word about it. For almost twenty years."

"You telling me you and Hap—?"

"I'm telling you there was a homicide. No statute of limitations on that, right? It's still unsolved. And nobody's talking."

"I don't know. Me and Hap been tight a long time. He'd tell me something like that. I mean, he dropped the rock on someone, I'd know." Leonard turned to me. "Wouldn't I?"

I didn't say anything. Veil was doing the talking.

Veil leaned in close, dropping his voice. "It wasn't Hap who did it. But Hap knows all about it. And you, if keep your mouth shut long enough, you will too. Then you can decide who to trust. Deal?"

Leonard gave Veil a long, deep look. "Deal," he finally said, leaning back, waiting to hear the story.

Veil turned and looked at me, and I knew that was my cue to tell it.

2.

“It was back in my semi-hippie days,” I said to Leonard. “Remember when I was all about peace and love?”

“The only ‘piece’ I ever knew you to be about was a piece of ass,” Leonard said kindly. “I always thought you had that long hair so’s it could help you get into fights.”

“Just tell him the fucking story,” Veil said. “Okay? I’ve got work to do, and I can’t do it without Leonard. You two keep screwing around and the guard’s going to roll on back here and—”

“It was in this house on the coast,” I said. “In Oregon. I was living with some folks.”

“Some of those folks being women, of course.”

“Yeah. I was experimenting with different ways of life. I told you about it. Anyway, I hadn’t been there long. This house, it wasn’t like it was a commune or nothing, but people just . . . came and went, understand? So, one day, this guy comes strolling up. Nice-looking guy. Photographer, he said he was. All loaded down with equipment in his van. He was a traveling man, just working his way around the country. Taking pictures for this book he was doing. He fit in pretty good. You know, he looked the part. Long hair, but a little neater than the rest of us. Suave manner. Took pictures a lot. Nobody really cared. He did his share of the work, kicked in a few bucks for grub. No big deal. I was a little suspicious at first. We always got photographers wanting to ‘document’ us, you know? Mostly wanted pictures of the girls. Especially Sunflower—she had this thing about clothes being ‘inhibiting’ and all. In other words, she was quick to shuck drawers and throw the hair triangle around. But this guy was real peaceful, real calm. I remember one of the guys there said this one had a calm presence. Like the eye of a hurricane."

"This is motherfucking fascinating and all," Leonard said, "but considering my particular situation, I wonder if you couldn't, you know, get to the point?"

Seeing as how Leonard never read that part of the Good Book that talked about patience being a virtue, I sped it up a bit. "I was out in the backyard one night," I said. "Meditating."

"Masturbating, you mean," Leonard said.

"I was just getting to that stage with the martial arts and I didn't want any of the damn marijuana smoke getting in my eyes. I guess I was more conservative about that sort of thing than I realized. It made me nervous just being around it. So I needed some privacy. I wasn't doing the classic meditation thing. Just being alone with my thoughts, trying to find my center."

"Which you never have," Leonard said.

"I'm sitting there, thinking about whatever it was I was thinking about—"

"Pussy," Leonard said.

"And I open my eyes and there he is. Veil."

"That'd be some scary shit," Leonard said.

"Looked about the same he does now."

"Yeah? Was he wearing that Armani suit?"

"Matter a fact, he wasn't," I said. "He looked like everyone else did around there then. Only difference was the pistol."

"I can see how that got your attention," Leonard said.

"It was dark. And I'm no modern firearms expert. But it wasn't the stuff I grew up with, hunting rifles, shotguns, and revolvers. This was a seriously big-ass gun, I can tell you that. I couldn't tell if he was pointing it at me or not. Finally I decided he was just kind of . . . holding it. I asked him—politely, I might add—if there was anything I could do for him, short of volunteering to be shot, and he said, yeah, matter of fact, there was. What he wanted was some information about this photographer guy.

"Now hippie types weren't all that different from cons back then, at least when it came to giving out information to the cops. Cops had a way of thinking you had long hair, you had to be something from Mars out to destroy Mom, apple pie, and the American way."

"Does that mean Texas too?" Leonard asked.

"I believe it did, yes."

"Well, I can see their point. And the apple pie part."

"I could tell this guy was no cop. And he wasn't asking me for evidence-type stuff anyway. Just when the guy had showed up, stuff like that."

Leonard yawned. Sometimes he can be a very crude individual. Veil looked like he always does. Calm.

"Anyway, I started to say I didn't know the guy, then . . . I don't know. There was something about his manner that made me trust him."

"Thank you," Veil said. I wasn't sure if he was being sarcastic or not.

I nodded. "I told him the truth. It wasn't any big deal. Like I said, he wasn't asking anything weird, but I was a little worried. I mean, you know, the gun and all. Then I got stupid and—"

"Oh, that's when it happened?" Leonard asked. "That's like the moment it set in?"

I maintained patience—which is what Leonard is always complaining he has to do with me—and went on like he hadn't said a word: “—asked him how come he wanted to know all about this guy, and maybe I ought not to be saying anything, and how he ought to take his pistol and go on. I didn’t want any trouble, and no one at the place did either.

“So Veil asks the big question: Where is the guy right now? I told him he was out somewhere. Or maybe gone, for all I knew. That’s the way things were then. People came and went like cats and you didn’t tend to get uptight about it. It was the times.”

“Groovy,” Leonard said.

“We talk for a while, but, truth was, I didn’t know anything about the guy, so I really got nothing to say of importance. But, you know, I’m thinking it isn’t every day you see a guy looks like Veil walking around with a gun almost the size of my dick.”

“Jesus,” Leonard said. “Can’t ever get away from your dick.”

“No, it tends to stay with me.”

“How about staying with the story,” Veil said, still calm but with an edge to his voice now.

“So I ask Veil, it’s okay with him, I’m going back in the house and get some sleep, and like maybe could he put the gun up ’cause it’s making me nervous. I know I mentioned that gun several times. I’m trying to kind of glide out of there because I figure a guy with a gun has more on his mind than just small talk. I thought he might even be a druggie, though he didn’t look like one. Veil here, he says no problem. But I see he’s not going anywhere, so I don’t move. Somehow, the idea of getting my back to that gun doesn’t appeal to me, and we’re kind of close, and I’m thinking he gets a little closer, I got a small chance of taking the gun away from him. Anyway, we both stick. Studying each other, I think. Neither of us going anywhere.”

“Neither the fuck am I,” Leonard said. “Matter of fact, I think moss is starting to grow on the north side of my ass.”

“All right, partner,” I told him, “here’s the finale. I decide to not go in the house, just sit out there with Veil. We talk a bit about this and that, anything but guns, and we’re quiet a bit. Gets to be real late, I don’t know, maybe four in the morning, and we both hear a motor. Something pulling into the driveway. Then we hear a car door close. Another minute or so, the front door to the house closes too. Veil, without a word to me, gets up and walks around to the drive. I follow him. Even then I think I’m some kind of mediator. That whatever’s going on, maybe I can fix it. I was hell for fixing people’s problems then.”

“You’re still hell for that,” Leonard said.

“Sure enough, there’s the guy’s van. I’m starting to finally snap that Veil hasn’t just showed up for an assassination. He’s investigating, and, well, I don’t know how, but I’m just sort of falling in with him. In spite of his sweet personality, there’s something about me and him that clicked.”

“I adore a love story,” Leonard said.

“So anyway, I wasn’t exactly shocked when Veil put the pistol away, stuck a little flashlight in his teeth, worked the locks on the guy’s van like he had a key. We both climbed in, being real quiet. In the back, under a pile of equipment, we found the . . . pictures.”

“Guy was a blackmailer?” Leonard asked, a little interested now.

“They were pictures of kids,” I told him. Quiet, so’s he’d know what kind of pictures I meant.

Leonard’s face changed. I knew then he was thinking about what kind of pictures they were and not liking having to think about it.

“I’d never seen anything like that before and didn’t know that sort of thing existed. Oh, I guess, in theory, but not in reality. And the times then, lot of folks were thinking free love and sex was okay for anyone, grown-ups, kids. People who didn’t really know anything about life and what this sort of thing was all about, but one look at those pictures and I was educated, and it was an education I didn’t want. I’ve never got over it.

“So he,” I said, nodding my head over at Veil, “asks me, where does the guy with the van sleep? Where inside the house, I mean. I tried to explain to him what a crash pad was. I couldn’t be sure where he was, or even who he might be with, you understand? Anyway, Veil just looks at me, says it would be a real mess if they found this guy in the house. A mess for us, you know? So he asks me, how about if I go inside, tell the guy it looks like someone tried to break into his van?

“I won’t kid you. I hesitated. Not because I felt any sympathy for that sonofabitch, but because it’s not my nature to walk someone off a plank. I was trying to sort of think my way out of it when Veil here told me to take a look at the pictures again. A good look.”

“The guy’s toast,” Leonard said. “Fucker like that, he’s toast. I know you, Hap. He’s toast.”

I nodded at Leonard. “Yeah,” I said. “I went inside. Brought the guy out with me. He opens the door to the van, climbs in the front seat. And there’s Veil, in the passenger seat. Veil and that pistol. I went back in the house, watched from the window. I heard the van start up, saw it pull out. I never saw the photographer again. And to tell you the truth, I’ve never lost a minute’s sleep over it. I don’t know what that says about me, but I haven’t felt a moment of regret.”

“It says you have good character,” Veil said.

“What I want to know,” Leonard said looking at Veil, “is what did you do with the body?”

Veil didn’t say anything.

Leonard tried again. “You was a hit man? Is that what Hap here’s trying to tell me?”

“It was a long time ago,” Veil told him. “It doesn’t matter, does it? What matters is: You want to talk to me now?”

3.

The judge looked like nothing so much as a turkey buzzard: tiny head on a long, wrinkled neck and cold, little eyes. Everybody stood up when he entered the courtroom. Lester Rommerly—the local lawyer I went and hired like Veil told me—he told the judge that Veil would be representing Leonard. The judge looked down at Veil.

“Where are you admitted to practice, sir?”

“In New York State, your honor. And in the Federal District Courts of New York, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Michigan, California, and Massachusetts.”

“Get around a bit, do you?”

“On occasion,” Veil replied.

“Well sir, you can represent this defendant here. Nothing against the law about that, as you apparently know. I can’t help wondering, I must say, how you managed to find yourself way down here.”

Veil didn’t say anything. And it was obvious after a minute that he wasn't going to. He and the judge just kind of watched each other.

Then the trial started.

The first few witnesses were all government. The fire department guy testified about "the presence of an accelerant" being the tip-off that this was arson, not some accidental fire. Veil got up slowly, started to walk over to the witness box, then stopped. His voice was low, but it carried right through the courtroom.

"Officer, you have any experience with alcoholics?"

"Objection!" The DA shouted.

"Sustained," the judge said, not even looking at Veil.

"Officer," Veil went on like nothing had happened, "you have any experience with dope fiends?"

"Objection!" The DA was on his feet, red-faced.

"Counsel, you are to desist from this line of questioning," the judge said. "The witness is a fireman, not a psychologist."

"Oh, excuse me, your honor," Veil said sweetly. "I misphrased my inquiry. Let me try again: Officer," he said, turning his attention back to the witness, "by 'accelerant,' you mean something like gasoline or kerosene, isn't that correct?"

"Yes," the witness said, cautious in spite of Veil's mild tone.

"Hmmm," Veil said. "Be pretty stupid to keep a can of gasoline right in the house, wouldn't it?"

"Your honor. . . ," the DA pleaded.

"Well, I believe he can answer that one," the judge said.

"Yeah, it would," the fire marshal said. "But some folks keep kerosene inside. You know, for heating and all."

"Thank you, officer," Veil said, like the witness had just given him this great gift. "And it'd be even stupider to smoke cigarettes in the same house where you kept gasoline . . . or kerosene, wouldn't it?"

"Well, sure. I mean, if—"

"Objection!" The DA yelled. "There is no evidence to show that anyone was smoking cigarettes in the house!"

"Ah, my apologies," Veil said, bowing slightly. "Please consider the question withdrawn. Officer: Be pretty stupid to smoke crack in a house with gasoline or kerosene in it, right?"

"Your honor!" The DA cut in. "This is nothing but trickery. This man is trying to tell the jury there was gasoline in the house. And this officer has clearly testified that—"

"—That there was either gasoline or kerosene in the house at the time the fire started," Veil interrupted.

"Not in a damn can," the DA said again.

"Your honor," Veil said, his voice the soul of reasonableness, "the witness testified that he found a charred can of gasoline in the house. Now it was his expert opinion that someone had poured gasoline all over the floor and the walls and then dropped a match. I am merely inquiring if there couldn't be some other way the fire had started."

The judge, obviously irritated, said, "Then why don't you just ask him that?"

"Well, Judge, I kind of was doing that. I mean, if one of the crackheads living there had maybe fallen asleep after he got high, you know, nodded out the way they do . . . and the crack pipe fell to the ground, and there was a can of kerosene lying around and—"

"That is enough!" the judge cut in. "You are well aware, sir, that when the fire trucks arrived, the house was empty."

"But the trucks weren't there when the fire started, judge.

Maybe the dope fiend felt the flames and ran for his life. I don't know. I wasn't there. And I thought the jury—"

"The jury will disregard your entire line of questioning, sir. And unless you have another line of questioning for this witness, he is excused."

Veil bowed.

4.

At the lunch break, I asked him, "What the hell are you doing? Leonard already told the police it was him who burned down the crack house."

"Sure. You just said the magic word: crack house. I want to make sure the jury hears that enough times, that's all."

"You think they're gonna let him off just because—?"

"We're just getting started," Veil told me.

5.

"Now officer, prior to placing the defendant under arrest, did you issue the appropriate Miranda warnings?" the DA asked the sheriff 's deputy.

"Yes sir, I did."

"And did the defendant agree to speak with you?"

"Well . . . he didn't exactly 'agree.' I mean, this ain't the first time for old Leonard there. We knowed it was him, living right across the road and all. So when we went over there to arrest him, he was just sitting on the porch."

"But he did tell you that he was responsible for the arson, isn't that correct, officer?"

"Oh yeah. Leonard said he burned it down. Said he'd do it again if those—well, I don't want to use the language he used here—he'd just burn it down again."

"No further questions," the DA said, turning away in triumph.

"Did the defendant resist arrest?" Veil asked on cross-examination.

"Not at all," the deputy said. "Matter of fact, you could see he was waiting on us."

"But if he wanted to resist arrest, he could have, couldn't he?"

"I don't get your meaning," the deputy said.

"The man means I could kick your ass without breaking a sweat," Leonard volunteered from the defendant's table.

The judge pounded his gavel a few times. Leonard shrugged, like he'd just been trying to be helpful.

"Deputy, were you familiar with the location of the fire? You had been there before? In your professional capacity, I mean." Veil asked him.

"Sure enough," the deputy answered.

"Fair to say the place was a crack house?" Veil asked.

"No question about that. We probably made a couple of dozen arrests there during the past year alone."

"You made any since the house burned down?"

"You mean . . . at that same address? Of course not."

"Thank you, officer," Veil said.

6.

"Doctor, you were on duty on the night of the thirteenth, is that correct?”

“That is correct,” the doctor said, eyeing Veil like a man waiting for the doctor to grease up and begin his proctology exam.

“And your specialty is Emergency Medicine, is that also correct?”

“It is.”

“And when you say ‘on duty,’ you mean you’re in the ER, right?”

“Yes sir.”

“In fact, you’re in charge of the ER, aren’t you?”

“I am the physician in charge, if that is what you’re asking me, sir. I have nothing to do with administration, so . . .”

“I understand,” Veil said in a voice sweet as a preacher explaining scripture. “Now, doctor, have you ever treated patients with burns?”

“Of course,” the doctor snapped at him.

“And those range, don’t they? I mean, from first-degree to third-degree burns. Which are the worst?”

“Third degree.”

“Hmmm . . . I wonder if that’s where they got the term, ‘Give him the third degree’. . . ?”

“Your Honor. . . ,” the DA protested again.

“Mr. Veil, where are you going with this?” the judge asked.

“To the heart of the truth, your honor. And if you’ll permit me . . .”

The judge waved a disgusted hand in Veil’s direction. Veil kind of waved back. The big diamond glinted on his hand, catching the sun’s rays through the high courthouse windows. “Doctor, you treat anybody with third-degree burns the night of the thirteenth?”

"I did not."

"Second-degree burns?"

"No."

"Even first-degree burns?"

"You know quite well I did not, sir. This isn't the first time you have asked me these questions."

"Sure, I know the answers. But you're telling the jury, doctor, not me. Now you've seen the photographs of the house that was burnt to the ground. Could anyone have been inside that house and not been burned?"

"I don't see how," the doctor snapped. "But that doesn't mean —"

"Let's let the jury decide what it means," Veil cut him off. "Am I right, Judge?"

The judge knew when he was being jerked off, but, having told Veil those exact same words a couple of dozen times during the trial already, he was smart enough to keep his lipless mouth shut.

"All right, doctor. Now we're coming to the heart of your testimony. See, the reason we have expert testimony is that experts, well, they know stuff the average person doesn't. And they get to explain it to us so we can understand things that happen."

"Your honor, he's making a speech!" the DA complained, for maybe the two-hundredth time.

But Veil rolled on like he hadn't heard a word. "Doctor, can you explain what causes the plague?"

One of the elderly ladies on the jury gasped when Veil said "the plague," but the doctor went right on: "Well, actually, it is caused by fleas, which are the primary carriers."

"Fleas? And here all along I thought it was carried by rats," Veil replied, turning to the jury as if embracing them all in his viewpoint.

“Yes, fleas,” the doctor said. “They are, in fact, fleas especially common to rodents, but wild rodents—prairie dogs, chipmunks, and the like.”

“Not squirrels?”

“Only ground squirrels,” the doctor answered.

“So, in other words, you mean varmints, right, doctor?”

“I do.”

“The kind of varmints folks go shooting just for sport?”

“Well, some do. But mostly it’s farmers who kill them. And that’s not for sport—that’s to protect their crops,” the doctor said, self-righteously, looking to the jury for support.

“Uh, isn’t it true, doctor, that if you kill enough varmints, the fleas just jump over to rats?”

“Well, that’s true. . . .”

“That’s what happened a long time ago, wasn’t it, doctor? The Black Death in Europe—that was bubonic plague, right? Caused by rats with these fleas you talked about? And it killed, what? Twenty-five million people?”

“Yes. That’s true. But today, we have certain antibiotics that can —”

“Sure. But plague is still a danger, isn’t it? I mean, if it got loose, it could still kill a whole bunch of innocent folks, right?”

“Yes, that is true.”

“Doctor, just a couple of more questions and we’ll be done. Before there were these special antibiotics, how did folks deal with rat infestation? You know, to protect themselves against plague? What would they do if there was a bunch of these rats in a house?”

“Burn it down,” the doctor said. “Fire is the only—”

“Objection! Relevancy!” the DA shouted.

“Approach the bench,” the judge roared.

Veil didn’t move. “Judge, is he saying that crack isn’t a plague? Because it’s my belief—and I know others share it—that the Lord is testing us with this new plague. It’s killing our children, your honor. And it’s sweeping across the—”

“That is enough!” the judge shrieked at Veil. “One more word from you, sir, and you will be joining your client in jail tonight.”

“You want me to defend Leonard using sign language?” Veil asked.

A number of folks laughed.

The judge cracked his gavel a few times and, when he was done, they took Veil out in handcuffs.

7.

When I went to visit that night, I was able to talk to both of them. Someone had brought a chess board and pieces in and they were playing. “You’re crazy,” I told Veil.

“Like a fuckin’ fox,” Leonard said. “My man here is right on the money. I mean, he gets it. Check.”

“You moved a piece off the board,” Veil said.

“Did not.”

“Yeah, you did.”

“Damn,” Leonard said, pulling the piece out from between his legs and returning it to the board. “For a man with one eye you see a lot. Still check though.”

I shook my head. “Sure. Veil gets it. You, you’re gonna get life by the time he's done," I said.

"Everything'll be fine," Veil said, studying the chess board. "We can always go to Plan B."

"And what's Plan B?" I asked him.

He and Leonard exchanged looks.

8.

"The defense of what?" the judge yelled at Veil the next morning.

"The defense of necessity, your honor. It's right here, in Texas law. In fact, the case of Texas v. Whitehouse is directly on point. A man was charged with stealing water from his neighbor by constructing a siphon system. And he did it, all right. But it was during a drought, and if he hadn't done it, his cattle would've starved. So he had to pay for the water he took, and that was fair, but he didn't have to go to prison."

"And it is your position that your client had to burn down the crack . . . I mean, the occupied dwelling across the street from his house to prevent the spread of disease?"

"Exactly, your honor. Like the bubonic plague."

"Well, you're not going to argue that nonsense in my court. Go ahead and take your appeal. By the time the court even hears it, your client'll have been locked down for a good seven-eight years. That'll hold him."

9.

Veil faced the jury, his face grim and set. He walked back and forth in front of them for a few minutes, as if getting the feel of the ground. Then he spun around and looked them in the eyes, one by one.

“You think the police can protect you from the plague? From the invasion? No, I’m not talking about aliens, or UFOs, or AIDS, now—I’m talking crack. And it’s here, folks. Right here. You think it can’t happen in your town? You think it’s only Dallas and Houston where they grow those sort of folks? Take a look around. Even in this little town, you all lock your doors at night now, don’t you? And you’ve had shootings right at the high school, haven’t you? You see the churches as full as they used to be? No you don’t. Because things are changing, people. The plague is coming, just like the Good Book says. Only it’s not locusts, it’s that crack cocaine. It’s a plague, all right. And it’s carried by rats, just like always. And, like we learned, there isn’t but one way to turn that tide. Fire!

“Now I’m not saying my client set that fire. In fact, I’m asking you to find that he did not set that fire. I’m asking you to turn this good citizen, this man who cared about his community, loose. So he can be with you. That’s where he belongs. He stood with you . . . now it’s time for you to stand with him.”

Veil sat down, exhausted like he’d just gone ten rounds with a rough opponent. But, the way they do trials, it’s always the prosecutor who gets to throw the last punch.

And that chubby little bastard of a DA gave it his best shot, going on and on about how two wrongs don’t make a right. But you could see him slip a few times. He’d make this snide reference to Leonard being black, or being gay, or just being . . . Leonard, I guess, and, of course that part is kind of understandable. But, exactly like Veil predicted, every time he did it, there was at least one member of the jury who didn’t like it. Sure, it’s easy to play on people's prejudices—and we got no shortage of those down this way, I know—but if there wasn't more good folks than bad, well, the Klan would've been running the state a long time ago.

The judge told the jury what the law was and told them to go out there and come back when they were done. Everybody got up to go to lunch, but Veil didn't move. He motioned me over.

"This is going to be over with real quick, Hap," he said. "One way or the other."

"What if it's the other?"

"Plan B," he said, his face flat as a piece of slate.

10.

The jury was out about an hour. The foreman stood up and said "Not Guilty" about two dozen times—once for every crime they had charged Leonard with.

I was hugging Leonard when Veil tapped me on the shoulder. "Leonard," he said, "you need to go over there and thank those jury people. One at a time. Sin*cere*, you understand?"

"What for?" Leonard asked.

"Because this is going to happen again," Veil said. "And maybe next time, one of the rats'll get burned."

Knowing Leonard, I couldn't argue with that. He walked over to the jury and I turned around to say something to Veil. But he was gone.

Death by Chili

"Well, I can almost see murdering someone for a good chili recipe," Charlie Blank said, "but not quite."

"What if it had been barbecue?" Leonard asked.

"Now, that's different."

"Ah, hah!" I said. "That's because you're prejudiced. You think barbecue is The Texas food, when any idiot knows it's chili."

"Only if you can't get barbecue," Charlie said.

"One thing is for sure," I said. "Goober Smith's recipe for chili isn't going to grace anyone's dinner table from here on out. Other than the person killed him for it, that is."

It was a cold, rainy afternoon, dark as night, and we were sitting around Leonard's dining room table drinking coffee and eating vanilla cookies, which Leonard thinks are some kind of food of the gods, but they're just these plain ole vanilla things that you can eat about twenty-three zillion of and not realize you've eaten anything till you get on the scale. Even if you don't like 'em much, you tend to eat 'em.

Anyway, we were sitting at the table and Charlie was telling us about Goober Smith. It was a story we'd all heard before, but not the details. Charlie, who's a lieutenant on the police force, got the story from someone at the cop shop, someone who had been around in 1978 when Goober got his head blown open and went face down in a bowl of chili.

“Whoever it was came up behind him and let the boom drop,” Charlie said. “Killed him deader than the five-cent candy bar, then snuck off with his chili recipe. That recipe used to win all the chili cook-offs around these parts.”

“What I wonder is what this person did with the recipe,” I said. “If they were stealing it to win cook-offs, it never surfaced. Right?”

“Goober’s chili was supposed to be as distinctive as a chicken with dentures. No one could use it if they stole it. Unless they were at home.”

“Must have been some really fine chili,” Leonard said.

“Jack Mays thought it was the best,” Charlie said.

“That the cop told you about this?” I asked.

“Yep. He used to go around to cook-offs all over East Texas tryin’ to see if he could get a taste and figure who killed Goober. Solving the murder was kind of an obsession with him. Everyone else had given up. Course, Jack’s retired now.”

“Now you’re on it,” I said.

“I tinker with it now and then,” Charlie said.

“And how are you tinkering?”

“Not so good. I’ve looked at it from every angle possible. Why would someone come into Goober’s place at night, catch him at the table, shoot him in the back of the head with a Luger, and steal his recipe?”

“What I’d like to know,” Leonard said, dunking a cookie, “is how anyone knows his recipe was stolen. He could have had it in his head.”

"Nope," Charlie said. "He was adamant about the fact he kept it under lock and key in his wall safe, and the safe was cracked open and money was still in it. Only thing seems to have been missing was the recipe. Least ways, no one ever found it."

"Seemed to be missing," Leonard said. "But you don't know for sure. Right?"

"I guess so," Charlie said. "Well, it's all chili through the intestines now, isn't it?"

"Wasn't the final official word it was suicide?" I asked.

Charlie nodded. "He was found sitting at the kitchen table, nude. The Luger was on the floor by the chair, and his brains were all over the place, and he was facedown in an empty bowl that had contained chili. There was a pot of it on the stove."

"What made Jack think it wasn't suicide?" I asked.

"Funny stuff. The bullet had gone out the top of Goober's head, hit the ceiling. The casing from the Luger was on the floor behind him, and there was powder residue on his hand. No note."

"Sounds like suicide to me," Leonard said.

"Problem was, a Luger ejects its shell forward. You put the barrel to your head, the shell casing would have been thrown forward onto the table or the floor. That wasn't the case."

"Could have rolled," I said.

"Floor behind Goober was raised, a living area. It couldn't have rolled uphill. And the lead in the ceiling. Had Goober put the gun to his head, even if he'd slanted it, doesn't seem likely it would have gone into the ceiling at that angle. It could have, I guess, but it doesn't seem likely. Someone else could hold it at that angle more comfortable. It's difficult to do it yourself and get those results. Add to it the safe was open and the money was there but there was no chili recipe, and you got a mystery."

"Did Goober have reason to commit suicide?" Leonard asked.

"He was sick," Charlie said. "Rumor was it was a bad disease of some kind, but what it looks like is someone came up behind him, shot him with the Luger, wrapped his hand around the gun, and let it fall so it would look like suicide. Then they stole the recipe."

"The safe blown open?" Leonard asked.

"No. But that doesn't mean it wasn't cracked by someone knew how. Or someone had the combination. An old girlfriend was one of the suspects, but nothing ever came of that. Actually, I still have my eye on her."

"The Luger belong to Goober?" Leonard asked.

"No one knows. Wasn't registered. A war souvenir. Goober's dad had been in World War II, so it's possible it had been passed down, but if it was, that doesn't mean Goober shot himself with it. Someone could have used it on him."

"My uncle had a Luger like that," Leonard said. "A World War II souvenir. I have it now."

"Hey, I got to go, boys."

Charlie put on his coat and I walked him to the door. It was very cold out there. Good chili weather. Charlie and I shook hands, and he drove off in the rain.

When I came back inside, Leonard was pouring us fresh cups of coffee.

"That recipe thing, that is kind of weird," he said. "A real-life mystery."

"For what it's worth," I said.

"I've heard about Goober Smith all my life," Leonard said. "And the stuff about his chili and his murder and the missing recipe, but I never thought there was anything to it until Charlie gave us the skinny."

"Want to watch a movie tonight? I see She Creature is coming on. We could pop some popcorn, get some Sharp's."

Leonard seemed distant, but he said, "Sure."

We popped popcorn and watched the movie, but Leonard didn't really seem into it. He had a kind of glassy stare through it all.

I was making out with this marvelous raven-haired beauty, and she was just about to expose her breasts when she grabbed me by the arm and shook me like I was in a paint shaker.

I came awake to Leonard standing by the couch where I slept.

"Hap," he said, shaking me, "I solved the mystery."

"What mystery?"

"Get up."

"You're kidding. I was dreaming of and just about to make love to a black-haired beauty."

"She'll wait."

I pushed the covers down and sat on the edge of the couch. I felt like I had been plowed into the ground for fertilizer. Outside the rain hammered the house like a drum solo.

Leonard turned on the light. He brought a chair to the front of the couch and sat down on it. He was holding a Luger.

"This is my uncle's Luger," Leonard said.

"That's nice. Right now I'd like to shoot you with it."

Leonard held it in front of him. "I'm going to eject a shell."

"How nice."

He did. It flew up and over my head. "That was great, Leonard.

Now let's go back to bed."

"Forward, just like Charlie said." Leonard put the Luger in his lap. "But if this is the Luger." He made a gun with his thumb and finger. "And I put it to my head, it wouldn't fire in such a way as to shoot a bullet into the ceiling."

"Which is what Charlie said."

"Right. But, think about this. Goober was naked, as suicides often are. He knows he's dying, or is going to be terribly ill, so he decides to kill himself. You try and hold the Luger in the normal way, it isn't comfortable. I mean, you hold it just right it could fire through the head and ceiling, but like I said, it's not a comfortable way to hold it."

"I don't think comfort was on his mind."

"So he holds it this way, which is really more natural."

Leonard put his finger to his head, thumb down. "Think about it."

I did. I was starting to get interested.

"So, when he pulls the trigger, he gets powder burns on his hand, and upside down, it would eject the shell casing backwards, behind Goober."

"What about the way the bullet went into the ceiling?"

"Well, if it's flat against the head, it won't go into the ceiling at all. It could be slanted, held either way, but it's very comfortable holding it upside down, and easier to give it a slant, and therefore easier to fire through the skull and into the ceiling."

"As I said, I doubt Goober was all that worried about comfort right then."

"Okay. But the rest of it adds up pretty good, doesn't it?"

I thought about that for a moment. "That's all well and good," I said, “but that still doesn’t explain the open safe, the missing recipe.”

“I think it does,” Leonard said. “Goober was secretive about his recipe to the point of phobia. So, when he decided to commit suicide it was the one thing he wanted to take with him.”

“But it wasn’t found.”

“Because he ate it.”

“You mean he put it in the chili?”

“That’s what I think. He made up a last batch, tore up the recipe like seasoning, put it in the chili. Had himself a big bowl, then blew his brains out. That way, no one would ever have his recipe. That’s why nothing else was taken from the safe. Simple really. Charlie and Jack are all wet. It wasn’t murder. The first impression was correct. Goober really did kill himself.”

“You know what, Leonard? I think you’re right for a change.”

“Good, now I can go to sleep.”

“Course, it’s all just guess work and will probably never be proven one way or another.”

“I’m satisfied,” Leonard said.

“You going to tell Charlie?”

“Sure. Tomorrow. I want him to know how smart I am.”

Leonard turned off the light, went into the bedroom, and closed the door. I stretched out on the couch and pulled the covers over me. I looked at the ceiling a while.

Sonofagun, I thought. He probably did figure it out.

The rain hammered on the house. Lightning flashed through the curtains over the living room window.

I closed my eyes, hoping the raven-haired beauty would be back.

Lansdale Chili

First, you cook a lot of hamburger meat. I'm not sure how much is a lot, but you know, a lot. Anyway, you brown it, drain off the grease and put it in a pot. Now cut some steak into strips and brown it, cut this up in chunks and put it in the pot. Add a couple cups of water and six to twelve ounces of tomato paste. Put in two teaspoon's of sugar, four teaspoon's of chili powder, and ten cut up juicy jalopena peppers. Stir and add more water, be your own judge, but don't make it too watery.

Now, a dash of cayenne pepper, a dash of tobasco sauce, a teaspoon of garlic or some real chunks of garlic, add one tablespoon of olive oil—that's so it won't all clog up like a brick inside you.

Cut up two to three medium ripe tomatoes and toss this into the mix. Slice up a small onion and add it. Half a teaspoon of oregano. A tablespoon or two of black pepper and a half cup of ketchup.

Let this simmer for a damn long time, adding water when needed, but don't add too much. Keep it thick. If it looks a little watery, then add more ingredients. It's better at this point to add a cat or a parakeet than it is to add too much water.

After a few hours take a Pepcid and have chili.

If it doesn't taste quite right, you probably followed the recipe too closely or didn't take enough Pepcid. Throw it back into the pot, add some more of everything but water, and try again.

If your chili comes out of the pan in wads, then maybe you do need to add some water.

Each time out, I assume that a job we’re hired to do will be exactly what we think it’s going to be, and frankly, some are. I don’t talk about those much because they’re boring. And for a long time I didn’t think of myself as a freelance troubleshooter, but instead, a guy looking for work to tide me over until I got my career going, whatever that might be. Then Leonard explained to me that I was actually practicing my profession, and that I was good enough at it and it was really what I wanted to do. That all that stuff about finishing out a degree at my age and becoming a teacher, or some such thing, was just so much talk.

After a short nervous breakdown, and a period of finding my center, as they say in martial arts, I got back on the horse, and now I’m riding, in the dark. But I’m at least on the horse and not being dragged around by it. I realized that Leonard was right. I also realized that like it or not, at the bottom of it all, I was a sometime killer.

When Leonard and I accepted a simple protection job, or what seemed simple, I was hoping, as always, that we'd just get it done and go home and Marvin would give us a check that didn't bounce, and we'd be as happy as a stud horse in a corral full of fillies.

A guy named Jim Bob Luke recommended Marvin's agency for the job. It's not exactly a legit job, which is frequently the case. The problem was a lady who had known Jim Bob Luke asked him to help her out. She had an ex-husband who was stalking her, and had actually threatened her, but she couldn't prove it. It was her word against his. Jim Bob was going to be busy and couldn't drive to LaBorde to help out, so he put us onto it.

Me and Leonard drove over to see the lady. She was offering us good money to split between us and the agency. What she wanted us to do, as she put it, was meet up with her husband and have a discussion with him. The way she said it, it sounded like we were just going to set a date at a restaurant and have tea. Of course, that's not what she meant at all.

It was early afternoon in September and some of the hot had gone out of the day. Midday it could get pretty warm in East Texas, but not like a month or so earlier when you could fry an egg on the sidewalk, and going barefoot on cement was like walking across a pancake griddle. It was a pleasant change. Cooler weather was in the offing.

Me and Leonard were the kind of guys that never took anything at face value, or at least we liked to think of ourselves that way. So we thought we'd go over and talk to our client, Mrs. Devon, soon to be the ex-Mrs. Devon, and see if we thought her complaints were legit, or if she was just looking to have someone beat the shit out of her husband for vengeance and entertainment.

From the mouth of the street she lived on, across the way, we could see a new apartment complex, and not far from that was a long street full of fast food joints and doctor's offices and the like. Along the street where she lived, there were a few houses still clinging to the past, like ancient souls waiting silently for death, or hoping for a last visit from somebody before they were knocked down flat and carried out.

Next to those were marginally better houses, prefab style, the sort of thing where a shell of a house could be put up in the weekend, and two weeks later plumbing and water would be ready. All that was needed then was furniture, kids to yell at, and a dog to crap on the lawn, which at least for a few months would be a patch of bulldozed red clay.

Mrs. Devon's house was back from the street a bit. There were hedges on either side of her driveway, and they were well-trimmed but a little anemic. In the open garage there was a blue Cadillac that had aged well, and a closed-up barbecue grill pushed up against the wall with a sack of charcoal bricks stacked on top.

We parked behind the Cadillac and got out.

When the door was answered it was by a lady about six feet tall with black hair and a nice shape. She must have been about forty, and you could tell it if you looked real hard, but it was a nice forty, and the body seemed to belong to someone about twenty-five; she obviously had a gym membership, a trainer, and a special diet. She smiled and showed us that she had nice teeth. Her face was nice too. Her eyes were as green as Ireland. When she moved, something primal inside me moved.

After she confirmed we were who she was expecting, we came in and sat down on an elderly but comfortable couch. She asked us if we'd like a drink, and we ended up with ice tea.

“Jim Bob told me you could help me,” she said.

“Probably,” I said. “I mean, we have to check things out.”

“In case I’m lying and just want you to beat up my husband?”

“That would be it,” Leonard said.

“He hasn’t been all that clever about it,” she said. “I don’t think he’s trying to sneak, it’s just that no one has really seen him do anything, or will admit to it. No one but me. I really don’t want him arrested. I just want him to stop. The divorce is going to go through, and I don’t think he cares about that. He doesn’t love me, and I don’t love him. He just doesn’t like losing me. He wouldn’t have minded dumping me. But I dumped him first. That sort of got his panties in a twist.”

“When was the last time you saw him?” Leonard asked.

“A few days ago. I had a gentleman over.”

“Someone you’re dating?” I asked.

“Someone I had one date with. Henry showed up and beat up my date. Bad.”

“So there’s your proof,” I said. “Have your date press charges.”

She shook her head. “No. My date wasn’t willing to turn him in, because Henry threatened to kill him if he did.”

“You think he’s capable of that?” I said.

“I don’t know. I don’t think so. But my date thought so.”

“That happened here?” Leonard said.

“Yes. I had left the back door open. I didn’t think he was that dangerous. Henry, I mean. But he’s big and scary.”

“How big is he?” I asked.

“Six-five, maybe three hundred. Not a fat man. Does that scare you?”

“Hell yeah,” I said. “But it won’t stop us if we believe you.”

"All I got is my word, and no one else is talking. I thought I could give you his address and you could just check on him. Follow him around or something, see what you think. See if he shows up here. I've got so I lock all my doors and the windows too. I don't know that he's dangerous, but the beating he gave that man . . . it was quick and it was awful. I think he may have broken his ribs."

"So he comes by a lot?"

"He used to knock on the door. Now he mostly just drives by, or pulls up in the drive and sits there. By the time I call the cops, he's gone. They've talked to him, but he just says I'm lying, and I can't prove it any other way. They can't post a man twenty-four seven just on my word. And won't. That's why I've come to you."

"Give us his address," I said. "We'll check on him. One of us can stay here with you if you like."

"I have an extra bedroom so one of you can be here all the time. Jim Bob recommended you two and your boss, Mr. Hanson, very highly."

"How do you know Jim Bob?" Leonard asked.

"We dated in high school. I lived in Houston then."

"Jim Bob went to high school," Leonard said. "I thought he came out of the womb the way he is, wearing that hat and driving that old Cadillac."

"That would have been painful for his mother, don't you think?" she said.

"It would," I said. "It certainly would."

"You lock up," I said, "and we'll go get a few things we might need, like an axe handle, and we'll be back."

“An axe handle?” she said.

“Call it insurance,” Leonard said. “You want the protection, you got to allow us to protect. And discourage.”

“You won’t kill him, will you?”

“Of course not,” I said.

“Look, I really don’t want him hurt.”

“Only if he tries to hurt us,” I said.

“Why don’t one of you stay now?” she said. “Start this minute.”

“Because we have to decide if we believe you or not.”

“Oh.”

“In the meantime, lock this place up tighter than a nun’s chastity, and we’ll be right back.”

We walked out and waited for her to lock the door behind us. When we heard the lock click, we walked to the car.

In the car, backing out, I said, “What do you think?”

“Sounds legit,” Leonard said. “I think she’s scared and wants to get on with her life and wants him to know he’s not welcome.”

“If we beat the dog shit out of him, you think he’ll quit?”

“Hard to say, but I do know it works more often than you hear about. I had someone tell me, you know, you do that, they just come back. I’ve done it a few times, so have you—”

“And they didn’t come back.”

“But sometimes they do.”

“Henry sounds like he could be pretty hard-core.”

“Worrying about him being big?” Leonard asked.

“Crossed my mind.”

“What the axe handle’s for, my boy.”

“And if he turns us in for whipping his ass?”

“We were visiting a friend of a friend. That friend being Jim Bob, and she being the friend of that friend. Henry arrived. Violence broke out. Axe handles were lying about, and . . . well, you can figure from there.”

“And we just happened to be there when he showed up? With axe handles?”

“Exactly,” Leonard said. “It doesn’t have to be a true story, it just has to be our story. . . . You know, you’re getting cautious in your old age.”

“I am. I like having a nice home and Brett and a comfortable place to lay my head and put my dick.”

“Since I’m living at your house these days,” Leonard said, “I like you got a nice home and a comfortable place for me to lay my head, though I’m still in search of a place to lay my dick.”

“About that . . .”

“Yeah. I know,” Leonard said. “Like Ben Franklin said, fish and friends smell after three days.”

“No. I’m asking about you and John. The dick part, and the deeper meanings that go with it. How are things developing between you two?”

“Nothing much. We talk by phone now and again. I’m almost done with that business. I think you can only brood so long, wait on someone so long, and then you got to move on. But, I’ll move out soon enough.”

“Not what I meant,” I said. “Stay as long as you like.”

“Hell, I know that. I was joking. You can’t get rid of me.”

Brett was off on rotation from work. She was sitting at the kitchen table wearing white shorts and a big, loose, red T-shirt. Her thick red hair was tied back in a bushy ponytail. She wasn't wearing any shoes. Her toenails were painted as red as her hair. She was drinking coffee. Leonard and I went over and poured ourselves a cup from the pot.

"Well?" Brett said.

"We think she's for real," I said.

"So, how are you going to play it?" Brett said.

"Leonard is going to stay there for awhile, and I'm going to be on phone service here at the house. Later, we can swap out."

"What's she look like?"

"She wouldn't hurt anyone's feelings at a glance," I said.

"How about if they concentrated?" she said.

"No one's feelings would be hurt that way either," I said.

"Then you best just let Leonard stay there."

"You're just saying that because I'm queer," Leonard said.

"Exactly," Brett said.

"You don't trust me?" I said.

"I trust you, but I don't know her, and Little Hap likes pussy almost as much as life."

"You know better than that," I said. "Well, you're right about the pussy part and life and all that. But you know what I mean. I'm trustworthy."

"Yeah, but I'm still a little jealous."

We had our coffee, then we got a few things together for Leonard. Toothbrush and toothpaste. Deodorant. Axe handle from the closet. A small handgun. That kind of stuff.

"Be sure and not shoot anyone," I said.

"Gotcha," Leonard said, got his keys, and drove his car away. I watched from the kitchen window until he was out of sight.

"He gone?" Brett asked.

"Yep."

"Great," she said. "Let's screw like mongooses."

We screwed like mongooses and one extra beaver and a water snake, and then lay in bed and watched TV. We watched The Fugitive Kind on some movie channel. I wanted a cool jacket like Marlon Brando wore in that movie. I knew I'd never have one. Besides, I didn't have anything against reptiles, and it was supposed to be made out of them.

When the movie wrapped, another came on, and we watched part of that, but it wasn't much, and we gave it up. I had a book to read and Brett had a biography. We stacked pillows behind us and lay there nude and read. It was one of our favorite things to do, following the whole mongoose thing, which got a number-one rating.

Three hours or so later, feeling lazy, I lay down and dozed. Brett woke me, freshly showered, dressed in blue jeans and a blue top, tennis shoes on her feet.

"Baby," she said, "you're taking me out. Get up and shower."

I got up and showered, dressed, and we drove into town to a Mexican restaurant that served a good steak, better than average tacos, tamales, and the usual rice and beans, and so far no stomach poisoning. When it comes to good eats, nothing beats Mexican food, though Japanese is close. Sometimes I eat meat, I think about the poor cows, and then I think since I ate them, I might as well wear leather too. No use letting a discarded cow suit go to waste. But I wished I could just eat lettuce and tomatoes and tofu. Doesn't work for me, though. I get sick. Hypoglycemia. I think about a lot of things on a full stomach. It's easier to think about not eating something anymore when you just ate it.

When we got back to the house, Brett pulled on the big loose shirt she had been wearing earlier in the day and, as a treat to me, left off the panties. I pulled on my pajama bottoms as a treat to her, and a loose T-shirt, and climbed in bed. This was my favorite kind of day. Lazy.

I said, "You said you were jealous earlier, of Sharon Devon. You weren't serious, were you?"

"A little," she said.

"I've never known you to be jealous."

"I didn't think I was. I guess it's because I want to see this arrangement as permanent."

"I already saw it that way."

"I did too, but you know, there were doubts in the back of my mind."

"Because we're not married?"

"That was there in an old-fashioned way," she said. "But I don't think that really matters. Not really."

"But it is a braver commitment, isn't it?"

"Maybe," she said.

"Look, honey," I said. "I want to be with you. I'll keep it like it is, or I'll marry you. Whatever, baby. It's you and me."

"You once said something to me about having kids."

"I was just in a mood."

"I think you meant it."

"I did mean it. But, you pointed out what should have been obvious to me: we're a little too old."

"I'm younger than you," she said.

"Everyone thinks you're twenty years younger," I said. "And you look it. Pretty soon they'll be thinking I'm your grandpa."

"That could happen," she said. "But, just in case. I looked into fertilization drugs, you know, to see. Case I might need them."

"I wouldn't want to have a kid just because you think I want one," I said.

"I know that."

"You are a mother, but I've never been a father. I figure I don't become one, that might even be best."

"You do know things would change," she said.

I nodded. "I know. And what worries me is—"

"You don't know if you can really change."

"I been trying so long now, that I'm starting to think the trying and not doing it is as much a part of who I am as what I actually end up doing. Which seems to be hitting people in the head, shooting people—"

"And being their rescuer. Hap Collins, have I ever told you that all your doubts about yourself are none of my doubts? That I worry about you using my toothbrush instead of yours, and you sometimes pee on the floor, but as far as your worth as a person, even if you have done some things you consider dark, they do not faze me or concern me at all. Except if we have kids. And it's not about what you're doing, but about what it could do to a child."

"I wouldn't want him or her to grow up like me," I said.

"I would want them to have your integrity," she said.

I started to say something, but it was like a fist was in my throat.

“Let’s read,” Brett said.

We read a long while, watched the late movie, and then we did the mongoose thing again before going to bed.

When I woke up the next morning, it was to a knock on the bedroom door. I sat up. Brett was gone. Off to the hospital to nurse someone. Since I was upstairs in our bed, I opened my drawer and took out my revolver and lay back against my pillows.

I said, “Who is it?”

“Marvin.”

“Come in.”

Marvin opened the door. He hobbled in on his cane and found a chair in the corner.

“How’d you get in?”

“You gave me an emergency key, remember?”

“Is this an emergency?”

“No. But I thought I’d take advantage of my key ownership and see if I could get some coffee. It’s nine already.”

I put the revolver in the nightstand drawer and pulled off the sheets and got out of bed, forgetting I hadn’t replaced my pajamas after mine and Brett’s mongoose moment last night.

Marvin said, “Oh, the humanity.”

Downstairs, with my pajama bottoms on, as well as a top, I started the coffee pot. I said, “You don’t have coffee at your house? The office?”

“Actually, I forgot to buy coffee for either place. Wife is mad at me.”

"Coffee is like a goddamn staple," I said. "You don't forget that. That's just wrong."

"What my wife told me."

"So, what's up besides you being here drinking my coffee?" I said.

"Talked to some cop friends. They said Mrs. Devon reported her husband beating a boyfriend up, and the boyfriend, though he looked like he had been through a meat grinder, wouldn't press charges. Told them he got that way falling down. They didn't have proof otherwise. They think his masculine ego was harmed and he didn't want to harm it any more by admitting he got his ass beat like a bongo drum."

"So, do the cops believe her ex is bothering her?" I asked.

"They do, but they can't spend all their time waiting for him to show up."

"Course, if he shows up and kills her, they can put their time into that," I said.

"Well, they'll have a pretty good idea who did it. At least solving it will be easy enough."

"There's that," I said.

"Here's the thing, though. They told me if he bothers her, and you're there, don't mess him up too bad, 'cause then you'll be up a creek."

"They know we're watching?"

"Not officially, just my contact at the cop shop. He knows, and he's not telling. But, you mess this guy up too bad, they'll have to look around, and you two may come up in the investigation."

"What's the world coming to that you can't just give a good old-fashioned ass-whipping anymore?"

“He’s doing what they think he’s doing, they want you to whip his ass, just not so much he can make a good stink. If you can find him some place other than her place, that would be best.”

“May not get to choose,” I said.

About noon I drove over to Mrs. Devon’s house, and parked in the back behind the garage, next to Leonard’s car. We weren’t being wide open about what we were doing, but we weren’t being sneaky either. Sometimes a stalker isn’t a full-blown nut, and just the presence of someone who might embarrass them, or put a stop to their actions, can end the matter.

Other times, however, it’s worse than that, and what it takes is kicking their asses up under their hairline. Then, sometimes that’s not enough. This situation was wide open.

I had been inside the house about five minutes, drinking a cup of coffee offered to me by Mrs. Devon.

I was sitting at the table with her and Leonard and the axe handle, which I had named Agnes.

She said, “Really. I don’t want him hurt. I think you should just talk to him.”

“That’s the plan,” I said. “This is just to dissuade six feet and three hundred pounds, if the need should arise.”

“I really don’t think it will come to that,” she said.

I thought she was sounding a lot more confident today. Maybe it was just a good night’s sleep.

The doorbell rang.

Mrs. Devon looked at me and Leonard, and we looked at each other. I got up and went to the door and looked through the little square of glass. There was a guy there. He wasn't big. He was carrying a briefcase. I didn't take him to be Mr. Devon.

I opened the door. The man looked at me in a kind of stunned manner. "Is Mrs. Devon in?" he asked.

"Who's asking?" I said.

"It's okay," Mrs. Devon said, came over, opened the door wider, unlatched the screen, and let the man in. "This is my lawyer, Frank Givens."

She gave him a quick kiss on the cheek and led him into the house and to the table, where he took a seat. I locked the screen back, and then the main door. I sat down in front of my coffee again. Givens was staring at Agnes lying on the table.

"I hope I'm not in the way, Sharon," Givens said.

"Of course not," she said. "This is Hap Collins and Leonard Pine. They are protecting me."

"Has Henry come back?" Givens asked.

"Not yet," she said. "And if he does, my friends here hope to encourage him to leave."

"Being a lawyer I don't know exactly what to say to that."

"We just want to talk to him some," Leonard said. "We can explain someone's position real good, we take a mind to."

"I bet you can," he said.

"They do look like gentlemen who can take care of themselves," Mrs. Devon said, "but then again, Henry is someone who can take care of himself as well."

"Yeah, but there's two of us," I said.

"And we have an axe handle," Leonard said.

"Its name is Agnes," I said.

"Have you seen him yet?" Givens asked.

"No," I said.

"Have you seen those old stills from the silent movie about the Golem?"

"Maybe," I said. "But if I haven't, I get the idea."

"Thing is, he really wants Sharon back," the lawyer said. "Not because he loves her, but because he wants her back. He thinks he owns her."

"Me and Henry were all right for awhile," she said. "I just made a big mistake."

"How long have you been married?" I asked.

"About . . . what is it, Frank?"

Frank looked as if the answer soured his stomach. "Almost four years."

She patted Frank, the lawyer, on the arm, said, "Me and Frank, we were married once."

"Oh," I said.

"It's all right," she said. "That was some years ago."

I looked at Frank. The look on his face made me feel that he might not think it had been that long ago.

"We were married young," Mrs. Devon said. "We got along fine, but the fire played out. And then I was on my own for awhile, a few years ago I met Henry. He was interesting. Worked in the oil business, and then the business played out, and so did we. I know that sounds terrible. Like it was the money. And maybe it was. We had a nice place, not like here. . . . Oh, I guess this is all right. But we had a nice place, and then the money was gone—"

"And the fire went out," I said.

"Are you being judgmental?" she asked.

"Quoting you," I said.

"You aren't paying us enough to be judgmental," Leonard said.

"Please be respectful," Givens said.

"I didn't mean anything by it," I said. "I'm just saying the fire went out for you, but not for him. I can see you're a woman that could have that effect on someone."

She smiled at me. "You think so?"

"I think so," I said.

She looked at Leonard and smiled. "What do you think?"

"I think heterosexual stuff is confusing to me. I like what men have in their pants, not women."

"Oh," she said. "Oh."

"That bother you?" Leonard said.

"No. No. Not at all. I just didn't know. I mean, you look so masculine . . . I didn't mean it that way."

"Yeah you did," Leonard said, "but it's all right. Look. The gay folk who fit your idea of gay folk are the ones that stand out. We come from both ends of the spectrum. Some of us even learn how to have sex with heterosexuals and fake a happy orgasm. Mostly those guys are preachers and politicians. Me, I'm a tough guy. Even us queers can make a fist. End of story."

"I assure you, I didn't mean anything by it," she said. "You come highly recommended. The both of you."

Looking at Mrs. Devon I had an idea then why Jim Bob wanted us to do this job. He probably still had the hots for her. She wasn't only good-looking, it was the way she talked, the voice, the way her eyes half-closed when she was serious. I even felt a little sorry for Henry then, and Frank Givens the lawyer. I felt like she was a woman that could tell you a sincere lie.

"I can see you're well protected by these gentlemen," Givens said. “That being the case, I’ll get right down to business. I have the divorce papers with me. They’re all set. He’s contesting the divorce, but at this stage, there’s nothing he can do to keep you from going through with it. All you need to do is sign.”

“But he can be a pain in my ass,” she said.

“That he can, Sharon,” Givens said.

We left Givens and Mrs. Devon, who we had been told to call Sharon, sitting at the table discussing divorce plans. Me and Leonard went out in the backyard and stood around.

“How about that, Givens is her ex-husband,” I said.

“And he still loves her,” Leonard said. “And she doesn’t even know it.”

“Oh, she knows it all right,” I said. “I think she’s something of a manipulator.”

“Starting to doubt her stories about hubby?”

“Not necessarily. I’m just saying she’s manipulative. I think she’s using Givens to get the kind of deal she wants for very little money. And she might be feeding him a little possibility, if you know what I mean.”

“A chance to rekindle the fire.”

“Yeah.”

“Do we stick with it?” Leonard said.

“So far we don’t know things are any different than what she says. But I do have the feeling I’m in a play. A bit actor.”

“I know what you mean,” Leonard said. “I feel a little played in some way, and I don’t even know what it is. But we’re getting paid.”

"Yeah," I said. "There's that."

"Goes on too long we might have to ask for more money."

I nodded.

"But, if she doesn't offer us any more, and we haven't discouraged her hubby—"

"We'll stay anyway," I said.

"Yep," Leonard said. "It's our way. It's not a good way, but it's the honorable way."

"And it's just about all we got."

"Our honor?"

"No. Our way."

What we decided was Leonard would stay at the house, as originally planned, and I would try and locate the husband. If I could catch him leaving his place, lurking around Sharon's house, as soon as he acted like a threat, then I'd go after him. Probably after I called Leonard for reinforcements. We're tough, but we're not stupid. Double-teaming would be the best system. That way, we could possibly convince Henry the better part of being an asshole was staying at home and minding his own business, letting Sharon go her own path.

Sounded and seemed simple enough.

I had an address for him, and me and Agnes went over there and sat on a hill that looked down a wooded lane. I could see his driveway from there. I sat for a moment and got my shit together, then drove down and past his house and took a look.

The house was pretty nice, but it wasn't well attended. I could understand that. I hated yard work. The front yard was grown up and the trees needed trimming, and it stood out because the houses on either side of his were out of House Beautiful.

He had an open carport, and in the carport was a not too old Chevy truck. I drove to the end of the street, to the dead end there, turned around, and went back up and sat at the top of the hill. Up there the neighborhood changed, and was not so nice. I parked in the lot of an abandoned laundromat. There were other cars there. It had become a parking spot for the chicken-processing plant on the far side of the highway that broke Haven Street, the street Henry lived on.

I had a good view from my parking spot, and nothing was going on down below. I wondered if Henry had a job now that the oil had played out. I wondered if he had money. I wondered if he was as big as they said. I wondered why I was doing this.

I had a CD player with me, and I listened to a CD Leonard had given me, Iris DeMent. It was good stuff. A few years back I wouldn't have listened to it. When I was young I associated country with ignorance and backwoods. The music still carried some of that with it, but no more than what a lot of rap carried with it; when it was ignorant, it was urban ignorant. It always depended on who was doing it, and how it was done. I was thinking about that as seriously as if I were going to write a paper on it, when the house I was watching moved. Well, the door did. I saw a man big enough to eat the balls off a bear while it was alive and make it hold its paw against the wound walk out to the mailbox, open the lid, and yank out some mail. He was so big I was surprised he could get his hand in there. Frankly, I didn't know people could grow that big. He may have been six-five or six-six, but in that moment he looked seven-six. His shoulders were just a little wider than a beer truck and he was about as thick the other way as City Hall.

We had to deal with that motherfucker, we were going to need a bigger boat. Certainly a bigger axe handle. I think we had to graduate to a baseball bat. Maybe a cannon. He might take the axe handle away from us, swallow it, and pull it out of his ass as a sharpened stick with our names tattooed on it.

As I watched him walk back to the house, a little chill went up my back and crawled across my scalp. I pulled out my cell and called Leonard.

“Yeah,” Leonard said.

“You know, this Henry guy. I just saw him. He’s big.”

“How big?”

“Do you remember that robot in The Day the Earth Stood Still?”

“Ouch.”

“Exactly,” I said.

“He still at home?”

“You gonna keep watching?”

“Ever vigilant,” I said. “Just wanted you to know what we were up against. And for all we know, he’s armed.”

“You’re exaggerating?”

“Nope, I’m being conservative. You know the remake of The Day the Earth Stood Still?”

“Yeah.”

“The robot in that one. More that size.”

“Bigger ouch,” he said. “Watch yourself.”

“If I want to see something way pretty, that’s exactly what I do.”

I closed up the phone and put on an old rockabilly CD and listened to that. This went on for hours, me sitting and listening to CDs. I went through everything I had twice and got so bored I was close to playing with my dick. Then I saw people coming from across the street toward the lot. A bunch of people.

I looked at my watch.

It was quitting time at the chicken plant. Or at least it was a shift change. Pretty soon I'd be the only car in the lot, and that wouldn't be as good. I was considering what to do next, if I needed a new parking spot or what, when I glanced down the street and saw Henry's Chevy pull out of the drive.

I followed him to a Burger King. He went through the drive-through and I pulled in after him. Looking at his head through the back window, it looked as big as a bowling ball, but with a close haircut.

He made his order, and then I ordered some fries and a big soda, and followed to the checkout window. He went through. I went through. He drove home. I parked again in the abandoned lot. It was just me up there with Agnes, my drink, and fries. And, of course, my precious thoughts.

Leonard called.

"You want to switch shifts?"

"Nope. I'm fine. I think I'll wait until after dark, then you can drive over and we'll swap out."

I told him exactly where I was parked, and hung up.

I rolled down my window. The air was cool. The mosquitoes, however, were busy. I was about to roll the window up again when I heard a shot.

I was positive it had come from Henry's house. I had seen a flash of light behind the window. And it was a gunshot. I was certain. I had heard quite a few of them. I thought about just going home or waiting for a neighbor to call, but all the houses were dark on either side of Henry's, and since it wasn't really late, I figured no one was home. If they were, they might not have even recognized what the sound was. Sometimes shots don't sound like much, especially when they come from a small-caliber gun.

I had a revolver in my glove box. I got it out. I picked Agnes off the seat and got out of the car. I put the gun under my shirt, in my waistband. I carried Agnes in my left hand and held her down by my side. The street was pretty dark for the neighborhood. There was no one moving about except a cat, and he didn't seem all that interested.

I went across the street slowly and came up in Henry's yard. I thought I should have called Leonard, but I hadn't. I had just reacted. In the stealth business they call that poor planning.

I took out my phone and turned it off and put it back. All I needed was for it to ring while I was putting on the sneak. I went to the front door and touched it, using my shirttail to tuck my hand into. No use leaving prints.

The door was locked.

Okay.

I eased around the edge of the house, and now I had my gun out. I was breathing a little heavy. Maybe Henry had fired the shot. Popping a rodent. Didn't like a TV show and was showing it what he thought of it. There could be all kinds of explanations. The one I figured most likely was that someone had shot someone.

Taking a deep breath, I eased my head around the edge of the house, stooping down low to do it. No one was there. The yard was open, with no fence at the back, but there were some thick trees and they went over the hill toward where the highway curved.

I eased around and took a better look. The back door was a sliding-glass door. It was open. I went over there on tippy-toes and looked inside. Dark in there. I moved away from the door and leaned against the wall and thought things over. The smart thing was to call Leonard. Or go away. Those were good choices and safe.

Me and my gun and Agnes went inside.

It was dark and I couldn't see, and I figured if anyone was still in the house, they'd have had time to adjust to the dark. They would be able to see fine. They'd be able to shoot fine.

I leaned against a wall and thought that any moment there would be a shot I wouldn't hear, and it would be all over.

Around the corner from where I leaned was a hallway. There was a break to the left. There was some light in there, but it was the outside light. It was darker in the house than outside.

I moved from my spot, inching carefully into the room beyond the hall. It was a kitchen. A nice kitchen with a nice table and chairs and a coffee pot I could see on the counter, and leaning over the sink, his elbows in it, his knees on the floor, was our big guy Henry.

I said, "Henry?"

Henry didn't call back.

I went over easy, and a little wide. There was a light switch on the wall next to the sink. I used the back of my wrist to flip it on. The top of Henry's head was up against the windowsill. He must have been looking out the window when it happened. Maybe at me and my car up there at the parking spot; he might have had my number early on, standing there in the dark seeing what I was doing while someone was coming in to see what he was doing. Someone with a gun. There were brains and blood on the wall and a little on the window, and a lot of it had run down into the sink; most of it had gone down the drain, but as the blood pumped slower, it had started to go thick. He was still big, but that didn't matter much now. You don't get too big for a bullet, if it's placed right.

I didn't shake him to see if he would come around.

I leaned Agnes against the wall, got out my phone and called Leonard.

"Yeah," Leonard said.

"You know that big guy?"

"Uh-huh," he said. "Henry."

"We are not going to have to fight him. We are not going to have to deal with him."

Leonard was silent for a moment. "That doesn't sound good."

"Not for him it isn't."

"You hurt him?"

"No."

"Killed him?"

"No. But someone did."

"Shit," Leonard said. "You sure he's dead?"

"Oh, yeah. The splattered brains gave him away."

Lights jumped around outside the window. I took a look. Cop cars.

"My turn to say shit," I said.

“What?” Leonard said.

“I think our donkey is in a ditch.”

The chief of police said, “I see you so much, maybe we ought to have a chair put in, something with your name on it, like those movie directors have.”

“That would be nice,” I said. “Maybe with a built-in drink holder.”

We had gotten off the subject, but we had sure been on it a lot for the last hour or so. My butt was tired and I had answered the same question so much it was starting to sound new when I heard it. I was starting to think maybe I should make up new answers. The truth wasn’t working.

“Why don’t you kind of run over things again,” the chief said.

“So you can see if I slip up?”

“That’s the idea, yeah.”

“I might ought to call for a lawyer.”

“You asking for that?” the chief said.

“No, I’m just thinking about it. But without a lawyer, I’m going to say it one more time. I didn’t kill him.”

“You had a gun on you.”

“Weak ploy, Chief. Wrong caliber.”

“You can’t know that,” the chief said.

“I’ve seen what a gun like mine can do. It would have made a bigger mess.”

“Maybe you had another gun.”

“Sure. Two-Gun Hap. What did I do with the other one, hide it up the big guy’s ass?”

"We can take a look."

"Go right ahead. There's no one going to stop you. Least of all Henry. You can prowl around in there all day. Bring the kids."

"All right," the chief said. "I don't think you did it."

"That's nice of you," I said.

"Least not by yourself," he said. "I'm thinking there was you and your partner, Leonard, and he got away. Quick out the back door."

"That's a shitty theory," I said. "He was with Sharon Devon, being a bodyguard."

I had told him all of this, but he liked to pretend we had never discussed it. It's how we danced. I figured Leonard was in another room with someone else, being interrogated same as me.

"So, what's your theory?" he asked.

"My theory is I was there to make sure he didn't bother his soon to be ex-wife."

"And how were you to do this?"

Now we were getting into new territory. "Idea was to keep an eye on him."

"And if he went to see his wife with bad intent?"

"I was supposed to dissuade him."

"And how, pray tell, were you supposed to do that?" the chief asked.

"I was going to reason with him. Really, man. We been all over this so many times you could tell me my story."

"Reason with him, huh," he said. "I got to keep coming back to the part about you were in his house and he was dead and you had a gun and an axe handle."

"Sometimes reason requires visual aids," I said.

“Just wrap it up a little,” he said, leaning back in his chair, placing his hands behind his head. “Tell me the good part, about how you went in the house and found him like that. Tell me why you went in again.”

I sighed. “I was watching the house. I heard a shot. I went down there and went in the back way. The door was open. Henry was hanging on the sink. I think he knew I was following him. Not at that moment. He didn’t know anything right then. But before that I think he knew. He made me.”

“A clever boy like you?” the chief said.

“Even squirrels fall out of trees. But maybe he was looking up the hill at me in my car. Someone was in the house. They may have come in the back way. The door was open. They snuck up on him.”

“That could be Leonard,” the chief said.

“But it wasn’t,” I said.

“You might not have found the door open,” he said. “You might have broke in to kill him. The lock had been worked. We could tell from the scratches. A lock kit. You could have come in using that.”

“Did you find a lock kit on me?”

“Maybe you stashed it somewhere with the other gun, the one you used to shoot Henry.”

“Yeah,” I said. “I stuck them both down the commode along with my spare Range Rover and flushed them.”

“Yeah, that doesn’t seem so likely,” he said. “I think all those things together might cause a clog. I mean, you know, after the Range Rover.”

“What was I saying?”

“You heard a shot.”

“So, someone slipped in and shot Henry. I heard the shot. I went down there. When I did, whoever killed him saw me. I figure they were in that patch of woods behind the house. They called the cops. It put you on me and off of them, whoever them is."

"The one with the lock-pick kit and the right-caliber gun?" he said.

"That would be him or her, yes."

"You want a candy bar?"

"What?" I said.

"Candy bar," he said. "I got a couple in the drawer."

"Really?"

He opened his desk drawer and took out two Paydays and put them on the desk. "Go ahead," he said.

I took one and peeled the wrapper off and put it on the desk. "It's a little warm, kind of melted," I said.

"It's free," he said.

"That's true," I said, and took a bite. When I finished chewing, I said, "You don't think I did this, do you? I mean, you said you didn't, but really, do you?"

"No, but you're the kind of guy who could do it," he said.

"Shoot him in the back of the head?"

"I think you'd do it any way you could get it done," he said. "I planned to shoot a guy big as Henry, I'd have shot him in the back of the head. You know, these are pretty good."

"Yeah," I said, and ate the rest of mine.

The chief eased out his breath. "No, I don't think you did it, but it's my job to ask, and I can't treat you any different from anyone else."

"And if you act like you're really on my side, give me a candy bar and all, I'll slip up and tell you something that will hang me."

"It's the sort of thing that's happened," he said.

"But not to me," I said.

"So it's not working?"

"Nope."

"You can go," he said. "But we might come back around to this again. Same questions. Maybe some new ones to go with it. Could be your answers will change."

"Just restock on candy bars," I said.

I got up and went out.

Leonard came to the house about an hour later. When he came in I poured him a cup of coffee and put it on the table along with a bag of vanilla cookies.

"I had a candy bar," I said. "Did you?"

"No . . . they gave you a candy bar?" he said.

"Yep. It's my charm."

"What kind of shit is that?" he said. "They didn't offer me a candy bar. They didn't offer me a fucking stick of gum."

"Did you talk to the chief?"

Leonard shook his head. "I talked to a major asshole who was about five-four and wanted to be six-six and wished twelve inches of that would be dick. Tell you another thing, I saw Sharon there when I came in, and she looked at me like I had crapped a turd on the tile."

"Yeah?" I said.

"Yeah. And the guy grilling me, he said she rolled over on us."

"They lie like that to get you to give things up," I said.

"I know that, Hap. You think I don't know that?"

“I know you know that,” I said. “I’m just saying.”

“What I’m telling you though, I saw her there in the hall, and I got the vibes.”

“Tell me about the vibes,” I said.

“I think we been butt-fucked vibes, that’s what they were.”

“Define butt-fucked.”

“She had you go over there to watch the guy, and then she had someone go over there and pop him, and guess who takes the rap?”

“They’re going to have a hard time proving I shot him with the wrong gun and hit him with an axe handle when I didn’t.”

“They think she hired you and me to pop him,” Leonard said. “That’s how it looks, so to help herself out, to make them not think that, she’s got to paint us like we went rogue on the deal. Just decided it was easier to lay him down than to follow him around. She may have had it planned that way all along.”

“It could be like that,” I said. “Though you were at her house.”

“But that doesn’t do you any good, and she could still make me part of the plan. Say I wasn’t there. I could get the rap as the actual shooter.”

“She sure seems to be tossing us on the track in front of a train quick-like,” I said. “Quick enough you got to wonder.”

“Yep. . . . Where’s Brett?”

“She picked up a shift for a friend. . . . So what do we do now?”

“I suggest,” Leonard said, “we don’t let ourselves get screwed any more than we already have. That’s what I suggest.”

“How do we do that?” I asked.

“I ask questions, as wise men do. I do not provide the answers.”

“So, you think I’ll come up with something?” I said.

“Probably not,” he said. “Why I asked where Brett was.”

At Marvin's office I sat in the chair in front of the desk and Leonard sat on a stool by the counter with the coffee. He had the bag of vanilla wafers with him. He had not offered me or Marvin any, and I was the one who bought them for him. He was sipping a cup of Marvin's bad coffee and eating the wafers. He would put one in his mouth and close his eyes and look as satisfied as a lion with a gazelle in its stomach. If he had had a Dr. Pepper, his favorite drink, he would have floated to the ceiling and farted vanilla.

"That doesn't sound good," Marvin said, after I explained it to him. "You know what's worse? She never paid her bill."

"That is the least of our worries," I said.

"It's high on my list," he said. "Hey, I didn't ask you guys to kill him. I just wanted you to do right, get me paid so I could dole out a few bucks to you two. That way, I would have enough for a house payment."

"Funny," I said. "Leonard, think you might want to get in on this? Considering we might go to prison or get a needle in the arm for something we didn't do?"

"I wasn't in the house," Leonard said. "I think I can turn on you and get a lighter sentence."

"And me," Marvin said, "I'm in pretty good shape. I just hired you guys to do a simple observation job. What the lady wanted. And the two of you went crazy. You went in there and shot him with an axe handle, Hap."

"Nice," I said.

"Look here," Marvin said. "Let's figure this thing. Jim Bob knows the lady, so maybe we start with him."

"Nobody knows where he is," I said. "I tried him on the phone before we came here. He's not answering for whatever reason. For now, he's out."

"Then we got to think about what it was we were asked to do. Lady comes in and says she has a recommendation, and it's from one of our best buddies, Jim Bob. She says she needs someone to protect her. To discourage someone. We take the job. You guys go over there and talk to her and hear her story and meet her lawyer. How am I doing so far?"

"Good," I said.

"She tells you her husband is big, and it turns out he is. She tells you he is scary and he beat up a boyfriend, a date, whatever. But the guy that got whipped won't press charges. Course, really, he doesn't need to. The cops can go after Henry anyway, if they want. But they think: All right, guy got a beating, wouldn't stand up for himself, so why should we bother? Kind of a Texas thing going there."

"Maybe," I said. "Shit, Leonard. Would you at least not smack?"

"Sorry," Leonard said.

"But whatever, they know he's going to be a shitty witness. Maybe he'll say he fell down a few times and got banged up because he wants to keep his Man Ticket. Won't admit he got a licking. By the way, this guy that took a beating. Who is he?"

I looked at Leonard.

Leonard said, "I don't know."

"Nor do I," I said.

"You know what?" Marvin said. "I think this guy, whoever he is, would be a nice place to start. I think anyone with detective skills would have already thought of that."

"We've been a little preoccupied," I said.

"And you have limited detective skills," Marvin said.

“Well, yeah, there’s that,” I said.

“Let me show you some detective work,” Marvin said.

He called his friend on the force. The one that knew the guy’s name. He wrote down the name and gave it to us.

Robert Unslerod.

Unslerod lived out in the country in a trailer. That was surprising. Not the kind of man Sharon Devon would date. Least I didn’t think so. She struck me as someone who liked money, a man who wore a tie and took her to good dinners and when he dropped trousers he’d be wearing silk shorts. She was someone that at least wanted a man with a nice car to take her out. The car parked in front of the trailer looked like something the farm pigs drove when they went out for a spin. From the looks of things Unslerod seemed to belong in mine and Leonard’s category. He seemed like the sort of guy Sharon Devon would wipe her ass on at best.

We knocked on the trailer door, but no one answered. Maybe Unslerod was actually taking a spin in his Porsche and this is just where he came to store his garbage. When he didn’t answer, I got a pad and pen out of my pocket and pressed it against the door to write a note.

The door swung open a little. A smell came out of there that was, to put it mildly, unpleasant.

“Not good, sir,” Leonard said.

“Nope.”

We went back to the car and stood by it.

“Call the cops?” I said.

“Might just be a dead raccoon under the trailer,” Leonard said.

"That stink is from inside the trailer," I said.

"Might be a dead kitty cat inside," Leonard said. "Maybe he went off for the week and forgot to leave Fluffy his kitty food and water dispenser."

"And maybe that's not it at all," I said.

"Yeah, well, probably not," Leonard said, opened the car door and got my revolver out of the glove box and held it by his side. "You get the axe handle."

I got the axe handle. We went back to the trailer and I nudged the door with the toe of my old Tony Lama's. It slid back. I stuck my head around the corner. It was dark in there. The stink was terrible, worse when we got completely inside.

There was a pile in the hallway between the living room and the bedroom, near the open bathroom door. It didn't look like a lump in the rug. It was too big to be a cat.

"Shit," I said.

We went over and looked. It was a man, facedown. The floor under him was dark, like a hole had opened up there. He was only wearing dark boxer shorts; my guess was they were not silk. We couldn't tell too much about him there in the dark, but what we could tell was that he wasn't just having a little nap.

Leonard went past me, and, holding the revolver in front of him, he looked in the bathroom.

"No one," he said. He went along to the bedroom. The door was cracked. He looked in there. "And the hits just keep on coming."

I went over and looked. There was a nude woman on the bed. There was enough light through the curtains I could tell she wasn't napping either. It was hard to tell what she might have looked like. She was swollen up and her head was bloated. All I could tell was it was a female.

I used my elbow to turn on the light. She didn't look any more identifiable. She looked worse. She was lying on her back with a hole in her forehead. It reminded me of the hole in the back of Henry's head. The sheet under her head was dark and caked with blood. The sheet pulled over her went up to her waist. I was tempted to pull it over her head, but I resisted.

Back in the hall I used the axe handle to turn on the light so we could get a look at the man. He was facedown and was stuck to the floor by dried blood.

"Did you touch anything?" Leonard asked.

"The door with the toe of my boot and I used my elbow on the light. Wait a minute, I put the note paper against the door . . . I didn't touch anything but the paper though."

"Okay, let's keep it that way."

We went outside and breathed in clean air.

"They been dead awhile," Leonard said.

"No shit, Sherlock."

"And me without my deerstalker."

We got in the car. Leonard put my revolver back in the glove box. I put the axe handle on the backseat.

I said, "I hope no one saw us drive in."

"Probably not," Leonard said. "No houses much. We didn't pass any cars."

It was a good guess. There was only a little dirt road leading to the trailer, and the property was a pasture with high grass and some trees at the back. Still, someone could have watched us turn in. Nothing for it but to hope no one had seen us arrive.

I pulled onto the road and eased along. Driving fast would just draw attention to us.

“This whole business is starting to stink worse than that trailer,” Leonard said.

“Yeah,” I said. “I’m beginning to feel like you and me have been puppets all along, and that Sharon Devon is our puppeteer.”

“Time we cut the strings,” Leonard said.

We went to my place and Brett was home. She was cute in some old overalls worn over a paint-splattered shirt; it had got that way when we repaired a door and painted it. She had the cuffs of the overalls rolled up and she was barefoot. Her toenails were painted bright red. It went with her hair, which was tied back with a yellow tie. I made some coffee and we told Brett everything we knew. I always told Brett everything I knew. The only people I would tell that sort of thing were her and Leonard, maybe Marvin. Under certain circumstances, Jim Bob. In fact, when I got through telling Brett all we knew, she said, “Seems like you got to start with who put you in her camp.

“Jim Bob,” she said.

“Makes sense,” I said, “and maybe we can do that, but I got to say, if we were fooled, Jim Bob was fooled. And on top of that, I have tried him, without luck. He’s not answering his phone. I figure he’s turned it off on purpose. He may be in the middle of a job, and the kind of work he does often means the cell is off.”

“I wasn’t saying he had anything to do with it,” she said. “Just that he might give you some insight.”

“Yeah, he and Devon used to date,” Leonard said.

“Way back,” I said. “What I figure is she may have always been selfish, and over time, she became more of that. A whole lot of that. Enough so that it might lead to something that had to do with murder. Jim Bob, if he hadn't seen her in awhile, he wouldn't know that. Wouldn't suspect it. He'd remember her as the woman he dated."

"Problem with that," Leonard said, "is I was with her when Henry was killed. And somehow I can't see her breaking into that trailer and popping Unslerod and his girlfriend."

"Yeah," I said. "I figure whoever picked Henry's lock picked the trailer lock, caught Unslerod heading for the bathroom, shot him, and was in the bedroom before the woman knew what happened. They were probably both dead in less than fifteen seconds. If it took that long. Wouldn't have to be a professional killer, but someone who knew locks and was sneaky as an alley cat."

"Or professional," Leonard said. "I'm voting professional, but I'll settle it could be either way."

"Maybe you guys ought to forget all this," Brett said. "You're off the job. Not your problem, really. Maybe you stay out of it, she won't try to pin it on you."

"I don't want to feel like I let her set me up and she got away with it," I said. "Or that I somehow helped any plan she had all along to kill Henry. I don't know how I helped, but I have this horrible feeling I did. We only got how bad Henry was from her. Unslerod, what did he do? What did his woman do? I don't like it."

"You know what?" Leonard said. "Actually, we didn't just hear how bad Henry was from her. We heard it from the lawyer."

"And he's still in love with her," I said.

"Bingo," Leonard said. "You got any more cookies?"

Brett got up.

I said, “Don’t show him the stash.”

She laughed and opened a drawer next to the sink. It had two bags of vanilla cookies in it.

“And you know what, hon,” she said to Leonard, “I got you some Dr. Peppers.”

“Oh, hell,” Leonard said. “I swear, darling, I am going to quit being queer and go straight so I can take you away from Hap and you can keep me supplied in cookies and Dr. Peppers.”

Leonard was taking a nap on the couch, and Brett was upstairs in bed reading. I turned on the computer in Leonard’s bedroom we had built onto the house for him and did some checking on Frank the lawyer. What I got was Frank’s firm had been around a while. He owned it and employed other lawyers; in other words, he ran a large aquarium for sharks. I looked to find out about his cases, discovered his firm was pretty good. They had nice odds on their winnings. Not too many losses. They did everything from divorce to murder trials, but they didn’t seem to be ambulance chasers. As far as I could tell, they didn’t advertise on TV. They had been around long enough they didn’t have to. I called Marvin, told him what I found, asked if he might be able to find out more from some of his contacts. “After all,” I said, “as you have pointed out, you are the detective.”

“An attempt at flattery?”

“How’s it working?”

“I see it coming as clearly as an elephant trying to walk a high wire, so not so well.”

“But, then again, aren’t you the true detective?”

"Damn you, Hap Collins," he said. "It is working. You have found my weak spot."

I went upstairs and locked the door and took off my clothes and slid under the sheets with Brett. She was sitting up in bed with pillows at her back. She had the sheet pulled up over her. She had her reading glasses on, pushed down on her nose. She put the book in her lap.

"I hope you don't think you're going to get any," she said.

"Any what?" I said.

"Don't act coy with me," she said.

"I just got naked," I said. "It has nothing to do with you. I'm comfortable naked. Some of us are quite comfortable with our bodies, our nudity."

"Oh," she said.

"Yep."

"I'm reading, you know."

"How's the book?"

"Sucks."

"So, want to do the nasty?"

"That is far from romantic," she said. "But lucky for you I think a lot of that stuff is nonsense. The romantic stuff. I'm not as girly as I look. And then again, the book sucks, so that makes your suggestion a little more interesting."

"Dear, believe me," I said. "You are as girly as you need to be."

She laid the book on the bed beside her. She dropped the sheet. She was naked too.

"Surprise," she said.

The phone call woke me up. Brett stirred in my arms.

“You get that,” she said.

I slipped loose of her and put my feet on the floor and picked up the phone. It was Marvin.

“You busy?” he asked.

“Not right now,” I said.

“This Henry guy,” he said. “He seems to have been a pretty straight dude. Made a lot of money in oil. He was a land speculator for the companies. His job was to get people to give up beautiful land so it could have trees cleared, the soil torn up by a bulldozer, concrete and oil drills put down. He made a lot of money. And then he didn’t.”

“It comes and goes,” I said.

“People were drilling everywhere because of the oil shortage talk, and then when they drilled in some places and didn’t find as much as they hoped, they quit drilling so much.”

“And he quit making money,” I said.

“But here’s some things,” Marvin said. “He has a daughter. Her name is Nora. My cop friends say she has been arrested. A lot. Mostly stupid stuff. Small amounts of drugs. Being at the wrong place at the wrong time with the wrong people. Not exactly a Bonnie Parker, more just troublesome. Lindsay Lohan without the fame and without that much money. Daddy had enough money to help her out of deep doo-doo, though, until he didn’t.”

“So what has she got to do with this?” I said.

“I’m not sure,” Marvin said. “Maybe nothing. But she didn’t get mentioned by Sharon Devon, did she?”

“Nope. The girl didn’t come up in conversation,” I said.

“My friend at the cop shop said Sharon and Henry always came down together to bail her out and such, and that it was pretty clear to them that the girl was close to Sharon. Like a mother. Her actual mother was dead. Car accident. Got an engine block through the chest."

"So, you're saying why didn't the dog bark in the nighttime?" I said.

"That's right. If they had a daughter and were divorcing, and the daughter was close to them both, why didn't she come up in your conversation with Mrs. Devon? And where is she? She was supposed to be living with Henry. The cops have been looking for her too, and nothing. No one knows what happened to her."

"Connected?"

"Maybe," Marvin said. "Cops have tried to find her every which way, but it's like she fell off the face of the earth. I'm not sure what that means or what we should do, but something about it bothers me."

"The lawyer," I said.

"What do you mean?"

"I mean I figure he knows something more than we know and we ought to know it."

"Lawyers have client privilege," Marvin said.

"Sometimes that wavers if they think you're going to beat the hell out of them," I said. "Not saying we would, but maybe he could think we mean to, even if we don't say we plan to. Just sort of insinuate."

"Maybe we ought to just drop it," Marvin said. "A reason we ought to, and I have been holding this back for dramatic effect, is Sharon Devon went down to the station and said she didn't think you had anything to do with Henry's death, and that she sent you there, and you were only doing what she asked."

"That's kind of different than before," I said.

"I guess she thought about it," Marvin said.

"Or decided she didn't need that dodge anymore."

"Well, there's a little bit more," Marvin said. "She's got a big insurance policy. Henry left everything to her and he's got this policy that's worth about seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars. They weren't divorced, and he hadn't changed his will or his policy, so it all goes to her."

"So she didn't have any reason to make too much of a stink about us being involved," I said.

"It clears the palate some," Marvin said. "It gets attention away from her, and it's just another unsolved murder. And there's all that money. Maybe not as much as he would have had a few years back, but it's more than starter change."

"You think she had him hit?" I said.

"It happens," he said, "but if so, why hire us in the first place?"

"It made Henry look like a bad man and it made us look like someone who might have put him down, and it confused the situation. It doesn't seem to take much confusion to mess a jury up these days. If she could plant in people's mind that he was dangerous, any sympathy there might be for him could be negated."

"You sound like you're holding something back, Hap," Marvin said. "It's not what you're saying, but I know your tone well enough to know there's something missing here."

"Not really," I said. "I was going to get around to telling you. Maybe, like you, I was holding it back for dramatic effect. I meant to tell you earlier, but I wanted to think about things first. Unslerod, you remember him?"

"The guy that got beat up by Henry," Marvin said.

"He's dead, and a woman who was with him is dead too."

"Shit."

"I haven't called about it. I figured they weren't going to get any deader. Maybe stinkier, but not deader."

I gave Marvin the location of the trailer. That way he could contact his friend at the department, maybe keep me and Leonard out of it. Marvin too.

"This is getting more complicated," Marvin said.

"Still think we should let it go?" I asked.

"I think we ought to," Marvin said. "And I want to."

"But we won't, will we?"

"Of course not," Marvin said.

I had no sooner got off the phone than there was a knock on the bedroom door.

Leonard called out, "I woke up and I was all alone and I didn't know where you were."

"Go fuck yourself," I said.

"Get up and let him in," Brett said.

I got up and pulled on my pajama pants and T-shirt, unlocked the door, and let Leonard in.

"The cookies are missing," Leonard said.

"I put them up," I said. "You eat all of them if I don't hide them. You'll have a tummy ache."

"You hid Leonard's cookies?" Brett said. She was sitting up in bed with the sheet pulled around her. Her red hair fell against the white sheets and her fine skin and made her look like a goddess.

"They're not his cookies," I said.

"Are too," Leonard said.

"Yeah," Brett said. "They are. You go down there and give the baby his cookies."

I said, "You're spoiling him, you know."

When the lawyer, Givens, came out of the restaurant, we were waiting in the parking lot. We had followed him from his work and parked as near to his car as possible. We had been waiting all morning for him to leave his office, not even sure he would, but hoping eventually he'd come out. If he went to lunch we could maybe pull off talking to him easier than trying to set a time at his work and him not wanting to talk to us; we tried it that way, he could avoid us for ages. So, when he left we were watching from across the street and we followed him, and now, here we were, waiting.

While he was in the restaurant enjoying a good meal, Leonard and I were eating hot dogs from Sonic, which frankly, wasn't half bad.

We ate and waited, and after about an hour he came out. As he got close to my car we got out and started walking like we were going into the restaurant. He looked up from fumbling with his car keys and saw us.

"Hello," he said, and gave us one of those smiles you would expect from someone who had just discovered his zipper was down.

"Hey," I said, like it was a big surprise to see him. "How are you?"

"Okay. Just grabbing a little lunch."

"Yeah, well, good," I said. "We thought we'd have a little lunch ourselves."

"That's nice," he said. He couldn't have been more awkward than if he were standing on a mile-long razor blade over a gorge.

"You know, things really didn't work out for us on that gig with Mrs. Devon," Leonard said.

"Yes, of course," he said. "I know. Sorry about that."

He tried to dart for his car.

I said, "Thing is, we think a lot of what happened stinks. We think maybe we got played for fools."

"I'm sure you're mistaken," he said.

"Then you wouldn't mind talking to us?" I said.

"Did you follow me here?" he asked.

"Happy coincidence," Leonard said.

"Well, I don't know I have anything to say," he said. "Mrs. Devon is my client, and—"

"Oh, come on," I said. "It's just us guys talking here."

"She's more than a client. She's also a friend," he said.

"Ah," Leonard said, "I bet you feel more than that for her. I mean, hell, you were married to her for awhile, and to think that big jock Henry was riding her around the bedroom like she was a pony had to get your goat."

"That is inappropriate," Givens said.

"So is framing our ass," Leonard said.

"Mrs. Devon has made it clear you had nothing to do with what happened," Givens said. "It was just an unfortunate coincidence."

"Coincidence, huh?" Leonard said. "You know what I'm thinking, and I'm just thinking here—"

"And for him to do that, he has to really be serious," I said, "because it hurts his head."

"There you have it," Leonard said. "But I'm thinking since you knew Hap was watching Henry's house, you sneaked over there and picked the lock and shot Henry. Hap hears the shot, like maybe you thought he would, and he comes in and looks bad for it."

"I already told you Mrs. Devon says it was a coincidence, and the police believe her."

"That's good," I said. "Really, but we still got to wonder if that was part of the original plan, to have our dicks mashed between two bricks."

"I didn't shoot anyone. I don't even own a gun, and I don't know how to pick locks, and if I were going to frame someone, I'd find a better way to do it than that. Hoping you heard a shot and came in and got framed. That's not a very good plan."

"It wouldn't have mattered if I came in," I said. "All that mattered was I was there, and the cops could fill in the rest of the blanks."

"Wouldn't you have to have the same kind of gun that killed him?" Givens said. "Wouldn't you have to have a gun that had been fired?"

"Okay," I said, "you're starting to sound more convincing. Listen, let me put it another way. We really don't know you had anything to do with it. We're just fishing. But we don't like being played for idiots. Some might think that happens daily, but they would be wrong. Leonard just looks foolish, he's not."

"Thanks," Leonard said. "That was mighty white of you."

Givens said, "Good day," and made like a bullet for his car.

I trailed after him. When he got to the car, unlocked it and was opening the door, I said, "Thing is, if you two have something going on that's got nothing to do with us, maybe we can help. Maybe you ought to talk to us."

Givens looked back at me, paused. I thought for a minute he was going to say something, but instead he got in his car and drove away.

"He hesitated," Leonard said. "I think that help line got to him."

"I was just throwing it out there, seeing if it had a hook on it."

"I think it did," Leonard said. "And some bait, and he almost went for it. That makes me think maybe he's telling the truth. Or part of the truth. That they didn't set us up. But it's also got me thinking he knows more about what happened than he's letting on."

"I keep telling myself if we're out of it, we ought to let it go," I said.

"I know," Leonard said. "But you know, that would be a first, and I'm not sure I want to start down that road. Next thing, I'll break down and buy my own cookies. And you know that ain't right."

We had just pulled away from the restaurant when my cell rang.

It was Marvin. He said, "I got a call from Givens."

I had it on speaker, so Leonard heard it. "That was quick."

"So, does this mean we're in trouble?" I said.

"No," Marvin said. "I think something you did may have worked out. He wants to see you at his office, downtown in an hour. It's a pleasant request. He even said please and that he's thought over what you said and he wants to talk straight."

"Interesting," I said.

"Find out how interesting."

We stopped by Starbucks and sat at a table and had coffee in mugs. Since I found out you can have it in a ceramic mug if you don't plan on carrying it off, I had it that way every chance I got. It tastes better.

We drank our coffee, and then went over to the law office and rode the elevator up to the third floor. When we got there the office door was open. Frank Givens and Sharon Devon were both there. Sharon was in a chair near the desk. She looked as if she had just seen her own ghost.

Givens was standing up behind his desk. As we came in, he said, "Shut the door."

I shut it.

"I started to say something in the restaurant lot," Givens said, "but you see, part of the problem was who I had lunch with today. I wanted to get out of there as swiftly as possible. Before he came out. I didn't have your number, so I called your boss."

"Sometime boss," Leonard said. "Actually, he can't do without us."

"So you weren't there to eat?" I said.

"I lied," Givens said. "I went in and I sat in a back booth in a conference room and got talked to by a person who is part of the problem. Him and his bodyguard."

I looked at Leonard, said, "Is any of this making any sense?"

"Not to me," he said. "But I'm still trying to figure out the ending to The Sopranos."

"I'm sorry," Givens said. "Please sit down."

There were two very comfortable leather chairs, and we sat in them.

Sharon Devon had not spoken a word. She looked as if she had been crying. Her eyes were red as sunrise and she looked more her age today, as if she had finally lost the war against it. I felt sorry for her. I feel sorry for just about everybody.

“We led you along some,” she said.

“Figured that,” Leonard said.

“Me and Henry,” Sharon said, “we weren’t really having trouble.”

“Okay,” I said.

“We were just pretending,” she said.

I glanced at Givens. He didn’t look too happy. I couldn’t tell if it was about Henry and her not actually having trouble, or about something worse. I decided a little of column A and a little of column B. I had a suspicion there might even be a column C.

“So we were just sort of window dressing?” Leonard said.

She nodded. “Yes. You see, we have a daughter, Nora.”

We knew that, of course, but we didn’t say so.

“She is by Henry’s previous marriage. I was never able to have children. But, I love her quite a bit. Nora was precious to me. She wasn’t quite a teenager when we first met, but I took to her right away, and she to me. After that came the teenage years and Nora was pretty wild. Not that uncommon. I was pretty unruly myself. Nora started seeing boys we didn’t want her to see, and she started experimenting with drinking and drugs. It made what happened later easy.” She paused. Givens got up, went to a cabinet and pulled out a bottle of water, got a glass and a coaster and brought it over to her. He placed the glass on the coaster and unscrewed the cap on the water bottle and poured about half a glass.

Patiently, she waited while he did all this, as if a pause like this was the most natural thing in the world. For the two of them, maybe it was. When he was finished she sipped her water, delicately, placed the glass back on the coaster.

“You see, Henry really was in oil,” she said. “And he really did have a loss of money. But part of the reason wasn’t just a shift in natural fortune. There was a dismantling of fortune, and Henry was the cause. He liked to gamble. He liked to gamble a lot. Then the business went bad and he got into debt with the wrong people. He bet on some football games, some horses. He bet on just about anything. He would have bet on the number of freckles on my ass if I’d have been willing to let someone count.

“I loved him, but he was a gambling addict, and no matter how bad the people were he got into debt with, he kept letting the debt get deeper. Then they put interest on what he owed. Lots of interest. About double. They wanted him to get in deep, because they assumed he was a big shot, and that whatever problem he was having paying would go away, because they had had a few ups and downs with him before, and in the end, he had paid it off, and with interest. Lots of interest.”

“But the downs didn’t stop,” I said.

She shook her head. “No. They didn’t. He went to them and told them there was no way he could pay all that back if they kept compounding the interest, which they were doing. They didn’t listen. He was late, so they added on a late fee, and added interest on that. He told them if they stopped compounding it, maybe he could pay it back, in time. He probably couldn’t have paid it back if they had let him go back in time to the beginnings of the earth and work it off up until now. The business, it wasn’t coming back. Not the way they thought it might. Fact was, he had lost the business, but they didn’t know that.”

Sharon paused and drank some more of her water.

“He let them think he was still making money. Maybe that was the right thing, to let them think that, because if they didn't think he could pay, they didn't have any reason to let him live. They even threatened me. We had some money. But it was just eating money, gas, enough to pay a few bills. We didn't have enough to pay them so that it would mean anything to them. That's when we came up with a plan. Idea was we'd divorce and sell the house."

"I don't see why you would have to divorce," I said. "Don't see the plan in that."

"Turns out it wasn't too good a plan," she said. "We tried to get clever because we thought we were smarter than a bunch of thugs."

"You probably are smarter," I said, "but not as clever. They're two different things."

"Or as ruthless," Leonard said. "That's something makes them real different."

"Why didn't you just go to the cops?" I said.

"For the same reason I said," Sharon said. "We thought we were smarter. We didn't want people to know about Henry's gambling debts. We thought we could work things out and no one would know, and we could make some kind of life together again."

"So what was the plan?" Leonard said.

Sharon drank more of the water and looked as if she might break out crying. She didn't. She said, "Thing was, Henry thought if we were divorced, at least they'd leave me alone. They didn't. And the man that I said I dated, that got beat up—"

"Let me guess," I said. "He isn't really your type."

"No," she said. "He was a messenger for the people Henry owed."

"And Henry beat him up, causing more problems," Leonard said.

"Yes," she said, "but there was already a problem. You see, the messenger came to my house because he said he wanted us to know that if we didn't pay he had our daughter. She had been seeing someone that was part of the problem. Jackie Cox. She was in with the wolves already."

"Ah, I got it," I said. "The Dixie Mafia Cox family."

"You know them?" she said.

I shook my head. "I know who they are. They took the place of someone who used to run this area's business. Those people we did know. They came to kind of a sad end."

"Rumor is," said the lawyer, "you were involved."

"Rumors are all over the place," I said.

"Jimson and his crew," the lawyer said, "they got killed in a filling station in No Enterprise, and the rumor is from cops I know, you and Leonard might have had something to do with that."

"We had our problems with Jimson," I said. "But no. That wasn't us."

And it wasn't. It was a young and lethal lady named Vanilla Ride who had put them down, but that's a different story.

I said, "I don't want you to be too disappointed about that, though. Me and Leonard, we've had our moments, and I figure you wouldn't have asked us here if you didn't know that, and didn't want us to have a moment again."

"Jackie was seeing our daughter," Sharon said. "She met him because of my husband and his gambling dealings. He didn't intentionally introduce her to Jackie, but he used to have these tough guys coming around, and Jackie, he's the son of one of them."

"Richard Cox," I said.

She nodded her head. “They got tight quick. Maybe because he was a bad boy, and Nora liked bad boys. But then Henry owed them the money, things went bad, and then they sent this Unslerod around.”

“He was kind of a tough guy they used,” Givens said.

I didn’t mention that he wasn’t that tough anymore, and unless Marvin got in touch with his cop friend, Unslerod and his girlfriend were still collecting flies in a trailer out in the boonies.

“He said they had our daughter,” Sharon said, “and if Henry didn’t find some way to pay half, soon, and the other half almost as soon, they would harm her. Henry was already living apart from me, trying to set the divorce up to maybe make me safer, and then this guy came around. He was looking to talk to Henry. He thought he was tough.”

“But Henry was tougher,” I said.

“Much more so,” she said. “He gave him a beating and they didn’t get any money. It was a foolish thing to do, them having our daughter. I don’t think Henry believed them at first. Then they sent this.”

She opened her purse and took out a plastic bag and dug in the bag. When she got through with that she pulled out another plastic bag and unwrapped that. There was a pair of red thong underwear inside.

“These are hers,” she said. “I bought them for her and her father didn’t like that I did. All the girls were wearing them, she said, and I thought it was harmless. Anyway, they’re hers. I know they are. It proves to me they have her.”

“What we would like,” Givens said, “is that you go and get her back. That you make these men stop bothering Sharon. They killed her husband and took her daughter, and now they're pressuring her to pay. She can't pay. They have come through me with all this. They said Sharon goes to the cops, or doesn't pay something on what she owes, and by something they mean a substantial amount, they will send the part of her daughter that fits in the underwear to her in a cardboard box with a bow on it."

"How much time did they give you?" Leonard asked.

"Three days," Givens said, without waiting for her to answer.

At Marvin's office, he said, "So, how do you read it?"

"I think Henry got his dick in a crack," I said, "and he was too arrogant to take care of matters when he could, so he just kept it there and the crack got tighter. He didn't pay, so they took his daughter. They sent around a guy they thought was tough to collect and tell Henry how things were, that being Unslerod, and maybe he thought he'd play tough on Henry. Henry was tougher. Maybe Unslerod pissed Cox off with his failure, or maybe it was some other reason, but it seems more than likely Cox had him taken care of. His girlfriend was probably just in the wrong place at the wrong time. Later on it was Henry's turn. I figure Unslerod and the woman were dead some days before Henry, considering how their bodies looked. Way I understand it, Cox doesn't like failure, and he gives it a very short shelf life."

"Question comes to me," Marvin said, "guy owes you, why whack him if you want the money that bad?"

"That's the question me and Hap got to thinking on coming over here," Leonard said. "We got to thinking on it hard enough that I cell phoned Sharon. I asked her how they expected her to pay what was owed, and she said—"

"Insurance money," Marvin said, and snapped his fingers at the same time.

"Yep," Leonard said. "You are a wizard. She has a shit-full policy. Seven hundred and fifty thousand. Henry managed to keep that up, as protection for Sharon. That isn't even all Henry owes, but it's a good part of it. She told me that, I cleverly asked, doesn't it take time for the policy to pay out? And she said it did, and you know what?"

"The lawyer is helping her out," Marvin said, leaned back in his desk chair and placed his hands behind his head. "He's going to put the money up for her in return for the insurance money."

"Yep," Leonard said. "He's not only an ex-husband carrying a torch, he's a fucking saint."

"Sure he is," Marvin said. "Sure he is."

We drove over in my car and met the lawyer. We were going to go with him to the Dixie Mafia guy and they were going to give us the girl in exchange for the lawyer's money. When the insurance paid off, Givens was going to get his money back from Sharon. He was carrying a briefcase when he came outside his office and met us at the curb.

It was a nice day, and I wondered, as I often wondered, if it might be my last day on earth, if this might be the day I set out to do something simple and it turned bad and I'd end up in a ditch with crows pecking at my eyes.

Givens climbed in the backseat with his briefcase. He said, "We got to drive to Tyler."

"All right," I said, and I slipped away from the curb. "We meeting in the city?"

"That's the plan," he said. "It should go easy enough."

"They explained it to you?" Leonard said. "You got all the particulars down?"

"They just want the money," Givens said.

"What about the boyfriend?" I said. "Cox's son?"

"He was just the bait," Givens said. "He was the one that got her to trust him."

"And that's kind of what we are, aren't we?" I said.

Givens was quiet for a long moment. "I don't think I follow you."

"I might have to throw a few words in, but I figure you'll put it together pretty quick. I'm talking about you getting us to trust you, same as you say Jackie did with Nora."

Givens didn't say anything. I looked at his face in the rearview mirror. He was doing a fair job of looking puzzled.

"Let me see the briefcase," Leonard said.

"Why?" Givens said. He put a hand on top of it where it rested on the seat.

"Because if you don't," Leonard said, "I'm going to have Hap pull over by the side of the road and I'm going to kick your ass so hard you'll be peeking out of your asshole."

"What in the hell is wrong with you guys?" he said.

"Let's just say we don't like your story," I said. "We look in the suitcase, see the money there, we might believe you better."

"It's there," he said.

"Show it to us," Leonard said. "And right now. I'm feeling edgy."

"He wanted vanilla cookies," I said, "but he got up too late, and I had eaten all of them with my coffee. You don't want to make him mad when he hasn't had his cookies."

Givens had no idea what his life had to do with vanilla cookies, and frankly, neither did I, but it was on my mind. Cookies are not cheap, I'll have you know. Not when your brother eats them by the bagful. What really made me mad was Leonard didn't gain a pound. I looked at cookies too long and I could feel myself gaining weight.

Leonard leaned over the seat and held out his hand, said, "And that gun you got under your coat. I saw it when you got in the car. Reach for it and I'll be over this seat pronto and stick it up your nose."

"I just brought it for safety," he said.

"But you told us they said not to bring guns," I said. "They making like a special deal just for you?"

"Hand me the case," Leonard said. "While you're at it, hand me the gun. Never mind."

Leonard went over the seat and was on top of Givens so fast Givens probably thought Leonard had a warp drive up his ass. I glanced in the mirror. Leonard was practically sitting in Givens' lap. He reached the gun from under Givens' suit coat and threw it in the front passenger's seat. Then he slapped Givens across the face, twice, fast as the beat of hummingbird's wings, then got off Givens' lap and picked up the briefcase. Givens held his hand to his mouth as blood dribbled between his fingers.

"You didn't have to do that," Givens said.

"I thought I did," Leonard said. "Soon as I saw that bulge in your coat, I knew you'd lied to us, that you were putting our lives in danger by bringing your gun, or that there was more to things than you wanted us to know.”

“Another thing,” I said, “just for the record, we brought guns ourselves. Because, you know what? We didn’t believe you. First, you’re a lawyer, and that’s a mark against you, and second, you still got a thing for Sharon, and third, you putting up that kind of jack for your former wife seems unlikely, love her or not. You may be a lying scumbag lawyer who makes a lot of jack, but it’s hard to think even you got seven hundred and fifty thousand just lying around? Possible, not likely. So, that means you got something else going on here. Something that might even make you look like a bit of a hero, and we would be there to witness you turning the money over and taking the girl back. That could ingratiate you to Sharon, couldn’t it?”

“We don’t do this right,” Givens said, “it’ll turn out bad. Real bad.”

Leonard opened the briefcase. “Well, now, ain’t this some shit,” he said.

Leonard turned the case toward me. It only had a pile of empty manila folders inside.

“That won’t pass for money,” I said.

“No,” Leonard said. “It won’t.”

I pulled over to the side of the road and put the car in park and looked back over the seat at Givens.

“Lay it out,” I said. “No stalling. No stories within stories. Lay it out.”

“No one was meant to get hurt,” Givens said.

“Yeah,” I said, “it’s all fun and games till someone loses an eye.”

“Henry owed the money, and well, I know the people involved. You might say I handle their affairs.”

“You’re their lawyer,” I said. “The Cox family.”

“That, among other things.”

“That’s goddamn typical,” Leonard said.

“I do odds and ends for them here and there. Henry owed them and they wanted their money, and they knew I knew Sharon and that I had been married to her.”

“Favor time,” I said.

“Yeah,” he said. “They wanted me to put the screws on her to make Henry give up the money. I thought if we had someone threaten Henry he’d give it up. I was sure he had money in some hidden account somewhere. They sent Unslerod around and he didn’t work out so well.”

“Henry turned out to be tougher than they thought,” I said.

“He did,” Givens said. “Then Unslerod decided he’d blackmail me by threatening to let Sharon know I worked for the organization.”

“The organization,” Leonard said. “I like that. The Dixie Mafia and Cox you mean.”

Givens nodded.

“That meant you had to get rid of Unslerod,” Leonard said. “And when you did, the woman just happened to be there.”

“Something like that,” Givens said, and I saw in his eyes then something that made me shiver a little. He may have been a frightened weasel, but I knew in that moment I had to keep my eye on him. Because nothing is more dangerous than a frightened weasel. They have no loyalties but themselves.

“That was cold,” Leonard said.

"He was a deadly man," Givens said.

"But not so deadly you couldn't sneak up on him and shoot him," I said. "And then the woman."

"It just worked out that way," Givens said. "I used a credit card on the door and I surprised him. Well, he surprised me too. I shot him, and then I went in the bedroom and she was there and I didn't have any choice. I shot her too."

"No choice, huh?" I said.

"I didn't think so," Givens said.

"So what happened next?" I said. "Better yet, let's go back in time to Nora."

"I didn't want to do that, but I set it up so Jackie could meet Nora. He got her interested in him, and then she moved in with him."

"She wasn't kidnapped?" Leonard said.

"No," Givens said, sighing so loud it was like a windstorm blew into the car. "What I thought was it could look like a kidnapping. Cox said that would be good, and his boy Jackie was for it. And so was Nora."

"Nora was in on it?" I said.

"Yeah," he said. "She was. Big time. Way we arranged it was we'd hold her for ransom and Henry would come through. Like I said, we all thought he had money and was holding back, and that if he thought Nora was in danger he'd give it up."

"Only problem was he didn't really have any money," I said.

"Correct," Givens said. "No money. Or at least I don't think so now. He loved Nora. I think he would have come through if he had any."

"So you revised the plan, and the revised plan included bad things for Henry," Leonard said.

"I didn't so much revise it because I wanted to, but because I had to. Cox had one of his men do in Henry. A black guy named Speed. He's big as Henry, but more dangerous."

"Let me guess the rest," I said. "You told them they had to do Henry because you knew about the insurance policy. You never planned to give Cox your money until you got the policy money. You'd just pretend to take Sharon off the hook. Me and Leonard would be there as witnesses, and you'd hand them the briefcase full of folders, and they would give you Nora, and you would bring her home like she was let go, and when the money came through, you'd give it to Cox because he liked the plan and didn't mind temporary ownership of folders and a briefcase. When you paid them the insurance money, minus you and Nora taking a little off the top for your troubles, no one would be the wiser."

"It wasn't all that Henry owed," Givens said. "But it was enough for them to be satisfied, and it would take Sharon out of the mix."

"And you'd look real good in her eyes," I said.

He nodded. "I suppose that's true."

"You and Nora are some pair," I said. "Nora cheating her grieving stepmother for some dollars and for this Jackie Cox, and then you cheating Sharon. Not to mention committing murder."

"That's pretty much it," Givens said.

"You know," I said. "One revision on what I said earlier. I don't think you brought us along so we could say what a hero you were. I think you brought us along because Sharon insisted. She said she wanted us along to make sure things went well. She wanted us to protect you and Nora. How am I doing?"

"All right, I guess," Givens said.

"You know what, Givens?" Leonard said. "I didn't check you out so good. I see you are trying slowly to ease your hand down to your sock, where I suspect just under your pants leg is a holstered handgun that you hope to pull and shoot me and Hap with."

Leonard poked the gun he had gotten off the front seat against the side of the lawyer's well-combed hair, just over his temple. "What you want to do is tug up your pants leg, pinch the gun out by the grip with thumb and forefinger, and hand it to me easy as if it might blow up."

Givens did as he was told. Leonard took the gun. He tossed it over the seat into the passenger seat and hit Givens across the head with his own gun, right over the ear. It knocked Givens sideways. He reached up and held his head. When he moved his hand there was blood on his fingers.

"You sonofabitch," Givens said.

"And don't you forget it," Leonard said.

I had some tissues in the car and I gave some to Givens and had him wipe the blood off his head and hand.

"What we're going to do," I said, "is we're going to go through with this plan. Almost. We're going to have you waltz in there with the briefcase. We're going to have you be a really nice guy and not let on we know dick about what you're doing, 'cause if you do, we will kill you deader than a tree stump.

"When we get the girl, both of you get a drive to the police station. We'll call Marvin and have him grease the path for us with the cops. We'll turn you and her over to them, let you figure out how to explain extortion, illegal gambling profits, murder, and fraud, or whatever the fuck crimes we got here. Thing is, we play this right, we get you two and they get the briefcase, thinking they're going to get insurance money later, and you get to leave without a hole in your head. How's that plan?"

"Cox won't forget," Givens said.

"We'll see how that turns out," I said. "We got long memories ourselves."

Givens didn't say anything. I figured he didn't like the plan.

The meeting place was on the first floor of a two-floor parking garage in Tyler. Just before we got there we pulled over, and Leonard made Givens get up front in the passenger seat, and he sat directly behind him. He had both of Givens' guns and one of his own he had brought, and I had mine from the glove box tucked in a holster at the small of my back, with my shirt pulled down over it.

When we drove inside the garage we went to spot 15, as Givens said for us to do. A big black car—of course it was black—was waiting. We pulled up behind it and a man got out. He was an exceptionally large black man that moved like a cat; frankly, he moved the way Leonard and I do. I'm just telling it like it is. One bad man can spot another, even if that bad man is me and I'm feeling a lot less bad these days. I figured he was the aforementioned Speed. He was dressed in an expensive black shirt, coat, pants, shoes, and a very glossy black dress jacket that couldn't have been off the rack, not and fit those shoulders. His head was shaved and it looked to have been waxed. It was shiny enough you could have used it as a mirror to comb your hair.

"You go on and get out," Leonard said to Givens. "I'd be real cool, I was you."

Leonard got out, and Givens got out.

Speed looked at me behind the wheel. He was expressionless, which was expression enough. Guy like that, not showing much in his features, you had to watch him. Wasn't the kind of fella that would give you many signals before he shot or punched you or drove a car over your ass.

I had my window rolled down. I said, "Hey, how's it hanging?"

Speed ignored me. He looked at Leonard and Givens. They had come around to the front of the car.

"Givens," the big man said.

"Speed," Givens said.

"Hey," Leonard said. "How about this weather?"

"Which bozo is this?" Speed asked.

"Leonard," Givens said. "Guy behind the wheel is Hap."

"How's it hanging?" I said again.

Still no evaluation of the general hanging condition of his meat was offered by Speed.

"Here's the thing," Speed said. "You got no guns, right?"

"Not exactly," Leonard said. "I actually got some guns."

Speed turned his attention to Givens. "You were told no guns."

"They go their own way," Givens said.

"That's right," Leonard said. "Way I see it, since we're all pals we won't be shooting anybody, right? You came with a gun, because I see it under your well-cut coat."

"You don't leave the guns," Speed said, "we don't go."

"How about we get where we're going, we all put our guns in a pile," I said. "Till then we keep them. You see, the lawyer here told us your rules, but we're here to make sure he don't get shot and we don't either. To make sure it works out that way, we got to have rules of our own. One of which is we hang onto our guns until it looks like it's okay to let go of them."

I knew that since this was a scam, there was no real threat in saying we wouldn't give them the briefcase. Cox wanted the meeting to happen, to set it up so Givens could give him the insurance money eventually.

It was a big joke, but a joke only works if you play it right. Thing was, they didn't know we were in on the joke. We had a few laughs of our own planned.

Speed let what I said move around in his thoughts for awhile. His expression didn't change.

"You follow me out," he said.

He got back in his car and we backed out from behind him. He pulled from his parking place and drove off. We followed. I saw that he was on his cell already.

When Bad Guys start directing you outside of town it's always a crapshoot. But that's where we were going, outside of town. We passed what used to be Owen Town. It was really nothing more than an asphalt path and a couple of storage buildings. It had never been a town since I was alive, but it used to be a place where aluminum chairs were made. I worked there when I was young.

We went along until we came to the cutoff for Starrville, a little burg so small most of the inhabitants could have lived in one house, and maybe a shed out back. We didn't go all the way there. Instead, we stopped in the Starrville Cemetery. There was another black car like the one Speed was driving already parked there. The windows were dark. A man got out from behind the wheel. He was a big white guy with a crew cut. He was almost as big as Speed. His jacket, an ugly plaid thing, fit him the way a designer dress fits a hippopotamus.

Speed got out of his car. We got out of ours. After a moment, the back door of the other car opened and a man slid out, leaving the door open. It was Cox. I had never met him, but had seen a couple photos of him on the Internet, usually something to do with law-breaking. He always claimed to be innocent, and always got out of whatever problem he was in. He was a tall, lean man with gray, well-cut hair, and a look about him that said he liked things his way. He was dressed in a nice gray suit to go with the hair. My dad always told me not to trust anyone who ran around in the middle of the day with a suit on. If they wore one because they were on their way to preach, he told me to watch them even closer.

“So,” said Cox, “we’re here to deal.”

“If you got something to deal with,” I said.

“They got guns,” Speed said.

Cox glanced at Speed. “What did I tell you?”

“No guns,” Speed said, but he didn’t look worried about the situation. My guess is it was mostly show. My bet is when I saw Speed was on his cell phone, he was calling ahead to tell Cox we had guns.

“We just want to play even,” I said. “Your man here has a gun. And I’m going to guess the guy in the plaid coat has one too. Wouldn’t surprise me you had one. All I’m saying is we all keep our guns and stay friends. Having us put ours up and you keeping yours, that wouldn’t be playing fair. And me, I’m all about fair play.”

“You said we would put them all in a pile,” Speed said.

“I lied,” I said.

"All right," Cox said. "We'll play your way." He looked at Givens. "Got the money?"

Givens held up the briefcase they both knew was empty.

"Good," Cox said.

"You got the girl?" Leonard said.

"I do," Cox said.

He looked back at the car. A young man who looked a lot like Cox, but with black hair, got out. He poked his hand back inside the car, when he pulled on it, a girl came out with it. She was dressed in jeans and a T-shirt. She wasn't wearing a bra. This wasn't a negative. She had unreal red hair and a pretty face, but there was something about it that made you want to throw a pie at it.

Givens said, "These men, they know what the real deal is."

I looked at Leonard. He looked at me. The cat had just jumped from the bag.

Givens walked over to Cox's car carrying the briefcase. He stood by Cox.

"They know," he said. "They know and they're trying to work me to get the girl back. They know she's in on it."

"Yeah," Cox said, "and how do they know that? You tell them?"

"They figured it," Givens said.

"That's right," Leonard said, "we're pretty smart for old country boys. We can even tie a square knot in the dark."

I let my hand drift to the edge of my shirt. Speed eased his coat back. I think the guy in plaid was still trying to figure out what everyone had said. Cox didn't look any different at all. Oh, maybe a bit irritated, but nothing more. The girl looked at the young man, who I figured was Jackie, then looked at Cox. She seemed to be waiting for someone to tell her something.

“All right, so they know,” Cox said.

“They plan on taking me and her to the police,” Givens said.

“They do, do they?” Cox said.

“That’s exactly the plan,” Leonard said.

No one said anything for a while. A plane flew over. I wished they were parachuting in reinforcements.

“I think there’s more of us than there are of you two,” Cox said.

“What a mathematician,” Leonard said.

“Me and Leonard get to shooting though, your numbers may decrease,” I said.

“Speed here,” Cox said, “he’s fast on the draw, and he hits what he aims at.”

“I’m not that fast on the draw,” Leonard said, “and I’m not that good of a shot, but I still might hit something. But him, Hap, he can shoot. That motherfucker is a natural. He don’t really know from guns, but he knows shooting. It’s like a god-damn inborn knack.”

“This is true,” I said. “I’m like a fucking prodigy.”

I didn’t add that my expertise was really with long guns, though I did all right with a handgun. And Leonard was right. I didn’t know that much about the workings of guns, really. Not the way gun nuts do, the guys talking about them the way you ought to talk about a woman, but I could hit stuff. As for fast on the draw, I had no idea. I never thought of slapping leather with anyone. I usually had my gun out and ready.

“We got quite the conundrum then, don’t we?” Cox said, and grinned a little.

“Pretty conundrummy,” Leonard said.

Speed was a little to my left rear, but I could see him well enough. Across the way was Crew Cut, and not far from him were Cox and the girl, Jackie, and Givens. Leonard was off to my right.

“You know what?” Leonard said. “I’m going to step a little wide, in case my man here decides to shoot. He’s got dead aim, but I don’t want to be in the line of fire. He might let a lot of bullets go.”

“You really good?” Speed asked me.

“There’s all manner of opinions floating around,” I said.

“He will blow your head off, Speed,” Leonard said, without looking back at me, keeping his eyes on the others. “It will happen so fast you’ll never know you have a hole in you.”

I thought: Don’t build it up so much, Leonard. This Speed guy, he looks like someone who would like to try me out, and I’d rather not. But I didn’t let on I was worried. I smiled a lot. I was one confident and happy-looking sonofabitch.

“I’m thinking I might like to try you, fast man,” Speed said.

Shit. I knew it.

“We don’t have to, you know,” I said.

“You sound a little scared,” Speed said.

“It’s just I don’t like having to clean my gun,” I said. “All that smoke in the barrel. The cost of a bullet.”

“You know what I think,” Speed said, pushing his coat back so the butt of his holstered gun could be seen. “I don’t think you’re that—”

I drew and wheeled and shot him, right in the center of the chest. I wheeled again, toward Crew Cut. He was struggling his gun out of the holster beneath his coat. I shot him in the arm. The gun he’d grabbed went flipping away and he fell back against the car, grabbed his arm, said, “Shit.”

Leonard had his gun out now. It was about time.

“Damn, Hap,” Leonard said. “That was some good shooting.”

“Wasn’t bad,” I said. “Disarm the dick cheese.”

Leonard pointed his gun at them. He said, “You, Nora, you get their guns from them, bring them over here and toss them on the ground behind the car. You get feisty, I’ll put a hole in you. I got a rule, anyone tries to hurt me gets hurt, male, female, wild animal. And if they got hide-out guns, those better come out slow and easy too, not be hanging around for later. Something like that would make me irritable, and like the Hulk, you wouldn’t like me when I’m mad.”

Nora did as she was told. It was quite a pile of guns she dumped behind the car. When she was finished, Leonard said to her, “You come over here and get in our car. Sit in the backseat, put your hands in your lap, and look prim.”

Nora got in the backseat of the car the way a child in trouble will do.

I went over to Speed. I had been watching him carefully ever since he hit the ground, except for when I shot the Crew Cut fellow. He was bleeding badly and his eyes were blinking very fast. He wasn’t even trying to reach for his gun. I knelt down beside him.

“Damn, my man,” Speed said, coughing a little. “I never even cleared leather.”

“That’s because I’m faster than you,” I said.

Speed made a barking laugh that tossed blood onto his lips. “You’re the real deal,” he said.

“Frankly,” I said, “I didn’t know that until just now.”

I pulled his gun from its holster, just in case he might be stronger than he looked, though the way he lay there he gave the impression that lifting his fingers would be a serious workout. I lifted his head up so he wouldn't choke on his blood. I turned my head, said to the young man: "Your name is Jackie, right?"

He nodded.

"You have the sports coat man there give you his coat."

"My arm hurts," Crew Cut said. "And I like this coat."

"Give him the coat anyway," I said, "or you won't have to worry about hurting."

Jackie went over and Crew Cut worked his way out of the coat. Jackie brought the coat to me. He said, "Don't hurt Nora. This wasn't any of her idea."

"I don't believe that," I said, "but she isn't going to get hurt as long as she doesn't get cute. Now, sit down there on the ground in front of my car."

Jackie went over and did just that. I rolled the coat up and put it under Speed's head.

"Bullet didn't have much impact," Speed said, still gurgling blood.

"It was enough," I said.

"I mean I didn't feel it so much," he said. "But I can hardly move."

"That's because you haven't had time to feel it," I said. "Now shut up. You're spitting blood."

Speed lay quietly on the sports coat.

I got out my cell phone and made a call.

Next day we were at Marvin's office, in our usual spots. Marvin behind his desk, me in the chair in front of it, Leonard sitting by the coffee machine, munching on vanilla wafers. At least he had bought those with his own money.

Marvin said, “I called you here to tell you the cops believe your story, about how you thought you were just getting the girl back and they tried to kill you, so you shot them. They’re not too happy about you going out there without calling them, not telling them what the deal was, but I think they’re in a forgiving mood. They been wanting Cox on something that would stick, and you two talking at a trial, and Givens talking to save his own bacon, that’ll nail him. And way I figure it is you’ll be all right ’cause they’ll be shit-blind happy you helped nail Cox.”

“What about Speed?” I said.

“They think he’s going to make it and get to go to prison,” Marvin said. “He appears to be as tough as boot leather.”

“But he’s not near as fast as he thought he was,” Leonard said. “My man here is like fucking Wild Bill Hickock.”

“I got lucky,” I said. “And I shot him while he was talking.”

“Well,” Marvin said, “I think his future career is woodshop in prison.”

“What about Nora?” I asked.

“The kid, Jackie, he’s saying she didn’t know anything about it, and so’s the old man. She’s gone back to her stepmother. I think the cops will let that stand. Givens will get some time too. He’s backing Jackie’s story about the girl having nothing to do with it. Guess he wanted to have the same story Cox had. He’s helping put Cox in prison, but maybe he didn’t want to go the whole hog, thinks he might get a brownie point or two.”

“Think he will?” I asked.

“Nope,” Marvin said. “They will most likely have him shanked in prison. They do, no tears here.”

Leonard said, “Me either.”

I have to admit, I didn’t see myself shedding tears for that lying, conniving weasel.

“I believe Nora thought she found true love,” I said, “and would get some money out of her father, and she’d have some teenage revenge on her stepmother. For what, I’m not sure, but it seems that’s how she was thinking. She was close to her, but maybe she got unclose when she started to grow up and thought Daddy was putting more attention into Sharon than her. No idea really.”

“Frankly,” Leonard said, “my take is she’s just stupid. Probably glad it’s over, probably glad to be home. Probably forget Jackie in a year’s time. You can bet the way she’ll tell it to Sharon is she was forced. I think that little shit’s a born liar. One of those entitled turds who think they have the best of everything coming just because they are who they think they are, not necessarily who they are.”

“That’s some serious psychoanalyst shit going on there,” I said.

“Naw,” Leonard said. “I just sort of made that up.”

“Actually, that’s what I really thought,” I said.

“I think that’s what Sharon wants her to do—just pretend things are fine between them until they are,” Leonard said. “In the long run, I think she figures what really happened won’t matter, and she’s probably right. And maybe Nora really did find true love, because Jackie didn’t tell it different, and Cox didn’t say his son was lying, so you got to give the old man points for going with what his son said. I think the cops want to let Nora go. They got the fish they wanted to fry and could care less about the minnows.”

“Cox family values,” I said. “Kind of touching. Go figure.”

Brett and I were lying in bed. I said, “I love you.”

Brett turned and put her arm across my chest. “I love you too.”

“I asked you to marry me, would you? Right now, if I asked?”

“Are you asking?”

“I’m running a test,” I said.

“A test, huh,” Brett said.

“Yeah.”

“I don’t know, baby. Really, I don’t. I want to, but you know, I got married once before and it ended with me setting my husband’s head on fire.”

“So, you get married, you have to go for gasoline and a match?”

She laughed.

“No, I’m just saying what happened before, my first attempt at wedded bliss. What I’d say about us is this. Let’s give it some thought. Let’s see if it’s something that really matters, and if it does, we’ll get past talking about it. Maybe we’ll decide things are just fine the way they are and we don’t need a piece of paper.”

“I know. I’m just saying let’s think about how much it matters to us. Give it some thought, some time.”

“All right,” I said.

“Do you want to play doctor?”

“No,” I said. “I’d just like to hold you.”

“Really?” she said.

“Really.”

“That works too,” Brett said, and so I held her.

A Bone-Dead Sadness

It was about one o'clock in the afternoon with nothing to do but read email. It was mostly ads. Marvin Hanson was trying to figure out how to filter the ads, and not having much luck at it, when he came across an email to his website that was interesting.

It said:

MR. HANSON. I WANT TO HIRE YOU OR YOUR OPERATIVES, IF YOU HAVE ANY. MONEY IS NOT AN ISSUE. WELL, IT MIGHT BE AN ISSUE IF YOU ASK FOR TOO MUCH, BUT OTHERWISE, IF YOU'RE INTERESTED, COME OUT TO TIMBER LAKE DRIVE, 113, AND TALK TO ME ABOUT THREE P.M. TODAY. MILDRED CRAVER.

Hanson leaned back in his desk chair and thought a moment. He looked at his watch. He had come in late today, starting with lunch, and had only been in the office thirty minutes. It was already one-thirty.

Marvin leaned forward and typed: SEE YOU THEN, MARVIN HANSON.

Marvin sat in his desk for a moment and considered. He knew the area of the address in the email. Once nice, kind of gone to seed, but there were people out there that had money. Mildred said it wasn't an issue, but she had also curiously, and perhaps with humorous intent, added the part about asking too much.

There hadn't been much in the way of work lately, and certainly not enough to hire any operatives, that being mostly two of his friends, Hap Collins and Leonard Pine. They weren't worth messing with unless there was real business to take care of. Actually, friends or not, they were kind of a pain in the ass.

Nope. This was one he'd take care of himself.

Considering his leg, which had given him grief for some time due to a car accident, was much better, he thought he could handle it all himself. He still carried a cane, but mostly for psychological support. It was also a good weapon if he should need it. He thought about getting himself one with a sword inside of it, but it probably wouldn't play out well if he ended up using it. For now, he'd stick to the cane he had—solid hickory with a knob, not a hook.

Marvin got up without use of the cane and made a cup of coffee. He drank that while he sat at his desk reading the rest of his email. That finished, he made a phone call to his wife. Their marriage had a few bumps they were ironing out, and had been ironing out for years, but Marvin knew he had brought it on himself. Fact was, the wreck that had messed up his leg and nearly killed him had involved a girlfriend he was seeing.

Pussy.

It made a man crazy. Even a good man, and he liked to think that's what he was. But the thing was, he had cheated on his wife, and she knew, and she took him back. Even if she did remind him of it daily, and not always directly. She didn't have to. She just gave him a look that made him feel like a worm on a hot rock. She did it less as time went on, and he liked to think he had proven to her that he had acquired better sense, but a certain element of trust had been lost, and maybe forever.

Anyway, he called her. It was a short talk, and mostly pleasant. She no longer checked on him, which was a mixed bag. It either meant she trusted him a lot more than before or just didn't care anymore.

When they finished talking, he fiddled with the email awhile longer, then pulled a book out of his desk drawer and read a bit of it. It was pretty good. Hank and Muddy, by Stephen Mertz.

He put it away after an hour and drove over to Starbucks and bought some coffee at the drive-through. It was better than the coffee he made. Decaf with soy milk and two artificial sweeteners. He sipped it as he drove out to Timber Lake Drive.

When he got there he saw the area had gone downhill a might more than he thought, but the house he was looking for hadn't gone downhill at all. In fact, it was sitting on top of one surrounded by trees. The yard looked as if it had just been clipped and the sky even looked brighter over the roof, as if the sunlight had saved itself for that location.

Marvin parked and got out. He had left his cane at the office, on purpose, now he was having second thoughts. He limped a little as he went up the steps and knocked on the door. After a short time, a middle-aged woman answered.

"Mrs. Craver?" Marvin asked.

She smiled. "I am, but I think you're looking for the other Mrs. Craver. Babe Craver. That's what everyone calls her. My mother-in-law. Would you please come in?"

Marvin did just that. It was a nice house. Not a mansion, but nice. The younger Mrs. Craver went away in search of the older.

When the older Mrs. Craver showed up, she looked old enough to have ridden in on a mammoth. She moved well enough, but there was something about her gait that gave the impression that she was near worn out. She had very white false teeth that fit like they were too big for her mouth. She had hair that looked more orange than red and her face was marked with lines that looked to have been the results of chickens scratching through the pale powder on her face. Her lipstick was a little lopsided, like a monkey had put it on her in the dark. Marvin judged her age to be about Three B.C.

"Won't you sit down, Mr. Hanson?" she said.

There was a couch, so Marvin sat. She sat too, though it took her awhile. Marvin commiserated. He wasn't her age, but his leg had given him hell for quite a few years, so he recognized how she was trying not to show pain. He liked her immediately. Old as history, and tough as stone.

"Are you open to all manner of investigation?" she asked.

"I think I am. I have to hear the job to know."

"Do you rough people up?"

"Not that I'd admit to."

The old woman grinned her false teeth. "That's all right. I was just checking. I don't want you to beat anyone up. I just like to know if you're a tough guy."

"Do I need to be?"

"Nope. But my husband was, and I liked that about him. He was a good guy, but he was tough. They don't make men tough anymore. You look pretty tough though."

"It would take a dog a long time to eat me, I think."

"Ha," she said. "What I want is to find out what happened to my son, Tom."

"How long has he been missing?"

"Twenty-five years."

"Yikes."

"Yep. Yikes. He went missing twenty-five years ago and I haven't so much as heard a peep from him. I figure he's dead, but I'd like you to look into it. If he is dead, I'd like to know how he ended up and where he is before I pass away. I don't know how long I got left, but I wouldn't count on much. I got up this morning and felt so bad I thought I was dead for a couple of hours."

"You look spry enough," Marvin said.

"You sweet liar."

"When was he last seen and where?"

"The bank, twenty-five years ago," said the younger Mrs. Craver, who was entering the room again, carrying a tray with a pitcher of ice tea on it and three glasses. Marvin had heard her banging around in the kitchen and had hoped some kind of drink would be the result.

"This is my daughter-in-law, Frankie," said Mrs. Craver. "She lives with me."

"I'm more like a daughter," Frankie said.

"True enough," Mrs. Craver said.

Frankie sat. She was a thick lady with thick ankles and a thick neck. Her face showed a former beauty hidden under some fat. "He came to see me at the bank, and that was the last time anyone saw him."

"Just a visit?"

"Actually. . . ," Frankie glanced at Mrs. Craver when she spoke.

"It's okay," Mrs. Craver said. "He's going to find him, he's got to have the whole package."

"He was fresh out of prison and he came to see me about money."

"Your money or the bank's?" Marvin asked.

"My money that he wanted to make his money," Frankie said. "I didn't give it to him."

"Tom had his faults," Mrs. Craver said. "And in fact, he was a shit and not worth the powder to blow him up. But he was my son, and in some place deep in the back of my old withered heart, I love him and want to know what happened to him. I presume an untimely end. But after twenty-five years, the police, and four private investigators who have found nothing, I thought I'd give it another try. I was told at the police department that you used to be a cop and that you were known to manage some tough jobs, and sometimes you were known to stretch things a little, but not so much that they snapped."

"Not that anyone knows about," Marvin said.

"I'm not sure you're joking," Mrs. Craver said.

Marvin didn't say anything to that.

"No matter what the outcome," Mrs. Craver said, "I'd like to know what happened to him."

"Tell me about his coming to see you," Marvin said to Frankie.

"I worked a desk in the bank," Frankie said. "The Standard Bank. I was a loan officer. That's when the bank was in the old section. Before the newer section was built."

Marvin considered that. The old bank had been scheduled to be torn down at one time, until the historical society made a big stink about it. There was history with the old bank. Once it had been robbed at the turn of the century. One of the first robberies by car, before all the famous guys like Bonnie and Clyde came along. Marvin didn’t really remember all that much about it.

“He came to see me, wanting money,” Frankie said. “It was about closing time, and I remembered the whole thing embarrassed me. I didn’t give him any money. He left. That was the last time I ever saw him. That was the last time anyone in the bank ever saw him. No one else has ever claimed to have seen him since.”

“The law, the private detectives,” Marvin asked. “Did they come up with anything?”

Mrs. Craver tapped some thin folders that were lying on the coffee table between them. “These are the police reports, and the reports from the private investigators. Well, three of them. The fourth took our money and went to bars and never looked any farther than the bartender. We sued him. We won, but he didn’t have any money and he spent ours.”

“All right,” Marvin said. “Any special interests or friends that Tom may have had? That kind of thing.”

“He was short in the friend department,” Frankie said. “He was, of all things, a rodeo clown for awhile, then a circus clown. He actually ran off to the circus.”

“When he was eighteen,” Mrs. Craver said. “He was our youngest. All the other kids, and there are three others, did quite well for themselves. But Tom, he was always a pain in the ass. He took gymnastics, and baseball, and was good at all of them.”

“He was a contortionist in the circus,” Frankie said. “I figured when he went away that day, he just joined back up with the circus.”

“I believe it was actually a carnival that he worked for,” Mrs. Craver said.

“Whatever,” Frankie said. “He worked for them from time to time. He could dislocate his shoulders and put his foot behind his head. It wasn’t a skill that served him well outside of the carnival, and he didn’t work there often. He was always looking for the easy way out.”

“You don’t sound like you miss him much,” Marvin said to Frankie.

Frankie looked at Mrs. Craver.

“It’s okay, dear,” Mrs. Craver said. “I understand that you two weren’t that close. Not in the end. It doesn’t matter.”

Frankie reached out and touched Mrs. Craver’s arm. “You know I love you.”

“Of course I do,” Mrs. Craver said. She looked at Marvin. “She takes very good care of me. Better than my own children. She moved in with me to take care of me.”

“So you and Tom weren’t close,” Marvin said to Frankie, “because of Tom’s work habits, or lack thereof, and his time in prison.”

“That would be a lot of it,” Frankie said. “That and the fact he chased every woman he saw. He was charming, but it was all BS. We were separated at the time of his disappearance. When he got out of prison, he wanted us to get back together. I had heard that before. And he’d mean it when he said it. For about a week, or until I gave him some money. My guess was in no time he’d be back in prison.”

“What did he go to prison for?” Marvin asked.

“Burglary,” Frankie said.

“All right,” Marvin said. “I guess that does me for now. I might have some questions later.”

“That’s fine,” Mrs. Craver said. “Shall we settle on a fee?”

They talked money. It was good money they were talking, and Marvin felt it was one hell of a good deal they settled on. A good fee to look and report, a better fee if he found out where Tom was, or what had happened to him.

When the deal was struck, Marvin picked up the files from the coffee table. “I’ll return these when I finish.”

“That’s fine,” Mrs. Craver said. “Do you think you can find out what happened to Tom?”

“But it’s possible?” Mrs. Craver said.

“Yes,” Marvin said. “But there are no guarantees.”

“I understand,” Mrs. Craver said.

“However,” Marvin said, “if it’s any consolation, if anyone can figure out what happened to him, or where he is, it’s me.”

“That’s not a very modest view,” Mrs. Craver said, showing her false teeth.

“No, it isn’t. But it’s not a brag either. Just fact.” Frankie walked Marvin out to his car. When he opened the door to get in, he paused and leaned on it.

“I was trying to give her some hope in there,” Marvin said, “and I meant what I said about being good at what I do. But, it really is a long shot.”

“I realize that,” Frankie said. “And frankly, as far as Tom goes, I don’t really give a damn. He can be dead. He can be alive, living in Argentina with Hitler, and I don’t care. But, for her there’s always going to be a bone-dead sadness about her until she knows what happened to him, good or bad. Therefore, it matters to me. For her sake.”

“Is there anyone else that worked at the bank at that time that may remember Tom’s visit?”

“You doubt me?”

“Someone may have noticed something you didn’t.”

“And they’d remember twenty-five years later?” Frankie said. “I think the other detectives went over that.”

“A lot of detective work is looking at old information in a new way.”

“Well, I think James Raymond saw him, but he’s no longer around. He was the bank manager at the time. It was a small bank then, they were about to build the new one. He knew Tom in passing. But, as I said, he’s dead, so that doesn’t matter. There was Tiffany Millar. She was a teller. In fact, there was the manager, me, Tiffany, and old Mrs. Thompson. She did the books. She’s long dead as well. That was the whole bank staff back then.”

“All right,” Marvin said. “Thanks. And, good-bye.”

That evening at the dinner table, Marvin said to his wife, Rachel, “It’s a pretty odd case. Guy’s been missing twenty-five years.”

“You think he’s dead?”

“I think it’s highly possible. Likely even. But it’s also possible he’s living somewhere under another name.”

“He could be back in prison.”

“I checked that. That would have been easy for the law or the previous investigators to figure out. Even if Tom had been using an assumed name, he got caught doing something he shouldn’t, the fingerprints would have ratted him out. No. He’s either dead or out there in hiding.”

When they were through eating, Rachel said, “I’m going to go to bed.”

“Pretty early,” Marvin said. “We could watch some TV.”

“No. That’s all right.”

“Rachel?”

“Yes.”

“I’m trying.”

“Trying what?” she said.

“You know. To make up for things.”

“Sure. I know.”

“Can’t you forgive me?”

“I forgive you, Marvin. I just can’t forget.”

“Will you ever be able to forget?”

“No,” she said. “Of course not. You don’t forget getting burned, or hit by a car, or cheated on.”

“Stupid question.”

“Yes, it was. But maybe I can forgive more in time. I’m trying to. I want to. I’m just not there yet.”

“It’s been a long time,” Marvin said.

“Trust. Hard thing to get back, Marvin.”

“I know. I don’t know what I was thinking. I love you. I have always loved you. I just don’t know what I was thinking.”

“I do.”

“All right. Yeah. I was thinking that. No excuse. I was a dog.”

“Yes, you were.”

“She’s dead.”

“I mean with anyone. It never will.”

“I believe you.”

"Then?"

"It still hurts. In time, maybe it won't. I'm going up to bed."

"I'll be right up, soon as I finish my milk."

"Don't hurry."

"No problem."

"No," Rachel said. "You watch some TV. That would be good. You come up after awhile."

Marvin knew what that meant. After she was asleep.

"All right," he said. "I'll take care of the dishes."

Rachel got up from the table and leaned over and kissed him on top of the head and went upstairs. Marvin watched her go. When she was gone he finished his milk and picked up the dishes, then went into the living room and got the TV Guide. He looked it over. There was nothing he wanted to see. He stretched out on the couch. He thought about Tom and what happened to him. He got up and got the files and looked at those. He read them for awhile. He decided to go up and go to bed, but he knew he would just have his cold space on the far side of the mattress.

He put the files away, stretched out on the couch, and thought about Florida, the woman he had cheated with, the one who was dead now. But that was a different deal, and he didn't want to think about that. He thought about the Craver case a little more, and then he fell asleep.

At the office the next morning, Marvin went to the bank website. It was a lot of what he already knew and had been told by Frankie and Mrs. Craver.

The old bank had once been scheduled to be torn down. It had been sealed off as soon as it was closed, and for about two years the new bank was in a larger rented building on the other side of town. The plan was to destroy the old bank and build a new, larger, more modern one on the site. Instead, property next door to the old bank opened up and was purchased for the new bank. It was decided the old bank would be used for storage for awhile, and when the new bank was built, it would be torn down and that area would become a parking lot.

The storage plan never materialized. The new bank was built next to the old one, and the old one was saved by the city's historical society. Later, the new bank expanded even more and the old one was connected to it and was turned into a tourist attraction, which garnered money for the town with its simple tour and gift shop. Hanson thought about all that, decided there was nothing there that helped him much.

The notes from the private detectives offered a little more. An armored car that delivered money to the bank came up missing for a couple of days, was later found down in the Sabine River bottoms. The two drivers were there too, but they had bullet holes in their heads. No money was in the truck at the time, and therefore nothing was stolen.

Odd.

And odder yet, the bank manager Frankie said was dead was indeed that. But not of natural causes. He had been murdered a month after Tom disappeared. Marvin thought it odd that Frankie hadn't mentioned that. One of the private investigators had thought this might be important, said so in his notes, but apparently, whatever that importance was, he had never been able to link it up.

From the notes, no one at the police department had ever spoken to Tiffany Millar, the teller. Only the private detectives, and they didn't really have anything of value from her in the notes.

He looked her up in the phone book. He called and she answered on the first ring.

"Excuse me. Is this Tiffany Millar?"

"It is."

"Who used to work at the bank?"

"I did. Who is this?"

"My name is Marvin Hanson. I've been hired by Mrs. Craver to look into the disappearance of her son."

"Again? I talked to private detectives about this before."

"I know. It's probably just old hat, but I wanted to speak with you. We can do it over the phone, or in person if you prefer."

"I'm bored. How about I meet you somewhere?"

"My office okay?"

"Do you have good coffee?"

"No."

"Starbucks?"

"When?"

"Now. Like I said, I'm bored."

They met at Starbucks. Hanson, who had already had morning coffee, ordered decaffeinated with soy milk and two artificial sweeteners. He bought Tiffany's drink, which looked to be something chocolate with whipped cream and colored sprinkles on top.

Tiffany, one hot fifty-year-old blonde who looked to have had only minimal surgery on her face, sat at the table and crossed her legs, which were long and smooth and clothed in high-heel shoes. Marvin thought: Who wears high heels in the middle of the day to go to Starbucks? But, he didn't mind all that much, and since he assumed she sat the way she did so she could show him her legs, he let her.

She smiled at Marvin. He was sure it was a smile that had melted many a male heart and made many a female mad. It was doing something to him as well, though the area it was affecting was somewhat lower than the heart.

"I don't know I can add much to help," she said. "All I know is Tom came up missing and no one has found him, and that he came into the bank that day and spoke with Frankie. She was cute then," she said. "Though I think time has been somewhat rough on her."

"Not financially," Marvin said.

"No. Not so bad in that department." Tiffany said all of this between sips of her drink. "She endures."

"Is there anything you can tell me about that day?"

"Tom came in and spoke to Frankie at her desk, and they argued a little, and then he left."

"Did you hear anything they said?"

"No. Not really. I think it was over money. He wanted some, and she didn't want to give it to him. I think they were not really together by then. He just hoped they were. And I don't think it was for love. I think it was money, because his mother wouldn't give him any more, and he thought his wife might. I think Frankie and her mother-in-law were close."

"Still are," Marvin said.

"Okay. But it wasn't love. It was her money, and the money he thought he might get from his mother by way of his wife."

"How do you know it wasn't love he was after?" Marvin said.

"Because he had hit on me before, right after he got out of prison."

"He came in before that?"

"He came in three or four times," Tiffany said. "He'd walk around and look the bank over, and act like he was interested in the place. You know, it was still the old bank in that day, and it had a kind of pioneer feel about it. It was old and small. It's a museum now. You should have a look at it."

"I will."

"He liked to look around and see the bullet holes in the wall. The bank had been robbed in the early nineteen-hundreds, old cowboy-style, except the robbers came with a car instead of a horse and got shot to death before they left town. They were shot with some kind of big gun. Shot so much it knocked one of them out of his boots. The car had a flat, you see, and the law caught up."

"But you didn't hear anything odd between Frankie and Tom?"

"If I did, I've forgotten it. I just remember it was an argument and money came up, and that was it. I really didn't mean to hear that much, but it was hard to help, you know. Small bank."

"Did Tom talk to anyone there besides her that time, or for that matter, the time before?"

"Just hit on me. Oh, I guess he chummed it up with everyone. He was a real glad-hander. A bullshitter, you might say. Excuse my language. TV has ruined the way I talk."

"Did you and Frankie socialize outside of the bank?"

"Usually just bank functions."

"What about the bank manager?"

Tiffany was suddenly a little less light. "Jim was found dead, you know."

"What did he die of?"

"Two bullet holes."

"Oh," Marvin said, as if he didn't know. "How long after Tom disappeared did that happen?"

"About two weeks, I think. Yes. That seems about right."

Marvin studied Tiffany. She looked not only less light, but he thought she looked teary.

"You were close to him?"

"Not really," Tiffany said. "He was my boss, of course."

"Did he get along with everyone at the bank?"

"Quite well," Tiffany said. "Frankie, well . . . I think he may have gotten along with her too well."

"They had something going?"

"I suppose there's nothing wrong with that. She and Tom were separated. But she did work for him. It wasn't seemly, the way she carried on. It wasn't that she was at anytime a great looker, so I don't understand his attraction."

"You said she was cute," Marvin said.

"Like a Chinese pug, but not pretty."

"So, the boss liked her?"

"I doubt it was anything serious."

Marvin sipped his coffee. None of this had been in the notes. And another thing not in the notes, and left unsaid, but seemingly said beneath the conversation, was the fact that Tiffany had had designs on the boss herself.

Marvin decided to come right out with it.

"Did you have interest in Jim?"

"Of course not."

“A beautiful woman like you, and he didn’t notice?”

The beautiful woman line perked Tiffany up, but the glow faded quickly. “Oh, he noticed. He noticed plenty. It made Frankie mad, the way he noticed. It made her mad plenty.” Tiffany leaned back with satisfaction and drank her coffee. She licked at the whipped cream at the top of the straw like a cat licking milk.

“He just noticed?” Marvin said. “That’s all? Just noticed?”

“Yes. He just noticed. Are you looking into all of this again?”

This seemed like a stupid question, since that was why he had invited her to coffee, but he said, “Yes. I think the previous detectives might have missed something.”

“What would that be?”

“Don’t know yet, but I’m going to find out. They skimmed the surface. That’s what I get from reading their notes anyway. Me, I’m tenacious.”

“Are you?” she said.

“Very much so. It’s a cold day in hell when I quit.”

“I see. Well, that’s certainly a good quality in your line of work.”

“I like to think so.”

“Nothing else I can help you with, I suppose I should run along. I have a few errands to take care of.”

“If I think of something I’ve forgotten, would it be alright to call you up again?”

“I just can’t imagine having anything else to say on the matter. I’ve told you all I know. To tell the truth, I think Tom’s gone forever and no one will ever find him.”

“I’ve found people missing for years before,” Marvin said. “Sometimes they were even alive. So, you never know.”

She stood up with her drink in her hand. “Good luck to you, then.”

She stuck out her free hand. Marvin stood and shook it.

The next moment she was out the door.

Marvin drove by the bank. It was a pretty large building, and there were a number of drive-through outlets associated with it scattered throughout town.

It seemed to Marvin it hadn’t been that long ago when the old bank, which was a fifth the size of the new one, was the only one in use. But when he counted up the years in his head, he winced. Time flew quickly and was as merciless as a hawk.

The new bank was attached to the old one, but the old one was now a museum and could be entered only by the original front door. Marvin did just that. The old bank had a lot of exposed fine wood, and there was a huge red brick fireplace to one side, and there were tellers’ desks, and at the back was a glassed-in section that had been the manager’s office. He remembered that from when he was a kid. He had lived in Houston at that time but visited LaBorde often, as his aunt had lived here. Dead and gone now, he had tagged along with her a number of times as she did her banking. It made him feel good to do it.

There was a woman at the desk and she smiled at Marvin and he smiled back. She was a plump woman in a loud flower pattern dress, but she had a gorgeous brown face and short black hair.

Marvin paid his dollar. He walked around. There really wasn’t much to see. The bullet holes had a frame around them and there was a placard there that said they had been shot into the wall by one of the robbers, Dog-Face Fulton, just to show he and his two pals meant business. This may have let the people in the bank at that time know he was serious, but it also alerted the law, who took note of the getaway driver outside, and promptly chased them down and shot them to pieces. Fulton may have been dangerous, but he wasn't smart.

Marvin was surprised to discover that the bank really was small. Even smaller than he remembered. As a child, it had seemed so imposing. He walked to the back and looked in at the glassed-in manager's office. It was claimed by another placard on the wall that all the furniture in the manager's office, and throughout the bank, was the original furniture in the same position, dating all the way back to the bank robbery. Probably was. It seemed like the same furniture he remembered.

Marvin stopped at the fireplace. There was a placard there. It said the fireplace ceased to be in use after the bank closed, but at one time it was the only heat for the bank. He walked past the desk where the lady sat. He said, "So, the front door was the only way in when the bank was in use."

"No, you could come in from the back street," the lady said, and pointed at a sealed door. "That door leads into the new bank, but it used to be an outside entrance. There was an alley there. Oh, and there was a storage room off to the left of the door. That's gone too. It got incorporated into the new bank."

It was funny that he and she both thought of it as the new bank. It was only new as compared to the museum.

"I see," Marvin said, and thanked her and started to leave. But then he paused. He walked to where the old back entrance had been. There was a door there, but it was locked. He looked where the storage room would have been. He faintly remembered its location, and the doorway from the alley. Where the storage room had been located, there was only a wall.

He went back to the desk. “So where the wall is, there was a storage room?” he said as if he didn’t know better, hadn’t really listened to her.

The lady smiled the way you might for a little child who was easily distracted. “Yes, that’s right. But everything else is the same.”

“Everything?”

“All the desks, everything. Just like they were, all the way back to the robbery.”

“Like the placard says,” he said.

“Just like that,” she said, losing a tiny bit of patience.

Marvin didn’t blame her, but he thought it best to double-check. His memory wasn’t perfect about the old bank, and he wanted to make sure the placards weren’t shining on their history a bit more than was true.

Marvin looked at the back door. If someone had walked out that way, they could easily have stepped into the storage room, if they were being clever, without being seen by anyone. Unless that person was sitting where this lady was sitting now.

Marvin said, “This desk is original?”

“Yes, it is,” the lady said, “as I said.”

“Is this its original location? I mean, was it setting here back twenty-five years ago?”

“Wait a minute,” the lady said.

She pulled open her desk drawer and pulled out a small stack of papers. She said, “This is a copy of the original layout. . . . Yes, it looks as if the desk was here all the way back to the eighteen-hundreds." She pushed the paper across the desk toward Marvin. "See," she said, "everything is pretty much the same. You can check for yourself."

"May I have a copy of the layout?" Marvin asked.

"There are plenty. I suppose I should put them out here on the desk, it's just that no one really seems all that interested in how things were laid out back then . . . I mean, you look around, and you can see that, how it was laid out. But if you'd like, certainly. Take one. Take two."

"One will do," Marvin said, took the sheet of paper, smiled, and went out.

Marvin stopped by the police station. He was lucky. His friend, the chief of police, was in. He was invited into the office. The chief was a cop named Drake who had been bumped up to the position recently. LaBorde went through chiefs of police like toilet paper for prune-juice drinkers.

Drake was thin and black as night. He had a flat nose that was partly due to genetics and partly due to someone's fist. He was leaning back in his chair, smiling at Marvin. "There's coffee, you want it."

Marvin stopped at the coffee table and fixed him a cup, lots of cream and sweetener. Marvin sat down and took a sip. He said, "Man, who shit in this?"

"I do the shitting," Drake said. "Every morning. It gives the stuff some bite."

Marvin took the coffee to the trashcan and dropped it inside.

"You'll make everything wet," Drake said.

"There's a liner."

Marvin sat back down. He said, "Twenty-five years ago, a fellow named Tom Craver disappeared. He was never found. Know anything about it?"

"They don't know where he is," Drake said, and grinned.

"Thanks."

"It's a cold case. I know a little about it. I even looked into it once. Not very seriously, I admit. But it came up again when I was a cop, not a chief, and we have that cold-case unit, which is two tired cops, one of which at the time was me, and a police dog without all his teeth and a surly attitude."

"The dog helps on cold cases?" Marvin said.

"Not that I can see. He doesn't even sniff drugs very well. But, can't fire him. Union, you know."

"Uh-huh. So, nothing?"

"I don't remember a whole lot about it," Drake said. "Just that this guy Tom disappeared and they didn't find him. He was at the bank one day. Spoke to his wife, or ex-wife. I forget the exact situation. Anyway, he spoke to her, went out, and no one ever saw him again."

"I hear the bank manager turned up dead of gunshots," Marvin said.

"Oh, yeah. I remember that. Sure. No connection that anyone could find, though this Tom had a record, you see, and some thought it was him. That he wanted to rob the bank, maybe by getting the manager to help him out at gunpoint. There was an argument, and he shot the manager and killed him in his car while it was sitting in the drive. Anyway, some thought this Tom was good for it, but we never found him. Tom, wasn't he some kind of circus guy?"

"Carnival. He was a contortionist. Clown. That sort of thing."

"Yeah," Drake said. "I remember now."

"Anything else curious?"

"Let me see. Hell, there was the guard and the driver."

"Excuse me?"

"The armored car," Drake said. "They delivered money to the bank, and a week later, them and their armored car were found in the Sabine River, some good many miles from here. They were both shot in the head."

"How many times?" Marvin said.

"What? Oh. I get you. Twice, I think. We can get the files and look, to make sure, but I think it was twice. You're saying it was the same as the manager?"

"I'm saying they both got shot twice," Marvin said. "A bit of a coincidence. I'm assuming the armored car made deliveries and or pickups at the bank."

"Yep," Drake said. "And a connection was thought of then, but none was found. No money came up missing. The bank was even. The armored car showed up there. The manager checked the money in. The money was put in the bank, and the right amount was there the next morning, and a week later. No one ever figured why the guards were killed, as they weren't carrying money at the time, and no one ever figured why the bank manager was killed. A connection was implied, but never found. It seems to have all been a coincidence."

"I believe in them," Marvin said. "Happens all the time. But three of them? The armored truck guard and driver. The manager of the bank. And Tom Craver missing. That seems like a lot of coincidences, and all of them at least mildly related."

"How do you see it?"

"Not sure," Marvin said. "I think Tom might have gone in and talked to his wife, and then acted as if he left the bank, but maybe hid in a storage room."

"To do what, use the bathroom later?" Drake said. "Nothing was stolen."

"That's where my theory has a hole in it," Marvin said.

"And that puts you right back in the position where everyone else has ended up. Except no one has ever thought Tom hid out in the storage room. And if he did, to what purpose?"

"You're making me feel bad," Marvin said.

"You getting paid good money for this?"

"I am."

"Monopoly money?"

"Nope. The real stuff."

"Who's paying?"

"Tom's mother."

Drake nodded. "She's got some dough."

"Yep."

"I know you're going to actually try and find Tom. I think some of the other detectives, from what I've heard, didn't. I have a feeling you're going to end up tired and frustrated."

"You knew them? The private detectives?"

"One. He wasn't so good in the reputation department. He probably did enough to make it appear he took a serious look, but I think he mostly looked at his name on the check Mrs. Craver wrote him. She's a nice sort, actually. I've met her a few times."

"I liked her," Marvin said. "She seems like a tough old bird."

"Last of a breed," Drake said. "So, you doing this with the help of your crack assholes, Hap and Leonard?"

"Don't think I need them for this."

"Good. Otherwise they might have come in with you. They give me a stomachache. Especially Leonard."

"They're my friends, and they give me a stomachache. Especially Leonard."

"You feel you're really onto something?" Drake asked.

"You ever have that sensation that there's a worm of wisdom in the back of your brain, and that it has the answer to what it is you're searching for? That it has things figured out and it's trying to burrow to the front of your head so it can let you know what's up?"

"Nope."

"Yeah," Marvin said. "Me neither."

Marvin drove back to his office. The worm in the back of his head was wiggling pretty hard now. He parked and waved at the good-looking woman who ran the bicycle shop below his place, climbed the stairs, and unlocked the door. His leg was bothering him, and when he got inside, he was glad to see his cane on his desk. He had a pretty good idea that for the rest of the day, he walked anywhere, he and it would be companions.

He made a cup of coffee, fixed it the way he wanted, was about to sit at his desk, and the door opened.

Two guys not any bigger than professional wrestlers entered the room. They weren't young, but they weren't old either. One was a little tubby, but he still looked like he could turn over a car and fuck it in the transmission. The other was leaner and had more defined muscles. He was the prettier of the two, and would have only been scary to children and small animals and old people, and well, pretty much anyone.

“You Hanson?” said the pretty one.

“That’s me,” Marvin said, and put the coffee down. He looked at them and moved toward his desk, stood behind it. He studied the men. They had an air of trouble about them. “How can I help you?”

“Look here,” said the not-so-pretty one. “We want you to leave our sister alone.”

“And who might that be?”

“Tiffany,” said the pretty one.

“I thought Tiffany and I had a nice and civil conversation,” Marvin said.

“She said you wanted to talk to her again, and she don’t want to talk,” said the pretty one.

“So she sent you troglodytes around to ask me not to call?” Marvin said. “That seems extreme.”

“Extreme, not so extreme,” said the not-so-pretty one, “we want you to not bother her anymore.”

“You know, I didn’t plan to,” Marvin said.

“That’s good,” said the not-so-pretty one. “It’s best that way.”

“I didn’t have any reason to,” Marvin said. “Until now.”

Marvin grabbed the cane and came out from behind the desk and whipped the cane over his head and caught the pretty one in the teeth. It was a good blow. Hickory is stout. The prettier of the two was soon less pretty. He was on the floor, bleeding from the mouth, spitting teeth.

The not-so-pretty one came at Marvin, and Marvin swung the cane and hit him in the knee, popped it up and caught him in the side of the jaw, then stepped in and folded the cane against his forearm and hit the not-so-pretty one in the throat with that. The man went down.

The prettier one tried to get up and Marvin kicked him in the throat. For good measure, he popped him across the back of the head with the cane. He went back quickly then to his desk, dropped the cane on it, pulled open the drawer, and took out a large automatic. He sat down in the chair behind his desk and waved it in their general direction.

“My leg hurts,” Marvin said. “So, I’m going to sit. You two can get up, but do it slow and don’t act like assholes, or I’ll shoot you full of more holes than a cheese grater. I’m in what I like to think of as one of my blue moods.”

Marvin rubbed his leg. It hurt like hell all of a sudden. The quick moves, the twisting.

“Now, what the hell is this all about?” he said.

“You knocked out some of my teeth,” said the formerly pretty one.

“Yes, I did,” Marvin said.

“It hurts.”

“I hope so. Now, both of you. Pay attention. Tell me what this is about, or I’m really going to get mad.”

“You’re already mad,” said the not-so-pretty one.

“Yes, but this isn’t as mad as I get.”

“Our sister wanted us to tell you to quit.”

“Let me tell you something,” Marvin said. “I have a gun. I have a cane. I have two friends that are less pleasant than I am. One’s named Hap, and one’s named Leonard—he’s really unpleasant. If I don't beat you to death with my cane, or shoot you, they will find you and do one or the other if you bother me again. Do you understand?"

"They don't know us," the not-so-pretty one said.

"They'll find you," Marvin said. "You can count on that. Now, don't bother me anymore. Get up and leave, and don't let your fucking shadow darken my doorway again."

They got up slowly.

Marvin said, "Before you go. You. Asswipe, find your teeth and take them with you."

The formerly pretty one stood up and went about looking for his teeth. They were in various places around the room. He picked them up and put them in his pocket.

"Put those on ice, go to a dentist, they might can put those back in for you," Marvin said.

"We was just gonna scare you," said the not-so-pretty one. "It worked on the others."

"The others?"

"Detectives," said the not-so-pretty one.

"Now git," Marvin said.

They got.

Marvin looked up Tiffany's address and drove over there. It was a very nice house. Not as rich as the Cravers' joint, but nice nonetheless, and in a neighborhood that was even more nice. No wear and tear around there.

Parking at the curb, Marvin went to the door and pushed the bell. Tiffany answered the ring. Her pretty face fell.

"Hey," she said. "My brother lost teeth. I think Tony has a broken nose."

"I hope so," Marvin said. "They were certainly quick to call."

She tried to shut the door. Marvin stuck a foot out and blocked it. "No you don't."

"I'll call the police," she said. "You get off my property."

"I'll wait here while you call the police, and then I'll tell them about your brothers, and about how they threatened me. Had you left well enough alone, I might not have known you were dating your boss at the bank."

"You don't know that . . . I mean, that isn't true."

"Sure it is," Marvin said. "I had my suspicions from our conversation earlier. But it didn't matter to me. Not until you sent your brothers to see me. That was just plain stupid. Can I come in?"

"Are you serious?"

"As a heart attack."

"My husband gets home in half an hour," she said. "He wouldn't like you here."

"Oh, it's all right. Me and him can talk about your earlier days, about the bank, about your boss and what was going on with him."

Tiffany looked around, as if someone might be in the yard, said, "Okay, come in. But I only have twenty minutes."

"I think that'll cover it, if we can quit horsing around and get to the point."

They went into a sitting room that didn't look as if anyone ever sat there. It was very formal and smelled as clean as a hospital room, but was less charming. She waved at a chair and Marvin sat. She sat in a chair across from him.

"Ask what you like," she said.

"Your boss. You were seeing him. Right?"

"Right. That was then, though. This is now, and that's long in my past."

"You were seeing him, and so was Frankie."

"How do you know that? Frankie tell you?"

"No. You did. Or at least I could easily get that from your conversation today. It didn't really matter that much at first, but when you sent your two stupid siblings around, it sort of did. It mattered that much to you that I didn't ask about it, it had to be important."

"I just don't want my husband knowing."

"Was that before you met your husband? You and Jim."

"Yes."

"Then what do you care?" Marvin said.

"I just don't want it brought up."

Marvin nodded. "We can maybe avoid that. I think we can. If you answer some questions. And honestly, I'd hate to have to come back, or have your brothers lose more teeth."

"That was a bad idea, me sending them. It worked before. I guess I panicked. I didn't want it to come up, and for my husband to know. He can be pretty jealous, even if Jim is dead."

"Like you were jealous of Frankie?"

"I just never saw what he saw in her," she said. "We were dating, and the next thing I know, she's flirting with him, and I'm thinking, okay, look at me and look at her. I mean, even then, she wasn't pretty. But she certainly opened his nose."

"How long did the two of them date?"

"They had just started. Me and Jim still saw each other, but I could tell he was playing the field. Me, her, whoever. But her working at the bank. Well, it hurt. I liked him quite a bit.”

“All right. The day Frankie’s husband came by. Which way did he go out when he left?”

“Go out?” she asked.

“Which door?”

“Oh, my god, that’s been twenty-five years ago. I have no idea.” Tiffany looked at her watch. “He’ll be home soon.”

“Did you ever hear of any money missing from the bank?”

Tiffany knitted her brows. “Never.”

“Did all the money go straight in the vault?”

“Yes . . . well, there was the packet.”

“The packet?” Marvin asked.

“That’s right. I never quite understood about the packet. Jim explained it to me once, but I don’t remember the details, but it made enough sense then, whatever the explanation. It was some kind of extra money for the bank and was kept separate.”

“Tell me about the packet,” Marvin said.

“The armored truck. It brought the money, and it brought the packet, which was separate. The packet was kind of hush-hush because it didn’t go in the vault.”

“Where did it go?”

“In Jim’s desk drawer.”

“Was it a packet of money?”

“That’s what Jim said. That it was money, but it was separate. And that he had to make special notations and would put it in the vault later. I’m sure there was nothing wrong about it. The truck guards gave it to him and they were always there when he put the packet in the drawer, the rest in the vault.”

“How big was the packet?”

"Hefty. Like a couch pillow. It was money wrapped in paper. Or I guess it was money. It arrived every now and then, this packet. Frankie saw it too. It wasn't a big secret."

"No hiding about it? Nothing unusual."

"No," Tiffany said. "Nothing like that."

"Okay. And now I'm going to be a little more direct. Back then, were you sleeping with Jim?"

"That's none of your business. I won't answer that."

"All right. Fair enough. Was Frankie?"

Tiffany was quick to answer. "Yes. She was. I know she was."

"And how do you know?"

"Because I was very serious about Jim, and I could tell things weren't right, and then the way he and Frankie started flirting at the bank . . . a girl knows these things. And then he quit seeing me. I thought maybe we could work things out . . . then, he was murdered. I really cared about him then. Loved him, I guess. But later, I had the feeling I didn't really know him. Not really. I felt there had to be some secret for him to be killed like that. Nothing was stolen, or so I heard. He was just killed. I was even a suspect, but I was cleared. I had a solid alibi." Tiffany looked at her watch. "Please. He's so jealous. I don't want him to find out about Jim, even if it was in the past. I don't want to open that can of worms."

"One more question. How long before the old bank changed over to the new bank?"

"There was a bank holiday that weekend. All the way until Tuesday. They were already building the new bank, and Tuesday we were to move into the new one and the old one was locked off. I remember that clearly. Will that do?"

"Good enough," Marvin said, and stood up.

"So we're through?"

"Can't say for sure," Marvin said. "Probably. But no promises." Marvin headed for the door, said, "I can find my own way out."

"I bet you can, you sonofabitch," Tiffany said.

That night, at home, Marvin had dinner with his wife, then she went up to bed. He didn't even try to follow. He sat on the couch and turned on the TV and watched for awhile, and then the phone rang. He turned off the TV and answered.

It was Frankie. "I just thought you should know. Babe is in the hospital."

"What?"

"She's been having spells, and she had a bad one today. I wanted you to know, because if there's anything you've found out, any kind of comfort, even if it's a lie you can give her, that would be good."

"To tell you the truth, I might have something. I can't say for sure, but if you're willing to go to the bank museum tomorrow, I might have an answer, though I can't promise."

"It's Sunday. It's closed."

"I know. But Chief Drake can have it opened."

"Chief Drake?" Frankie said.

"Yes. And if you can come, I'd be grateful. I might need you to verify something."

"What time?"

"Ten a.m. And keep in mind, I could be all wet, and in the end I may end up embarrassed and know no more than I did when I first started."

"But you don't think that?" Frankie said.

"No, I don't."

"I'll see you then," Frankie said.

Marvin arrived at the bank museum about five till ten. Drake was there and had already had the lady Marvin had met at the museum open the doors. She was inside at her desk, not looking too happy about things. Drake was leaning against the fireplace. Frankie had yet to arrive.

Marvin nodded at the lady at the desk, leaned on his cane. "Thanks for opening up."

She said, "I'm missing church."

"Sorry," Marvin said. "I'll try not to take long."

"I don't want to go in after things start."

"I'm sorry you've missed it," he said. "This shouldn't take long, and you can get on with the rest of your day."

This didn't seem to please or inspire the lady any at all.

Frankie came through the door and nodded at Marvin. She nodded at the lady behind the desk. "Tulip," she said. "How are you?"

"I'm missing church," she said.

"Preacher just makes it up anyway," Frankie said.

Tulip gave her a confused look. Frankie said to Chief Drake, "How are you?"

"Fine," Drake said. "I'm not missing church, but I am missing sleeping in late. I don't want to miss football."

"This shouldn't take that long," Marvin said. "If I'm wrong it'll take even less time. And if I'm wrong, I'll owe you all a lunch."

“Get on with it,” Drake said.

“Everyone get comfortable,” Marvin said.

Frankie captured a chair out from behind one of the desks and carried it over and placed it by the desk where Tulip sat.

“I’m just going to be blunt and get right to it,” Marvin said. “Frankie, I think your ex-husband, Tom, wanted you to help him rob the bank. No need to answer that. Just listen. I think he wanted you to do that, and I think maybe you were still seeing him again, and at the same time had taken up with Jim.

“Okay. Let’s focus on Jim. I think you got to wondering about the packets that the armored car guards were bringing in. The ones Jim put in his desk drawer, separate of the money in the vault. Maybe you figured it out, or maybe he even told you, during a little pillow talk. But I think you understood, or guessed one way or another, that that money was different. That it was Mob money, and this bank was a laundry for them. It was separate money, but in time, it was laundered through the bank, and it came out clean. Or at least the cut the Mob expected was clean. When I say Mob, I’m saying Dixie Mafia. I’ve had a few run-ins with them, and I have an idea how they work. Am I warm?”

Marvin was looking right at Frankie.

“You might be,” she said, and crossed her legs and swallowed.

“So, you’ve got the money figured, and maybe you even got something going with Jim, and then the ex-husband comes back into things. I’m figuring you’re thinking not to take all the money. Not the bank money, just the Mob money. The crooked money. But you don’t know you can do it. You need to be somewhere else for an alibi, so you need the ex. You have him come in, you two have that fight so everyone remembers it, and he goes out. But I figure he ended up in the storage room. The only way someone would know he didn't go out is if you were sitting where Tulip is sitting now. Knew he wouldn't go out, and had in fact planned for him to hide in the storage room until the bank closed. Could it have happened that way?"

Frankie didn't answer.

"All right then, I'll go on," Marvin said.

Drake said, "This better have one hell of an ending."

"I think it might," Marvin said.

"So, you have an alibi. Turned out no one suspected you of anything because the money didn't get out there in the world. How do I know that? I figure if it had, you wouldn't have ended up living with your mother-in-law. My guess is the Mob was moving some serious cash through here. They wouldn't bother for a few thousand. Or even a hundred thousand. My guess was there was anywhere from a quarter million to a million in that big fat packet, and there was something like that every time that packet showed up."

"Why would I do something like that?" Frankie said. "My mother-in-law has money."

Marvin dipped his chin. "True. I thought of that. But greed, it's hard to explain. It comes out of nowhere and it's a hell of a bitch. And maybe you thought you didn't want to live with Tom's mother, which is what you were doing since he had been in prison. It wasn't like this bank job was making you a fortune. But I figure you didn't get the money that your ex stole. That it didn't happen the way you had hoped. Then Tom was gone, and, well, things fell in place. You ended up staying with Mrs. Craver, and in time, my guess is the two of you actually became close. I saw the way you looked at her. I think you care. I think it was a stupid mistake on your part, thinking about that money. Maybe it was the adventure. Maybe you said something to Tom about it, and then he got it in his mind to steal it and cut you in."

"Lot of conjecture," Drake said.

"Yep," Marvin said. "I noticed all the windows are barred or wire meshed. And they would be locked. Tom had to have not only a good hiding place but a way out. And he didn't want it to look like someone broke in or out. He left everything locked from the inside, there was no way for anyone to suspect anyone had been inside for any reason. Next day, when people came to >work, there were no signs of him breaking in. But the night he hid here, in the storage room, when everyone was gone, Tom came out and took the Mob money. He knew it was in that drawer, because you knew, Frankie. You knew when the guards came, and you knew Jim hid it in the drawer overnight, until he could do whatever he needed to do to launder it. When he came in the next day, discovered it was missing, he couldn't, wouldn't say anything. Fact was, no one would ever know it was missing except him, and Tom, and you, Frankie. Oh, and in time, the Mob. That's what happened to Jim. In a way, you and Tom killed him. Because when that money came up missing, and the Mob didn't get their fair share, they thought Jim and the truck guards tried to pull a fast one. So the Mob killed them all. Just moved onto another bank with another sucker. Someone who would do what they wanted for a healthy cut of the take. Same as Jim."

Drake leaned away from the fireplace. "That fits. That really fits."

"Yeah," Marvin said. "I thought so."

"But there's a problem," Drake said. "How would Tom get out and not leave a window open, a door unlocked?"

"He could have had a key, I suppose," Marvin said. "But my guess is, and this is just a guess, no one had a key to lock up but Jim. That's how he would want it, keeping that Mob money here. Is that right, Frankie?"

"He had the only key," Frankie said. "But that doesn't prove anything."

"It sure doesn't," Drake said. "I think your theory is falling apart. Sounded pretty good for a minute there, but now, not so much."

"Tom was a contortionist," Marvin said. "I figure, from looking at that big fireplace, he thought he'd just go up that and out." Marvin walked over to the fireplace. "Now we see if I'm an idiot."

Marvin reached a little flashlight from his pants pocket, ducked down carefully on his bad leg, looked up the chimney with the light. He reached up inside the chimney and got hold of something and pulled.

When he pulled his hand back, there was a shoe in it, and part of a bone. An ankle. The rest of the foot was in the shoe. "Looks like to me, the rest of Tom is hung up in there. It was a little tighter than he figured. He got hung. Probably even yelled out. But, it being a bank holiday. Well, my guess is he got up in there, twisted about, broke something, a rib maybe. Punctured something inside. Lung, heart, kidney. And he bled out internally. Died. Probably stank like crazy. But with the place sealed off for so long, no one being in here, it wasn't noticed, and in time he dried out. As for the money, if the rats haven't eaten it, you might find it up there too."

Drake looked at the shoe, said, "I'll be goddamned."

“With the bank closing, the fireplace was never used again, so no one ever thought to look up there.”

“Until you,” Drake said.

“Yep,” Marvin said. “Until me.”

“Oh, my goodness,” Tulip said.

Marvin hated hospitals. He had spent more than a little of his time in a hospital bed after the wreck. He rode the elevator up and walked along the antiseptic hall, his cane clicking against the tile as he went.

A nurse moved past him. Down the hall he saw two nurses hustling quickly, which was never a good thing. Someone was in distress.

Marvin came to the room he wanted. The door was cracked open. He knocked ever so gentle, as if he might be waking up a dragon and was uncertain of the outcome.

Frankie came to the door, eased out into the hallway.

“She’s sleeping,” she said.

“Maybe we could talk for awhile then,” Marvin said. “Down in the cafeteria. I came to see her, to tell her in person about the outcome, but I wanted to see you as well.”

“When you tell her, I guess that’s not going to look so good for me,” Frankie said.

“Let’s go downstairs to the cafeteria, have some coffee.”

When they had their food and were sitting at a table away from the others, and there weren’t many in the cafeteria, Frankie said, “No matter what you might think, I really do care about her. I didn’t care so much for Tom after awhile, but I cared for her. And I'll tell you this. I never planned to rob anyone. You're wrong about that."

"Am I?" Marvin said.

"I was seeing Jim, and I knew about the money, and he even bragged to me about it. He thought that might cinch the deal, me and him staying together. Maybe he just wanted to impress me right then. He was getting the goods, you know, so I don't see how he needed to impress me anymore than he had."

"Sounds like you still care about him."

"Not at all, but I'm trying to tell you how things were then. What he told me didn't endear him to me at all. It just confused me. I decided I wanted out of the relationship, and I went back with Tom. There was an easy excuse I could tell Jim. That Tom and I are trying to fix our marriage. It wasn't really any better, our marriage, but it's the excuse I used. I was actually thinking about turning Jim in to the law. But I was uncertain. And then Tom and I seemed to be getting along, and like an idiot, and I have no excuse except I was young, but I told Tom about the money. What Jim told me about it being Dixie Mafia money, and that he laundered it, got a big cut."

"And that gave Tom ideas," Marvin said.

Frankie nodded, sipped her coffee. "Yes. It did. I knew I had messed up immediately. I mean, if there ever was a sorry criminal at heart, and in action, it was Tom. And the idea that he could steal the money and no one would know who did it, and the law wouldn't be bothered at all, and Jim would take the heat, for him, that was just too perfect to pass up.

"So, he tries to talk me into helping him. He wants me to give him a key. But I didn't have a key. No one had a key but Jim. He always locked up. The doors in and out. He never locked his office. He never locked his desk. Cocky, I guess. And since the money most people would want was in the vault, he wasn't worried. That little bank hadn't been robbed since the famous robbery years before, and it hadn't turned out so well for them. Arrogance on Jim's part, I suspect.

"But that day me and Tom had the argument, he came to the bank and asked me for some money. I wouldn't give it to him, and then I realized he was just putting up a front. He had other ideas. He told me he wanted to hide in the store room, and for me not to let on. That he had plans. I think he thought I'd draft in with him on account of, well, there he was and he was saying he was going to do it and I wouldn't have a choice."

"You didn't report him. So I guess you did make a choice," Marvin said.

"No. I didn't report him. He hid there and I didn't say anything. I thought he'd take the money and leave, and that would be that. I mean, it was Mob money. Not the people in the town."

Marvin added some milk to his coffee. "How'd you think he'd get out?"

"The chimney. I knew what he had planned. I knew how he thought. Never occurred to me he'd get stuck. He was so cocky about what he could do. And then there was that long weekend, and then the bank moved. It was months before they even opened the museum. I mean, damn. No one even cleaned the chimney after all these years."

"I found out they blocked the chimney off at the top," Marvin said. "Found that out yesterday. They had sealed it off some time ago, and hadn't even noticed Tom was down there. I guess, you wanted to see him, you'd have to be looking. They just slapped some concrete on the bricks and put a piece of metal in the chimney, cemented it in."

"What about . . . getting him out?"

"They already have. They took the entire chimney out to remove the body, or what was left of it. Mostly bones in clothes. Rats had been at the money. Wasn't worth a thing. Just some chunks and mostly dust. All of it in a leather bag, and that wasn't in too good a shape either. Pocked with rat and insect holes."

"I thought he had taken the money and run off," Frankie said. "I thought he got away with it. Figured he got away and maybe got himself killed some other way down the line."

"He thought he'd squeeze through. But the chimney, for all its large size, it was built small inside. He got about halfway up, and the thing was even smaller there. Bad design. Bad luck for Tom."

"All that time," Frankie said. "In the goddamn chimney."

"How's Mrs. Craver taking it?"

"She doesn't know all the details," Frankie said.

"No one but me and you and Drake and Tulip know all the details," Marvin said. "I guess I was trying to be dramatic and wanted an audience. Like in an old mystery movie. What does she know?"

"That you found Tom. That he was in the chimney, and was there to steal money. I left my connection out. Thought you could fill her in on my part. I just couldn't tell her. I didn't have the courage or the heart to let her down. I'm the last thing she has to cling to."

"How'd she take Tom's death?"

"Well enough. I think she just wanted to know what happened.

She never expected him to come to any good, but she wanted to know, and now she does, and I think it was a relief.”

“Her health?”

“She won’t recover,” Frankie said, pushing her coffee cup away from her. “They say she’s got a few days at most. She comes around from the drugs about midday for a few hours. You can explain it all to her then.”

Marvin shook his head. “Nope. Me and Drake, we figure you were an idiot, but you didn’t really steal anything. And it was Mob money. And Jim was Mob, directly or indirectly.”

“He was still a human being.”

“But he’s a dead human being. You’re trying to do right, Frankie. You care about your mother-in-law. It’s a twenty-five-year-old crime. You haven’t stolen anything in the meantime, and if it’s any consolation, I believe your story.”

“Thank you,” Frankie said and reached out and touched Marvin’s hand.

He patted her hand and smiled. “I think it’s best we leave it alone from here on out. No one in town lost any money. The Mob made Jim and the two guards in on it pay, and that seems like a fitting end to all of it. I’ll try and see Mrs. Craver later today. But I won’t have anything new to add to what she knows.”

Frankie opened her purse and took out a check. She gave it to Marvin.

“Mrs. Craver signed this, told me to give it to you.”

Marvin looked at it.

“This is a lot more than we agreed to,” Marvin said.

“She wants you to have it. I want you to have it. Take it.”

“You’re sure?”

“I am. Mrs. Craver is.”

“All right then,” Marvin said. “That’s the end of my argument.”

That night at home, Rachel and Marvin had dinner. When they finished, Rachel said, “Want to watch some TV?”

“Sure.”

“We can surf the channels, see if there’s something interesting,” Rachel said.

They went in the living room with glasses of ice tea and sat on the couch, Rachel on one end, Marvin on the other. They watched TV for a few minutes, and during a commercial, Rachel said, “What you told me about Mrs. Craver, about Frankie, not turning her in. That was the right thing to do.”

“I think so,” Marvin said.

Rachel slid over closer to Marvin and let her hand rest on top of his. “You’re a good man, Marvin.”

“Think so?”

“Stupid now and then,” Rachel said, “but at heart, a really good man.”

Marvin didn’t say anything to that, but he smiled. A little later he put his arm around Rachel’s shoulders, and she placed her head against his chest.

The Boy Who Became Invisible

A Story

The place where I grew up was a little town called Marvel Creek. Not much happened there that is well remembered by anyone outside of the town. But things went on, and what I'm aware of now is how much things really don't change. We just know more than we used to because there are more of us, and we have easier ways to communicate excitement and misery than in the old days.

Marvel Creek was nestled along the edge of the Sabine River, which is not a wide river, and as rivers go, not that deep, except in rare spots, but it is a long river, and it winds all through East Texas. Back then there were more trees than now, and where wild animals ran, concrete and houses shine bright in the sunlight.

Our little school wasn't much, and I hated going. I liked staying home and reading books I wanted to read, and running the then-considerable woods and fishing the creeks for crawdads. Summers and afternoons and weekends I did that with my friend Jesse. I knew Jesse's parents lived differently than we did, and though we didn't have money, and would probably have been called poor by the standards of the early sixties, Jesse's family still lived out on a farm where they used an outhouse and plowed with mules, raised most of the food they ate, drew water from a well, but, curiously, had electricity and a big tall TV antenna that sprouted beside their house and could be adjusted for better reception by reaching through the living room window and turning it with a twist of the hands. Jesse's dad was quick to use the razor strop on Jesse's butt and back for things my parents would have thought unimportant, or at worst an offense that required words, not blows.

Jesse and I liked to play Tarzan, and we took turns at it until we finally both decided to be Tarzan, and ended up being Tarzan twins. It was a great mythology we created and we ran the woods and climbed trees, and on Saturday we watched Jungle Theater at my house, which showed, if we were lucky, Tarzan or Jungle Jim movies, and if not so lucky, Bomba movies.

About fifth grade there was a shift in dynamics. Jesse's poverty began to be an issue for some of the kids at school. He brought his lunch in a sack, since he couldn't afford the cafeteria, and all his clothes came from the Salvation Army. He arrived at history class one morning wearing socks with big S's on them, which stood for nothing related to him, and he immediately became the target of James Willeford and Ronnie Kenn. They made a remark about how the S stood for Sardines, which would account for how Jesse smelled, and sadly, I remember thinking at that age that was a pretty funny crack until I looked at Jesse's slack, white face and saw him tremble beneath that patched Salvation Army shirt.

Our teacher came in then, Mr. Waters, and he caught part of the conversation. He said, "Those are nice socks you got there, Jesse. Not many people can have monogrammed socks. It's a sign of sophistication, something a few around here lack."

It was a nice try, but I think it only made Jesse feel all the more miserable, and he put his head down on his desk and didn't lift it the entire class, and Mr. Waters didn't say a word to him. When class was over, Jesse was up and out, and as I was leaving, Mr. Waters caught me by the arm. "I saw you laughing when I came in. You been that boy's friend since the two of you were knee-high to a legless grasshopper."

"I didn't mean to," I said. "I didn't think."

"Yeah, well, you ought to."

That hit me pretty hard, but I'm ashamed to say not hard enough.

I don't know when it happened, but it got so when Jesse came over I found things to do. Homework, or some chore around the house, which was silly, because unlike Jesse, I didn't really have any chores. In time he quit stopping by, and I would see him in the halls at school, and we'd nod at each other, but seldom speak.

The relentless picking and nagging from James and Ronnie continued, and as they became interested in girls, it increased. And Marilyn Townsend didn't help either. She was a lovely young thing and as cruel as they were.

One day, Jesse surprised us by coming to the cafeteria with his sack lunch. He usually ate outside on one of the stoops, but he came in this day and sat at a table by himself, and when Marilyn went by he watched her, and when she came back with her tray, he stood up and smiled, politely asked if she would like to sit with him.

She laughed. I remember that laugh to this day. It was as cold as a knife blade in the back and easily as sharp. I saw Jesse's face drain until it was white, and she went on by laughing, not even saying a word, just laughing, and pretty soon everyone in the place was laughing, and Marilyn came by me, and she looked at me, and heaven help me, I saw those eyes of hers and those lips, and whatever made all the other boys jump did the same to me . . . and I laughed.

Jesse gathered up his sack and went out.

It was at this point that James and Ronnie came up with a new approach. They decided to treat Jesse as if he were a ghost, as if he were invisible. We were expected to do the same. So as not to be mean to Jesse, but being careful not to burn my bridges with the in-crowd, I avoided him altogether. But there were times, here and there, when I would see him walking down the hall, and on the rare occasions when he spoke, students pretended not to hear him, or James would respond with some remark like, “Do you hear a duck quacking?”

When Jesse spoke to me, if no one was looking, I would nod.

This went on into the ninth grade, and it became such a habit, it was as if Jesse didn’t exist, as if he really were invisible. I almost forgot about him, though I did note in math class one day there were stripes of blood across his back, seeping through his old, worn shirt. His father and the razor strop. Jesse had nowhere to turn.

One afternoon I was in the cafeteria, just about to get in line, when Jesse came in carrying his sack. It was the first time he’d been there since the incident with Marilyn some years before. I saw him come in, his head slightly down, walking as if on a mission. As he came near me, for the first time in a long time, for no reason I can explain, I said, “Hi, Jesse.”

He looked up at me surprised, and nodded, the way I did to him in the hall, and kept walking.

There was a table in the center of the cafeteria, and that was the table James and Ronnie and Marilyn had claimed, and as Jesse came closer, for the first time in a long time, they really saw him. Maybe it was because they were surprised to see him and his paper sack in a place he hadn't been in ages. Or maybe they sensed something. Jesse pulled a small revolver from his sack and before anyone knew what was happening, he fired three times, knocking all three of them to the floor. The place went nuts, people running in all directions. Me, I froze.

Then, like a soldier, he wheeled and marched back my way. As he passed me, he turned his head, smiled, said, "Hey, Hap," then he was out the door. I wasn't thinking clearly, because I turned and went out in the hall behind him, and the history teacher, Mr. Waters, saw him with the gun, said something, and the gun snapped again, and Waters went down. Jesse walked all the way to the double front door, which was flung wide open at that time of day, stepped out into the light, and lifted the revolver. I heard it pop and saw his head jump and he went down. My knees went out from under me and I sat down right there in the hall, unable to move.

When they went out to tell his parents what had happened to him, that Marilyn was disfigured, Ronnie wounded, and James and Mr. Waters were dead, they discovered them in bed where Jesse had shot them in their sleep.

The razor strop lay across them like a dead snake.

The Boy Who Became Invisible

A comic book script based on the story of the same name

Note to artist: East Texas is not West Texas. No mountains. No deserts. No sand dunes. It's a place of great pines and plentiful water in the form of creeks and rivers and man-made lakes. So do not think Texas of the movies, as East Texas is much closer in appearance to Louisiana and Arkansas. But most of the story takes place in a school and a schoolyard, places where that isn't a concern. Jesse's home should be on a wooded lot, and it isn't so small as it is old.

Another note: This comic builds, and it's not an action comic, and therefore could be designated as "talking heads" a lot, but I try to give it scenes and background that keep it interesting. I think the comic panels should reflect the alteration in Jesse's state of mind, along with events and dialogue. This keeps a kind of slow burn more interesting, and then in the end it becomes more dynamic. Much of the strength of the piece is the build, and the tension the artist puts into panels.

First page or so sets up town and era and mood, some symbolic ideas to go with the captions.

All CAPTIONS are Hap's internal dialogue.

Lastly, the artist may decide to change the size and number of panels, which is fine as long as the script is being properly conveyed. I like the artist to have freedom to create.

Panel One:

FIRST THIRD OF A PAGE

One end of the street looking down at—

View of a typical small East Texas town, one long main brick-street drag with buildings on either side, circa 1940s, though the story takes place in the 1960s. So keep that in mind. A couple of 1960s automobiles coast down the street, one toward us, one away from us.

SECOND THIRD OF PAGE, AERIAL VIEW

View of the Sabine River, which is long, and muddy-colored and winding, but it’s rarely a wide river, so we will use a medium-size run of water as it hurtles under a high metal trellis bridge, and all along the water is bordered by tall trees, oaks and pines and hickories, and close to the shore, willows and a few shrubs.

Panel Three:

CAPTION (2)

When I wasn't to run along the creeks and through the woods with my best friend, Jesse.

The woods with a little creek winding along through it, and running beside the banks of the creek are two boys about nine or ten. One is Hap, the narrator of our story; the other is Jesse. Hap is a nice-looking kid with an air of contentment. Jesse is a raw-boned, long-legged, ragged-clothed kid with greasy hair that falls in his face.

What we see in their faces is the youthful excitement of being alive.

Panel Three:

Jesse doing just that, in perfect upright position, legs straight and high to the sky.

I couldn't.

HALF-PAGE PANEL

CAPTION
I knew Jesse's

They were very poor. So were we. But compared to them, we were the Rockefellers.

Very important to give some of Jesse's background, or at least how Hap sees it.

Hap and Jesse in tire swings side by side, swinging on ropes fastened to the tires and the limb of a huge oak.

Behind them we see a rundown shack with a porch to one side, and a leaning outhouse out to the left and some distance away from the house. There are old cars in the yard, tireless, wheel-less, up on blocks. Along with that, strewn about the yard, are overturned washing machines, hubcaps, and heaps of drying grass.

CAPTION

And although

Jesse’s old man, Cletus.

SIDE VIEW AND MEDIUM-SIZED PANEL

Jesse’s old man, a classic peckerwood-cracker-son-of-a-bitch. He’s big, tall, and raw-boned like Jesse, but broad-shouldered with muscled arms. He’s wearing overalls and his hair is greasy and combed back Elvis-style with what was called a duck’s ass in the back—long, oily, flipped-up hair at the base of the neck. He is shirtless under the overalls.

Cletus has Jesse by the back of the neck, has his belt off and looped, and he’s beating Jesse like a drum.

Hap is standing off to the side, shocked.

SFX
Sound effect

Panel Two:

CAPTION (1)

Cletus had the brain of a flea, the ambition of a frog, and the temper and savagery of a wounded
bear.

CAPTION (2)

He could go off on Jesse for the slightest reason. Real or imagined.

MEDIUM-SIZED PANEL

Another angle on this scene. Jesse facing us, his old man behind him. His eyes are lit with anger or glee, a little of both, if that's possible to present, and his arm is raised high, the belt coiled and ready to strike. Although we are showing the same thing as the panel before, I think seeing what's going on twice and from a different angle affects the viewer more, and lets us really know how nasty Jesse's home life is. But, if the artist wants to use these two panels to make several small panels to show what's going on, that's cool too. I'm for the artist using common sense.

Panel Three:

MOMENTS LATER, ANOTHER ANGLE

Jesse and Cletus, and in this scene Cletus is giving Jesse a good kick in the ass, sending him flying.

CAPTION
Cletus was a brutal old bastard.

Panel Four:

Hap is running by the front porch, away from Cletus's home, and on the porch we see Cletus's wife, a rundown middle-aged woman with black eyes.

CAPTION
He didn't treat his wife or dogs any better. And as far as Jesse's mother was concerned, he was on his own.

Panel One:

INTERIOR CLASSROOM, DAY

Big panel for establishing classroom and kids.

No teacher is present yet. Blackboard. Desks. A globe of the world setting on it. Usual stuff. Pencils, notepads. Teacher supplies.

The kids are all sitting in their desks. Jesse is in the front row wearing ragged clothes, and behind him is Hap, simply dressed. Nothing fancy, but not ragged.

In a desk on Jesse's right is a solid-looking fifth grader, already looking as if some day he'll own a car dealership, have a gym membership, and have a mistress on the side and a fat pile of money. He's got a flattop and he's well-dressed for a fifth grader. This is JAMES.

Behind James is a near carbon copy, a little smaller, red hair. This is Ronnie. He's yukking it up over James's remarks.

Across from James there is a cute, blonde girl. This is MARILYN. She's laughing as James delivers his line. If ever there was a wicked harpy in the making, she is it.

JAMES
Jesse, you steal those clothes off a drunk?

SFX
Giggles from Ronnie and Marilyn, or

Panel Two:

FRONT VIEW SHOT OF JESSE

He's the main focus, but to his right side (our left) we can see James, his mouth open.

Jesse is sitting with his head hung, and we can see James thundering along with his abuse.

JAMES

He has monogrammed socks. Cheap-looking with a big "S" on them.

CAPTION
Jesse's

Panel Four:

James pointing at Jesse's socks, his head thrown back in a laugh.

JAMES
What's that

And we see James passing a note back to Marilyn.

Panel Three:

Panel One:

As they are leaving the classroom, filing out, Jesse is in front of Mr. Waters's desk, walking with his head down.

MR. WATERS

I like your socks, Jesse.
Monograms

sophistication.
I need to get me some.

Panel Two:

Jesse in the hallway, Hap behind him.

CAPTION

Nice try on
Mr. Waters's part, bless him, but I think recognition of socks with a monogram

Jesse's name only made him feel worse.

Panel Three:

ON THE PLAYGROUND

James and Ronnie have Jesse on the ground, and James is kicking him while Ronnie is bending over him, punching him in the back of the head. Marilyn is watching, laughing, her pretty blonde head thrown back, giving some impression of the beautiful but mean-spirited human being she will grow up to be.

CAPTION

It was bad enough he got beatings at

CAPTION (2)
Goddamn me.

Panel Five:

ANOTHER ANGLE ON SCENE

Now Marilyn and Hap are close together and both are laughing as Jesse continues to take a beating in the background.

CAPTION
For a moment
I was no better than them. Like Jesse, I just wanted to belong.

Panel Six:

Ronnie has Jesse's foot, and Jesse's shoe is off, and James is peeling off the monogrammed sock. He has his head turned to show the smell is offensive.

JAMES
I'm going to put this in a jar of alcohol as a little souvenir of a skunk hunt.

Panel Two:

HALL OF HIGH SCHOOL, FEW YEARS LATER

The kids are about seventeen in the following scenes.

Hap is walking down the hall, books under his arm, and coming toward him is Jesse with his books. Jesse looks equally uncomfortable.

CAPTION

I saw him at

CAPTION

Marilyn went from being a mean little kid—

MOMENTS LATER, SAME SCENE

Marilyn with her tray of cafeteria food, a carton of milk, and she's in mid-model stride.

Marilyn, older now, a real knockout in a mini-skirt so tight that if it had a pocket and there was a coin in it, you could read the writing on it. She has long, blonde hair, great cheekbones, and full lips. She looks like the kind of girl that would make you set fire to the pope and throw your wife into the flames after him. She's walking toward Jesse's table. She is smiling in a friendly way.

All the kids are laughing as Marilyn, still carrying her tray, is walking away from Jesse's table, our view being her back and that marvelous ass. Panel Two:

IN THE HALLWAY

Jesse, and coming down the hall is the teacher Mr. Waters.

MR. WATERS
Jesse. What have you done, son?

Panel Three:

We are looking down Jesse’s gun arm as he fires at Mr. Waters, who is taking the shot in the head and lurching backward from it.

CAPTION
I guess Mr.
Waters was just in the way. Wrong place, wrong moment.

Panel Four:

VIEWED OVER HAP’S SHOULDER AS HE STEPS INTO THE HALLWAY

At one end of the hall are two glass doors, and Jesse is using one hand to push one of them open. The revolver dangles in the other hand.

CAPTION

I think I knew what was about to happen. It might have been for the

THE END

When I got out of school that day, I drove over to the Dairy Queen to get a hamburger before I had to go to work at the aluminum chair plant. I had a work permit, so I got off early, and I usually grabbed a burger, and then I drove out to the plant and worked until midnight. A lot of us from high school worked there, making fifty-six dollars and fourteen cents a week, which wasn't even good for 1968.

I was sitting at the back of the Dairy Queen, eating quickly, and was about halfway through the burger when four boys from school came in. I knew one of them pretty well, and the others a little. We all knew each other's names, anyway. I can't say any of them were friends of mine. We ran in different circles.

They saw me and came over. Two of them sat down in my booth, across from me, and the other two sat out to the side at a table and leaned on their elbows and looked at me. I didn't like their attitude.

"What's going on?" I said.

"You're seeing it," the one I knew best said. His name was David. Last time I saw him was at the Swinging Bridge, and there had been a fight there for money. My new friend Leonard was there. He won the fight. It was a friend of David's he fought, and he beat the guy's ass like a tambourine and made some money.

Actually, that fight, lit by a huge tire fire, was the first time I met Leonard, and we hit it off, and we saw each other again in Marvel Creek, running into one another accidentally at first, and then finally on purpose. He lived over in LaBorde with his uncle, but they came to the general store in Marvel Creek to shop, which I didn't understand. Everyone in Marvel Creek goes to the larger city of LaBorde to shop, but his uncle had a store in Marvel Creek he liked, place where he had been buying shoes for a long time. He liked it, Leonard said, because the owner never told him to come around back, even before laws were passed that said he didn't have to.

David said, "We were talking about you the other day."

"Were you?" I said.

"Yeah. Some. We been seeing you around with that nigger."

"Leonard?"

"One name is as good as another for a nigger. 'Boy' will work. We'll call him 'Boy.'"

"I won't. And if I was you, I wouldn't call him that. You might find yourself turned inside out and made into a change purse."

"You think he's tough, don't you?"

"Don't you? You seen him whip some ass at the Swinging Bridge, same as me."

"We seen you whip some too," another of the boys said, "but that don't scare us none, about you or the nigger."

The big guy's real name was Colbert, but everyone called him Dinosaur on account of he was big and not that smart. He was a football player and he thought he was as cool as an igloo. He was said to be the toughest guy in school. That might have been true. He hadn't been at the bridge that night. I didn't know if he'd seen me and Leonard together or not, but he was riled about it, thanks to David.

I didn't like where this was going. I kept eating, but I didn't taste the rest of the burger.

"Way we see it," David said, and bobbed his head a little so as to indicate the others, "you aren't doing yourself any good."

"Oh, how's that?"

"Ought not have to spell it out for you, Hap. Hell, you know. Hanging with a nigger."

"You mean Leonard."

"Yeah. Okay. Leonard the nigger."

I nodded. I didn't realize until that moment that I really liked Leonard, and these guys I had known all my life, if only a little, I didn't care for that much at all.

"Word's getting around you're a nigger-lover," Dinosaur said.

"Is it?"

"Yeah. You don't want that," David said.

"I don't?"

"Are you trying to be a smartass?" Dinosaur said.

"I don't think so," I said. I put one foot out of the booth so I could move if I had to, could get a position to fight or run.

"There's talk, and it could reflect on you," David said.

"In what way?"

"You think girls want to date a nigger-lover? And way we hear it, this guy's queer as a three-dollar bill, and proud of it. A nigger queer, come on, man. You got to be kidding me."

"But he has such a nice personality," I said.

"You aren't going to listen, are you?" David said. "Girls don't want to date no nigger-lover."

"You said that."

"Because it's true."

"So, you have come here to spare me being viewed in a bad way, and to make sure I don't lose my pussy quota? That's what's up?"

"You're making light of something you shouldn't," David said. "We got a way of doing things, and you know it."

"We got to keep it protected," Dinosaur said.

"We?" I said.

"White people," David said. "Now that niggers can vote and eat with us, they think they can act like us."

I nodded, glanced at the two that hadn't spoken. "You guys, you thinking the same?"

They all nodded.

"Civil rights may change how the Yankees live," David said, "but it won't change us."

"That's why I don't like you guys."

This landed on their heads like a rock.

"You don't have to like us, but we can't have one of our own hanging about with niggers. He's not our kind. He's not one of us."

"You know, it's really been nice, but I have to go to work now, so I'll see you."

I got up and eased past Dinosaur, keeping an eye on him, but trying to look like I wasn't concerned.

They all stood up. I was about halfway to the door when they came up behind me. David grabbed at my arm. I popped it free.

"You better take in what we're saying," David said.

"I could throw you through that window glass right now," Dinosaur said.

"You might need yourself a nap and a sack lunch before you're able to throw me through that glass, or anywhere else for that matter," I said.

I was bluffing. I was a badass, and I knew it. But four guys, badass or not, are four guys. And one of them was a fucking freak of nature. I was reminded of how freakish he was with him standing almost as close to me as a coat of paint. He was looking down at me with a head like a bowling ball, shoulders wide enough to set a refrigerator on one side, a stove on the other.

About that time, the manager, Bob, came out from behind the counter. An older guy, red-haired, slightly gone to fat, not as big as Dinosaur, but I'd seen him throw out a couple of oil workers once for throwing ketchup-soaked fries against the Dairy Queen glass to see who could make theirs stick and not slide off. They didn't get very far in that game.

What I remember best was one of those guys, after Bob had tossed them out like they were dirty laundry, pulled a knife and held it on Bob when he came outside to make sure they were leaving.

Bob laughed, said to that guy, "Should have brought yourself a peppermint stick, you oil-field trash. They're a hell of a lot easier to eat."

This with the tip of the knife pressed to his stomach. The guy with the knife and his buddy believed Bob. Believed him sincerely. They were out of there so fast they practically left a vapor trail. It seemed they were standing there outside the Dairy Queen one moment, and the next their car's taillights were shining red in the distant night.

Bob said to David and the others, "All right, boys. Take it outside."

I thought, shit. Outside isn't going to be all that better for me.

We all started outside. Even Dinosaur didn't want a piece of Bob.

As we were going, Bob put his hand on my shoulder.

"You stay with me."

The others turned and looked at Bob.

"Unless I've developed a stutter, you know what I said."

They hesitated about as long as it takes to blink, and went out.

Bob waited until they were outside and looking through the glass. He made a shooing movement with his hand, and they went away. After a moment I saw their car drive by the window and on out to the highway.

"They'll be watching for you, son."

"I know."

"Hanging with niggers is frowned on. I got some nigger friends, but you got to know how to keep them at a distance. I go fishing with a couple of them, but I don't have them around at my house, sitting in my chairs and eating at my table."

"Thanks," I said. "I'll remember that."

"Still, no cause to pick on someone. You or the nigger. They don't get to choose to be niggers. And you can get along with most anyone, and learn from most anyone, even a nigger. I learned how to catch catfish good from one."

Well, Bob was better than the other four.

I bought a bag of chips and a Coca-Cola on ice to go, went out to my car, and drove to work. I was about halfway to the aluminum chair plant when Dinosaur, driving a Ford Mustang, pulled up behind me. The other three guys were in the car with him. They followed me to work. I parked close to the door and got out with my chips and Coca-Cola. I slurped at the Coca-Cola through a straw as I walked. I was saving the chips for dinner break. It was a light dinner, but I'd been trying to drop a few pounds. I was always prone to picking up weight, and I had to watch it.

I turned at the door into the plant and looked at them.

Dinosaur shot me the finger.

I shot him the finger back.

We had really showed each other. Funny how that can make people so mad. It's their finger in the air, and that's it. It has about as much actual effect as a leaf falling from a cherry tree in Japan.

They drove way, screeching tires as they left, and I went to work.

Next few days in school I'd see them in the hall, and I never once avoided them or tried to get out of the way. They were not always together, though sometimes they were, and Dinosaur bumped me a couple of times as he went by. I kept my cool. Once David said to me as he passed, "We'll get you, nigger-lover."

This went on for awhile, and now and then they'd follow me to work, but they never did anything. I had a ball bat in my car, and they knew that, because I let them see it by holding it up once while driving, knowing they could see it from their Mustang, as they were so close on my ass. What I feared is they'd hold up a gun or guns in response, but that didn't happen. Everyone wasn't shooting everybody back then.

This went on through the semester, and then the spring came, and one day I went downtown to buy some blue jeans and a union shirt. The old white union shirts had become popular. Everyone was dying them, or tie-dying them, and I guess I didn't want to be left out. What we had there in Marvel Creek was a kind of general store named Jack Woolens, and that's where I went to buy the shirt, couple pairs of jeans, and maybe what we called desert boots, which were tan, low-cut, comfortable shoes. I thought I had enough to afford it all. I was thinking on that, figuring I could skip one pair of pants if I had to, and I'd have enough for sure that way to get the shirt, shoes, and one pair of Lee Riders.

My hair had grown longer, and I had to comb it behind my ears at school and push it up off my forehead into a pompadour so I didn't get sent home. A bunch of us were wearing our hair longer, and there was even talk of a sit-in to protest how we were hassled by the principal, but I was the only one that showed up for the event. I ended up wandering around in the hall for a few minutes and went back to the lunchroom and had some Jell-O before going to math class. I had it washed and combed out this day, and it was bouncing loosely as I walked. I thought I was as cool as a razor edge in winter time.

I parked my junker and was walking along the sidewalk, almost to Jack Woolens. I could see the wooden barrels setting out front—one had walking canes in it and brooms, the other had axe and hoe handles.

As I came along the sidewalk, I saw Leonard coming toward me. He saw me and smiled. We hadn't seen each other in a while, but when I saw him I knew I had missed him. He was like a stray dog that wandered in and out of my life, and I felt like when we were together that something missing was fulfilled. It was an odd combo, him being a homo and me being straight, him being black and me being white, and him being more redneck than I was. He didn't like my long hair and had told me, and I didn’t like that he thought we needed a conservative president. He was a stray dog I liked, and I decided right then and there I wanted to keep him, even if he might bite. He probably thought I was the stray dog. I doubt he worried about my bite, however. He came down the sidewalk with one hand in his pants pocket, the other swinging by his side.

That’s when David and Dinosaur, and the other two thugs, got out of the Mustang parked across the street, having spotted me and caught me without my ball bat. They came across the street, almost skipping.

They got to me before Leonard.

They came up on the curb and managed their way around me in a half circle. The door to Jack Woolens was at my back. It was open. It was a cool day and air-conditioning wasn’t as common then, so it was left that way to let in the breeze as well as too many flies.

“Gotcha now,” David said.

“Gotcha what?” Leonard said, as he came up the sidewalk, both hands swinging by his sides now.

“You’re the other one we want to see,” said Dinosaur. “You and the girl, here.”

“Wow,” I said. “That bites. You see, Leonard, they’re calling me a girl because my hair is long.”

“It is too long,” Leonard said.

“They are really pushing the wit, calling me a girl, noticing I have long hair. These guys, they ought to be on Johnny Carson.”

“Fuck you,” Dinosaur said.

“You’re looking for us, well, you done found us,” Leonard said.

“That’s right,” I said. “You have.”

“We don’t like what we see,” David said.

“That’s because you are a blind motherfucker and don’t know a couple pretty fellas when you see them,” Leonard said. “I could be on a fucking magazine, I’m so pretty. Shit. You could hang my goddamn dick in the museum of fucking modern art. Damn, Big Pile, you know you want to kiss my black ass, right where the tunnel goes down into the sweet dark depths.”

“You gag me,” David said.

“Fuck you,” Dinosaur said.

“The big man is consistent with those two words,” I said.

I didn’t know what it was about Leonard, but he brought out the double smartass in me. I figured if I was going to die, I might as well go out with a few good remarks. And with Leonard there, well, I felt I had a chance. That we had a chance.

Leonard looked at me. “Yeah. He repeats himself because it’s wishful thinking that slips out. Some of that Freudian stuff. Big white boy wants a piece of my fine, shiny, black ass I tell you, but his little ole dick dropped down there would be like tossing a noodle into a volcano.”

“Now I’m starting to get gagged,” I said.

“Ah, you’ll get over it, Hap,” Leonard said.

David said to Leonard, “You’re a goddamn dick-sucking nigger and he’s a nigger-lover.”

“Nah,” Leonard said. “I mean, yeah. I’m a dick-sucker, but me and Hap, we ain’t fucking, just hanging. Oh, I should also add, I don’t like being called a nigger, you cracker motherfucker.”

“You got some sand,” David said.

“I’m a whole goddamn beach,” Leonard said.

“What we’re thinking,” David said, “is we’re going to knock you two around until your shit mixes, until you get it through your head how things are supposed to be."

"That a fact?" I said.

"Oh yeah," Dinosaur said, "we're gonna do that."

Leonard grinned, said, "I guess you boys ought to get started. It's already midday."

"But the sun stays up for quite awhile," I said.

"Yeah, there's that," Leonard said. "We got plenty of time to whip their asses."

"Smartass nigger," David said, and glanced at Dinosaur, who moved forward.

That's when an older black man stepped out of Jack Woolens and reached in one of the barrels and pulled out an axe handle.

"I hear you peckerwoods calling my nephew a nigger?" the man said.

David bowed up a little. "We ain't got a thing against hitting an old nigger, or a lady nigger, or kicking around a dead nigger, which is what you're gonna be, you ancient watermelon fart."

That's when the old man swung the axe handle and clipped David across the jaw and made him stagger. I almost felt sorry for David. Even more so when the handle whistled again and caught him behind the neck and laid him out flat on his face on the cement.

The other three thugs froze, then seemed to come unstuck and started toward the three of us. Me and Leonard took fighting stances. That's when Jack Woolens came out behind us, a slightly paunchy old man with thinning dark hair.

"Stop it, goddamn it," Jack said.

They stopped, but when Dinosaur saw who it was, he said, "You old Jew bastard."

"Old Jew bastard fought Nazis, so he isn't afraid of your kind. You aren't a pimple on a Nazi's ass, but you're made of the same kind of pus."

This stopped them. I don't know why, but they hesitated.

The old Jew bastard pulled an axe handle from the barrel and stepped up beside the black man. "Way I see it," he said, "is we have axe handles, and for now, you have teeth. You see it that way, Chester?"

Chester said, "Yeah. They got some teeth right now."

Dinosaur looked a little nervous. "We ain't even eighteen, and that nigger hit David with an axe handle."

"Hard as he could," Leonard said.

"That's against the law," Dinosaur said. "We're underage. Minors."

"Sometimes, you have extenuating circumstances," Jack Woolens said. "I once strangled a Nazi when I was in the O.S.S. Look it up, you never heard of it. It wasn't a social group. I strangled him and went back to the farmhouse where I was hiding in Austria, and slept tight. I knocked me off a piece the next day. Young German girl who thought I was German. I can speak it. I had the chance, I'd have strangled another fucking Nazi."

"No shit?" Chester said. "You speak German?"

It was like they forgot the thugs were there.

"Yeah, I was born in Germany."

"No shit?"

"Yeah. I did get a little scratch when I was strangling that Nazi by the way. I don't want to sound like I come out clean. That would be lying."

Jack Woolens put the axe handle back in the barrel, and showed Chester a cut across his elbow by nodding at it. It was a long white line.

"Knife," Jack said. "I had to wear a bandage for a few days."

"That ain't shit," Chester said. "Cracker tried to castrate me once. I got a scar on my thigh I can show you makes that look like hen scratch. I had twenty-five stitches and had to stand when I fucked for awhile and reach under and hold my balls up so it didn't slap my stitches. Want to see?"

"You win," Jack said. "Keep your pants on."

"I was moving when the cracker did that, cut me I mean," Chester said. "Cracker didn't turn out so well. They found his lily-white ass in the river, and there wasn't no way of knowing how he got there. Some kind of accident like being beat to death and thrown in the river is my guess. You know, said the wrong thing to someone, tried to cut their balls off, something like that. I ain't saying I know that to be a fact, him being dead in the Sabine River, but I'm going to start a real hard rumor about it right now."

Jack turned back to the barrel and retrieved the axe handle, casual as if he were picking out a toothpick.

The thugs continued to stand there. As if just remembering they were there, Chester thumped Dinosaur's chest with the axe handle. "Pick up this sack of dog shit, and carry him off. Do it now, 'cause you don't, it'll be hard to do with broke legs. You boys carry him now, you won't have to scoot and pull him away with your teeth, ones you got left. Gumming him might be difficult. One way or another, though, it ain't gonna turn out spiffy for you fellows."

Dinosaur looked at me, then Leonard, then the older men. He looked at his friends. Nobody bowed up. No smart remarks were made. Dinosaur seemed small right then. They picked up David like he was a dropped puppet, tried to get him to stand, but they might as well have been trying to teach a fish how to ride a tricycle. They had to drag him across the street and into their car.

When they got David inside, the others got in, and Dinosaur went around to the driver's side. He shot us the finger. He said, "This ain't over."

"Better be," Jack Woolens said.

Dinosaur drove his friends out of there.

"We could have handled it," Leonard said.

"Maybe," I said.

"Shit," Leonard said. "We could."

"Now they're tough guys," Jack said to Chester. "It's all over, and now they're tough."

"We were tough enough," Leonard said, "and we could have got tougher."

"Leonard," Chester said, pulling car keys out of his pocket. "Bring the car around, and don't squeal the goddamn tires."

"Like he can't walk a few feet," Jack said. "Like he's got a lot to carry. A pair of shoes on lay-a-way he bought. He can walk."

I looked at Leonard and he grinned at me. I loved that grin.

Chester said. "I got the lumbago."

"Lumbago," Jack said. "Now the lumbago he gets."

Chester grunted, said to Leonard, "Get the car, kid."

Leonard looked at me, smiled, and went away to get it.

The Oak and the Pond

At one time there was a great oak tree behind the house where Leonard was living then, and the oak was deep in the woods, and it was one of the last of the great oaks. It stood tall and thick and ancient. It had great limbs you could crawl up on and stretch out on and sleep without real fear of rolling off.

We called it the Robin Hood tree, like the great tree where Robin and his merry band of men gathered to talk and feast. I also thought of it as the Tarzan tree, imagined how you could build a treehouse on its massive limbs and have plenty of room to live with a lithe, blonde Jane and do more than call elephants and swing on vines.

Leonard and I would meet at the oak, me having hiked through the woods from my place. My place wasn't all that far if you came by wooded path, then broke off the path and took a deer trail, and finally a winding trace through a series of tall blackjack oaks until you arrived at Fisherman's Creek. Across the creek the trees thinned in number but not in magnificence. There were sweet gums and hickory trees, and of course pines.

The Robin Hood tree was the granddaddy of them all. The oak rose higher and spread its limbs wider than all the others. Its bark was healthy and dark, and in the spring its leaves were green as Ireland. To stand beneath it when it rained was a miracle, because the limbs were so thick and the leaves so plush that during the spring, and much of the summer, if not the fall when the leaves were brown and yellow and falling, you would hardly get wet. When it stormed the limbs shook like angry soldiers rattling their weapons, but the limbs didn't break, just old dead leaves and little branches dribbled down. The soil beneath the oak was thick and dark with many years of dropped and composted leaves. There were acorns on the ground, and sometimes when you came to the tree, squirrels were beneath it, rare black squirrels that made this part of the woods their home. They were in the tree too, chattering and fussing as you arrived.

Leonard and I met there many mornings, usually having a breakfast of boiled eggs we had brought in sacks, drinking coffee from our thermoses, carrying fishing gear and small coolers with our lunches in them.

We would sometimes sit there beneath the tree and talk, and finally we would go away from there, carrying our coolers, through the trees, and then along the creek line to where the pond was. It was a big pond, and at one point in time there had been a house near it. Now the house was a pile of gray lumber and rusty nails and a few bricks that showed where the fireplace had been. Beyond that was a clapboard barn that still stood, the great wide doors gone, probably taken for lumber for someone's project. Trees crowded it, and one sweet gum had grown up and under the roof and was pushing it loose on one side.

The pond had been dug maybe fifty years before and had been filled with fish, and we were fishing their descendants. There was a boat down there, one we had tediously carried there along the creek bank, and we left it for when we wanted to fish. No one bothered it, because no one came there anymore but us. The land was owned by someone up North who had mostly forgotten about it. The pond was always muddy, but the fish were thick. We caught them and generally threw them back, unless they were good-sized enough and fat. Then they went home with us and became our supper.

We fished there with cane poles, not rods and reels. It wasn't a place for rods and reels. It was a place for fishing in an old and simple way. We put lines on the poles, sinkers, corks, hooks, and bait, usually worms. Out in the boat we would dangle lines and watch the fish jump, the dragonflies dip down on the water, see the shadows of birds flying over, now and again there was the sight of a leaping frog or a wiggling water moccasin. Turtle heads rose like periscopes, then fell beneath the water with a delicate splash and a small ripple.

In the spring it was cool for a long time, and in the summer it grew hot, but with wide-brimmed hats on, we still fished, and we lazed, and sometimes we talked, softly, fearing we might frighten the fish. We talked about all manner of things we believed in, and how we differed from one another. I told Leonard about my women, and he told me about his men. We talked about brotherhood without speaking of it directly. I told bad jokes and Leonard grumbled.

When Leonard moved from the house next to the woods, and I later moved from where I lived, we lost that spot.

Some years later the people up North remembered the land, and they brought in pulp crews and cut the woods down, even the great and ancient oak, which must have fought the saws with its old, hard wood. But the saws won, and it tumbled down and was coated in gasoline and set on fire. They didn't even bother to make it into lumber. The land where it stood was a black spot for a long time.

They planted rows and rows of soft lumber pines to be cut and replanted every fifteen or twenty years a crop. People claim there are more trees now than before, but they are wrong. Once you could drive all through East Texas and there were trees as far as you could see, and not just pines either. The trees grew close to the roads and covered them in shadow. You don't have to go out in the woods and count trees one by one to know that the statements being made about there being more trees than ever before is a bald-faced lie. The pines they planted where the oak grew didn't shield you from rain or rattle in the wind the way the Robin Hood tree did.

Eventually, they filled in the pond, killing the fish. They dammed up the creek and made another, larger pond farther up, but it lacked charm, and finally scummed over. Nothing lived in it.

A company that raised chickens for a supermarket chain bought the land, and a series of long, commercial chicken houses took the place of the original pond and the woods that had surrounded it, even the pulp trees, which they also cut down and didn't replant. Now there is a wide gravel road that leads out of where the trees once grew, on to the highway. It's odd. Looking down that gravel road, you can see the highway so easy. It seemed farther away in the years before the road was there and the trees were cut.

Leonard wouldn't even look in the direction of the old place when we drove by. I look, but I don't like what I see. The rain still falls and the wind still blows, but the oak and the pond are gone.

Bent Twig

When I got in from work that night, Brett, my redhead, was sitting at the kitchen table. She didn't have a shift that week at the hospital, so I was surprised to see her up and about. It was two a.m. I had finished up being a night watchman at the dog food plant, hoping soon my buddy Leonard would be back from Michigan, where he had gone after someone in some case he had been hired out to do for our friend Marvin and the detective agency Marvin owned. We did freelance work like that from time to time.

There was no job for me in this one, and since Leonard was without a job at all and needed the money more than I did, he hired on. I had a temporary job at the dog food plant. It was okay, but mostly boring. The most exciting thing I had done was chase some rats I had caught in the feed storage room, nibbling on some bags of dog food, stealing chow out of some hound's mouth, so to speak. Those rats knew not to mess with me.

I kept hoping Marvin would have something for me so I could quit, but so far, nothing. I did have that week's paycheck from the dog food plant in my wallet, though.

"What are you doing up?" I asked.

"Worrying," she said.

I sat down at the table with her.

“We have enough money, right?”

“We got plenty for a change. It’s Tillie.”

“Oh, shit,” I said.

“It’s not like before,” Brett said. What she meant was a little of column A, a little of column B.

Column A was where she got in with a biker club as the local poke, and got hauled off to be a prostitute, partly on purpose, as it was her profession, and partly against her will because they didn’t plan to pay her. We had rescued her from that, me, Brett, and Leonard. She had then gone off and got into a series of domestic problems over in Tyler, but those were the sort of things Brett got her out of, or at least managed to avert catastrophe for awhile. Every time Brett mentioned Tillie, it meant she would be packing a bag, putting her job on hold, and going off for a few days to straighten some stupid thing out that never should have happened in the first place. Since she was Brett’s daughter I tried to care about her. But she didn’t like me and I didn’t like her. But I did love Brett, so I tried to be supportive as possible, but Brett knew how I felt.

“You have to go for a few days?” I asked.

“Maybe more to it.”

“How’s that?”

“She’s missing.”

“Wouldn’t be the first time she took a powder for awhile. You know how she is. Goes off without a word, comes back without one, unless she needs money or a tornado got the double-wide.”

“Brett, baby. Don’t give me the stuff about how you weren’t a good mother.”

“I wasn’t.”

“You were young yourself, and I don’t think you did all that bad. You had some circumstances, and you did what you could for her. She’s mostly a mess of her choosing.”

“Maybe.”

“But you’re not convinced.”

“It doesn’t matter. She’s my daughter.”

“You got me there,” I said.

“I got a call from a friend of hers. You don’t know her. Her name is Monica, and she’s all right. I think she’s got a better head on her shoulders than Tillie. I met her when I was there last. I think she’s been a pretty good guide for my girl. Fact is, I sort of thought Tillie was getting it together, and I’ve been keeping in touch with Monica about it. She called to say they were supposed to go to a movie, a girls’ night out. Only Tillie didn’t show. Didn’t call. And now it’s three days later. Monica said when she got over being mad, she got into being worried. Says the guy Tillie lives with, that he could be the problem. He used to run whores, and Tillie could easily fall back into that life. I mean . . . well, there’s a bit of a drug problem with the guy, and Tillie, sometimes. He could have gotten tough with Tillie. He might be trying to make some money off of her, or he might have got into something bad and Tillie got dragged with him.”

“Monica think he’s holding her at home?”

“Maybe worse.”

“I thought he was supposed to be all right.”

“Me too,” she said. “But lately, not so much. At first, he was a kind of Prince Charming, an ex-druggie who was doing good, then all of a sudden he didn’t want her out of the house, didn’t want her contacting anyone. Didn't want her seeing Monica. But Monica thinks it's because he was choosing who he wanted Tillie to see."

"Prostitution," I said.

Brett nodded. "Yeah, it's how those kind of guys play. Like they care about you, or they got some of the same problems they're kicking, and the next thing Tillie knows she's on the nose candy again and is selling her ass, and then pretty soon she's not getting any money from the sell. He gets it all."

"The pimp gets it all, keeps her drugged, and keeps the money flowing in."

"Yeah," Brett said. "Exactly. It's happened to her before, and you know that, so—"

"You're thinking it could happen again."

"Yeah," she said. "I am."

"Course it doesn't matter, and it may not have been planned. He may have just fallen off the wagon and grabbed her as he fell. After he got the prize he wanted, he didn't want to share it or show it around."

"He liked showing her around at first, all right," Brett said. "He liked her to dress sexy, and then if anyone looked, he was mad. She was for him, and yet he wanted to parade her and not have anyone look at the parade. Later on, he wanted to bring people to the parade. Maybe when his drug habit got bad. I don't know. I don't care. I just want to know she's safe."

"And you want me to check it out?"

"I want us to check it out."

"Let me drive back to the dog food plant and quit with prejudice first."

"Short notice," Brett said.

“I know,” I said. “But then so was this.”

It felt odd going off to see about something like this without Leonard. I liked having him around in these kind of circumstances. He helped strengthen my backbone. I liked to think I was already pretty firm in that area, but it never hurt to have your brother from another mother there to keep you feeling confident.

Tillie lived just outside of Tyler, between there and Bullock, a little burg outside of the city. Tyler wasn’t up there with Dallas and Houston, but it was a big town, or small city, depending on how you liked your labels. A hundred thousand or so, with lots of traffic, illegal immigrants, and college students. The immigrants they liked to hire to get work done cheap, then use them for every scapegoat situation possible, forgetting they wouldn’t even be there to blame for what they did and for what they didn’t do if they weren’t offered the jobs in the first place.

When we got to Tillie’s house we found two cars in the carport. Brett said, “That’s Tillie’s and Robert’s cars. Both cars are here.”

I went over and knocked on the front door, but no one answered. It’s hard to explain, but sometimes you knock, you know someone’s inside, and other times it has a hollow feel, like you’re tapping on a sun-bleached skull, thinking a brain that isn’t inside of it anymore is going to wake up. And sometimes you’re just full of shit and whoever is inside is hiding. I remember my mother doing that from time to time when a bill collector came around. I always wondered if they knew we were inside, hiding out on paying the rent we hadn’t earned yet, but would pay, hiding out from paying a car payment, hoping they wouldn’t haul the car away.

I went around back and knocked, but got the same lack of response. I walked around the house with Brett and we looked in windows when there was a window to look in. Most were covered with blinds or curtains, but the kitchen window at the back had the curtains pulled back, and we could see inside by cupping our hands around our faces and pressing them against the glass. There was nothing to see, though.

Finally we went back out to my car. We leaned on the hood.

I said, “You want me to get inside?”

“I don’t know,” she said. “I called the police yesterday, well, it was the sheriff ’s department, but they wouldn’t do anything.”

“Not twenty-four hours?” I said.

“Actually, it has been. Over. But the thing is, they’ve dealt with her before.” I didn’t know all the details on that, but I figured as much. Tillie tended to get in trouble, run off from time to time, so they weren’t quick on using man power to chase a sometime prostitute and drug user, and full-time pain in the ass.

“Okay,” I said. “Going to make an executive decision. I’m going to break in.”

There were houses around, but no activity, and I didn’t see anyone parting the curtains for a peek, so I got a lock-picking kit out of the glove box that I use with the agency from time to time, went around back, and got to it. I’m not that good a lockpick, and to tell the truth, it’s seldom like on TV, least for me. It always takes awhile. This door was easy though, so it only took me about five minutes, and then me and Brett were inside.

Brett called out. “Tillie. Robert. It’s Mom.”

No one answered. Her words bounced off the wall.

“Hang by the door,” I said.

I went through the house, looked in all the rooms. There was no one handy, but in the living room a chair and a coffee table were turned over, some drink of some kind spilled on the floor and gone sticky, a broken glass nearby. I went back and told Brett what I had seen.

“Maybe now we can get the law interested,” I said.

Outside, out back, I saw there was a thin trail of blood drops. I hadn’t noticed it before, but now, coming out of the house and with the sun just right, I could see it. It looked like someone had dropped rubies of assorted size in the grass. I said, “Brett, honey. Go out to the car and sit behind the wheel. Here are the keys in case you need to leave. And if you do, leave. Don’t worry about me.”

“Bullshit,” she said. “We’ll get the gun out of the glove box.”

I have a concealed carry permit, but I seldom carry the gun. Fact is, I don’t like the idea of one, but in my line of work, and I don’t just mean watchman at the dog food plant, the other stuff sometimes requires one.

We went and got the pistol out of the glove box, an old-style revolver, and walked after the blood drops.

It trailed into the woods, and then we didn’t see much of it anymore. We went along the trail a bit more, and I saw where something had been pulled into the bushes, mashing them down. We went up in there and found a body lying on the ground. It was lying facedown. I shouldn’t have moved the body, but I nudged it with my foot so as to turn it over. The face looking up at me was that of a young man and it had eyes full of ants and the victim’s nose was flattened and scraped where it had been dragged along the ground. There was a bullet hole in the chest, or so I assumed. I had seen a few of them, and it had been delivered right through the shirt pocket. I could see there was another one in his right side. I figured one shot had wounded him, he had made a break for it, and whoever shot him caught up with him and shot him again, then dragged him in the bushes. I also noted the man had tattoos up and down both arms, and not very good ones. They looked as if they had been put there by a drunk trying to write in Sanskrit and hieroglyphics. Either that or a cellmate.

Brett was standing right there with me. She said, “That’s him.”

“Meaning Robert, Tillie’s boyfriend.”

“Yeah,” she said, and started looking around. Me too. I sort of expected to find her daughter’s body, but we didn’t. We even went back to the house and walked through it without handling anything but the doorknob, just in case we had missed Tillie on first pass, stuffed under a bed, in a closet, or in a freezer. They didn’t have a freezer and she wasn’t under the bed or in a closet.

I put my pistol back in the glove box of the car and called 911.

What they sent out was a young guy wearing an oversized pair of pants and a badge as shiny as a child’s Christmas dreams. He had a gun on his hip that was large enough to think he might have been expecting elephants to give him trouble. He had on a cowboy hat that seemed too tall, the brim too wide. He looked like someone playing shoot ’em up. He told me he was a deputy.

There was another guy with him, older, sitting on the passenger side of the car. The young guy got out and the old guy didn’t. He just opened the door and sat there. He looked like a man waiting for retirement and not sure he'd make it. He might have been forty, but there was something in his face that made him seem older. He had a smaller gun on his hip. I could see that clearly, and he had a cowboy hat on his knee.

The younger man listened to us make our statement. He looked interested, and wrote some stuff down on a notepad. I told him I had a gun in my glove box and I had a permit, just so things wouldn't get dicey in case they found it later. After a time, the older man got out of the car and came over. He said, "You get it all down, Olford?"

"Yes, sir," said the deputy.

I saw then that the guy in front of us had a badge that said SHERIFF on it. It looked very much like those kind of badges we used to buy as kids, ones came with a cap gun and no caps. You had to buy those separate.

He asked us some of the same questions, just to see if we'd trip up, I figure. He didn't look at me much when I answered. He studied Brett constantly. I didn't blame him. She looked fine, as always. Long red hair tumbling over her shoulders, great body kept firm through exercise, and the kind of face that would make Wonder Woman beat herself in the head with a hammer.

"Walk me," said the sheriff to me.

"I'm coming too," Brett said. "I'm no shrinking violet."

"I bet you aren't," said the sheriff. "Olford, you go sit in the car and get your notes straight."

"They're straight, Sheriff," Olford said.

"Go sit in the car anyway," he said.

We walked along a ways. The sheriff, who we learned was named Nathan Hews, said, "Olford is the mayor's boy. Whatcha gonna do?”

“Did he get his uniform from Goodwill?” I asked.

“Don’t be disrespectful,” the sheriff said. “He stole that off a wash line.”

We came to the body. I said, “I turned him over.”

“Not supposed to do that,” Sheriff Hews said.

“I know. But I checked to see if he was alive.”

“When they look like this, facedown or faceup, you got to know they’re dead.”

“Maybe,” I said.

“You know something,” the sheriff said. “You called things in, said who you two were, I made some calls, checked some things out. The chief over in LaBorde, he said you’re a real pain in the ass. That you usually run with a black guy named Leonard.”

“Yep, that’s me,” I said. “I mean, I run with a black guy named Leonard. I don’t know about the pain in the ass part.”

“I think you do,” he said. “Chief told me some things.”

“Blabbermouth,” I said.

When we finished looking at the body, we walked back to the car. The sheriff had Olford get a camera out of their car and go out and take some pictures.

“We don’t have a real team,” he said. “There’s me, Olford, one other deputy, and a dispatcher. Sometimes we get free doughnuts though.”

“That’s keeping in form,” I said.

“You betcha,” he said. He looked at Brett. “You seem to be holding up well, considering your daughter is missing and a man is dead.”

He was still playing us, trying to see we had anything to do with the business that had gone down.

“Trust me,” Brett said. “I’m worried sick.”

We had to stay at a motel for a couple of hours before the sheriff showed up with a lack of information. “We didn’t find your daughter,” he said to Brett. “That could be good news.”

“Could be,” Brett said. What the sheriff had missed in his absence was Brett breaking down and crying, but he probably noticed the red in her eyes. She listened to what he had to say and went into the bathroom and closed the door.

He said to me, “Listen, I’m going to square with you. Going to tell you what you probably have already figured. I’m a one-horse sheriff in a one-horse town with two deputies that are working their first murder case. They’re more suited to chasing down renegade cats and dogs and figuring out who stole whose graham crackers at the nursery school. If we had one. I’m not telling you to go off on your own, and there’s bigger law can be brought into this. But I was you, from what I know about you, I’d tell you on the sly, which is what I’m doing now, just in case you don’t get it, to do some looking on your own.”

I nodded, said, “You got any idea where I should start?”

“I said I was a one-horse sheriff, but I once upon a time did some city work. I came here so I’d see fewer bodies. So far, I’ve seen fewer. This is the first murder that isn’t a suicide I’ve seen in five years. The dead man is Robert Austin, he was for some shit. The girl, your woman’s daughter, word was she did some business, if you know what I mean.”

“That word is probably good,” I said.

“This guy, Robert, sold drugs and sold her. Town like this, people who used her services . . . well, everyone knows. Everyone here knows the size of their neighbor’s turds and can tell one’s stink from the other. Thing is, Robert, he was most likely selling drugs for Buster Smith. Buster runs a Gospel Opry show over in Marvel Creek.”

“I was born there,” I said.

“Then you know the place. Used to be tough as a doorstop and sharp as a razor. All that booze out there on Hell’s half mile. Now it’s a town known for antiques and all the tonks are gone. The Gospel Opry, well, they say that’s a cover for old Buster. Marvel Creek sees him as a pious businessman. Me, I see him as a man gives real Christians like me a bad name.”

“All right,” I said.

“He’s about fifty with slicked-back hair and a very cool manner. Wears awful plaid sports jackets all the time. I’ve met him a time or two, when I was over that way. I even went to the Opry once. Good entertainment. But the word kept drifting back about him, and though it’s rumor, I’ve come to believe it. He’s an operator living a simple life on the surface, putting himself in a squeaky clean front while he does the bad stuff out the back door. He’s got everyone that matters over there in his pocket.

“Another thing, there’s a guy named Kevin Crisper hangs out at the Go-Mart here, sits on a bench out front. It’s his bench. He works his drug deals there, and rumor is, though we can’t prove it, he works for Buster. I keep a watch on him, but so far I haven’t caught him doing what he shouldn’t be doing. He has a guy or two to help him out. They all got a few snags on their arrest sheet, but nothing that keeps them anywhere behind bars. I mean, I know what they’re doing, and I can’t prove it. I can’t do to them what needs to be done. Thing is, though, Kevin Crisper does sales of drugs and gets a percentage. Buster gets the lion’s share because he provides the goods. At least the dope. Tillie, and I want to say this before your girlfriend comes back, she was a self-operator, but word was she was getting pretty deep in the drugs, and that maybe she didn’t know if she was about to shit or go blind. She was down in the dead zone with one brain cell or two for a life preserver, and that was it. Robert, he might have been farming her out through this Kevin. Probably was. And Tillie, like I said, she might as well have been a blow-up sex doll, way her mind was messed up.”

“And you know all this and couldn’t do nothing?” I said.

“That’s right,” he said. “Isn’t that nice? Listen here, chief in LaBorde said you were smarter than you looked, so I’m thinking what I said before. There’s stuff you can do I can’t. Law and all. But, you get caught doing it, I didn’t tell you to do it, and you say I did, I’ll call you a big fat liar. I’ll even arrest you. How’s that for modern law enforcement?”

“I can live with it,” I said.

It took some doing, but I finally talked Brett into letting me take her home. I called Leonard on my cell, but he didn’t answer his. I left him a message. I drove over to downtown Bullock, which was a cross street, and went over to the Go-Mart and found Kevin Crisper. He was a man in his forties trying to look thirty. He had similar tattoos to Robert. Kevin looked like a man who had been soaked down wet and overheated in a microwave. Skin like that was last seen on Tutankhamun’s mummy. That said, he had muscular arms, the kind of muscles some people are born with, long and stringy and deceptively strong.

I walked over to him, said, “I hear you can sell me some things.”

“Some things?” he said. “What kind of things? I look like I got something to sell? Pots and pans? Maybe gloves or shoes?”

“I was told you had some entertainments. Guy named Robert told me. You are Kevin, right?”

“Yeah, that’s me.” Kevin lifted his head, said, “When did Robert tell you that?”

I backdated the time, just in case Kevin had some idea when Robert bit the big one. I added, “He said there’s a girl that could do me some favors, you know. For some money.”

“You heard all that, huh?”

“I did.”

“He didn’t offer just to take care of you himself?”

“He said he worked for you, and that I should talk to you.”

“That’s funny he should say that,” he said.

“Look, you got the goods or you don’t. I got money. I want some services. I’d like to party with a girl and I’d like to make myself right. You know where I’m coming from.”

He nodded. “Say I know how to get this girl, the stuff you want to get right, you think I’d have it on me? Think I got that girl’s pussy in my back pocket along with a sack of blow?”

“That would be handy, if you did.”

“Listen here, tell you what. I like Robert, and since he sent you, I got a place where you can come for the stuff, and the girl. We don’t use a motel. There ain’t but one and everyone knows everyone.”

“So where is this place?”

“You going to be around tonight?”

“Could be.”

“You want some leg and some head-twister, then you got to be around.”

“Head-twister?”

“Stuff I’m selling. It’s a mixture. You take this stuff your dick gets hard, your head gets high, and you’ll have so much fun you’ll drive over and slap your mama.”

“That right?”

“Way I hear. Course, I don’t sample that shit myself.”

“That’s not much of a selling point,” I said.

“Oh, it’s not that. I sample the girl, of course, but the rest of it, that’s product man. You dip into your own product, especially with it being available, you can get in Dutch pretty quick.”

He gave me a time and an address. I thanked him and tried to look excited. I drove over to the one café and parked out front and sat behind the wheel and called Leonard again. I had some idea that the Michigan thing was near wrapped up, that he ought to be driving back down and in Texas by now, but it appeared it had taken more time than expected because I got the same thing. No answer. I left him a detailed message, even told him where I was supposed to be and at what time. I gave him the same directions Kevin had given me. I went in the café and had some coffee and a sandwich. I figured I might want to be fortified. I bought a sack lunch and an axe handle at the feed store and put it in the car, and then I drove out to where I was supposed to meet Kevin. Only thing was, I was four hours early.

I tried Leonard a few more times, leaving the same directions, but whatever he was up to, it didn't involve having his phone on. The location Kevin gave me was not deep in the woods, but it was out of town, which would of course suit his kind of services. But since I didn't think Tillie, possibly the only lady working the grid, so to speak, was truly available, and since I knew Robert was dead as a pair of post-hole diggers, and had a suspicion Kevin knew it as well, I thought I wouldn't rely on his hospitality to bring Tillie straight to me. Me and Brett and Leonard had rescued her once before, a few years back, from something stupid she had gotten herself into that sounded a lot like this, and frankly, there was a part of me that wanted to leave her to it. I couldn't do that because she was Brett's daughter. That was the big part. The other part was I was me. I seem to be one of those guys that would help a rabid dog across the street if I thought it were confused on directions.

I thought over the directions I had been given, and then varied from them. I found a little road to go down, a hunting trail, and then a little path off of it. I parked there and hoped no one found my car and decided they'd like to hot-wire it and drive it off, or, for that matter, just vandalize it. I got my pistol out of the glove box and stuck it in the pants at the base of my spine, and pulled my shirt over it. I got the food I had bought extra, a hamburger and fries and a canned Diet Coke, tucked the axe handle under my arm, and walked to where I understood the meeting place to be.

When I could see the house, which seemed pretty rickety and set off partly in the woods, I was pretty sure my suspicions were confirmed. Anyone coming here expecting pussy and drugs was a dumbass. I wasn't actually expecting either, but I was a dumbass, because here I was. I went to the house and checked the door. It was locked. I went around back. The door there was locked too, but it was thin. I thought that would be my surprise entrance, kicking the door down. I could do it now, and wait on him, but if he came around back, or that was his preferred way of entering, the joke could be on me.

I walked off in the woods to the left of the place and found a tumbled-down tree to sit on. I had my supper, which was alright if you had no taste buds and your stomach was made of cast iron. I only ate a few of the french fries, being as how they were greasy enough to give a garden statue the shits. I drank the Diet Coke and ate the burger. The meat seemed suspicious, but I was already hungry. I always got hungry when I thought I might kill someone or get killed myself.

As it grew dark, mosquitoes came out and buzzed around, and a few bit me. I wondered if they were carrying the West Nile virus, or maybe something worse. I slapped at them. I caught a chigger on its way up my pants leg, heading for my balls; I felt proud to have rescued them.

After a while I saw Kevin drive up and park and go inside the house. I saw a light go on. He didn't have Tillie with him. He didn't seem to have anything with him. He was early too. I thought I would wait a few minutes, then surprise him. I looked at my watch. I'd give him a few minutes to feel secure, then I'd surprise him. Course, if he had a gun, which he would have, the surprise would be on me. Course, I had one too, but when guns come into play, anything can happen.

I thought about this, and I thought about that, and then I thought I felt something cold at the base of my skull, and since this was the dead of summer, even if it was just now dark, I knew it wasn’t a cold breeze.

It was a gun barrel.

I can’t explain how much like a dick I felt. Here I was putting the sneak on them, and they had put the sneak on me. I turned around slowly. A short fat man with a face that looked like it had been used for missile targeting, it had so many pocks, was smiling about fifteen thousand dollars of much-needed dental work at me.

“I could shoot you, you know,” he said.

“Yep,” I said.

“What we’re gonna do is we’re gonna walk up there and see Kevin. Stand up first.”

I stood up, leaving the axe handle on the log. He patted me down with one hand and found my pistol and stuck it in one of his baggy pants pockets. He picked up the axe handle with his free hand and tapped my shoulder with it.

“Walk on up to the house,” he said.

I was getting old, I figured. Any other time I would have been prepared. Or so I told myself. I had thought I was being smart getting there early, but they had put the sneak on me, putting moon-crater face in the woods to wait, and Kevin to come up like a staked goat.

“There’s a road behind the woods here, dickhead,” said Moon Crater. “I come up on that, then through the woods. I hid out and waited. I thought I might have to do some serious sneaking, but you picked a spot not that far from me. It was easy, man. Kevin said he thought you thought you were a smart guy, but you’re not really so smart, are you?”

"I have to agree with that," I said.

In the house Kevin was waiting. He said, "No snatch or juice for you, huh? Course, that isn't what you were coming for, were you? I didn't like your looks from the start."

"You ain't got no mirrors at your house?"

Moon Crater whacked me across the back of the legs with the axe handle hard enough I went to my knees.

"I got a suspicion you got some other reason to see me. I got a suspicion you might be looking for Tillie, or Robert. I got to tell you, I think you know Robert's dead."

"You got me," I said. "I know he's dead. What about Tillie?"

"She's all right, but she won't be long," Kevin said. "Mr. Smith likes to get all the juice out of a product before he lets it go. He gets her hot-wired enough on something or another, he can sell her out until there's nothing to sell, you know. She then gets a hot shot, looks like an accident. They find her in a ditch somewhere with toadstools growing out of her ass."

"Robert didn't look like an accident."

"He proved more of a problem. Things got out of hand. You see, he was dipping, him and the cunt. We don't like dippers, unless maybe it's with chips and dip."

Kevin and Moon Crater liked that. Both of them laughed. I figured they didn't get out much.

"Get him in the chair," Kevin said.

They were ready for me. The chair was arranged in the middle of the floor. I did have a nice view through a window when Kevin moved out from in front of it, which he did from time to time. I could tell he lied about sampling his product. He had some of it in him right then, and it was giving him a nervous twitch. They put me in the chair and Moon Crater tied my legs and arms to it with rope while Kevin held Moon Crater's gun on me. When I was good and tied, Kevin said, "Now you got to tell me what you're up to."

"You can take a running leap up a donkey's ass," I said.

"Oh, that's not nice," Kevin said. "Jubil, hold this gun."

Jubil, aka Moon Crater, took the pistol. Kevin picked up my axe handle. I knew I was going to regret having bought that. He swung it hard against my shins. The pain jumped from my leg to my spine to the base of my brain. For a moment I thought I was going to be sick to my stomach and black out.

"That's got to hurt," Kevin said.

"You think?" I said. It wasn't much, and it wasn't good, but it was something, even if it sounded as if it were coming from a very small man under a pillow in the corner.

Kevin went over and put the axe handle by the front door. He reached in his pocket and took out a long pocketknife. He flipped it open.

"This house was left to me by old Grandma. It's not much, but I come here now and then for things. And I got a sentimental spot for it, even if it is starting to go bad. That being the case, what I want to say is, I don't want to bloody it up, I don't have to. So, for your sake, and mine, you should talk."

"I talk, you're just going to let me go?" I said.

"Sure," Kevin said.

"Bullshit," I said.

"Okay, you're right. I'm gonna kill you. But I can make it quick, a cut throat. Nasty to think about, but it gets over quick. Bleeds out good. Robert, I ended up having to shoot him a couple of times. Not so good. He was in pain right up until that last bullet. You, I can make you last a long time with this here knife."

"So my choice is I talk and you cut my throat, or I don't talk and you cut on me awhile till I do?"

"That's it," he said.

Right then, by the window, I saw Leonard's head go by. I stalled. I said, "So what would you like to know? I might have some answers, long as it doesn't involve math problems."

"Okay. First, who the fuck are you?"

I said, "I'm a census collector."

"That's going to get you cut," Kevin said. "I'm going to have to take an ear."

"Before you do," I said, "I really need to tell you something."

"What would that be?" Kevin said.

"Hell is coming," I said.

At that moment the door burst open, propelled forward by Leonard's foot. Leonard spied the axe handle, and he had it in his free hand before you could say, "My, is that an axe handle?"

Leonard said, striding forward, "Queer, roughhouse nigger, coming through."

He stepped forward quick and caught Moon Crater in the teeth with a left-handed swing of the handle. It knocked Moon Crater to the floor, sending the gun spinning away from him.

The light caught the black gleam of Leonard's close-shaved head, and it danced in his eyes, it danced along the length of the brand-new axe handle. The axe handle cut through the air like a hot knife through butter. When Kevin met the wood there was a sound like someone slapping a belt on a leather couch, and then there were teeth and there was enough blood flying out of Kevin's mouth I was sure Grandma's house was ruined. It splattered on the wall and on the window, teeth clattered on the floor.

Kevin hit the floor on his belly, dropped the knife. He tried to crawl for it, but Leonard stomped his hand and the axe handle came down again. This time it was a sound more like someone chopping the neck off a turkey with a meat cleaver.

Kevin didn't move after that lick, but just for good measure, Leonard hit him again. He went over then to Moon Crater, who was trying to get up, and kicked him in the mouth. That dental work Moon Crater already needed was going to cost a lot more now.

When Kevin came awake, he was strapped to the chair where I had been. Leonard was nearby, leaning on the axe handle, I was squatted down in front of Kevin. Moon Crater was still stretched out on the floor. If he wasn't dead or in a coma, he probably down deep in some part of his being wished he was.

"Howdy," I said.

"Fuck you," Kevin said, but it was hard to be sure if that was actually what he said. He was spitting up blood.

"If you leave here," I said, "and it's possible, you might want to pick up your teeth, not confusing them with the gems that were in Jubil's mouth. You might want to put them in a glass of water and freeze them. I hear they can do wonders with knocked-out teeth now."

"Who are you?" he asked.

"My name is Hap, and this is my brother, Leonard. But you two have already met."

"Glad to make your fucking acquaintance," he said.

I stood up, turned to Leonard. "I didn't think you were coming."

“I was on my way home when you called. Started driving back two days ago, but I was in a blind spot for the phone. Bottom land. I got your message a little late.”

“Not too late, though.”

I turned back to Kevin. “Kevin,” I said, “you and me, we got to talk, and I got to get some answers, and if I like them, I’m not even going to cut your throat.”

They told us Tillie had been taken by the Gospel Opry guy, Buster Smith, and that Kevin and Moon Crater had helped him take her. She was in an old theater. I knew the theater. I was from Marvel Creek, and when I was growing up I went to many movies there. They had a stage at that theater, a movie screen behind it. They had kid shows and they brought out clowns and jugglers and special entertainment. It was awful and I was always glad when they got off the stage and turned off the light, leaving me with the roaches and a movie.

Leonard didn’t want to leave them with their car and he decided he didn’t want to fuck it up. He wanted to fuck them up. I don’t like that sort of thing, but, hey, what you gonna do? They started it.

Leonard put them in the trunk of his car and I followed in mine after he dropped me off. We took them into the river bottoms. Leonard let them out of the trunk. They got out, though neither felt well. Leonard had really laid that axe handle on them. He said, “Thing I’m going to do is break both your legs. One a piece.”

“No need in that, Leonard,” I said.

“I know. I just want to do it.”

“Look now,” said Kevin. “Listen to your friend. We just work for that dickhead. We’re out of it. We hope you get the girl back.”

“Oh, we’ll get her back if she’s to be gotten back,” Leonard said. “But here’s the thing. You were going to kill my friend. Had I not showed up, you would have. So, which leg?”

Kevin and Moon Crater looked at me.

“He’s sort of got his mind made up,” I said. “And you were going to kill me.”

“But we’ll die out here if our legs are broke,” Moon Crater said.

“Don’t be so goddamn dramatic,” Leonard said. “You’ll still be able to crawl, maybe find a stick to support yourself or something. Really, it’s not our problem.

“Which leg?” Leonard said. “Or I choose.”

“Left,” Kevin said. Moon Crater didn’t choose. “But—”

Before Kevin could protest again, Leonard swung that axe handle. It whistled, caught the man on the side of the knee, which is where it’s the weakest. I heard a sound like someone breaking a rack of pool balls. Kevin screamed and went down holding his knee.

“One,” Leonard said.

Moon Crater made a break for it. I owed Leonard one, so I chased Moon Crater down and grabbed him by the shoulder and spun him around and threw a right cross into his face, and his face took it. He fell down. Before he could get up Leonard was there with the axe handle. I think it took about three whacks for Leonard to catch him good, I don’t really remember. I looked away. But, I think it was the right leg.

We drove Leonard’s car to a church lot, which struck us as ironic, and I drove us in mine over to Marvel Creek. I said, “What if those guys get out of the woods and call? Warn Buster.”

“It’s miles to their car,” Leonard said. “It’s miles to Bullock. They got broke legs. Besides, it was you didn’t want me to kill them. Up to me, they’d be in the Sabine River somewhere with fish nibbling on them.”

“You are cold, man,” I said.

“Absolutely,” Leonard said.

We thought we’d stake out the Gospel Opry, but when we drove by, there was action there. A big crowd. Leonard said, “They’re loading them inside. What is it? Nine? Ten o’clock? I didn’t know Jesus stayed up this late.”

“True. He’s usually early to bed and early to rise.”

I got my gun and put it under my shirt in the small of my back. We left the axe handle in the backseat with its memories. As we walked up, we saw the crowd was growing.

I said to an old man on a cane, “What’s up?”

“The Gospel Opry usually. Talent show tonight, though. Y’all don’t know about it?”

“No,” I said. “We don’t.”

“It’s more fun than a barrel of monkeys. There’s people who sing and dance and do comedy. Good clean fun.” He looked at Leonard. “You’ll be able to get in, son. I remember when your color couldn’t.”

“My, how times have changed,” Leonard said.

I glanced around and saw a line going through another door, off to the side. I said to the old man, “Who are they?”

“The talent. They signed up to perform.”

Leonard said, “Come on, Hap.”

We got in line at the talent door.

“More fun than a barrel of monkeys,” I said, “and they let your kind in, Leonard.”

“Well, suh, I sho’ is beholding to some peckerwoods for that. Sho’ is.”

Inside there was a little man at a desk. He wore a bad wig. He asked us our name. We gave him our first names. Leonard said we were a singing act.

The little man couldn’t find us on the roster, of course.

“We were set,” I said. “We called ahead and everything. They think we’re the bee’s knees over in Overton.”

“Overton is so small you can throw a rock across it,” the man said.

“Yep, but we’re still big there,” I said.

He thought about it a moment, said, “Look here. There’s a couple of guys who play bagpipes that canceled. Laundry lost their kilts or some such something. I’ll give you their spot. You didn’t get registered, but it’ll work out. So you sing?”

“Like fucking birds,” Leonard said.

The man looked at him, grinned slowly. Jesus didn’t seem to always be at his house. He waved us inside, and we went.

“A singing group?” I said.

“The bee’s knees,” Leonard said.

Way it worked is we were guided backstage. There were a lot of acts there. One old man had on what looked like a sergeant’s uniform. He was potbellied, bald, and looked as if he should have been on oxygen. He had a ventriloquist dummy with him. It was dressed up like a private, with a field cap and everything. I got to tell you, I seriously hate me some ventriloquist dummies. When I was a kid, late at night, I caught an old movie titled Dead of Night, an anthology film. One of the sections was about a man and a ventriloquist dummy that takes over his life. It scared the living dogshit out of me. I see a block of wood that might be carved into a ventriloquist dummy, I get nervous. And this dummy looked as if the rats and someone with an ice pick had been at him.

"How long you been doing this?" I said.

He wheezed a moment before answering. "I used to make real money at it. No one will have me now, except these talent shows, some kids' parties. I don't do as well as I once did. They got the goddamn Internet now. Oh, you boys won't tell on me, will you? They like us to watch our language."

"We won't say a fucking word," Leonard said.

The old man laughed. He leaned in close. "Neither of you boys got a drink, do you?"

We admitted that we didn't.

"That's all right, then. Just wondering." He shook the doll a little, causing dust to stir up. "Private Johnson is getting worn out. My wife took a knife to him once, and used him to beat me over the head. It did some damage to him and me. I fart, it blacks me out and I wake up wearing a tutu."

He barked then at his joke, and then he carried on. "I haven't had the money to get him fixed. I act like the one eyelid he's got that droops is just part of the act. It adds character."

"Sure it does," I said. "You'll knock them dead."

I hoped he didn't knock himself dead. He was red-faced and breathing heavy and looked as if he might blow a major hose at any moment. Maybe his talk about farting and blacking out wasn't just a joke.

We all stood there in line, looking out at the stage. There were some dance acts going on out there. The band sounded like cows dying. The dancers moved like they had wooden legs. Next a young, beak-nosed man who played a fiddle so bad it sounded like he was sawing on a log did his act. It was the kind of noise that made your asshole pucker.

"The sisters will win this thing," said the old man. "I ain't seen them yet, but they'll probably show soon. Those dried-upcunt bitches. They enter every week and win the five hundred dollars. It's those damn hymns. It gets the Jesus going in folks, and they feel like they got to vote for them. Shit, I'm up."

The old man waddled out with that horrible doll, picked up a stool on the way out. His act was so painful I thought I might use a curtain rope to hang myself, but at the same time I admired the old bastard. He wasn't a quitter. He wheezed and tried to throw his voice, but by the end of his act the dummy looked healthier than he did.

He came back with his doll and stool. He sat on the stool. "I tried to hit a high note there, when Private sang 'Boogie Woogie Bugle Boy,' and I damn near shit on myself. I think one of my rib bones moved."

"You did fine," I said.

"I did fine about fifty years ago and it was a spring morning and I had just knocked off a piece of ass. I did fine then. Least that's how I like to remember it. Might have been a hot afternoon in the dead of summer and it might have been a stump broke cow."

"Just sit there and rest," I said.

"You're all right," he said to me. "Sure you haven't a drink?"

"Sure," I said.

There was another dance troupe on stage, and a guy with some bowling pins he was going to juggle was next in line. Leonard and I glanced around, trying to take in the place. It didn't look like a joint where a prostitute would be kept, or in this case made to go for free until she was used up. It didn't look like a place where someone sold drugs. It looked like a place full of bad entertainment. That's what made it a good hideout, of course, but I wasn't convinced.

I noticed that the acts that finished were ushered along a certain path, and that there were two guys on either side of a dark stairway. They didn't look like church deacons, but I decided to call them that in my mind. I left Leonard and walked over to the stairway, looked up it. I said, "What's up there?"

One of the men stepped forward, said, "That's private, sir."

I went back to Leonard. I said, "There's a whole nuther floor up there."

"There's a stairway on the other side of the stage too," he said. "You can see it from here. It's got bookends on either side of it too."

I looked. Sure enough, two more guys. If the two near us were not church deacons, those two were not in the choir. Upstairs could have just been a storage place for hymn books, but I doubted it.

"Buster don't work the brothers," Leonard said. "All white thugs."

"It may not seem that long ago to them that your kind couldn't come in, and it may be they liked it like that."

"That really isn't true," Leonard said. "They did come in here, and you know it."

"They did janitor work," I said, "and they used to come up the stairs at the back and sat up there in the balcony."

"Nigger money was good as any," Leonard said. "I know. I sat up there in the balcony once and spat on a white boy's head."

"You did not," I said.

"No, but now and again I like to dream."

We were whispering a game plan, when all of a sudden the little fellow that had signed us in came over. He said, "The Honey Girls are sick."

"Who?" I said.

"The gospel singers I told you about," said the old ventriloquist, who had come over. "Their adult diapers probably got bunched up and they couldn't make it. Or they heard that young girl come on and sing and left. I know they were here. I seen them, the smug assholes."

"That'll be enough," said the little man.

"Sorry," said the ventriloquist, and he waddled back to his stool.

I had my mind on other things, and hadn't even noticed the young girl, not really. But in the back of my mind I sort of remembered her doing a Patsy Cline number, and not badly at all.

"Honey Sisters say they got sick," said the little man.

"Both of them?" Leonard said.

"It hit them sudden, so you two are on next."

"Oh," I said.

Leonard grabbed my elbow, "Come on, I still remember 'The Old Rugged Cross.'"

"You're yanking me," I said. "We're really going out there?"

"I sing in the shower," Leonard said. "I do all right."

"Oh, hell," I said.

Well, we went out there, and I knew that old tune too. I am an atheist, but I like a good gospel tune now and again. We didn't have any music, but there was the house band and they knew the tune, sort of, though I didn't remember it with a tuba solo. We started out with it. Leonard was good, actually; he sounded way all right. I sort of chimed in when he lifted a hand to me, but after a few lines I forgot the words, so I started singing nonsense. An old lady in the front row in a wheelchair said, "Get the hook."

Leonard finished out while I snapped my fingers and tried to look cool. I think had I had sunglasses, I could have pulled it off.

When we finished, or more or less quit, they were glad to see us go. Someone even threw a wadded-up paper cup at me. Fucker missed.

When we exited on the other side, Leonard said, "Damn, Hap. You fucked it up. We could have won that prize money. Or I could have."

"I didn't make us out as a duet, since we have never sang together even once. I never intended to go out there."

"I've always wanted to do that."

"You sounded all right," I said, "but don't be thinking of it as a second job."

"As for you," Leonard said, "you don't be thinking of it at all. Now, let's see if we can find Tillie."

"If she's alive," I said.

"She's alive, they are going to pay for it. If she's dead, they're going to pay for it, and then pay a dividend."

I didn't even like Tillie, but I sure liked Brett. Brett called her a bent twig. She'd say, "Hap, she's a bent twig, but she's not broken. She can weather the storm and come out on the other side."

She was pretty much still in the storm as far as I was concerned, but if the information we had was right, she didn't deserve this; this was even worse than what should happen to politicians. We headed toward the staircase on the side where we exited, near the choirboys. A man over there pointed us toward an exit. He was a chubby guy in a faded, purple leisure suit old enough to belong in a museum. He said, “That was bad, boys. Real bad.”

We ignored him and headed for the staircase.

“Not over there,” he said, and he grabbed my sleeve. I shook him loose and kept going. I had a feeling that most everyone here had no idea what was going on upstairs, no idea that the man who ran the Gospel Opry was about as reverent and kind as the business end of a hatchet.

“Those guys don’t kid,” said the man who had grabbed my sleeve. He was talking about the two boys at the stairs. They stepped out, one toward me, one toward Leonard.

The choirboy on my side said, “You don’t come this way.”

I kicked him in the balls and he bent a little and I hit him with a right hook. He went against the wall and came off of it mad. I hit him again, a straight right to the jaw. He went to one knee and tried to draw a pistol from under his coat. I pulled mine and hit him in the head with it. He went to his hands and knees, and I hit him again. He kind of bent his elbows like he had failed to do a push-up and lay on the floor. It was then that I noticed my leg where Kevin had hit me with the axe handle was really aching. I noticed this because I was going to kick him again and decided against it.

I looked over at Leonard. His man was already unconscious at the base of the stairs. I think he took him out with one good punch. I rolled my man over and took his gun. I had one in either hand, now. I went up the stairs behind Leonard. Back on stage I heard laughter. Someone had finally succeeded at something. A joke maybe.

When I got to the top of the stairs, Leonard had taken an automatic off of the man he had hit and he had it at the ready. I turned and looked down, wondering if the deacons across the way knew what we were up to. If they didn't, they would soon. I figured the man who grabbed my sleeve would tell them. He might not know what really went on here, but he knew who he worked for.

Of course, if we were wrong, and what we expected was not at the top of the stairs, was really a bingo parlor, we would have a lot of explaining to do. For that matter, we could have a lot of explaining to do anyway.

The deacons figured it out. They came running across the stage in the middle of a dance number with a man and a woman in a horse suit. The man was the back end, the horse's ass. I knew this because I came back down the stairs because I heard running. It gave me a view of the stage. The deacons knocked the horse over and the man and woman spilled out of it. The couple said some words you wouldn't expect to hear at a Gospel Opry. God probably made a big black mark in their book right then.

The deacons didn't have guns drawn, and they almost ran right over me they were coming so fast. When they saw my revolver, as well as the automatic I had taken off one of the choirboys, they stopped up short. They froze like ice cubes.

I said, "Do you really want to get dead?"

One man shook his head and started to run, across the stage again, past the horse, which had been put together again. A tinny trumpet was playing somewhere, and a piano. The horse was dancing. That goddamn tuba was hitting some random notes; that guy, he ought to be put down in the ground with that tuba.

The other deacon, the one that didn't run, put his hands up. He said. "You got to at least take my gun, so I can say I was unarmed."

"That'll work," I said. "But pull it easy."

He did, squatted down and put it on the floor and backed up. "I got no beef," he said.

"That's good," I said, "because I am in one shitty mood."

He backed out and went across the stage walking fast. The couple in the horse suit just quit then. The woman pulled off the horse's head and tossed it into the audience. I hoped she hit the old woman in the wheelchair that said to get the hook.

I picked up his gun, a little nine, and went up the stairs again. Leonard was waiting. "Stop to go to the bathroom?" he asked.

"I was disarming a gentleman."

Leonard pointed with his handgun. "There's one door. Shall we see what's on the other side? Lady or the Tiger."

"I think we might get both," I said.

We moved quickly down the hall and Leonard kicked at the door and it swung back and came loose, hanging on one hinge, and then it came looser and fell. It was a toilet. It was empty.

"They were guarding a bathroom?" Leonard said. "Really?"

There was probably some way to get across, but we didn't see it right away, and we were in a bit of a hurry. We put the guns in our waistbands, under our shirts, went down the stairs and behind the stage. The Gospel Opry folks were not deterred. The action, such as it was, was still going on. It was some kind of comedy act. When we got to the other side, we passed the man and the woman that had been wearing the horse outfit. They gave us the hard eye.

“Were you two part of the disruption?” said the woman.

“No, ma’am,” I said, and kept going. We went up the stairs where the deacons had been. We pulled out our guns. There were two doors along the hallway.

“I’ll take one, you take the other,” Leonard said.

We chose a door, nodded at one another, and stomp-kicked them. My door went back completely off the hinges, old as it was. I could hear Leonard still kicking as I went through.

There was a bed in the room, and a little light to the right, and there was a row of four chairs on that side, and I’m dying if I’m lying, there were four men in those chairs, and the one closest to the light was reading a newspaper. It was like they were in a barbershop waiting their turn. Tillie was on the bed, and a nude man was on her, his naked ass bobbing like a basketball. Tillie wasn’t there really. She was in some other zone. She had her eyes open, but they might as well have been closed. She looked skeletal. My guess is she hadn’t been fed in a while, outside of what was in a needle. She looked a lot like Brett, if Brett were a concentration camp survivor, and that disturbed me even more.

The four men stood up. They were all dressed, though one had taken off his shoes and placed them under his chair. One of them was wearing a police uniform and had his hand on the pistol in his belt. He was out for a little on-duty nookie and bit of blow it seemed.

By now Leonard had come through the door. The cop pulled his pistol and I shot him. I hit him in the arm and he fell down on the floor and started going around in circles like Curly of the Three Stooges. He was yelling, “Don’t shoot me no more, don’t shoot me no more.”

Blood was all over the place.

The other three men acted as if to run, but Leonard resorted to foul language that had to do with their mothers. One sat back down, as if still waiting his turn, his mother be damned.

I said, “Where’s dickhead? Buster?”

Nobody said anything.

“He asked you a question,” Leonard said. “You don’t say, and we find him, we’re going to shoot all your toes off. And then your dick.”

By this time the man in the bed had got off Tillie and was standing beside the bed with one hand over his pecker.

Leonard said, “I had a turkey neck like that, I’d keep it covered too. Fact is, I’m an expert on dicks, and that is an ugly one.”

“He does know dicks,” I said.

The man in the police uniform had quit spinning and had stuck his head up under a chair. He said, “I’m hit. I’m hit.”

“No shit,” I said.

I went over and saw that Tillie was breathing hard. I pulled the blanket at the end of the bed over her. I looked at the naked man with his hand over his privates and I just went berserk. I don’t know what happened to me, but I just couldn’t stand to think people like this existed, that they could sit in chairs and wait their turns to top some drugged girl. I kicked the naked man in the balls and hit him in the head with the pistol, and then I went after the other three, but not before I kicked the police officer on the floor once, and heeled his gun under the bed. I started hitting those three guys with the pistols, one in either hand. I was hitting so fast I looked like Shiva. They tried to run for it, but each time they did Leonard kicked them back into play, and I just went to work. I felt wrong. I felt savage. I felt awful, and yet, I felt right.

It didn’t take long before all of them were bleeding. Two were on the floor. One had fallen back into his chair. The naked man on the floor wasn’t moving. He was lying on his side and had thrown up all over the place, and the air was thick with the stench of vomit.

“Okay,” Leonard said. He walked over and put his gun against the shoeless man’s nose. He was the one that had sat back down. “Where is Buster?”

The man didn’t answer. He didn’t need to. A door opened at the far end and two men came in. One had a shotgun. He cut down with it, but we were already moving. I dropped to the floor behind the bed, and Leonard leaped through the door he had kicked down, landed out in the hallway. From under the bed I could see the man’s legs, and I shot at them, three times in rapid succession. I hit him somewhere because he yelped and fell down. I shot him again, this time in the top of the head, cracking it apart like a big walnut. The other man had a handgun and he had been firing it all this time. So far he had hit the bed, killed the barefoot man in the chair behind me, and had put some holes in the wall.

From under the bed I saw Leonard’s feet as he came through the other door, the one I had kicked down, and then he was on that bastard. I got to my feet and started around, tripped over the policeman who had, without me seeing him, started crawling toward the open doorway.

“Stay,” I said, as if speaking to a dog.

He stopped crawling.

By the time I got around to Leonard he had already taken the man down. Somehow the man had shot himself in the foot. I kicked him in the head, just to let him know I was in the game, and then Leonard reached down and took the man's pistol. Considering this guy's aim it was probably best to have left him with it. In time he would have shot himself again, maybe in the head.

"You stick," I said to Leonard.

"All right, but I hear too much gunfire, I'm coming. Right after I kill the lot of them."

I went through the door the two had come through, and by now I could hear yelling down below in the auditorium. The gunfire had roused things up, and was probably more exciting than anything they had seen tonight.

When I got into the room upstairs I saw that it was well tricked out for an old building. Lots of modern furniture, including a big couch. It was pushed back from the wall and I could see feet sticking out from behind it. I walked over there and laid my guns on the coffee table and grabbed the man by the ankles and pulled him out. He tried to hang onto the floor, but this only resulted in him dragging his nails across it. He was a long lean man in a plaid sports coat with hair the color of black shoe polish. I said, "You Buster Smith?"

He said, "No."

I got his wallet out of his back pocket and looked at his driver's license. "Yes you are," I said. "I bet you always got caught when you played hide and go seek as a kid."

He got to one knee. "I did, actually."

I went over and got my guns, said, "I wouldn't try anything. I shoot you, then Leonard will shoot everyone else, and we'll have a hard time explaining things. But you'll be dead."

We didn’t go to jail.

That’s the important part. Let me tell you why. So when it was done and everyone was hauled in, including me and Leonard, they waltzed us into the police chief. This is after interrogations, searches, a rubber glove up the asshole, just in case we were hiding hand grenades. He was a nice-looking guy with his black hair cut close to his head and one ear that stood out more than the other, as if it were signaling for a turn. He sat behind a big mahogany desk. There was a little sign on the desk that read POLICE CHIEF.

“Well now, Hap Collins.” he said.

I recognized him. A little older. Still fit. James Dell. We had gone to school together.

“It’s been awhile,” he said. “What I remember best about you is I don’t like you.”

“It’s a big club,” Leonard said. “Hap even has a newsletter.”

“Me and Jim dated the same girl,” I said.

“Not at the same time,” Jim said.

“He dated her last,” I said.

“That’s right. And I married her.”

“So, you won,” I said.

“Way I like to see it,” James said, “you boys raised some hell. And you shot people. And you hit people. And Hap, you killed a guy. I also got word there’s two boys with broken legs over in Bullock. They gave themselves up to the sheriff over there.”

“Nice guy,” I said.

“One of the men you shot was a police officer,” said James.

“I know. He was waiting in line to rape a young woman. How is she by the way?”

“Hospital. Touch and go for awhile. But she made it. Apparently she's no stranger to drugs, so maybe she had some tolerance. Hadn't eaten in days. Buster Smith, we talked to him. He came apart like a fresh biscuit. He was only tough when his money worked for him. That cop, by the way, he was the police chief."

"Oh," Leonard said. "Then what are you?"

"The new police chief. I should also mention that the mayor is the one that caught a stray bullet and is as dead as an old bean can."

"Mayor. Police chief. We had quite a night," I said.

To make this part of the story short, we had to stay in the jail till our friend Marvin Hanson could get us a lawyer, and then we got out, and then we got no billed, in spite of the fact we had hunted the bastard down and caused quite a ruckus. The former police chief was dead, by our hand, and the mayor was on the deceased list as well, by a stray slug, and the others that had been in the row of chairs were all prominent citizens. It was best to take it easy on us, let them cover their own dirt in their own way.

Thing was simply this: The crime being done to Tillie was so bad, they let us pretty much skate on self-defense. Hell, after all, it is Texas.

Brett and I climbed into bed and she lay in the crook of my arm.

"Tillie is going to be out of the hospital tomorrow," Brett said.

She had spent about three months in there. She had been in a bad way. I had to say this for the kid, she was tough as yesterday's fajita meat.

"I have to go get her then," Brett said.

"All right," I said.

"I know you don't like her."

"Correct."

"You didn't have to do what you did."

"Yes I did."

"For me?"

"You and her."

"But you don't like her."

"I don't like a lot of things," I said, "but you love her. You think she's a bent twig, and maybe you're right. No one deserves that."

"But she sets herself up for it, right?"

"Yeah," I said. "She does. I don't think she'll ever change. Sometime soon, she doesn't, she's going to be dead. She picks men like ducks pick june bugs. At random."

"I know. I tried to be a good mother."

"I know that too, so don't start on how you failed. You did what you could."

"I did set her father's head on fire," Brett said.

"Yes, you did," I said. "But by all accounts, he had it coming."

"He did, you know."

"Never doubted it."

"I love you, Hap."

"And I love you, Brett."

"Want to lose five minutes out of your life the hard way?" she said.

I laughed. "Now that's not nice."

She laughed, rolled over, and turned off the light. And then she was very nice.

Joe R. Lansdale Interviews

and Leonard Pine

Q. Hap, I’m going to start with you. You strike me as an intelligent guy. Why don’t you try and make a little bit more of your life?

Hap: Haven’t a clue. I keep thinking I will, but I seem to take wrong turns.

Q. Why not back off from the situations you get yourself into? You deserve a little better, don’t you?

Hap: I get into them before I mean to. It’s like they’re kind of lurking out there. I turn left to avoid them, there’s more trouble comin’ the other way.

Leonard: And he drags me in after him. Can I say something?

Q. Be my guest.

Leonard: Hap’s bright, but doesn’t fully believe it. He thinks because he hasn’t come up with the formula for something like Coca-Cola, or has done him some brain surgery, or cured a disease, he hasn’t lived up to his expectations. Problem with Hap is, he coasts. Ain’t sayin’ he’s lazy. He works hard. When he works. But he hasn’t got any rudder.

Q. Now, don’t take this wrong, Leonard, but what’s your excuse?

Leonard: I don’t make any. I’m doing what I want to do. That’s the difference between me and my brother here. He isn’t entirely happy being him. I’m damn ecstatic about being me. I work hard. I don’t worry that much about the future. A little. But nothing serious. Hap, he’s nothing but a big ol’ bag of worry.

Hap: I thought I was a love machine.

Leonard: You’re a love machine can’t keep a woman.

Hap: You’ve had a bit of a problem maintaining relationships yourself, my good man.

Leonard: Yeah. But, you know what? I think I’ve found a man finally.

Q. That’s another thing. Don’t the people you guys care about seem to . . . well, you know?

Leonard: Yeah, they seem to give us bad luck. We haven’t figured that one out yet.

Q. Well, they’re the ones get killed.

Leonard: Yeah. We haven’t figured that out either.

Q. This one’s for you, Leonard. Do you feel that as you get older you’re gettin’ your temper under control?

Leonard: What temper?

Q. Well . . .

Leonard: Hey, answer the question. I didn’t stutter. What temper?

Q. I was merely sayin’ . . .

Leonard: You haven’t said anything yet. You asked if I had a temper. I don’t have any damn temper.

Hap: Yes you do.

Leonard: Hey, you want a piece of me, brother? You want to wake up with a crowd around you?

Hap: Hey, bubba. You and me get into it, you better brought yourself a sack lunch, ’cause we’re gonna be here all night.

Leonard: Yeah?

Hap: Yeah.

Q. Let's change the subject. You guys seem to survive through pure tenacity and a feeling of quarrelsome brotherhood. . . .

Leonard: Quarrelsome. Who you callin'—

Hap: You're right. We do. There's this, Lansdale. You can have all the money there is, every damn thing, and what it comes down to finally, like it or not, you got to have someone to lean on.

Leonard and I aren't brothers by birth. But we are brothers. Like our lawyer friend Andrew Vachss says, "It's the family you choose that counts." We stand by that. It can be your blood kin, certainly, but it doesn't have to be. Way we see it, we can argue and fight with each other, but no one else better think they can. Least not in any serious manner.

Q. All right. Let me ask this: What are future plans?

Hap: Hard to say.

Leonard: Charlie Blank and Hanson have some ideas for us. They've got a little private investigator's agency, and we may be picking up a few jobs from them. Nothing technical. Just little stuff, you know. Hap here, he'll still be looking for a date. Watching his weight. Sticking to nonalcoholic beer and losing his hair. I'll still be cool and calm in my JCPenney's suit.

Hap: You may be calm, but that cheap suit is enough to make anyone else nervous.

Q. I have just a few more questions.

Leonard: Actually, we got to go. We borrowed the truck we're in to get over here, and we promised to have it back. Our junkers are in the shop. Guy needs this one back to go to work.

Hap: And there's a monster movie showing on channel 38 I want to see.

Leonard: Not that he hasn't seen it about a hundred times.

Q. Well, thanks, guys. And be careful out there. Leonard: Hell, careful's our middle name, man.

An Interview with Joe R. Lansdale,

His Own Self

Editor Rick Klaw sat down with Joe and discussed his writing, racism, violence, Texas, and, of course, Hap and Leonard.

RK: Your work has been called Texas gothic, gothic Texas fiction, Texas noir, mystery, suspense, crime, horror, western, and damn near everything in between. How would you describe your work?

JRL: Lansdale. I think of it as being Lansdale work. I try not to fit into any category. It's not that I purposely try not to, but that I just don't. I'm uncomfortable trying to force myself into a box. I write what I want to write. I also find that if I fit into a mystery or horror category and try to label myself or push myself as that, then if any one of those things becomes passé or not popular for awhile, then I've actually eliminated part of my audience. I don't want people to pick me up and read me for a mystery writer or read more mysteries; I want them to read more Joe Lansdale and that's not egotistical—although maybe it is a little, I don't know—but it's actually trying to find a way of expressing yourself and promoting what you do, instead of the general idea of a certain genre or a label. And I really hate labels like “splatterpunk” and things like that. Those to me, I think, actually constrict your audience.

RK: One issue that is common to all your work is racism. Why is that?

JRL: I think it perhaps is when I grew up—I was born in 1951—and in the South there was a lot of Jim Crow laws. I grew up in East Texas, which is considered part of the South, unlike most of Texas, which is considered the Southwest, so I saw examples of it. The separate water fountains, separate toilets, going around to the back of restaurants to get their food, theaters where they had to be in the balcony, general attitude that they were not as human as whites. I think, too, that a lot of it was just that my mother was very progressive for her time and I think she planted that seed there for me. Then the sixties came along and civil rights was a big issue as part of the sixties. I think that in those early years that it imprinted. I just always felt uncomfortable with segregation and didn’t understand exactly what it was about. I also felt that education and many things like that that had been denied blacks was the thing that prevented them being able to operate in society. I felt that these were things that should be there for everyone. And I didn’t feel they were, and it really struck me deeply. It runs throughout my work, civil rights in general, but I think especially my experience being with how blacks were treated and to a great extent with how women were treated in the fifties and sixties and what their roles were expected to be. My mother defied that and was certainly, as I said, very progressive. I don't use the term "liberal" or "conservative" in that because I don't think that matters, but I think she was progressive in her time. I believe too that put a lot of stress on her trying to do that because that certainly wasn't accepted, because there was a lot of religious fanaticism against the idea of women even working. All the things we take for granted now and are very common were at one time taboo socially—not just in the South but across the United States. Perhaps the racism struck me more deeply being from this area because we had more blacks and there was this ill legacy of the Civil War and people were still fighting the Civil War even when I was a kid. Even though it was over, they were still fighting it emotionally.

RK: Your work is littered with the mixture of violence and humor. Do you find these to be essential elements to your work, and do you feel you always need the combination?

JRL: I don't think you always have to. And I don't think I always have. But I think that it's more common in my work than not to have that. I think that's because I saw a lot of violence when I was growing up. Not necessarily always murderous violence, but in school Gladewater was a tough town—people always gettin' in fights, fistfights over silly things, and they fought hard. But there was a lot of humor in the way people conducted themselves and the way they saw things. I think that rubbed off on me a lot. I think everybody sees humor in violence, even those people who don't think they do. Because even if you are watching Laurel and Hardy or any comedian, whoever it is on these old shows that we grew up on, people are falling off ladders and people are laughing. People have always laughed at those sorts of things. Sane people laugh when they realize that no one is actually hurt. It is intertwined. I think that humor and violence is nothing new. It's always been intertwined. I think that Robert Bloch probably had a big influence on me as a writer because he always recognized that.

RK: In your books, the violence is very realistic. Why do you think you make it that way?

JRL: Like I said, I've seen it, I've been involved in it in the sense that I grew up with people who would fight at the drop of a hat over almost anything. I've been a martial artist all my life and I've actually used it in self-defense. I've also made a point of not using it a few times when I could have. I just controlled the situation either verbally or controlled them physically when they didn't realize that they were being controlled. And though I'm not anxious to get involved in violence myself (I'm not very much a fan of violence), it intrigues me. It's so much a part of the human condition. Some people try to deny it as part of the human condition. One of the things that martial arts does and writing this kind of fiction does is that they allow you to tap into that and let off some of that steam. Which is not to say that if you didn't that you'd necessarily go out and be an ax murderer, but I do believe that in my case that I have somewhat of an aggressive personality to some extent. I am very physical, and I think all those things help me keep my life balanced —which is still not to say I think I was gonna flip out or be an ax murderer or anything.

RK: It seems whenever a new Lansdale book comes out, fans and critics hail it as your most violent book yet.

JRL: I never can tell. To me, I don't notice any difference between this one and that one. I really don't. When I look at Bad Chili, I think, "Whoa! That was pretty violent." I always think of it and Two-Bear Mambo has the most violent of the Hap and Leonard series. The Nightrunners and Waltz of Shadows, those are VERY violent. I never think about that. I never think that I'm going to make this scene violent or what. It just sort of arrives. I'll read these other books, and this book is just as violent as my books. Why don't they talk about these people? As other people have told me: "But they don't write violence the same way. They don't have that kind of poetic description." I appreciate that.

RK: Your stories are steeped in Texas. Someone once said you're a writer who practically oozes Texas. Beside the fact that you grew up in Texas, is there another reason? There are plenty of writers who grew up here who don't have as much Texas flavor to their work.

JRL: First of all, as you said, growing up here. But I also believe that my parents were proud of being Texans. I think their people actually come from somewhere else. But my father was a Texan. My mother was a Texan. Prior to that, we weren't generations of Texans. But we epitomized what Texas represents, at least in that mythological sense, as being hardcore, independent people. People who literally did pull themselves up by their bootstraps. My father was a person who could not read or write. And I think he was a vast success. He taught himself how to be a mechanic. My mother bought him a Model T and said take this apart and put it back together until you can do it. And he did. That's how he learned to be a mechanic and, of course, just continued to learn and update his knowledge. He got to where toward the end of his life, he could actually read a little bit and write a couple of sentences here and there. His mother died when he was eight years old and him taking over the family pretty much. His father bein' a brutal bastard and my father, like I said, not being educated and having to work all these hard physical jobs. I look at my mother coming from a somewhat-better situation but still a poor situation. When they were reaching their adulthood, that was the Great Depression, and I think all of that just epitomizes what people think of when they think of Texans. So whether true or not, there's that. Something that appealed to me is that as a child, I always loved mythology. I didn't know that I was living in mythology, because Texas has its own mythology. It's bigger than life. And my father was the kind of person who's a real, everyday, down-to-earth person, but was yet somehow bigger than life. He was what John Wayne thought he was.

RK: Since this is an interview for a collection of Hap and Leonard stories, we probably should discuss the stars. Hap is obviously you.

JRL: To a great extent, yeah.

RK: And Leonard is. . . ?

JRL: Leonard is made up of several people I know, both gay and straight. He's a combination of those. And uh, also the fact that Hap and Leonard in many ways reflect both of my sides, 'cause I've always found that the liberals consider me a conservative and the conservatives consider me a liberal. Somebody once said that I'm an Old Testament liberal, which I thought was one of the funniest things and most accurate things I'd heard, even though I'm not by nature a religious person. However, the concept was just perfect. I knew when they said that exactly what they meant. And even though it would be hard to define what that means, it tapped with me . . . that's exactly right. And I also have a way of just irritating either side, which gets me back to . . . what the hell was the question?

RK: The genesis of Leonard?

JRL: Yeah, so he's a combination of things. And they're also BOTH a combination of me. Hap represents more one side of me than the other and Leonard more the other side. But Hap in personality and, I think, the way he talks in the books and attitude and approach is more similar to me, and maybe if I had been less ambitious and hadn't met my wife, I might have lived like he did. Hopefully not with all the adventures, of course.

RK: You once told me that you were surprised at how popular Hap and Leonard were with older women. Have you ever figured out why?

JRL: I have not. What's interesting is that it's not just older women now. The more the series has been around, the more women are responding to it. I only know that people have said that women will never like this because there's references that they may find offensive. And I think some have.

RK: There are references that we all find offensive.

JRL: That's part of the point.

I think that's one thing that a lot of the readers never understand—that there are some people who are offensive just because they are writing offensively, and there are other people who are using it as a tool and sometimes just for the hell of it. Just for the shock of it. But it's also because this is how a lot of the people I know talk. This is how they really are. And all I'm trying to do is tap into that. A lot of guys have responded to that. They've said, this is the way we really talk. When women aren't around, this is what we say—and you've done that. And the women—another thing that I've heard is that I've had several say, just tell me that Hap is real, please, because I want to marry him. I think what they are responding to somewhat is that Hap is a little bit in need. That people think, well, I can help him out. But the other part of it is that Hap does come across as a good man and that he means well and he's honest and he's trying his best. People respond to that. And they respond to that in Leonard, too.

RK: Do you have Hap and Leonard's lives mapped out?

JRL: No, not really. I have ideas about their lives. I borrow things from my own life, but I also borrow from people I know. It's not always negative stuff, but it's elements here and there. I have a general idea of where they are going, but it's a very general idea. I do some things on instinct. Basically, I'll have a really small idea that stays with me and I won't even know why. They aren't profound. They're little character things, and those will stay with me. The stories come out of the characters; about little revelations and little ideas. What happens is that there will be little things that will change the whole course of the novel. The characters themselves redirect my plans.

RK: Are you planning on incorporating the burgeoning and changing gay civil rights, such as the legalizing of same-sex marriage, in the stories?

JRL: Yeah, I think that will be more of it. It's hard to get a whole lot more, because Leonard's always been pretty damn outspoken. He's never been the bashful type about it. I'm sure that he's mentioned gay marriage a couple of times. I think in this one, there are problems with that because his boyfriend is being affected by all this religious brouhaha about changing your sexual orientation and all.

I think the books are better because they are crazy sort of folk tales mixed with reality, but it's always the social and cultural issues and the two characters that drive the series.

RK: Characters from your other crime novels keep popping in Hap and Leonard. Was this by design all along? Or did it just start happening?

JRL: It's a mixture. Some planned, most not. Sometimes readers see things that aren't there, or are coincidental, and sometimes they're right. I like to let people guess for themselves. It's more fun this way. Also an author touches on similar ideas frequently. Intentionally, or accidental.

RK: Will we start to see Hap and Leonard in your other books?

JRL: I doubt it. Then they might be described.

I hint at what they look like when Hap tells the stories, but actual descriptions by others might deflate the readers' imaginations. But, I never say never.

RK: Will some of these characters, such as Jim Bob and Marvin, star in their own stories?

JRL: Marvin does appear in Act of Love and later in "A Bone-Dead Sadness", a long story. Again more of him, or a Jim Bob story is always possible. I think Vanilla Ride is more likely.

RK: You've had periods when you stopped writing Hap and Leonard, including eight- and five-year gaps between novels. Why do you stop, and why do you keep returning to them?

JRL: The first reason is that I wanted a break from the characters. I didn't mean for it go eight years. A lot of other things I was doing got in the way and took more time than I expected. Probably the biggest reason was that I changed publishers. So my backlist was with one publisher and my frontlist with another. A new publisher doesn’t profit much by the backlist belonging to someone else and they’re not as interested in doing one of the books in that series if they’re not gonna have the backlist. So gradually my agent and I worked to get the backlist back, and it took several years. When we got the Hap and Leonard backlist back, then I went to Knopf, and I actually sold them two of the Hap and Leonard books: Vanilla Ride and Devil Red.

When I left Knopf for Mulholland, I wrote several historical books, including Edge of Dark Water, The Thicket, and Paradise Sky. All the while, I was writing new, shorter Hap and Leonard stories for other publishers, but then Hap’s voice got louder and more insistent, so I wrote the novel Honky Tonk Samurai. He still wouldn’t shut up, so I had to write another, which probably will be called Rusty Puppy.

The Care and Feeding and Raising Up of Hap and Leonard

Careers have phases, and I've had a few.

My early career was merely struggling to sell. I managed early on to write some mystery material, and then horror, mostly short fiction. I wrote some books I'm proud of in my early career—The Nightrunners, Dead in the West, The Magic Wagon, The Drive-In, and Cold in July come to mind.

I remember these were all written in a house on Christian Street. I also wrote there the stories that ended up in my first collection, By Bizarre Hands, as well as Stories by Mama Lansdale's Youngest Boy.

Shortly after I finished Cold in July, we moved to the far side of town, another rural area, to have more room for our kids. Before moving, my study became our daughter's room. She had her crib assembled, amid piles of books, next to my desk, which eventually became covered with baby supplies. I ended up ejected and working on a small, wobbly desk in our bedroom.

Our new house was massive compared to our old one. I had an entire floor for my study, for all my books. With this house came a large desk that I have used ever since, although that is about to change. We are moving. I wrote a lot of books and stories and articles and screenplays and comics on that desk in our middle house, as I have christened it. Our children were raised here.

We are in the process of moving, and as we make efforts in that direction, it occurred to me that this is the house where Hap and Leonard were born. Other characters and stories, and some of my best critically received novels, were birthed here as well, but it somehow seems more significant to me that the boys were born here. There has always been something about Hap and Leonard that has engaged readers in a different way than what I might think of as my more “literary” novels. It’s not so much their adventures that keep pulling people back, although that’s part of it, but is instead the guys themselves. The way they interact with one another and others. A true odd couple. I feel as if I can hardly take credit for them. They seemed to leap into my skull whole-born, like Athena bursting forth from the head of Zeus. And, like Athena, their creation was not by design. It was a happy accident.

Let’s back up a bit.

I wrote *Cold in Jul*y in the Christian Street house, the one before the house we are about to move from; it was one of a two-book contract I had with Bantam. I wanted, at least then, to write books that I thought would be like modern Gold Medal novels, Gold Medal being a division of Fawcett Books, now defunct. Gold Medal was known specifically for crime books, although it certainly produced Westerns, science fiction, and so on. But it was the crime Gold Medals that hooked me in my late teens, and throughout my twenties. Outside Gold Medal, I was influenced heavily by the usual suspects—Chandler, Hammett, and Cain. But there was a tone in the Gold Medal novels that was quite different. They were an overall collective of hardboiled deeds, capers, thefts, and poor suckers riding life trains to oblivion, with no chance to brake or leap off.

I loved that stuff. I collected Gold Medal books for years, and still do, when I can find one that isn't falling apart or that I don't already have. And sometimes even if I do have it, I buy it anyway. They are becoming rarer each day. Where they were once stacked in droves at garage sales and used bookstores fairly dripped with them, they are now as unusual to find as the three-toed sloth in your living room.

With my two-book contract at Bantam, I thought it would be fun to riff on the old Gold Medal books, and after a very vivid dream that led to Cold in July, I was fired up even more. I thought that one had worked out quite well, and I wanted to do yet another in the same tone. Savage Season certainly tasted like Gold Medal, but there was something different about it from Cold in July. It was more deliberate, casual, purposely paced, and although it had twists and a dynamic climax, I found I was writing about my past, at least in a symbolic way, about how my life might have been if certain things had gone another direction. They were fiction, of course, but I must 'fess up and say that a lot in the Hap and Leonard books, especially the first three, was taken directly from events in my life, or the lives of others I knew, extrapolated and made a lot more exciting and dangerous.

I was also writing about the sixties, about how that era shook out, at least for me. I found a symbolic way of doing that by writing a novel that took place in the late eighties, a reflective book, with Hap feeling the changes, wondering how one morning it was the sixties and early seventies—because much of the time when we talk about the sixties, we're really talking about the early seventies as well—and then, the world was new and more consumer-driven, far less idealistic, and the music kind of sucked. In the mid-seventies, the Vietnam War finally wrapped up and the soldiers came home. All of us who had yelled about civil rights and an unjust war and so many things—gay rights, women's rights—suddenly felt vindicated. But in the long run, as Leonard says in Savage Season, the sixties were just the eighties in tie-dyed T-shirts. I'm not as cynical as Leonard, but there's something to be said, at least partially, for that point of view.

The book I was writing was not then called Savage Season but tentatively titled Ice Birds. Problem was everyone thought I was saying Ice Bergs, so I changed the title to Savage Season. It was originally something like A Strange and Savage Season, but that was too long and, frankly, didn't quite fit. It sounded a smidgen pretentious. Therefore, the final decision for a briefer and simpler title. I started writing the book, as I said, pulling from my own life, adding things that never happened, and this guy named Leonard showed up. With his arrival at the first of the novel, I knew then it was a buddy story. I love those. But then Leonard surprised me, not only by showing up but by revealing in a sideways manner that he was gay, Republican, a supporter of the Vietnam War, and a war hero. I hadn't known that going in. Hap Collins, my hero of the book, or at least the one who tells the tale, for Leonard is in many ways just as prominent a character, knew that about Leonard, but he didn't tell me until the moment Leonard revealed it. At the time of writing that book, gay characters were uncommon in crime fiction. There were exceptions, but they were rare. Even more rare were black Republicans, and rarer yet, gay Republicans. They existed, of course, but were generally more uncommon than a three-toed sloth in your living room. They were, in fact, as uncommon as a three-toed sloth in your living room wearing a propeller beanie. Also, male gay characters who were, in appearance and action, more masculine were also underrepresented. Yet I knew they existed, so why not represent them as well? I wasn't thinking about breaking new ground, or anything really, just about writing honest characters who weren't all white and straight and middle class.

Anyway, there I was, writing along, and Leonard showed up, and he and Hap were best friends, and different of opinion in many ways, as many of my friends are different from me, but at the core, Hap and Leonard are one and the same. Honorable men, smart men, who took a wrong boat in life and ended up on the ragged edge of the American Dream.

At the time of that writing, I was not far removed from that very position in life. My wife, Karen, was my saving grace. She directed me in such a way that I moved in a straight line, not in circles. She and I worked as farm fieldworkers, ran a goat dairy, butchered our own meat, and raised our own vegetables. Karen had come from a more middle-class background than I had, but she had dove right in with me, making ends meet as best she could, having faith that our life together would be a good one, and that the American Dream, which I believe in—how can I not? I'm living it—was ours for the taking.

We took hold of it, and have kept our teeth securely clamped there ever since. I know it's an elusive dream, and dream is the right word. It's something we all want, and sometimes it's something, through hard work, inheritance, or accident, that we can have. But, for the most part, it's an opportunity, not a promise.

That's all it's ever been, except for the fact that here in our country, that dream is supposedly more obtainable than elsewhere.

Sometimes it is, and sometimes it's not.

That, too, went into the book. In his own way, Hap is, like Gatsby, standing on the pier, reaching out for the green light across the bay. His life is a lot more blue-collar in nature, and the green light represents to him less than it meant to Gatsby. Not great riches and fine clothes and bringing back the past, just less-back-breaking work, a library card, and a TV that gets what was then all three network channels. A home where he can have a good wife and a happy sex life, raise fine kids to whom he can pass along the dreams he holds dear. Fair play. Common sense. A decent bank account. And, with a little luck, a quick death in old age without lingering illness, or a tube in his pecker and adult diapers steaming with shit.

So Hap, in his own small, blue-collar way, is my Gatsby. At least he is in the first few novels. In time, that changes, as all our lives must change.

Leonard, he just wants to be left alone. He doesn't care about anyone's club. He's gay, and he's all right with that. He's black, and if you don't like it, you can ram a stick up your nose. He's a lot less introspective than Hap. He's one of those guys like my dad was. It is what it is. Wish in one hand and shit in the other, and see which one fills up first.

After Savage Season, I had no idea that I would ever write about Hap and Leonard again. I didn't intend to, and it was three years before I did. I had moved from Bantam to Mysterious Press by that time, a kind of movement not uncommon to authors, especially in those days when we still had a number of publishers to choose from, and we didn't have computer sales numbers following us around. My then-agent managed to get me a two-book contract at Mysterious, and my first book for it wasn't going so well. I put it aside and very quickly wrote another. When I sat down to write it, Hap started speaking to me, and he took over. Even then, I thought, this is it, two and out. But the book really hit a nerve with the publisher and the readers, and a series was born. And boy, did I love Hap and Leonard.

Savage Season, the first, has its funny moments, but compared to the others in the series, it is a little more dour. It was followed by seven others, funnier on the whole, although still dark in places, and variable in tone and themes. The first was my caper book, or as close as I'll get to that; the second was the mysterious murder that is tied to the heroes; the third was the Bad Town novel; and the fourth was . . . well, wacky. The fifth was a road novel, the sixth a fish-out-of-water novel. I left the series for eight years to write other things at yet another publisher, Knopf, and for one of its paperback lines, Vintage.

At that time, Mysterious Press had the original Hap and Leonard novels, and Knopf wasn't interested in carrying the series forward because of that—hence the eight-year wait. Finally, the Hap and Leonard books went out of print, and Vintage picked them up. I wrote two new Hap and Leonard books back-to-back for it, one a kind of mysterious assassin novel, the other a dangerous cult book. The latest, Honky Tonk Samurai, forthcoming in 2016 from my current publisher, Mulholland, is what I call putting the crew together for one big event. It will be followed by Rusty Puppy. The definition of that one is yet to be decided. I never know until I'm finished, and frankly, even then I'm not absolutely certain. What remains in all the books are those guys, their close friendship, their personal histories, and the adventures.

I mention all of this to show how long Hap and Leonard have been with me. After the first six novels, I ceased aging them except when they were having books written about them. So the eight-year wait between number six, Captains Outrageous, and number seven, Vanilla Ride, is in my mind only a few months later, and so on. If I didn't do that, my guys would be in wheelchairs right now, fighting it out in rest homes with villains who were trying to take their desserts and piss in their bedpans.

But between all that waiting, now and again, I wrote shorter pieces about them. After Vanilla Ride and Devil Red, numbers seven and eight in the series, I wrote a novella, Hyenas, about them, and a short story that is among my favorites, a dark piece titled "The Boy Who Became Invisible." My comic-book script for an as yet unpublished comic that I produced for a German publisher is included in this book. I followed this with Dead Aim, another novella. Some years before these, however, my brother Andrew Vachss and I collaborated on a Hap and Leonard novella that to my taste is one of the oddest pieces I've been involved with, unique because Andrew is unique. He added a character to the Hap and Leonard mythology, Veil, and he appears in Veil's Visit, also included here, and although it's not exactly rare, it's a story that, until now, has been hard to capture. Veil, like my brother Andrew, is smart and unpredictable. A man couldn't ask for a better brother and friend than Andrew Vachss, whom I love and admire, as does my entire family. He thinks outside the box as a writer, as a lawyer, and as a protector of children. For my own children, he is Uncle Andrew, and they love him and think the world of him. Of course, they should.

Another related novella was Marvin Hanson’s first solo adventure since his introduction in my very first crime novel Act of Love (way back in 1981). A Bone-Dead Sadness is a bit different than much of my crime work, a kind of locked-room crime. Since Marvin is a recurring character throughout many of the Hap and Leonard stories, it’s included in this very collection.

What else is here?

I also had a promotional piece I had written to advertise Bad Chili, the fourth book in the series. It was “cleverly” called “Death by Chili.” It went out to reviewers and whoever received galleys of Bad Chili, part of a promotional package that included the story and a hot pepper glued to the page. I still have one or two of those promotional packets somewhere.

“Death by Chili” is the lightest of the Hap and Leonard pieces. Something to cleanse your palate. It’s a kind of locked-room mystery, and it’s Leonard’s story, for the most part.

This book also includes an interview I did with the guys, and, better yet, an intro by Michael Koryta and a memoir of Hap and Leonard and me by Bill Crider, who was there at the beginning. To have fine writers like Michael and Bill write about Hap and Leonard, and about me, is humbling indeed. I’m honored to have them here.

On top of all that are two new Hap and Leonard stories, one about their high school years and the other, more a vignette, about one of their favorite hangouts.

I am also grateful to have Rick Klaw, my editor on this book, as a friend. I have known him for many years now. He was nothing but an energetic kid with a lot of plans when I met him. Now he’s an energetic adult who has fulfilled many of those plans and is in the process of fulfilling others. Fortunately, I have been a part of those plans, and I owe him a lot for helping put this book together.

For Hap and Leonard fans who might have missed these stories when they first came out, I hope this will be a small treat. For those who have yet to discover Hap and Leonard, perhaps these short visits will encourage you to come on over and visit them in their truer habitat, the novel.

I would also like to thank Sundance TV; my friend and director, Jim Mickle; and my good buddy, actor/screenwriter Nick Damici, for all their hard work on developing these characters into a series. A special thanks has to go to Lowell Northrop, my friend and co-collaborator, for organizing and presenting this series to Jim and Nick, and for all his hard work and relentless pursuit of a series about Hap and Leonard. He knows the characters better than I do—I think they talk to him more than to me.

I should also mention, with great pride and respect, James Purefoy and Michael K. Williams, two fine actors and equally fine fellows who have brought Hap and Leonard to life on the small screen. Thanks, guys. It has been a treat.

And thanks to my pal Bill Sage, as well as the always game Jeff Pope, the wonderfully intense Neil Sandilands, the remarkable Christina Hendricks, and Jimmi Simpson and the sweetly tough-as-nails Pollyanna McIntosh. She's what we in Texas call "a pistol." You need her to climb through a window, she'll do it. Wrestle a bear, she's ready. Kick someone's ass, where the hell are they?

Thanks to all the crew and actors and everyone involved in the television show for braving mosquitoes; all manner of huge, crawling bugs, including fire ants; alligators; snakes; tornadoes; windstorms; rainstorms; and blistering heat to make this series a reality.

Special thanks to my niece and assistant, the smart and lovely Pamela Lansdale, aka Pamela Dunklin. She kept me focused, provided granola bars when I looked as if I might be losing blood sugar, and made certain things went smoothly. And, of course, thanks to my lovely wife, Karen, for letting me go on a two-month long adventure into TV land. And to my children, Keith and Kasey, thanks for supporting your old man with kind words and humor.

Finally, thanks to the Baton Rouge, Louisiana area, and all the nice people there for letting us pretend it was East Texas. Why not? They look just alike, although I think your crawfish are better.

So here are the stories.

Read and enjoy.

JOE R. LANSDALE

EDGAR AWARD–WINNING AUTHOR OF MOON LAKE

Praise for Born for Trouble

"It doesn't get much better than one of the best crime writers in the business serving up brand-new stories featuring his most iconic characters. Lansdale isn't just a brilliant storyteller with heart, he's also funny as hell, with tales of mummified dachshunds, homicidal bookmobiles, and a psychopathic hunt club. This collection is an absolute blast and a gift to all of us devoted fans."
—Ace Atkins, author of The Heathens

"If you already know Joe Lansdale, you don't need me to tell you to read Born for Trouble. If you don't, you're in for a hell of a ride. Pulpy, blackly humorous, compulsively readable, and somehow both wildly surreal and down-to-earth. Lansdale is a national fucking treasure."
—Christa Faust, author of Money Shot

"If you've met these dudes before, you won't be surprised to hear that these latest stories are a treat; if you're a Hap-andLeonard virgin, well, I'll overlook the fact that you've spent your recent years living in a cave and congratulate you on the adventure upon which you're embarking."
—Lawrence Bloch, author of the Matthew Scudder series

"You could call Born for Trouble a collection of stories. But that's like calling Paradise Lost by Milton a poem. Born for Trouble is a road map through 20th-century crime fiction, and your guides are two of the greatest, most intriguing characters ever created, Hap and Leonard."
—S.A. Cosby, author of Razorblade Tears and Blacktop Wasteland

"Born for Trouble: The Further Adventures of Hap and Leonard will delight Hap and Leonard fans all over the world."
—Lewis Shiner, author of Glimpses and Frontera

"Each story in this outstanding collection is like a full-ass novel boiled down to pure muscle, bone and mayhem, served up the just the way you like it."
—Duane Swierczynski, author of Revolver and Breakneck

"It's good to see Hap and Leonard again, especially now. When there are too many people willing to hurt others for fun and profit, Hap and Leonard will always kick the right asses and take the right names."
—Christopher Farnsworth, author of Blood Oath and Flashmob

"Hijinks and shenanigans anchored by the warmth of camaraderie and a steady flow of excellent jokes."
—Stephanie Cha, author of Your House Will Pay

"If you already love Hap and Leonard, you absolutely need this. If you're new, this is a fine place to meet them. I hope these stories go on forever."

—Richard Kadrey, author of the Sandman Slim series

"Joe Lansdale's Hap and Leonard stories are right up there with Richard Stark's Parker books to me. . . . An inspiration to all of us who make our living in the crime-fiction section, Born for Trouble is yet another masterclass in how it's done."
—Ed Brubaker, author of Criminal and The Fade Out

Praise for Joe R. Lansdale

"A folklorist's eye for telling detail and a front-porch raconteur's sense of pace."
—New York Times Book Review

"A terrifically gifted storyteller."
—Washington Post Book Review

"Like gold standard writers Elmore Leonard and the late Donald Westlake, Joe R. Lansdale is one of the more versatile writers in America."
—Los Angeles Times

"A zest for storytelling and gimlet eye for detail."
—Entertainment Weekly

"Lansdale is an immense talent."
—Booklist

"Lansdale is a storyteller in the Texas tradition of outrageousness . . . but amped up to about 100,000 watts."
—Houston Chronicle

"Lansdale's been hailed, at varying points in his career, as the new Flannery O'Connor, William Faulkner-gone-madder, and the last surviving splatterpunk . . . sanctified in the blood of the walking Western dead and righteously readable."
—Austin Chronicle

About the Author

Introduction: “The Boys”

I have been writing about the “Boys,” as I call them, for many years, and my children have grown up with them almost as if they are living, breathing uncles. My wife thinks of them as close brothers of mine who can be both humorous and annoying, who arrive on our doorstep with checks in their hands, both for novels and stories and the TV series, even comic adaptations, to help us pay bills and be quite comfortable. So, we don’t fuss much at their occasional bad manners and destruction of the furniture. Not to mention all those vanilla cookie bags and Dr. Pepper cans lying around.

Thank you, Boys, you have done well by us.

Writing about them has given me great pleasure, and thankfully they have given pleasure to others. I get numerous emails, letters, notes, even phone calls, to tell me how much the characters have meant to them. How they have given them relief in difficult times, helped them navigate sickness and death, as much as such a thing is possible, and that information alone makes it worth the creation and writing of Hap and Leonard.

I write for me. I never try and figure out what others will like when I’m writing, but when I finish with a story or novel, whatever form of writing I’m undertaking, I always hope there will be those who feel as I do. That the story I’ve written was worth the effort and that perhaps, just perhaps, it’ll spark flame to some kindling in your thoughts, soul, or at least kill a few hours.

I also include in the Hap and Leonard stories bits of social commentary, ribald humor, and the feelings and look of the East Texas environment. Contrary to what some might think, East Texas is not all redneck ignorance and racism and gun violence, but those things certainly exist. The reason it is so prevalent in my fiction is not that a better and positive side of East Texas doesn't exist; it is that the negative elements are what I wish to comment on, and stories that frequently are about crime or criminal elements will certainly have some bad characters in them. If I wrote about the ocean, there would be fish, and if I wrote about the sky, there would at least be occasional clouds.

That said, the Hap and Leonard stories truly do run the gamut. Blood and Lemonade and Of Mice and Minestrone both tell about when Hap and Leonard were growing up, and for the most part tend to not be 100 percent crime stories. They are what you might call How We Lived Then stories. They are a kind of autopsy of what ticks inside the characters, Hap primarily, although I have written a few very short stories from Leonard's POV that will in time be gathered together in one volume that I might cleverly call Leonard.

This volume is different. It has elements closer to the novels, but with less social background than some, and more excitement. When I wasn't writing Hap and Leonard stories, was busy on a novel, I would sometimes find myself missing them in the way you might miss a family member who had gone on a long vacation and had been completely out of touch.

I would dream about Hap, hear his voice, and abruptly I would have to put away whatever I was writing—tuck it into a computer file to be more accurate—and take a break to let Hap and Leonard speak to me. Most of these are stories of that ilk. Hap showed up. He talked. I took notes.

There are times when I need to take a vacation from Hap and Leonard, or I am happy to see them pack their suitcases and hit the trail. I sometimes need a rest from those guys, but I am always glad when they come back.

This collection contains some previous visits. They are collected here for the first time together in one volume. I hope they will serve as more than a placeholder until a novel arrives. I think they are good stories, and varied.

A note. This really should go without saying, but some readers say, "Well, wouldn't they be old by now? Unable to do what they do?"

In reality they would be slightly older than me. And I am no spring chicken. Though I'm spry. But here's the thing—as real as they seem to me, they have a different relationship with time than the rest of us.

I let them age, but I have never done it on a year-by-year basis. Like Travis McGee, Philip Marlowe, James Bond, and numerous other fictional characters, they move at a different pace and have multiple adventures that no living person might have in a lifetime, or two.

I consider a year when I do not write about them to be a year in which they remain, time-wise, in amber. When I return to them, or they return to me, the clock starts again, though I don't worry if it's the year it should be after their last adventure. If I wait eight years between novels, or what have you, they are only slightly older than when I ceased writing about them eight years before. Their current adventure will take place in the current year, which means they do not maintain a realistic chronology. I may even decide to write about them when they are younger, or middle-aged. I get to choose.

Some folks are really bugged by this. I'm not sure why, but they are. It pops up in a lot of discussions. At the same time, this approach is one that has been around forever; story heroes are not necessarily subject to the ticking of the clock.

As long as I enjoy writing about them, I will age them slowly, though there may come a day when I age them out. I don't plan too far ahead when it comes to books and stories.

So, folks, bring some vanilla cookies and Dr. Pepper for Leonard, some iced tea and animal crackers for Hap, and let's have a party.

Of course, don't mind me if after the cookies and such, I toddle off to bed early. That bunch, fun as they can be, can wear me out. And unlike them, I do age.

But I must admit, to a great extent, the Boys, with all their boisterousness and frequent juvenile humor, keep me young. I like that.

Coco Butternut

“All I want you to do is make the exchange. Give them the bag, and they’ll give you Coco Butternut.”

We were all in the office of Brett Sawyer’s Investigations, me and Leonard and Brett, my daughter Chance, and this little, chubby guy, Jimmy Farmer who wore a very bad toupée. He wanted us to make an exchange for him. Give some blackmailer a bag full of money in exchange for a dog called Coco Butternut that had belonged to Farmer’s mother, as did the pet cemetery, a mortuary, and a cemetery for humans called Oak Rest.

Our German shepherd, Buffy, was also present, lying on the couch, about as interested as a dog can be in conversations that don’t involve the words “treat” or “outside.”

What was odd about all this was Coco Butternut was as dead as a stone and mummified.

“Let me see here,” Leonard said. “You got a pickled dog stolen from you, and you want us to give some money to a guy that dug him up—”

“Her,” Jimmy said. He had a condescending way of talking and a face that somehow made you want to punch it. He had all the personality of the Ebola virus. I hadn’t liked him on sight, and I wasn’t sure why.

“Okay,” Leonard said. “Her. You want us to give a bag of money to a dead dog-napper and he gives us the mutt, and that’s it?”

“That’s all,” Farmer said. “Only one of you can do it. He said to send one person to make the exchange. He said I could do it, but I’m not comfortable with that, and I told him so.”

“You two talked person to person?” Brett said.

“No, we . . . does this girl work here?”

“That’s my daughter, Chance,” I said. He had been eyeing her since he first came in, as if she might have designs on his wallet.

“She can be discreet?” he said.

“She certainly can,” Chance said. Chance had her thick black hair tied back in a ponytail, and she was dressed the same as Brett, tee-shirt and blue jeans and tennis shoes. She looked like a fifties teenybopper. Even in her twenties she could have easily passed for eighteen or nineteen. She was so sweet she broke my heart.

Farmer paused a moment, taking time to consider how discreet Chance could be, I suppose.

"Okay," he said. "This thief, we didn't talk face to face. First he sent me a note that said he had the dog.

"I went to the pet cemetery to look. There was a hole where she was buried, an empty grave. No question the body was gone.

"There was a sealed plastic bag in the empty grave. Inside of it was a burner phone. There was a note with a number on it. I called the number. That's how we spoke, and that's when he told me what he wanted. I threw the phone away like he asked."

"You know the man's voice?" Leonard asked.

"No. It may even have not been a man."

"You keep saying he," I said.

"Look, it was one of those synthesizer things. You can't tell who you're talking to. Sounds more male than female on those things. I couldn't tell the sex or age really. Voice said they had my mother's dog, and he wanted money."

"They?" Brett asked.

"What the voice said."

"Why was the dog pickled?" Leonard said.

"Embalmed and wrapped like a mummy," Farmer said. "Not pickled."

"Same thing," Leonard said. "Except for the duct tape."

"No tape. Cloth. Mother had it done five years ago. She died shortly thereafter. The wrapping is stuck to the dog with some kind of adhesive. They embalmed her, and then wrapped her. It's not duct tape."

"Can I ask why?" I said.

"We own a pet mortuary and cemetery. Most dogs are cremated, but we offer a variety of services. Embalming and mummification for example. Coco Butternut was a show dog. A dachshund. She had won a number of dog show awards. Nothing big, but Mother adored her. She had all her dogs embalmed. Coco Butternut was the first one to be wrapped, mummified."

"I know we can become very attached to our pets," Brett said. "But it isn't your dog, and well, it's dead. You sure you want to pay for a mummified dog corpse?"

"I never really cared for the dog," Farmer said. "It bit me a few times. Nasty animal. But Mother was sentimental about it, and I'm sentimental about her. The dog meant a lot to her."

I didn't actually find Farmer all that sentimental, but you never really know someone at first blush, and truth is, you may not ever know someone even when you think you do.

"When you say a lot," Leonard said, "the next question is how much is this sentiment going to cost you?"

"I'd rather not say. Just deliver the bag and bring home the dog."

"I got one more question," Leonard said. "Who names a dog Coco Butternut?"

"Mother," Farmer said.

"Not to step on your mother's grave, but why the hell would she name a dog that," Leonard said. "She just go by Coco, or Butter, or Nut?"

"Dog had a chocolate body, but butternut-colored paws. That's how the name came about."

"Could have just called her Spot or Socks or some such," Leonard said. "Hell, Trixie. I had a dog named Trixie. That's a good name."

Farmer was paying us good money to deliver the bag, and the good money was considerably more than what we normally made for a few hours' work. He really wanted that dog back.

Plan was I would make the drop and exchange, and Leonard would find a place to hide in case things went south. We weren't hired to take the body snatcher down, and in fact, Farmer insisted we didn't. Said things could go wrong if we tried to do that. Thing was make the exchange and keep it smooth and simple.

Leonard went over to Farmer's house, picked up the money and was bringing it to us. I was looking out the office window as he drove up. It was a nice spring day and bright and the young woman downstairs that owned the bicycle shop was wearing shorts and her legs were long and brown and Brett wasn't looking at me right then and Chance was sorting out the lunch she had picked up from a Japanese restaurant. Buffy was watching me, but she didn't care what I was doing.

I kept a steady vigil as the fine-looking shop owner leaned over a bike she was repairing. Those shorts certainly could ride high.

It wasn't that I wasn't fine with my woman. I'm a one-woman man. But I still like to look. I think it's good for my heart or something, maybe even the liver.

Leonard parked and came across the lot, nodding at the blonde as he did. He looked up and saw me at the window and smiled. He came up the stairs and inside and placed the satchel on the desk. It had a clasp lock on it with a ring and through the ring was a tiny padlock.

Leonard said, "Brett, I think Hap was looking at that blonde's butt out there.”

“Daddy,” Chance said.

“I was merely looking out the window,” I said.

“I’ve noticed you do that a lot when she’s out there,” Brett said. “Don’t con me, Hap Collins.”

“Okay, the con is over,” I said. “So I can look at will?”

“I didn’t say that,” Brett said. “I prefer you think you’re being sneaky. It shows you have some pride.”

“That’s one way of looking at it,” Leonard said. “Now, you all thinking what I’m thinking?”

“How much money is in that bag,” I said.

“That’s right,” Leonard said.

“We don’t need to know,” Brett said. “And besides, it’s locked.”

“Hap’s going into this with a bag of money, someone bringing a dead dog to him. I think it might be wise to see how much is in the bag. I don’t like that Farmer guy, anyway.”

Brett came over and looked down at the satchel. “Like I said, we don’t need to know. But, my lockpick kit is in the drawer.”

Chance opened the drawer and removed the kit, handed it to Brett. She took out her tools and worked on the lock for a moment or two. It clicked open.

“He gave me a key to give to the kidnapper,” Leonard said. “But I just wanted to see you work that lock.”

Brett grinned at Leonard. “You rascal.”

“And then some,” Leonard said.

Brett opened the satchel. There were a lot of bills in it, stacks bound by paper binders. She took it out and thumbed through it.

“Jesus,” she said. “There’s something like a hundred thousand dollars here.”

“For a dead dog?” Leonard said.

“This guy must be rich,” Chance said.

“He is. Should have seen his house. You could park my apartment, your house, and this building in it. Well, there might not be room for the couch.”

“Ha,” I said.

“Yeah,” Leonard said, “that putting dead bodies in the ground pays mighty good.”

Brett said, “Now we know,” closed the satchel and put the lock back on it.

We decided first to have a recon mission before we made the actual drop. The team, as I like to think of us, drove out to the drop spot. That means me and Leonard, Brett and Chance. Chance decided she wanted to get in on things, and we decided to let her, as long as it wasn’t dangerous. It was pretty much a family business, so why not.

Drop was to take place at a graveyard, which when you think about it is kind of ironic. Dog was dug up from a graveyard, and was to be returned in one.

This one was an old graveyard for black citizens. It was called the Colored Graveyard by some, and there was a historical marker that called it a Negro Graveyard. It stopped being used mid-twentieth century, and though it was kept up, it was a piss-poor job. Someone hacked the weeds around the graves now and then with what appeared to be a stick. The drop was to happen at a grave for K. Hollis Colby. It was one of the few tombstones that was still intact. It was the only large tombstone and it was one of the few where you could see the name clearly on it. The dates of birth and death were not so clear. Looking at it I thought no matter who you are or where you are or when you're from, time passes away, and so do you and the memory of you. Maybe someone keeps it alive for a few generations, but most of us aren't remembered after the last shovelful of dirt is thrown in the hole.

"So this kidnapper's supposed to bring Coco Butterbutt here," Leonard said.

"Butternut," I said.

"I know. I just don't like that guy, and by proxy I think his dog is an asshole. Who names a fucking dog Coco Butternut?"

"His mother," I said.

"The dog's mother?"

"Now you're being a jerk. Farmer's mother."

"What kind of mother does that? Gives a dog a name like that."

Chance was coming across the graveyard to meet us. She had a device in her hand.

When she came up, she said, "Kind of sad here, isn't it?"

"Oh, I don't know," Leonard said. "They're dead. I'm kind of over it."

"Leonard," Chance said, "you are a turd."

"Just a little bit," he said, and tipped his fedora back. He had taken to wearing it all the time. It wasn't a hat that irritated me, like some he wore.

That goddamn deerstalker I took care of, and I don't think he even missed it, which means he merely had it to mess with me. He walked around in that thing, strutting like a peacock, drawing attention to himself because he knew that drew attention to me, and he knew it embarrassed me to be seen with him in that damn thing. The fedora. That was cool.

"Brett said you have to find some place to put this it can't be seen. It picks up voices good. You plant it, and we'll be back across the way, and we can hear everything."

"Where you'll be," Leonard said, "something goes down, by the time you or Brett get here with a big ole pistol or a long stick, Hap'll be dead and bleeding on ole Colby here."

"Don't be so morbid," Chance said. "He'll be all right. He's got you closer by."

"Girl, you are what we call a goddamn optimist," Leonard said. "You ain't been around your dad enough to know trouble follows his ass around."

"Maybe it's you trouble follows," Chance said. "You two are always together."

"Might be something to that," Leonard said.

There was a thin pine sapling that had grown up in the graveyard, and it wasn't far from the grave where we were supposed to make the exchange.

"Put it there," I said.

Chance went over to the sapling and Leonard walked over to help her. I stood where I was, thinking something about this whole thing smelled like the ass end of a dead elephant. Outside of what we were being asked to do, something else wasn't right.

"We got it," Chance said.

“I think I actually got it,” Leonard said.

“I held it while you fastened it down,” she said.

“Yeah, but I turned it on,” Leonard said.

“Children,” I said. “Back to the car.”

Driving us back to the office, Brett said, “We’ll get there before dark so Leonard can hide in the woods. He’s got a mic, and I got one. We can both hear what’s going down and Leonard will be close if something turns sideways.”

“I can hear it too,” Chance said.

“Of course you can,” Leonard said.

“Uncle Leonard,” Chance said. “I am going to hit you in the eye.”

Leonard laughed. “You are my kind of kid.”

“I’m not a kid.”

“Of course you aren’t,” Leonard said. “You are in your twenties, and therefore you are grown and know all there is to know.”

Chance was in the front seat beside Brett. She leaned through the crack in the seats and popped a knuckle into the top of Leonard’s thigh.

“Damn, Hap, I was hoping she wasn’t like you,” he said, rubbing his leg.

“Me too,” I said.

“What we could do,” Leonard said, “is we could keep the money and shoot the guy in the head and give Farmer back his dog and no one would be the wiser.”

“You talk some shit,” Brett said, “but you wouldn’t do anything like that."

"Maybe it's about time I did. I'm starting to look for retirement money."

"Retirement's a long ways off," Chance said.

"That's what Hap told me when I was thirty-five. Don't worry. We got plenty of time, he said. How'd that work out, Hap?"

"Not so well," I said.

We got there three hours early. Come too close to time, the man making the drop might see us and figure we were planning on nailing him. We weren't planning that at all. We just had the microphones for insurance. Our plan was to make the drop and take Coco Butternut home to Farmer, who was waiting nervously. Then we would cash the check he gave us.

I parked a pickup I had borrowed inside the graveyard, as that would be how I was to haul the coffin away. Farmer said it was a full-sized coffin and wouldn't fit in a trunk or backseat.

Leonard hid in the tree line beyond the graveyard, and lay flat. I insisted he not bring a gun. I was sick of them. Instead he brought a baseball bat. I brought a Yawara stick: a little stick nubbed on both ends, used by Jujitsu folks to strike and lock with. I was fair with it. Nobody was going to give me a job making an instruction video, but I could fuck you up with it, if I needed to. I had it in my back pocket under my coat.

The days were mildly warm, but as winter moved in, some of the nights were a little brisk. I tugged my jacket tight and zipped it up. It was not only a chilly night, but a dark night, and maybe our kidnapper planned on that. I saw him or her coming in a large truck along the road toward the graveyard.

The truck wound down the road and the headlights flashed through the thin run of trees along the edge of the graveyard, and then the truck roared down the dirt drive that led into it, the tires large as those of a semi. If the driver was being sneaky about it, I couldn't tell it. I noticed the license plate had been removed from the front of the truck, and I guessed the back was the same. He'd probably slip them back on when he was out of our sight and continue on his merry way. The headlights were in my eyes, but there was enough residual light from them I could see the truck had been spotted with paint. Most likely a kind of paint you could hose off. It was too dark to know what color paint the spots were, and it didn't matter; it wouldn't be there long enough to make any difference should I want to identify it. The underneath paint was white, though, of that I was certain. Like me, the driver had showed up early, but me and my crew had shown up earlier.

I stood framed in the headlights for a moment and then the driver backed the truck and turned it into the graveyard and bounced across a couple of headstones, knocking them over, snapping them underneath the truck tires like peanut hulls. Rest in peace. The bed of the truck was covered with a camper, and it looked cheap, and my guess was that was more camouflage, and once the job was done, the driver would get rid of that too.

The driver's door opened and someone got out of the truck, and it was high enough from cab to dirt, they had to drop to the ground instead of step.

Then the driver came around in front of the truck with an odd waddle and stood there for a moment. I was certain it was a guy, and I could see he had a gun strapped in a holster on his hip. It was a big gun. He wore a black hood over his head. It had eye holes cut in it.

After a moment of staring at me, he opened the camper at the back with a tiny bit of a struggle, dropped down the tailgate and lifted the top of the gate, the part that had a little window in it.

He gestured for me to come to him. I left the satchel on the grave and went over. He took a small light out of his coat pocket and flashed it inside the truck. I could see a coffin in there. It was rusty looking and it was full size, far bigger than what you'd expect as the last resting spot for a weenie dog.

The man motioned for me to grab the handle of the coffin, and I did. I pulled, and when the end got close to the tailgate, he took the handle on that side. Lifted it out, and we set it on the ground.

He held out his hand, implying I should give him the money.

"I need to see what's in the coffin before I do," I said.

This was something I thought might get me shot for a moment. I wished now I had let Leonard bring a rifle, but then again, another reason I didn't want him to have one is he's not that good a shot. Not bad, but he might just as easily shoot me if things went asunder. Right then I thought we should have switched jobs. I can hit a dime on edge at considerable distance with nothing but a glint of moonlight shining on the dime. It's an inborn knack for someone who really didn't like guns at all.

We stood that way for what seemed long enough for the season to pass, and then he nodded his hooded head, and motioned for me to open the coffin. I could see where it had been pried open before, so all I had to do was lift the lid.

Inside there was a small cloth-wrapped thing that might have been the body of a real dog or a wooden cutout covered in cloth. The cloth had turned brown and was rotting in spots. There was a musty odor, but no real stink of death. The dog was long past that.

“I need to cut the cloth and see what’s beneath it,” I said.

A nod from the hooded man.

I took out my pocket knife and bent over and cut loose some of the cloth. The hooded man helped by shining the flashlight into the coffin. It looked like there were bits of dog under the cloth. Gray, loose skin, and in some places the withered muscles were visible. I decided it was a dog. Was it the right dog? I couldn’t tell. I had done my part. I hadn’t been hired as a forensic expert, which was a good thing.

As I backed off he put his hand on the lid to close the coffin. He had very small hands compared to the rest of him. He closed the lid, placed one hand on his gun grip, and the other he used to make a kind of gimme motion.

I walked back to the grave, picked up the satchel and brought it over. He placed it on the tailgate, opened it for a look, made a satisfied grunt, and closed the satchel and looked at me.

I hadn’t moved.

He pushed the tailgate up and the upper portion down, walked swiftly to the driver’s side carrying the satchel, pulled himself into the cab and closed the door.

I gave the truck a good onceover. Yep, spray paint spots, and I still figured it was watercolor. The truck rumbled and the lights came on, and then it moved away, swiftly, down the dirt and gravel graveyard drive on out to the asphalt road. There was a flash of taillights through the trees, and that was it, he was gone.

Leonard, Brett and Chase all had microphones, so they heard me, and in a moment Leonard came walking out of the woods swinging his ball bat slightly above the ground. I thought he looked disappointed. He hadn't had the opportunity to hit anyone.

A few moments later I saw headlights through the woods, and knew that was Brett and Chance coming around to meet us.

They stopped the Prius, got out and came over.

Brett looked at the coffin.

"So that's all there was to it?"

"Yep," I said. "That was it."

"Silly fool paying for a dead dog, and we're talking one hundred thousand dollars, not a few hundred."

"I think it's sweet," Chance said. "It's not the dead dog, though I can understand that, it's about his mother."

"Yeah, Farmer and his dear old mother," Leonard said.

I went and pulled the pickup around, and me and Leonard loaded the coffin up, and we drove out of there with Brett and Chance following us.

As we rode along in the pickup, I said, "I keep thinking who would know the dog was worth that much to him, and then, why all the mystery, why hire us to do it? He could have done what we did."

"Said he was scared," Leonard said. "So I got a feeling he might know who had the dog, and whoever it was wasn't in love with him. Knew he came to get it, they might take the money and shoot him in the head and that would be the end of it. But if one of us came, the kidnapper might not feel the need to kill anyone he didn't know. Just make the exchange and drive away."

"Could be," I said.

"What I'm getting is we're being made monkeys for something we don't understand, and I don't like that. This stinks more than a dead dog, brother."

"Dog didn't stink that much, actually."

"Well, it stinks to me. I don't believe that Farmer fucker at all."

"You are a skeptical man," I said.

"Find a place to pull over. I want to take a look at that dog myself."

"Already have. Musty. Loose fur. Mummified under the wrap."

"Pull over."

We were still out in the country, so I pulled over by the side of the road near a stand of trees next to a little, trickling creek.

We got out of the truck and the Prius pulled up behind us and killed the lights. Brett and Chance got out.

"Car trouble?" Brett said as she and Chance came over.

"No," I said. "Leonard wants to look himself. He thinks Farmer's story stinks."

"Really none of our business how true his story is," Brett said. "We've done what we were paid to do. I don't think swapping money for a dead dog is illegal."

"Unless you consider that whole extortion thing," I said.

"When you're right, you're right," Brett said.

Leonard had the tailgate on the pickup down and was tugging at the coffin, paying us no mind. I went over and took hold of the other handle and we set it down behind the pickup. Leonard opened it up. He had a flashlight in his pocket, and he was shining it around on the dog.

I said, “Okay. There is one odd thing. The dog is lying on a bottom that’s higher than the real bottom. I didn’t notice that before.”

“I noticed it right off,” Leonard said.

“I have your word for that,” I said.

“Looks obvious to me,” Chance said.

“Remember, I am your dad,” I said.

“Yes, Daddy,” Chance said.

By this time Leonard had lifted the dog out and placed it on the ground. There was a small hole in one corner of the false bottom and Leonard’s finger fit in there. He lifted the false bottom out, and on the true bottom of the coffin lay a corpse.

I couldn’t distinguish age, but enough of the flesh and features had survived that I could tell that it was most likely a woman, way the hips were set, way the wide edges of the bones cut through the rotting flesh.

Chase said, “Yuck.”

“Damn,” Brett said.

Leonard stepped back, pushed the fedora up on his head and looked at me. “What kind of dog is that, Hap?”

Leonard and I took the Prius. Brett and Chance took the pickup and drove the body to the police station. Me and Leonard went to Farmer’s house. We might get our nuts in a vice over that with the police, even if the police chief was a good friend.

Farmer’s home was inside a gate and there was a tall rock wall around it and great oak and hickory trees that might have been around when Davy Crockett died at the Alamo bordered on either side of a long, white, winding drive. We stopped at the gate and pushed the button on the device outside, but the buzzer we heard went unanswered.

I walked up to the gate and looked through. It was a big house at the end of that long, white drive. It loomed like a mountain and was as dark as a murderer’s dreams.

“He was expecting us to deliver,” I said. “So why doesn’t he answer?”

“Might not like the answer to that question,” Leonard said. “Grab a flashlight.”

I went back to the car, got a flashlight out of the glove box and gloves for both of us. They don’t call it a glove box for nothing.

Leonard walked along the fence until he found a thick vine that wound down off the wall. He took hold of it, and pulled himself up and got over the wall, nimble as a squirrel. I followed, doing the same, less nimbly.

We walked along the drive toward the house. A walk like that you damn near needed provisions. The shadows from the trees were as thick as chunks of chocolate cake. A chill wind was blowing hard, lifting dead leaves, tumbling them over us and across the drive in an explosion of crackles and pops. More leaves snapped underfoot like locust husks.

When we came close to the house we could still see no light, not even in the side rooms. There was a brace of dried winter trees and evergreen shrubbery all about. At the back of the house we found a door pried open, as if with a crowbar.

We pulled our burglar gloves on and nudged the door open further and slipped inside. It was a corridor, and we went down it into a room large enough to keep a pet pachyderm. I moved the flashlight around enough to see that the furnishings were expensive and the paintings on the wall seemed to be as well. The frames were all impressive. I got my frames at Walmart, so I might not be an expert.

I found a light switch and hit it and the lights came on. We wandered out of the main room and down another hallway and poked our heads in rooms along the way, switching lights on, but nothing jumped out at us. We turned lights off as we left the rooms. The hallway was very long and the walls on either side were covered in dog photos in nice frames: all weenie dogs. There were award ribbons too, lots of Best In Show stuff, and there was a large photo of Coco Butternut. I knew this due to my superior sleuthing skills and because underneath the photo which was encased in a gold frame was a metal plate that read: coco butternut, my sweetie.

Last room on the left, Leonard turned on the light at the edge of the door and we went inside. More nice furniture, a fireplace you could have roasted a whole hog in. Farmer lay on the floor. He was not napping or watching a bug crawl across the ceiling, which was one of my pastimes. He lay on the floor next to the couch and there was blood all over his head and all over the floor and his head was a lot flatter than when we had last seen him. He hadn’t just been smashed in the head, he had been worked over good. One of his arms was at an odd angle. His toupée lay in a puddle of blood, like a dead kitten.

“Now we call the cops,” Leonard said.

We didn’t need to, because no sooner had we walked back to the main room than we saw flashing lights out the front window at the top of the drive. We stood where we were until someone got the gate open, and then three cop cars came rolling down the drive to park in front of the house.

I turned on a light that gave the front porch illumination, that porch being a giant concrete slab surrounded by shrubs, except at the steps which led down to a concrete walk. Leonard and I walked out there and stood with our hands loose in case the cops thought we were burglars or might be reaching for something.

Chief Marvin Hanson, our friend, got out of the head cop car and came over. “You guys,” he said. “What assholes.”

“What did we do?” Leonard said.

“Brett and Chance gave us the scoop, showed us the body, and we came here to talk to Farmer, and who do I find, but two salt and pepper assholes.”

“That asshole stuff,” Leonard said. “That hurts.”

“You won’t get to talk to Farmer,” I said.

“He not home?”

“Oh, he’s home, but someone in a very bad mood got here before we did and rearranged his head.”

“Yeah,” Leonard said, “he’s all over the place in there.”

“Shit,” Marvin said.

So Marvin and some of the cops took a peekaboo while me and Leonard sat on the steps and shot the shit with one of the officers who had been assigned to make sure we didn’t turn to smoke and disappear. The officer’s last name was Carroll and last time we had spent any time with him was when Leonard was beating the hell out of a dog abuser and Carroll had been called to make sure Leonard didn't kill the guy. Leonard and Carroll got along well and they were laughing about this and that and pretty much cutting me out of the conversation, though I tried several ways by which I might enter into the discussion, only to find myself ignored or given short shrift.

I was still looking for my opening when Marvin came out on the porch and sent Carroll inside to do this or that. Marvin said, "Thing is, we get here and there's a dead body, and we got you guys, and this after making a trade at a cemetery for a dead woman in a coffin."

"We thought we were trading for a dead dog," I said.

"But you didn't call the cops when this blackmail was going on, now did you?"

"We did not," I said.

"Bad us," Leonard said. "You guys really would have cared about a guy trading money for a pooch corpse? That would have been like a priority?"

"Maybe not too much," Marvin said, and sat down on the steps by us. He shooed the other cops away.

"So how bad a trouble are we in?" I said.

"I don't think you did it," Marvin said, "if I take Brett and Chance at their word, and I do, but I'm not sure how a judge and a courtroom would take all this."

"He was our client," I said. "We came to find out why he had lied to us about getting a dog's body back, and there was a woman's with it. We wanted answers."

"You should have come to me," Marvin said. "I'm the law. We get paid to get answers."

"Okay. Here's a thought. Is there some kind of privilege for private investigators and their clients?" Leonard said.

"Only in the movies, boys. Only in the movies."

They took us downtown but didn't throw us in a holding cell. We sat in Marvin's office with Brett and Chance. I had that feeling I had in grade school when the teacher made you write something or another on the blackboard multiple times.

"Here's what we're going to do," Marvin said. "I'm letting everyone go, and I'm saying you told Brett and Chance to tell me that you were going to Farmer's to do a welfare check, cause the guy in the cemetery looked dangerous, and you thought he might be a threat, and you thought you should get there and see he was okay. He wasn't."

"Could be the guy in the graveyard did it," I said. "We were farting around with loading up the body, stopping along the way to look in the coffin, and Leonard gave me bad directions, so it took us an extra ten minutes."

"I gave you bad directions?" Leonard said. "Bullshit, you can't follow a straight line if a string was tied to your dick and to where you wanted to go. Oh, sorry, Chance. No offense meant."

"None taken, but now I got that image in my head."

"Sorry again," Leonard said.

"He's not sophisticated like me," I said. "You'll have to forgive him."

Marvin said, "What I'm going to do is let you two go home, and then you're going to need to stay out of it. This could still come back to you, you know. No use adding fuel to the fire. Stay away from this."

We left out of there and drove our respective rides back to the office where Leonard put on a pot of coffee and got a bag of vanilla wafers out of the desk drawer.

As he did, he said, "These help me think."

"Sure they do," I said.

Brett and Chance drove up slightly after we arrived and came upstairs and into the office.

Brett said, "That was not too smart, boys."

"Yep," Leonard said. "Our usual."

"You know, guy in the cemetery would have to have been in a real rush to get there and do the job before you went over," Brett said. "I mean, he had to figure you might take the coffin right to him. He wouldn't know you were going to spend time looking inside or getting lost, so that would be some chance he was taking."

"Good point," I said.

"Means he probably had him a partner," Leonard said. "That means they get the money and while we're fucking around with Coco Butternuts and a corpse to be named later, he's got this other guy over there playing T-ball with Farmer's head?"

"Butternut," I said.

"What," Leonard said.

"It's Butternut, not Butternuts."

"Whatever."

There were no more revelations in the offing that night, so we all went home. Later, upstairs Brett lay in my arms, her sweet breath close to my face, her hand on my naked thigh.

“You know that gets me excited?” I said.

“I’d be disappointed if it didn’t,” she said.

“That’s why you let Buffy stay downstairs, huh?”

“She likes it downstairs now, since Chance is there. You know, we could do it if we did it quietly. I don’t want Chance or Buffy to hear.”

“Perhaps we could do it in slow motion,” I said.

“I like slow motion,” she said.

“Somewhere in the midst of it, though, we can move a little faster, if that’s all right with you.”

“Sure, but not too soon.”

“Sounds like a plan,” I said.

And it was.

I’d like to say with our great powers of deductive reasoning we figured out who did what and why by the next morning, but we didn’t.

When I came downstairs Leonard had used his key to come in, and he was fixing breakfast and Chance was in her footy pajamas with dinosaurs on them, sitting at the table, sucking at a large cup of coffee. Buffy was sitting at Chance’s elbow, waiting for her to drop something.

“I fed Buffy already,” Leonard said.

“Thanks, bro.”

“Leonard makes good coffee,” Chance said.

“It’s a Keurig,” I said. “Anyone makes good coffee with that. You turn it on, the water heats, you stick a pod in and wait.”

"Gave it my loving touch," Leonard said. "Waved my magic black hand over the pot. Gives it a kind of richness."

"I'm going to have to agree," Chance said.

Strands of her dark hair were loose from her hair tie and some of it clung to the side of her face. It made her look cute and young and made me feel even more fatherly, more protective. I had found out about her late in life, but I hoped I could be as good a father as I could from each day forth, but considering who I was and what I sometimes did, I had my doubts.

Leonard had gone all out with the cooking, scrambled eggs, bacon and cinnamon rolls. I ate a small amount of eggs and one piece of bacon and a cinnamon roll. As I got older, weight and I fought it out on a daily basis. I won for a while, and then it would come back and sneak up on me, climb into my belly and swell it. I worked out, but it didn't seem to matter, least not the way it used to. Fat was tenacious in middle age. I guess middle age is a silly term when you're fifty.

Brett came down in a bit. She was wearing sweat pants and a sweat shirt and her hair was tied back and her eyes were half closed. Time had stopped for her, and her aging was done in inches while mine was done in yards.

"I'll have a cinnamon roll and that's it," she said, and sat down.

I knew what that meant. I stood up from the table and got her a cinnamon roll and poured her a cup of coffee and sat it in front of her. When she had a couple sips of coffee, and had dunked her roll into the big cup, she said, "I think what we got to do is go to Farmer's business and see how things were there."

"He paid us to deliver money and pick up a coffin, and we did that," Leonard said. “Since he’s dead, I don’t see any more money forthcoming.”

“That’s never stopped us before,” Brett said.

“You can’t let it go either, can you?” I said.

“Nope,” she said. “I don’t like unsolved mysteries. I want to know who Jack the Ripper was and if Bigfoot lives in the woods. It’s how I am.”

“I’m curious,” Chance said. “I know it’s not my right to be curious about your work, but I am.”

“Sure it is,” Brett said, and reached out and patted Chance on the arm. “You’re family, and we’re a family business.”

“I’m actually a reporter, and I need to go to work,” she said. She stood up from the table and gave Brett a hug, went around and gave Leonard one, and then me. “I’m still curious though.”

“We’ll keep you in the loop,” Brett said.

Chance went to get showered and dressed. When she left the room, Leonard said, “I think that DNA test was flawed, brother. She can’t have come from you.”

Me and Brett drove over to the mortuary and cemetery owned by Farmer. Leonard went to the cop shop to see if he could pry any new news out of his new friend Officer Carroll.

The cemetery and mortuary was off the main highway and down a dirt road. The road would be dusty in the summer, but for now, during the cool and dry times, it was solid and smooth. We wound our way between trees and pastures and came to the mortuary and cemetery. There was a section for humans, and one for animals. As we drove by, I glanced over the rock fence around the cemetery. Both sections appeared to be pretty full.

The metal bar gate was wide open, and we drove through it and stopped in the circular drive close to the curbing near the main building, which was a goodly size and at first glance looked nice, but at second looked worn around the edges; I knew how the building felt.

I had combed my hair and put on dark jeans and had tucked my shirt in and had on a nice jacket. Brett thought it might be the thing to do, going there. She thought they might see us as more professional. She had on a black business suit with a white shirt, and a business-looking tie made of silk that she wore loose around the collar. The black boots she had on added to her height.

Inside it was a little too cool and it didn't look all that clean either. There was a lady behind a long desk. She was well dressed and a little plump, but it was a firm-looking plump. Fact was, she looked healthy enough to turn over a truck and make it beg for gasoline.

We stood in front of the desk and she smiled at us. Brett said, "We were working for Mr. Farmer. Private investigators. We are doing some follow-up, and would like to ask a few questions, if that's okay?"

The woman studied Brett, then she studied me, and then she leaned back in the desk chair and smiled a smaller smile than before.

"He didn't really operate this place, or had anything to do with it," she said. "He inherited money. Got a chunk of it every month and didn't so much as come in to see if the plumbing worked. It does, but not as well as it should."

"You sound a little unhappy with him," I said.

"I guess I shouldn't speak ill of the dead, but I couldn't speak about him at all until he was dead. Living, he had too much control here."

"Does that mean ownership has changed?" Brett asked. "I mean, the boss is dead so life goes on."

"Like I said, he was no boss. Just collected money. But he was the owner."

"Who owns it now?"

"I guess I do."

"Guess?" I said.

"The will is still being examined, but it looks that way. Jimmy quit having anything to do with this place five years ago, when his wife took off."

"Where did she go?"

"No one knows. She supposedly ran off with the dog mortician."

"How do you mortician a dog?" Brett asked.

"Not with mortician putty. We cremate them and we stuff them with chemicals after we pull out their insides, and sometimes we mummify them. That's extra. Got to be honest. The chemicals don't keep the fur from falling out, so some like the idea of mummification."

"Who in the world would be checking on a dog after it's in the ground?"

"It's the idea of it that the bereaved like. Frankly, it's nothing to me."

"You don't sound like a dog lover," I said.

"I'm not. But I can have them burned up or wrapped up for a nice fee."

"Question?" Brett said.

"Ask it," she said.

"First, to whom am I speaking?"

“Jackie Bridges,” she said. “I guess I should throw in that I’m Jimmy’s ex-wife.”

“Ah, that’s how you got in the will,” I said.

“Nope. His mother did that. She never liked the second wife. I didn’t either, but I wasn’t married to her. I don’t think Jimmy liked her too much. She looked good but wore badly.”

“How’s that?” I said.

“She was a bitch on wheels. Jimmy kept me on here after the divorce, and she didn’t like it, but he wouldn’t change it. Okay, not true. He couldn’t change it. It was part of his mother’s will that I could work here until I didn’t want to or I died. The second wife was given a piece of it too, as his mother didn’t want to alienate Jimmy. She loved him even if he didn’t care that much for her.”

“Why didn’t he?” Brett asked.

“He wanted the entire thing to go to him. He went to a shrink of some kind and got told he had potty-training issues, like not being able to shit right is going to cause you to make stupid choices. They got a lot of stuff for that problem in the drugstore. I don’t think Jimmy minded me working here because that meant he didn’t have to deal with someone new who didn’t know the business, but the wife didn’t work here, not a day, and still got a cut, and I won’t lie to you, that chapped my ass. His mother, bless her soul, had it in her will that if she died I got half of the business and got to stay on. That was a big bite out of things for him. Meant his wife’s share came out of his half, instead of what ought to be my half.”

“So this places makes big money?” I asked.

“Nope. But she has a lot of other businesses and property rentals, so they make big money, and this is a nice foundation. Me and Jimmy and Betty Sue, that's the wife, all got a cut of that. Still do. This place does better than you think, but not as well as I would like. I haven't exactly been on the ball the last five years due to the fact Jimmy wouldn't allow me to make certain changes to upgrade. I had some power, like I said, but there were certain things I couldn't do without his permission, and he wasn't giving it. He didn't want any more cuts to his money, and I couldn't convince him we could make more money by upgrading here and there. Way people are about their pets, hell, we could convince them to dress them in suits and sweaters that we provide. There's all manner of possibilities. One woman wanted us to have her dog put in capsules that she could take every morning until the dog was gone. Nice idea, but it's not sanitary and there are laws against it."

"One more question," Brett said. "Is it possible we could see where the body of Coco Butternut was buried?"

Jackie had a paper with all the graves listed on it, the names of the pets labeled. She gave it to me and I folded it up and put it in my shirt pocket.

"Just for the record, what's your view on cats?" I said.

"Don't like them either. Neither did Jimmy. His mother was the animal nut. I only like to eat them. Not cats and dogs, but animals like cows and such. Them I like with a side salad. Though, I don't know, you fix a dog or cat right, I might eat them too."

We went out and around the side of the building, having been given permission to look about.

"She doesn't like cats and dogs," Brett said, "so she's on my shit list.

But at least she’s an asshole on top of it all.”

“Her husband was probably a worse asshole,” I said.

“Could be. But I don’t like her. I think she was checking me out. You see the way she looked at me?”

“You have scrambled egg on your shirt.”

“Oh. Right. I do.”

Around back we looked out over the field of markers and stones.

“That’s a lot of cats and dogs,” I said.

Walking through the rows of animal graves we came to one that was nothing more than a hole and there was a large marker there made of granite. It read: coco butternut, champion and friend. There were no dates on it.

“Odd,” Brett said. “Someone broke into the dog cemetery and dug up the coffin and carried it out and no one noticed.”

“It is off the main road,” I said.

Brett nodded. “Yep, but it would have taken awhile.”

“Looking at the grave, I think they used a backhoe.”

“So he drove up on a backhoe?”

“Seems unlikely, but not impossible.”

Brett nodded again. I could see she was working some ideas around in her head.

A young man walked up. I hadn’t even noticed him. “Can I help you?” he asked.

He was tall and thin as a shovel handle and had a wad of blond hair on his head that looked to have been styled into a bird’s nest, something for a condor to sleep in. I had never seen hair bunched up like that and so blond it was nearly white. He had a nice face though. At first he looked young, in his thirties, but the more I looked at him the older he looked. Forty or so, I reckoned.

We explained what we were about, and when we finished he nodded.

"Of course. Look about all you want."

"So, obviously," I said, "you work here."

"I'm Jackie's son."

"So you're Jimmy's son too, I take it," Brett said.

"I'm Scanner. Mom named me after part of a science fiction book title. She was married before Farmer, but her husband, my father, James Sundrey, died when I was about ten."

"Sorry," I said.

"No sweat. He was a son-of-a-bitch too, just like Farmer. Can't say I miss him. He was about as fatherly as an earthworm."

"I take it earthworms are poor parents," I said.

"That's my take," he said.

"So what's your job here?" Brett asked.

"Whatever is needed. I have my own business. I make prosthetics and sell them."

"Your own company?" I asked.

"Online, but I make good stuff. Have some patents. I'm catching on. I'm anxious to get out of the pet smoking and wrapping business."

"There's another branch to the cemetery, though," I said. "People."

Scanner pointed. "It's over there, but I don't care that much for smoking or burying people either. What I want to do is end up going to Hollywood, make special effects for movies. I can really do some cool things with prosthetics, you know foam, make-up."

"Good luck with that," I said.

"Thanks," he said. "I guess I'll go now. I have to attend to a few things. Hey, you got something on your shirt there."

"Scrambled eggs," I said.

"Ah."

"Question," Brett asked. "When you do deep burials, and it looks like Coco here got a nice one, how do you dig the holes?"

"Backhoe," Scanner said. "We keep it in the shed."

And he pointed to the back of the cemetery where there was a long, high-roofed building made of aluminum.

A lot of things were clicking as we drove away, and we discussed them.

"Okay," Brett said. "The ex-wife didn't like him, and her son didn't like him, and there's a backhoe in the shed, and yet, it doesn't quite come together."

"If she knew there was a body under Coco Butternut, she didn't mention it."

"Because she knows she's not supposed to know. She's in on it, I bet you an enchilada dinner on it."

"What kind of enchiladas?"

"Focus, Hap."

"You brought up enchiladas."

"I also brought up I think she's involved in all this."

"Guy that drove that truck was a big dude, not a woman and not as skinny as Scanner."

“Still think she’s involved. Maybe we should come back tonight and look in the shed?”

“So they have a backhoe?” I said. “Scanner said as much, and a business like this would have one.”

“Yes, but maybe they have a big truck as well, like the one that brought the coffin. As for the big guy, maybe they got a third partner. It could easily be that way.”

“If they’re the ones did this,” I said.

“I don’t have the proof yet,” Brett said, “but I think we can bumble along until we do based on that assumption.”

“I’m a good bumbler.”

“You and Leonard both,” she said. “It makes me proud.”

Me and Leonard made an appointment with Marvin while Brett went to the office to hold down a chair in case a new client came in, one that wasn’t dead and was paying. What we were doing was now gratis, but damn if we wanted some skunk to use us as a way to get money and kill Farmer.

Day before Leonard had visited with Officer Carroll and asked him a few questions, things that could help us nail the murderer. I called Marvin and let him know we hadn’t been good, and that we were snooping, just what he’d asked us not to do. But when I told him what Brett and I had learned at the mortuary, about the financial arrangements and the will, it stirred his interest.

“I kind of hate you guys,” he said. “You never do what I ask.”

“We’re like teenagers,” I said.

“Assholes,” he said.

Marvin was seated with his feet on his desk and there was a steaming cup of coffee on the desk as well. He had a file in his hand.

“Officer Carroll seems to be talking out of school,” Marvin said.

“He might have been led to think I had your permission,” Leonard said.

“He might have been led that way, might he?”

“Alright, to hell with it. Maybe you boys are actually onto something.”

We seated ourselves in chairs in front of the desk and Leonard perched his fedora on his knee.

“Can we have some coffee?” I said.

“Go to the break room and get it,” Marvin said.

“Don’t you have minions?” I asked.

“For police work.”

“Get mine too,” Leonard said. “And if they have any cookies, vanilla in particular, bring some of those.”

“We don’t have any cookies,” Marvin said.

“If I ran this place vanilla wafers would be a constant.”

“If you ran this place there’d be a lot of fat cops,” Marvin said.

“I’m not fat,” Leonard said.

“You’re a freak of nature,” Marvin said.

“Actually,” I said, “he’s showing his age some. He recently had to drop ten pounds.”

“So did Hap, and he could drop ten more.”

Marvin eyed me. “I was thinking twenty.”

“You’re probably right,” Leonard said. “He doesn’t work out as much as he should.”

“I have other things to do,” I said.

“He’s lazy,” Leonard said.

“Well,” I said. “That too.”

“Okay,” Leonard said. “About that coffee, Hap. Stir my sugar in good. You know how to fix it.”

“Fuck you,” I said, and got up to get the coffee.

When I came back, Marvin had pulled his feet off the desk and tucked them underneath it. He had the file open in front of him.

“I’m assuming that file has to do with the death of Jackie Farmer’s first husband,” I said.

Marvin smiled. “You arrived at the same place I did. Here she is with two husbands, and they are both dead and with their deaths, money is to be made. The first there was a fat insurance policy, and with Farmer she made money as a business partner as well as a wife, and when they split, she made money just as a business partner. But Farmer’s mother liked Jackie, and it seems that gave Jackie a home court advantage. Then Farmer got a new wife and that led to new complications, until the new wife disappeared. Way I think Jackie had it figured was she was in a good position to get it all, due to Farmer’s mother making her a big dog at the mortuary. With Farmer and his new wife gone, she would own the mortuary, the cemetery, the whole business. And there’s the insurance on Farmer too. The mother put in her will should Farmer die, a sizable amount of the insurance money she had on him would go to Jackie. That’s a really large incentive for murder, you ask me.”

“What Jackie told us,” I said. “She didn’t try and hide it. Though she left out that whole advantage for her due to murder."

"I had to look around for a file on her first husband's death, and that took some work, and it's interesting in what's not in it," Marvin said.

"Like the dog that didn't bark in the nighttime," I said.

"Like that," he said. "The first husband started feeling bad and ended up in the hospital, and the doctors couldn't figure the problem. I think if we dig him up we'll find out what the problem was. I'm guessing poison. I think this Jackie is an operator. She didn't kill Farmer while the money was easy, even after the divorce, but at some point my guess is she thought it was a good idea."

"And Farmer's wife?"

"That might be a bit more complex. Farmer didn't like her much, and there had actually been three or four calls to the police by the missing wife, saying he was abusing her. And there was the whole business about her fucking around with someone, and then suddenly she's gone and so is the guy. Old Police Chief thought it was kind of suspicious, but he couldn't prove anything and Farmer just went on being Farmer."

"And Jackie went on being Jackie," I said.

"Right," Marvin said. "My guess is she somehow knew what Farmer did, kept it in her back pocket. Why not? She wanted to be rid of the wife too, and then one day she gets the bright idea she can get some money for the body, and then get rid of Farmer too. The time was right with the mother dead and her knowing where the body was and the will lined up to make her golden. She could sit around with her feet up and a fan blowing up her dress for the next ten years and not have to hit a lick at a snake."

"What about her son?" Leonard said.

"Checked on him," Marvin said. "Has a jacket. Had a few little notes added to it on a regular basis." Marvin shifted to pick up another folder, opened it. "All of it petty stuff. Peeping Tom, stealing women's clothes at the laundry mat. Stuff like that. He got caught on that one and they found selfies of him wearing stolen panties on his head. His history of panty hats was right there. He's one of those dreamers thinks he's going to be something he's too lazy to be, a special effects artist or some such."

"He told me and Brett just that thing," I said. "But wearing panties on your head is a long way from murder."

"Course," Leonard said, "we don't know the dead woman in Coca-Cola Butterasses coffin is Farmer's wife."

"We should know that in a few hours," Marvin said. "I got some guys in Tyler owe me a favor, so they're making DNA tests. Can do that stuff quick these days, they take a mind to, and there aren't a bunch of cases lined up in front of it. That's where the favor comes in. But I think we know who it is."

"And probably there's a dead boyfriend somewhere too," Leonard said. "You know, the wife is underneath Coconut Butterballs, then there's a good chance that boyfriend of hers is lying under another dog out there. Farmer killed them, the ex-wife threatened to expose the murdered wife, got some money in the deal, then got Farmer whacked. It's a tight idea, you think about it."

"I know I like it," Marvin said, "but thing is, even with one body on hand from the graveyard, we got to have a bit more reason to dig the other body up."

"Why would they care if you dug it up?" I said. "They got what they wanted, the money and Farmer dead. Farmer most likely put him there, so why would they bother not letting you check the graves out? It just puts more guilt on him, I'd think."

"Well, something is bothering them," Marvin said. "We asked and they said we would need a warrant."

"That paints things a different color," Leonard said. "Ah, I got it. The other body, maybe Jackie helped dispose of it. Maybe she helped in the murder of the wife too."

"Yeah, but still all things point to Farmer, not her," I said.

"Jackie may have played her hand too far, blackmailing him and killing him on the same night," Marvin said. "But what I'm thinking is she's thinking there's something in that other coffin that points back to her. My guess it might even be something she can explain away, but if she can get rid of the body, dig it up, cremate it and put the boyfriend's ashes in the flower bed, she's laid out smooth as silk. I think Farmer had a good idea who stole the body. He may not have known she knew he did what he did, but at that point, someone blackmailing him with his wife's corpse, he had to have an idea."

"Why he sent us," I said. "Had it figured right. They wanted to kill him. He thought he'd be all right if he stayed home, that paying her off would save his neck, but it didn't."

"Which brings me to a thought. You see, as Police Chief I have certain restrictions. You know, my hands are tied on some things. But I'm thinking if someone who didn't have those restrictions was able to find some evidence, maybe not too illegally, but you know, real soon, and it was something a Chief of Police could use, and those people, two guys say, were to present it to me in a fashion where I could find out about it in a good way, and I could use it in court, wouldn't that be nice?"

"So, you're talking about us?" Leonard said.

"Maybe," Marvin said. "You know, there might be something at her house, inside, or somewhere. Something like a big, white truck, which would be a nice place to start, though not quite good enough to finish, but what if they had four hundred thousand dollars under the bed in Farmer's satchel."

"That might be hoping too much to find," Leonard said. "Even for those two guys you're talking about."

"I think Jackie is too smart to just poke that satchel under the bed," I said.

"True," Marvin said, "but you never know, and you know what, they might have hidden it at the mortuary, but you see, I got this warrant I got to get, and the best I can do is get it tomorrow, and I'm not entirely sure the judge is going to give it to me, not in time, anyway. He's kind of stickler. But I'm thinking I get enough to pull them in, and get that Scanner fellow in interrogation, I can dangle a fine set of panties in front of him and he'll spill the beans."

"You'd dangle panties in front of him?" Leonard said.

"No," Marvin said, "I think he's the weak link in all this and he'll spill with little more than a cup of coffee and me giving him a stern look, but I thought that part about the panties sounded good, so I said it."

Chance, being part-time at the newspaper, had a day off from work, so we gave her the job of going out to the cemetery road and parking close to where it emptied into a highway. There was a parking lot there that went with a grocery store of some size. She could sit there in her car and see the road clearly.

There was a back way out of the cemetery, but it was a long way, and it stood to reason they would use the shorter route. If they did, if Scanner or Jackie left the place, went home, went anywhere, we would know because Chance would use her cell to let us know. She had on a baseball cap and a loose shirt and shorts and sandals and had her lunch with her in Brett's Star Wars lunch box. I think Chance liked playing detective. The idea of it anyway, but after lunch, if she was still sitting there and waiting without news, she might be less interested.

It didn't take much research to figure out where Jackie and Scanner lived. Scanner still lived with his mom, which was no surprise, and he had a place in the backyard. We knew that because we drove over there in Leonard's pickup and walked along the walk and went straight up on the porch. We had on khaki clothes and caps that could have fit any city worker doing any kind of city job, jobs that might require someone to go from house to house, or do work inside, say on a gas line or a phone line or electrical problems, plumbing perhaps. We could make a lie go in any direction we needed to.

At the front door Leonard took out the lockpicking kit and messed around for a while, and when he clicked the lock, he discovered there was a dead bolt as well and a chain. He locked the door back with his tools.

If they had the front door locked like that, it meant they locked it up inside and went out another way. We strolled casually around the side of the house, next to some ill-kept shrubs, and finally we were at a chain link fence with a gate in it. The backyard was high in weeds, but there was a walk along the side of the house and it came to where we stood at the gate. The gate had a padlock on it.

There was an old travel trailer in the yard with grass grown up around it. Behind that was a large shed and the pines in the yard on either side of it had dropped rust-colored needles on the roof making a thick carpet. We could see a padlock on the shed door from where we stood. The sunlight dappled through the pine limbs and leaves and gave the place a camouflage look.

“Like their privacy,” Leonard said.

“Lot of people do,” I said.

Leonard worked the padlock easy with his tools, and we went inside the yard, closing the gate behind us. “Bet you the kid lives in that travel trailer, and that’s his workshop out back for the things he sells online,” Leonard said. “Also betcha he doesn’t sell much online. I think that’s just his story so he doesn’t seem like the loser he really is. Grown man living with his mother like that, they always got excuses, usually about how they’re taking care of Mom, but it always seems to be the other way around.”

“You used to live with us,” I said.

“You shut up.”

We pulled on gloves and started at the back door of the house. Leonard cracked the lock quickly, and went inside. It was marginally neat, about the way mine and Brett’s place looks before we clean up for company. The air had a cinnamon smell. There wasn’t much of any great interest, some photos on the wall of her and Scanner. One of them he had a mask of some sort pushed back off his face and it nestled on top of his head. I couldn’t make out what it was supposed to be, but my guess was he had made out of foam or plastic. His face beneath the pushed back mask was young and happy. My heart hurt for him. Once he thought he’d have more to life than a trailer in the backyard, maybe have a Hollywood career making masks and such for horror movies.

In that same photo Jackie had her arm around him and was smiling. She looked pretty good. Thinner then, healthier, less angry. Maybe she had just poisoned her first husband and was happy about it. Around her neck was a necklace with a dangling pendant. It was fairly large and silver with a green stone in the center.

We made our way through all the rooms. Leonard stopped to use the bathroom, and then we slipped out back and locked the door again. We went out to the travel trailer. It had a padlock on the door. Leonard used the lockpick and in a moment he clicked it open.

“I’m getting good at this,” he said.

Inside, the place looked to be more a nest than a home. Clothes were strewn about and the sink was full of dirty dishes and the place smelled like old food and mildewed clothes and too much jacking off.

“Yeah, Scanner lives here,” I said.

“Guys like Scanner always got a story about how they’re going to become something or another, but they aren’t going to get there, and they know it,” Leonard said, flashing the light around.

“What about us?” I said. “We aren’t exactly living high on the hog.”

“It’s a higher hog than we used to live on, rose field work and such.”

“Yep. We’re growing up.”

We went through the travel trailer which took us about two minutes. We searched for another ten or so, found some nudie magazines under Scanner’s mattress. “I wouldn’t touch those too much,” Leonard said.

I put them back under the mattress. There was a little TV mounted at the foot of Scanner's bed and a stack of DVDs, all popular movies with lots of explosions and car chases.

We gave the place a bit more of a look, but all we found were some shit-stained underwear on the floor and a drawer full of clean women's panties.

"Scanner's head gear," Leonard said.

We went out and snapped the padlock into place.

"Nothing exciting here."

Out back we got in the shed easy. That lock might as well have been a piece of thread tied across the door.

There was dust in the place and it was moving about in the flashlight beam. There were tables with oddities on them, pieces of this and that. There were superhero masks and chunks of foam, artificial limbs.

"Okay, he really does make prosthetic limbs and such," I said. "And they look like they're pretty good quality."

"I know you, Hap Collins. You're thinking if he'd just had the right encouragement he might not have become a sad asshole who lives with his mother."

"Well. . . ."

"Let me tell you something, he decided on his own to be a sad asshole who lives with his mother. Sometimes there are just assholes, Hap."

I shrugged. "Maybe."

There was a window at the back of the shed and it looked out on a little road that ran up to a fence that bordered the back yard. There was a truck camper on the ground out there. I recognized it. It was the one that had been on the back of the spotted-up truck that night.

I heard a sound at the back of the shed, but when I changed my place and looked where I thought it had come from, I saw nothing. Cat probably. I was getting jumpy.

"Look here," I said.

Leonard looked out the window at the camper.

"That's the same camper cover that was on the truck that night," I said.

"Lot of those out there," Leonard said. "And they all look alike."

"That's it," I said.

We looked around and found more of the same, and then in a closet we found a set of legs and arms and a torso. Not real ones, but prosthetic ones. There was a foam head with eye holes and a black hood was pulled over it.

"No wonder our man at the graveyard walked funny," I said.

"Scanner was wearing this shit." Leonard said.

"Why he looked big and his hands looked small. He had this on to disguise himself, made him look more formidable. With the hood on, gloves and clothes, it being night, I couldn't tell. I just thought he walked a little funny."

Leonard pulled one of the legs out and used his hands to bend it at the knee. It bent easy.

"Feel it," he said.

I took it. It was light as a feather. If Scanner had the whole thing on it would have been a little cumbersome, but I could tell it was easy enough to move around in it if you practiced.

"Okay," I said, "how do we get it so Marvin can come in here and check things out?”

“I was thinking we set the travel trailer on fire and call Marvin and the fire department.”

“So they put it out?” I said. “Stuff we need is in the shed.”

“Leave it to me.”

Leonard took out a burner cell. We got so we carried one each on us or in our car or pickup.

A moment later the call was made.

“Hey, Marvin. This is Leonard. . . . Of course that Leonard. Listen, there may be a trailer on fire out back of a house on Prichard Lane, 303, and it might need to be put out, but you know, the shed behind it, you might come with the fire department, just in case you might need to snap the lock and look inside to see if anyone’s in there. Fire might spread.”

Leonard listened, then closed the phone.

“Okay. He’s coming in twenty, so let’s find a way to set a fire in the trailer.”

Outside of the shed Leonard put the padlock back in place, and then he picked the lock on the trailer again. Inside, Leonard pulled the curtains over close to the electric cook stove and placed the end of one of them over one of the burners. He filled a frying pan with cooking oil and put it on top of another burner and heated up the grease. I understood then. I got some frozen French fries out of a bag in the refrigerator and poured them in the grease, and we let that heat until the potatoes were popping, then Leonard placed the hot pan on the curtain over the other burner and turned that burner on. In a moment the curtain caught and the flames ran up the curtain and along the wall. I poured the oil and potatoes from the frying pan onto the stove and the hot burners caught the grease and then the top of the stove was on fire. We went out of there and locked the door. It wasn't that we thought Scanner would think he forgot and left potatoes on the stove, but it would sure look that way to the fire department at first glance.

"What if it doesn't catch good?" I said.

"Say some driver drove by, saw smoke and called it in but didn't want to leave their name. That driver wouldn't know how bad the fire was, only that smoke was seen. Hell, it might be out by the time the fire department gets here, but they got to go on and take a look, don't they?"

"They do, indeed."

Away from the house we walked along the street and glanced back. No smoke was drifting from the backyard. The fire might be out, but it was the excuse Marvin needed. He'd have the fire department break in there and then he'd say he thought he smelled smoke coming from the shed to, and they'd break in there too, or that's how I figured he'd do it.

In the pickup I took off the work cap and Leonard did too, slipping his fedora in place. I called Marvin on my burner.

When he answered he said he was already en route. I said, "I was you, I'd look close in the shed out back. Fact is, I'd look in a closet there where you'll find the disguise of the guy that brought us the dog and we gave the money. There might be a camper shell out back like the one the blackmailer was using."

I explained a little more to him, and then I picked up my personal cell and called Chance.

"They still there?" I asked.

"They didn't come out this end."

"You can go home now."

"Good," she said. "I'm out of coffee."

We thought if Marvin found the prosthetics and I said that Scanner was wearing that rig when we gave him Farmer's money, it would be good enough and over with.

But it wasn't like that, and of course, thinking back on it, there was no reason it should be.

Marvin came over late afternoon, and sat at the table finishing off coffee with me and Leonard, Chase and Brett.

"We can't go to the DA with what we got. We know the little bastard was in on it, probably his mother too, but we can't prove it. The rig he had, all you can say is you think he was wearing it. You didn't think that until you saw it in the storage building, and I can't say you were there, as they would get your asses in trouble for breaking and entering, and I kind of encouraged that. I mean the fire is suspicious as it is, but it did get us in the shed and we did find the prosthetics, so it's something. But, not enough. We didn't even take the stuff or them into custody. We got a free look, and that helped, but that's the end to it. Have to give me more, if you're up for it, and frankly I don't know what more is, but if you say I asked you for more, I'll deny it."

"Like the way you didn't ask us in the first place," Leonard said.

"Just like that," Marvin said. "Here's the thing, this isn't really your problem, and you could let it go. It's really my job to figure this out."

"Don't have sympathy for Farmer," Leonard said, "but I don't like us being saps in all this."

"I don't like we were handing Scanner money and in the meantime, Farmer was getting his brains knocked out, and right now, I'm figuring Jackie did that herself," Brett said. "If it was Scanner at the graveyard, then Jackie was most likely the muscle. She looked stout enough to swing a tire iron or a bat and make it count."

"You got a bother about it all, then you got to come up with more proof," Marvin said. "And let me tell you, that setting fire to Scanner's trailer was an iffy idea. That could have gone way wrong."

"But it didn't," Leonard said.

"Still, try and play it a little safer, okay? We had Jackie and Scanner come in and fill out some papers, you know, and the general consensus was that juveniles broke into the trailer and set the fire."

"That isn't far off," Brett said.

"Ha, ha," I said.

"Wow," Chance said. "Meeting people in a graveyard to swap money for a corpse. Murder. Arson. Bad language from my father and uncle, a stakeout. I certainly have been living a sheltered life. I like this one better."

After Marvin left, we mumbled about this and that for a bit, but didn't come up with anything constructive, but after we poured ourselves more coffee, Chance said, "I got an idea. It might not be a good one, but do you want to hear it?"

"Right now even a bad idea might sound good," Leonard said.

"In our case, they usually do," I said.

Leonard said, "Wait a sec," got up and pulled out the stash of vanilla cookies we keep for him in the cabinet and put them on the table. He opened the bag and stacked a half-dozen cookies in front of him and started dipping one in his coffee. “All right, I’m ready,” he said.

“Okay,” Chance said. “From what’s been said, it appears Jackie is worried about someone digging up that other body in the graveyard. She told the law they had to get a warrant. Right so far?” We agreed she was.

“She may not be hiding anything. That might just be good business, trying to keep the graves intact. She wouldn’t want her customers to think that whoever, animal or human buried there, will be excavated at the drop of a hat, so she makes a stand. But if she doesn’t want them digging graves up for another reason, could that reason be she knows there’s something in the other grave, the one with the boyfriend in it, that might somehow tie her to the murders?”

“Like what?” I asked.

“That’s where my plan falters a bit,” Chance said. “I don’t know. But that could be it, couldn’t it? And if we got to the grave before she did, that would be good, because if there’s something there, she’ll try and get to it before a court order goes through. She might fight it off a few days with a good lawyer, but she’s got to know in the long run the law is going to win out on this one. Those graves are going to be investigated. She may have dug up the one she needs to check already, but you know what I’m thinking is she’ll wait until late tonight so as not to be so conspicuous. She’s stirred up by today’s events, and by the law’s request to dig up some graves, so she knows that fire wasn’t merely an accident. She’s bound to suspect the law did it so they could snoop. She knows they want in that graveyard bad, and she’s got to figure that court order is coming soon, so that means she’s got to get to it and hide whatever evidence she believes might be in the coffin. She would most likely want to go there late at night to make her move, dig the grave up when fewer people might notice. What we need to do is beat her at her own game.”

“Well,” Brett said, “it’s some kind of plan.”

We didn’t go there when it was fresh dark, but we tried not to wait too long. When the sun was solid set and the stars were high and bright, we drove out there.

Brett was the only one of us that could drive a backhoe, as she had worked for the street department when she was young for a summer, and claimed she could make that machine purr, shit and call other machines bad names. I was her partner in the venture.

Leonard and Chance went in Leonard’s truck, parked at the same place where Chance had waited to keep a look out before. Since the lot was empty, they parked close to the building there to look as if the truck might belong to the owner.

They had a good view of the turn off to the cemetery as long as Jackie or Scanner came from that direction. It seemed the most logical path for them to take. It was the most direct route.

Driving past the cemetery, me and Brett scoped it out. There were lights in the front building and behind that was the dog graveyard, and beyond that was a long building where the backhoe should be, and there was a tall booger light on a pole.

We parked down a ways and walked back. I had a crowbar in my hand and a flashlight in my coat pocket. Brett had a flashlight in her hand, one of those big heavy cop things, but had yet to turn it on. We could see clearly enough. It was a bright starry night and the moon was near full. The air was cool and crisp as a starched collar and the air smelled like pines and it tingled in the nose and throat. As always, doing something like this, I was nervous and excited at the same time. In the sky bats were flying, chasing insects. You could see the bats well enough, and if you looked hard you could see the insects flying in the celestial light with the bats swooping down on them.

When we got to the cemetery the gate was locked. It was one of those tall, iron bar things with the bars pointed at the top, and there was a big lock where the gates closed and hasped together. I got out my lockpicking kit and couldn't do shit with it. Brett took the kit and went to work. It took a while, but she got it. We swung the gate open slightly with a haunted house creak and slipped inside and pulled it closed with the same creaking sound. It locked when it snapped together.

The wall around the cemetery was made of worn stone and mortar. It wasn't real high, but it was damn sure solid. It had most likely been built by the WPA during the Great Depression. Where we were had certainly contained something other than a cemetery back then. I think I had heard somewhere about there had once been a school in this location, but it was torn down in the sixties and eventually the acreage became the cemetery.

We eased along the drive, past the front building and the outside light that was on a large telephone pole, and then we started across the graveyard toward the long, high, storage building.

It wasn't that long a trek, but out there in the bright celestial light it seemed a long ways. I felt as if I were on a hike to Antarctica. You could see us easy from the road, and in fact maybe from the moon.

"If the keys aren't with the backhoe," Brett said, "we get a shovel and I can watch you dig."

"Hoping for keys," I said.

The shed had a padlock on the great doors that were chained together. Brett made quick work of it with the lockpicking kit, and then I pushed the doors open and we went inside. Brett took her light out of her pocket where she had tucked it, and turned it on, flashed it around the shed. It was really more a warehouse than a shed. The roof was tall and the room was wide. On the walls we could see all manner of gardening tools hanging, but the thing that interested us was what was in the center of the building, resting on a concrete floor like a dinosaur. A yellow backhoe, and an orange bulldozer, both of good size. They had cabins surrounded by glass. I guess if you're going to scrape ground and dig holes, you needed the right equipment. More interesting was a big white truck, and even without its spots, I felt certain that was the truck I had pulled the coffin out of. I went over and looked at it and was even more convinced.

"You know we are breaking so many laws right now," I said.

"Yep," Brett said. "I have become as gangster as you."

We looked around a bit and I took some photos on my phone. They might not be legal photos in a court of law, but they would certainly show Marvin that mother or son owned a big white truck and the camper in their backyard would conveniently snap together over it.

Brett climbed up on the backhoe, slid back the glass door and looked inside.

She called down to me. "Key's here."

"And you're sure you can drive it?"

"I said I could." She was already settling herself onto the seat.

"I know, but that's been a long time ago."

"It's like giving a blow job, you just don't forget something like that."

"Ouch," I said.

"By the time you and I got together I had perfected the art."

"Ouch again."

"It's not like I was doing it for pay."

"Ouch even again."

"I'm not making this any better am I?"

"Not much."

Brett turned the key and the backhoe growled to life.

"Climb on up," she said.

The backhoe had a lot of controls. Brett buckled her seat belt. That made me nervous. I didn't have a seatbelt. Why did a backhoe have a seatbelt?

Brett released the parking brake and shifted the transmission into forward. The bucket was already up. She drove us through the open doors and the backhoe rumbled us out into the cemetery.

It seemed obvious to us that if there was another body out there under a dog, it would most likely be next to the grave of Coco Butternut. If Farmer had to get rid of the boyfriend too, it seemed natural and simple that he would do them side by side and be done with it.

Brett stopped the backhoe, said, "Which grave are we digging up, one on the right or left of Coco Butternut?"

"It's a crap shoot," I said. "Go for either."

Brett chose the one on the left and started working the scoop. She had a delicate touch. I knew that already, but it was interesting to see it applied to a backhoe. She dug down a few scoops, and we were already there. I could see a coffin.

I climbed down with my crowbar and jumped into the grave and stuck the bar under the coffin lid and pried. It came open easy. There was a dry, musty smell. I could see right away that the dog inside was resting on the bottom of the coffin. I climbed out of the hole and stood there, shaking my head at Brett.

She went back to work. Two scoops and she scraped the top of the coffin in the other grave. I got down in that grave and did what I had done before. The dog lay high in the coffin and I used the tip of the crowbar to move the false bottom back. There was a human corpse underneath.

I looked up at Brett and nodded.

No sooner had I done that than I heard a roaring and looked toward the sound and saw the bulldozer come out of the warehouse at the end of the cemetery.

“Shit,” I said.

Brett leaned out the side of the open backhoe, said, “You better come up.”

I clamored back inside the backhoe.

“Looks like our watchdogs failed,” Brett said.

“Whoever it is, they came in another way,” I said. “Leonard and Chase wouldn’t have missed them.”

“I don’t intend to fight a bulldozer,” Brett said.

I figured the bulldozer driver had come in to do what we thought they might. Dig up the grave, but we had beat them to it, and then they had fooled us by coming earlier than we expected. That's how it goes. You can't assume shit.

Brett whipped the backhoe around and we started heading for the closed and locked gate. Bulldozers run faster than I thought they might, and it was closing on us. As we came closer to the gate, Brett said, "Hitch up your nuts. We're going through."

"The gate? Really?"

"Easier than the wall."

She gave the backhoe all the juice she could, and away we went. She used the bucket like a knight's lance. It hit the gate and there was a noise like someone skinning a cat, and then the gate buckled a little, but held. We were pushing so hard at it the tires began to smoke. I looked back.

The bulldozer was coming fast, whirling onto the drive, and inside its glass cabin I could see Jackie. She had a look on her face that I can only describe as goddamn unpleasant.

The back of the backhoe lifted up and the front tires smoked like a bonfire. Brett changed gears, and the rear end settled. She went at it again. The gate groaned like someone who had just had their knee capped, and then it snapped open. Brett gunned it through, but the bulldozer was as tight on our ass as a hemorrhoid. It hit our rear end and pushed us through and off the drive and onto a patch of grass beside the main road.

Brett turned the backhoe deftly. We bumbled across the patch of grass and then we were shooting onto the road, the dozer banging against the back of the backhoe as we did.

Another move by Brett, and we swung wide and to the right. The dozer was surprisingly dexterous in its moves, but not as swift as the backhoe, and with that maneuver we got away from the dozer, at least by a few paces.

We raced away, but the dozer was back on track and coming fast. There was a crack in our windshield where it had hit the gate and cold wind came through the crack to add to our misery. I looked back.

Behind us, the dozer dropped its blade so that it skimmed over the road. I knew what that meant. Jackie was going to try and scoop us from the bottom and flip us. Seemed like a good plan that I didn't want any part of. I felt a turd loosen inside of me and thought it might be surfacing soon.

Down the road toward us came a pickup. It was Leonard and Chase. I didn't know why they were coming, but they were. Leonard's truck was bent up in front and I could see there was a third person in the cab with them.

Chance was driving the pickup. Leonard was sitting on the passenger side, and then they were so close I could see who was in the middle. Scanner. It wasn't so much that I could make out his features in detail, but I could see him well enough to know it was him. They were heading right for us at what one could politely call an accelerated rate of speed, and we were on their side of the road. So, there we were, the backhoe flying along as fast as it could go, the bulldozer right on top of us, and Leonard's pickup heading straight for us. It was like me and Brett were about to be made into a sandwich between them, and then—

I hurt a little.

I could smell gasoline.

I woke up in a dry ditch and I could see the stars through the boughs of a pine that draped over me. I couldn't remember how I got there or why I was there, and I don't know if I even knew who I was for a moment without checking my driver's license. That's when I realized I was lying in a ditch. I didn't normally lie in a ditch. Why was I in a ditch?

And then I thought about Brett, and that got me moving, slowly, and then I thought about Chance and Leonard, Jackie and that goddamn bulldozer, and by then I had rolled over and was pushing up with my hands and climbing up out of that ditch. It wasn't a deep ditch, but I felt so damn weak it might as well have been me scaling Mt. Everest.

Chance was driving right at us, and then she veered, and when she did, Brett tried to take the backhoe to the right, but the bulldozer climbed up our butt, and the backhoe did a crazy slide and there was the sound of metal against metal and the sound of our machine blowing a tire; it was like some kind of weird music for the damned, and away the backhoe went, spinning.

When it came to a stop, the dozer hit the machine in the rear, crunching it a little, since it was pushed up against that brick wall that ran for a long ways at the edge of the cemetery. We really hadn't gotten that far.

I remembered the dozer blade being lifted and being smashed down on the back of the backhoe like a giant fist, and then I remember the glass cab shattering and me flying. My moment as Superman, but the landing was my moment as a mortal. Next thing I knew was I was waking up in that ditch. As I climbed out and stood on the road, I moved my parts to make sure they were all there, and they seemed to be. Nothing fell off. I could feel blood seeping at the knees of my pants and my hands were scraped and so was my face.

The dozer had the backhoe pushed across the road and up against the long stone fence, and it was pushing it and crushing it, and I could see Brett still in it, slumped over in the shattered cab.

I tried to dart toward the dozer, found I wasn't darting too well. In fact I was limping like I had one foot in a bucket of solidified concrete. I saw the crowbar I had been holding lying in the road and picked it up.

I glanced right and saw Leonard's pickup was turned over in the same ditch I had been lying in, only a little farther up the road. Gasoline was leaking out of the busted gas tank, and my heart sank. Then I saw Chance slip out of an open window, and behind her came Leonard. They were staggering about like drunks, but they were all right. That's all I needed to know. I didn't give a flying damn about Scanner. I came up the back of the dozer and scrambled up it as it eased back for another run at the backhoe. My pain seemed to go away. I was on top of the dozer and I could see Jackie. She had her back to me and she was shifting gears and the dozer was lurching forward.

I swung the crowbar, hit the back glass and the crowbar bounced back and nearly came out of my hands. I swung it again, and saw Jackie turning her face toward me. A warrior's face. She gunned the dozer backwards and I nearly lost my footing, but I bent low and held on. The dozer's movement paused, I came up and swung the bar again. The glass fell like chunks of shiny ice. I went through the hole to get at Jackie, ripping my shirt and cutting my arms a little on the broken glass. Jackie was up and out of her seat now, and she was like a wildcat. She grabbed me by the throat and rammed me backwards.

We went through the gap in the glass and I felt my arm being ripped by the glass, and then we were tumbling over the back of the dozer and falling to the street.

Jackie jumped astride me and started swing her fists, knocking my head from side to side like a piñata. I had lost the crowbar during all that, but Jackie found it. She stopped hitting me long enough to reach over and grab it and then she lifted it above her head with both hands and was going to drive the sharp end into me. I drew both legs back quickly and put my heels inside her thighs, close to her waist, and kicked with all my might. She went back and the crowbar came down and hit me without design. It hurt, but not as bad as it would have. I grabbed the bar, and then me and her were on our feet. She was a strong woman and I was an injured weak man. We both had hold of the bar now, and I was trying to wrest it from her, or at least keep her from whacking me with it, when a fist flashed out and hit Jackie in the side of the head, hurtling her head over heels without the crowbar. I was left holding it.

Brett was there. Her face was scratched and she was bleeding from the mouth and nose.

"Fuck with my man, and you'll have the undertaker wiping your ass," she said, and kind of collapsed against me. I held her. She was breathing heavily, but she seemed all right.

"It's okay," I said.

"Of course it is," Brett said.

I looked at Jackie. She was out cold.

Leonard limped over with Chance.

"That was some punch," Chance said. She was all out of breath and hopped up on adrenaline. She was vibrating.

"I brought that with me from hell," Brett said, righting herself.

"Scanner?" I said.

"Good thing they own a cemetery," Leonard said.

"It's going to make his burial cheaper."

"How did you know we needed you?" Brett said.

"Didn't," Leonard said. "We saw Scanner drive by and we started following him and he made us and started driving fast, and we thought, well, shit, he knows we're here, so Chance drove faster. Scanner lost control of his car and put it between two trees. I don't know how he did it, but he spun out and flew off the edge of the bar ditch and landed ass backwards in it, his car about three feet off the ground. It was like a goddamn circus trick."

"It was kind of funny," Chance said. "Well, I hate he got killed later, I think. But it was kind of funny right then, that car in a tree."

"You been hanging around Leonard too long," I said.

"I pulled him out of the car and asked him a few questions that he didn't want to answer," Leonard said, "then I interrogated him with my knuckles and he started to talk. His mother had come the back way, she always went that way, he said. A road we didn't even know about. Jackie was going to do what we thought, brother. Dig up the body. She thought she lost a necklace in the coffin. Hadn't thought about it in years, just knew it came up missing, and then when Marvin wanted to dig up the coffin, she got to thinking she had been wearing it the night she saw Farmer bury the coffins. She went out there and dug them up to see what was in them, saw the bodies, realized it was good for her, them being dead, and later she had Farmer's crime in her back pocket. And then she thought maybe that's where her necklace had gone. Had come off in one of the coffins when she was prying the lids open to look inside. Thought it had come loose off her neck and fell in one of them. It didn't turn up in the wife's coffin, so she figured it had to be the boyfriend's."

"It's like I thought," Chance said. "Well, mostly."

“Yep,” I said. “Thing is, I looked in that coffin pretty good. I didn’t see a necklace.”

“It’s probably under a couch somewhere,” Brett said, “and she should not have bothered. She was golden and didn’t know it.”

I looked at Jackie sprawled on the road like a collapsed puppet. She hadn’t so much as twitched a muscle. “That was one hard lick,” I said.

“She wakes up, I’ll give her a fresh one,” Brett said.

Marvin came over later that night after we had all been arrested, and then released, except for Jackie. I don’t know there was enough evidence to nail her even then, but with the death of Scanner—he ended up with Leonard’s truck radio pushed into his chest when the truck flipped—Jackie had had enough. She wanted to come clean. She told Marvin everything, filled in the gaps. Marvin told us we were going to have to pay a fine for digging up the cemetery, commandeering a backhoe that didn’t belong to us and breaking into a closed cemetery, but considering Jackie’s confession, he figured we’d come out all right. We might have to pick up trash along the highway for a few days in orange jumpsuits and pay a fine, but that was the worst of it.

“I’d get to wear a jumpsuit?” Chance said.

“Darling,” Brett said. “Don’t be too proud.”

Here’s some of the stuff Marvin told us. It isn’t all that new, some was obvious, some we guessed, but he had the facts from Jackie now.

Farmer buried his wife and her lover after killing them. Jackie was working late one night at the mortuary, looked outside and saw Farmer using the backhoe, digging up graves. She started to go out and ask him what was up, but hesitated. She watched from behind a shrub on the back walkway out of the mortuary, and watched him dig the holes, climb off the backhoe and pull the coffins out of the holes. They were cheap coffins, too big for dogs, really, but they were bought in mass and were cheap. They were light metal. She watched Farmer pry them open, take out the mummified dogs.

She watched him pull some bags out of the back of the truck, let them smack on the ground. He pushed them into the coffins and fitted in the false bottoms he had prepared, put the dogs on top of those, closed the lids, and pushed the coffins back in the holes, covered them up with the backhoe. Tomorrow he could claim he was doing a bit of cleaning work around the graves, and that's why they looked freshly dug.

A few days later when Jackie knew Farmer was out of town, one night actually, she dug up the graves and found what was in them. She covered them back up. It was to her advantage to have the wife dead, and now she had a secret that Farmer was unaware of. She literally knew where the bodies were buried, and as we also suspected, she waited until the time was ripe to play that card.

It hadn't quite worked out the way she thought.

Jackie also admitted she killed Farmer. Still had a key to the house from when they were married. He never changed the locks. She waited on him in a closet with a baseball bat, and surprised him. It took her one lick to knock him down, and then she finished him with more than was necessary. There was a lot of rage in that lady.

Scanner had been in on it, of course, but Jackie claimed he didn't know she was going to whack Farmer, only knew about the money part of it.

It didn't really matter. Scanner, innocent of murder or not, was as dead as those who were under those dogs.

Some time has passed. The cemetery is closed down now. No new customers will grace its grounds, human or otherwise. I drove by there the other day for no reason at all other than I wanted to.

I parked at the front of the cemetery and walked through the gate, which was still open and wrecked from us ramming through it. I walked over to Coco Butternut's grave. The dog had been reburied there by the county. Farmer's wife and the wife's boyfriend had been hauled away by relatives who finally knew where their kin ended up.

I looked down at Coco Butternut's grave. Thanks to that mutt we had caught a killer.

"Good dog," I said and went back to the car and drove away.

Hoodoo Harry

one

The sun was falling behind the trees as we came over the hill in Leonard's pickup, pulling a boat trailer loaded down with our small boat. We had been fishing and had caught a few. Our usual method was we terrorized the poor fish and threw them back at the end of the day, which for the fish, if you considered the alternative, wasn't so bad.

On this day however we caught about a half dozen good-sized perch and a couple of bass, and we thought we'd clean them and dip them in a thick batter and fry them in a deep Dutch oven full of popping grease.

I've cut back on my fried foods for years now, but once in a while a bit of fried fish or fried chicken sets me right for quite a few months and I thought this would be one of those times. But our intended fish fry was cut short before the fish so much as got cleaned for frying.

As we came over the hill, the trees crowding in on us from both sides, we saw there was a blue bus coming down the road, straddling the middle line. Leonard made with an evasive maneuver, but by this point the trees on the right side were gone, and there was a shallow creek visible, one that fed into the private lake where we had been fishing. There was no other place to go.

The bus seemed to come for us as we veered, and I saw right before impact that there was a black kid at the wheel, his eyes wild, working the steering wheel with everything he had, but it wasn’t enough. He was out of control. The bus hit us with a loud smack and I remember suddenly feeling the odd sensation of the tires leaving the ground and the truck turning over in mid-air. I heard the trailer snap loose and saw the boat sailing along in front of us, and then it was out of sight and we were in the creek, the roof of the truck on the bottom of the creek bed, water coming in through the damaged windows.

I heard a slow groaning of metal and realized the bus was on top of the truck and the roof of the truck was slowly crunching down into the creek bed and the floor of the truck was coming down to meet us. Another few seconds and me and Leonard would be pressed like sandwich meat.

I tried to get out of my seat belt, but nothing doing. I might as well have been fastened to that seat with duct tape. I held my breath as the water rushed in through the shattered windows, but the belt still wouldn’t come loose. A little, cardboard, pine-tree-shaped air freshener floated in front of my face, a shadowed shape against the dying sunlight leaking in at the edges of the side truck windows. A moment later the belt struggle was too much and I passed out, feeling as if I were drowning. Last thing I remember before going out was Leonard had hold of my arm—

That was it.

When I came to, I was lying on the ground on my side by the edge of the creek. I was dizzy and felt like I’d been swallowed by a snake and shit down a hole. My throat was raw, and I knew I had most likely puked a batch of creek water.

I turned my head and could see the bus, which I realized now was a bookmobile. rolling literature was painted in large white letters on the side. It was sitting with its tires on top of Leonard's truck, the windshield blown out. I could still hear the groaning sound as the weight of it slowly squashed the truck and shoved it deeper into the creek bed. Leonard was holding an open pocketknife in his hand, the one he had used to cut my belt loose. He looked exhausted.

"Good thing you come around," Leonard said. "Mouth to mouth wasn't going to happen, pal. Come to that, I was going to be walking home alone."

"The kid?"

Leonard shook his head. "What's left of him oozed out through the bus's windshield. Glass worked on him like a cheese grater."

"Shit," I said, sitting up.

"I was you, wouldn't go look. You don't need that in your head. Bet he ain't more than twelve years old."

Books were floating out of the shattered windows of the bookmobile and were pushed along gradually by the current like dead fish. The water was either red with sunlight or with blood. Night settled in and the red in the creek turned black as ink and the bus looked like a small island out there in the shallow water.

Few days later, Leonard and I attended the funeral of the dead kid. We were fine after the accident, but a little stiff, and Leonard had a bit of a hitch in his git-along. That leg had been giving him trouble for years.

The funeral was attended by a half a dozen people we didn't know. The kid was named James Clifton. He didn't have any real family and had been brought up, or more accurately jerked up, in a variety of foster homes. He lived in a small community called Nesbit. Nesbit was named after the black man who founded the place back in the early 1800s. At one time Nesbit had been home to over a thousand black people, surviving after the Civil War in their own communities, selling pulp wood to the white folks out and beyond.

Over time the bulk of the community faded, mostly due to an attack on it in the late 1800s by Civil War vets and those that wished they had been Confederates. The mob decided to kill everyone in the place over the death of a little white girl. She had been savaged and cut up in a manner that didn't designate any known tool or weapon, but it was immediately assumed that "a nigger done it."

After the raid, only a couple hundred residents survived, and most of them hid out in the nearby deep woods and bottom lands for months. When they returned, the community was a shadow of its former self, with all the houses burned down, the businesses destroyed. Over time it built back up to some degree, but it was never the same. A thousand people may not sound like a lot to begin with, but in those days, it had been a sizable population for an independent black community. After the massacre, its independence was over. The surviving residents went to work for white folks. These days people still lived there, but they didn’t even have internet access. A cell phone, forget it. Nesbit was like the ash from a once bright fire.

As a side note, it was later determined the little girl had been savaged by a pack of wild dogs. No apology was made. And in fact there was a sign placed outside of the community on a giant sycamore that said: dead niggers are good niggers, and if this sign comes down, there will be more.

Rumor was it didn’t come down until 1925 when it became so weathered it could no longer be read. When it was removed no one was killed, but within weeks a new sign with the same words on it went up. In 1965, it was finally removed and never replaced.

Nesbit was now only a post office and a general store, not too unlike the one of old that had been set afire. There were a few other little businesses along the street, a garage and tire shop, a small sawmill and lumberyard, a thrift store.

Our buddy, LaBorde Chief of Police Marvin Hanson, had filled us in on most of this, and had ended it with, “Thing is, except for the county, maybe a Texas Ranger that wants to bother, there’s no law in Nesbit, not even a constable. Well, no official law. Gardner Moost at the general store pretty much takes care of what can legally be done, and some that isn’t legal. His wife runs the post office, which means she mostly sits there and reads books. As for Gardner, no one bothers him much if no one gets killed around the place.”

“But the kid got killed,” I said.

"Not in Nesbit. And not in LaBorde. Sheriff's office will poke around a bit, might find something, but they don't have a good record for that part of the county. There's people in that office that are descendants of the Confederates who burned the place down, killed all those people. Some of them are still fighting the Civil War, least in their minds."

"What about the bookmobile?" Leonard asked.

"Eighties bus. Small school bus refurbished to be a bookmobile. It made the route of a number of black communities for years, then disappeared fifteen years ago."

"Wait a minute," Leonard said. "Jump back on that disappeared part."

"That's the curious part. There was a black lady named Harriet Hoodalay who drove it. Everyone called her Harry. One day she and the bookmobile disappeared. I don't remember all the details, but I remember the story. Anyway, her disappearing like that, like a haint, she came to be called Hoodoo Harry. Nobody calls her anything now. Subject doesn't come up anymore. Pretty much forgotten. And until you guys got run over by the bookmobile, it was forgotten as well."

"That damn sure does fall into the range of peculiar," Leonard said.

"Where's the bookmobile now?" I said.

"Police Department impound. Accident may not have happened in our jurisdiction, but we're the ones that have the storage. We're also the ones that are going to give it a once-over and give the info to the county. Odd thing about the bookmobile is except for the window blown out, tires flattened, a few bangs and scrapes, it's in great condition, like it was the day it disappeared."

"What about my truck, the boat?" Leonard said. "Y'all took them in, too.”

“Hope you got insurance,” Marvin said. “You can collect what’s left of them at the junkyard.”

Leonard sighed.

“Question is,” I said, “how did that kid get the bus? I mean, hell, he couldn’t drive. He was all over the place.”

“He drove well enough to take it from where it’s been all these years, just not well enough to keep it in his lane,” Marvin said. “You boys are lucky you’re alive.”

“Yeah,” I said, “but poor James wasn’t that lucky.”

“Since it was us he run over,” Leonard said, “can we take a peek at that bus?”

“Not legally,” Hanson said.

“How about illegally, but we don’t call it illegal?” Leonard said.

Hanson pondered on that. After what seemed long enough for all life on Earth to die off, he said, “Tell you what, if you’ll wear gloves and footies, and don’t touch anything—and I’m especially talking to you, Hap—we might can do that. Come to the impound around midnight.”

“I don’t touch things,” I said.

Leonard and Marvin stared at me.

“Sometimes,” I said.

Before it was time to go over to the impound, we did a bit of research, taking advantage of other friendships at the cop shop, the local newspaper and the paper over in Camp Rapture. In some cases they gave us connections to people who had a bit of information they didn't have. What we got when we put it all together still wasn't much.

We discovered that James had been born in Nesbit. His father ran off when he was born, and his mother died of heart disease. Then his grandparents took him in, but when he was ten the grandfather died, and just six months before he ran over Leonard's truck with the blue bus and got himself killed, James's grandmother died. Since then, he'd been couch surfing with his relatives and friends of his relatives. Child Protective Services had missed a beat. No one knew where he'd been staying the last week. He had been out of sight and out of mind, and was now resting in a pauper's grave in Nesbit cemetery. But before he was sent there, his body was examined and it was discovered he had been tortured with burns and cuts and pokes from sharp instruments. He was also malnourished.

Online we read some old newspaper accounts about the disappearance of the bookmobile. It originated out of LaBorde, but its driver, the aforementioned Hoodoo Harry, kept it where she lived. One morning folks woke up to find she was gone, and so was the bookmobile. And no one knew where either one of them were. Or at least no one admitted it. She was supposed to go off on a vacation to visit her sister that day, catch a bus, but if she left she must have left in the bookmobile, as her car remained at home. She never arrived at her sister's.

I went over to Leonard's apartment around 10 p.m. and we had a cup of coffee to stretch our night out more comfortably, and then about ten minutes before midnight, we drove from Leonard's apartment to the city compound, which was more or less just down the street. When we got there, Hanson's car was parked in its place, and out back was the compound fence and there was light poking out of the windows of a large garage tucked at the back of the property. The lot within the fence was filled with cars and trucks and even a couple of boats on blocks.

I pulled out my cell and gave Hanson a call. A few minutes later he came out of the garage and took his time strolling toward the fence.

"It's okay," Leonard called out to Hanson. "Take your time. We're going to set up camp in a bit anyway. We brought supplies."

As Hanson arrived at the gate in the fence, he said, "You're lucky I'm letting you do this. I'm putting my ass on the line."

"Bullshit," Leonard said. "You're the police chief."

"But I'm not Police God."

"In our book you are," I said, "and oh so precious."

Hanson let us in without whacking either of us on the head with a rubber hose, and we all walked over to the garage. Inside it was so brightly lit you could almost see germs crawling on the floor. A man and a woman in evidence protection gear were wandering about.

There was a motorcycle and a few cars inside, but at the back of the place was the bookmobile, mine and Leonard's Moby Dick. The window had been replaced and the side door was open, and water still leaking out of it.

There was a small smear of oil visible to the side of it where it had run out of the bottom of the bus. They had either repaired or replaced the tires to make it easier to maneuver and examine.

A short man, who might have been thirty or fifty, wearing a protective gown, gloves and footies, was standing near the bookmobile. He had a gray face shaped like the blade of a well-used axe, and a build like a stack of mud. The mud flowed when he moved, but he moved very little, just enough to reveal his natural shimmy as we introduced ourselves without shaking hands.

When we told him our names, he said, "Stump. Get suited out."

In a back room full of fresh and folded evidence suits, we dressed along with Hanson.

"Stump isn't much for lengthy conversation, is he?" I asked.

"No," Hanson said. "Bricks in his presence have died of boredom."

"Aren't bricks already dead?" Leonard asked.

"I was reaching," Hanson said.

"You got any news on the kid, or the bookmobile's sudden appearance?" I asked.

"Nope," Hanson said. "You know more than I know."

He said that because while we dressed we informed him the bits and pieces we had discovered, not revealing that in some cases they were people in his department speaking out of school.

When we were dressed we went back to the bookmobile.

Stump was standing pretty much where we had left him. I think he had moved a few inches to the right. Maybe he had peed in the old spot.

"What can you tell us?" Hanson said.

"I can tell you don't screw up my evidence, which is the whole damn bus. They got to do this, Captain?"

"No," Hanson said, "but believe it or not, they have solved a few things in their time. They don't have as much to do as we do, and they are dogged."

"Yeah, well, I guess that's some kind of reason," Stump said.

We went up the metal steps of the bookmobile and eased our way inside. I stood by the steering wheel and looked back through the bus. Though water still leaked from the bottom of the bus, the inside had been dried out after evidence was collected. There were lights strung in there. The books were all gone, and the shelves had warped a bit. In the back there was a curved metal hull that had been put in, perhaps to house a larger fuel tank. A small door was off to the right of where I was looking. The toilet.

It was so clean, I said, "Looks like you've already collected evidence."

Stump, who was behind us, standing on the top step into the bookmobile, said, "I have. But I don't want you adding any evidence that isn't evidence. Get me?"

"Yep," Leonard said. "We got you."

"That hull at the back," Leonard said, touching on what I had noticed first off, "what's it for?"

"Usually they put that kind of thing in to have a large gas tank, all the traveling they do out in the country. That was probably put in the minute it became a bookmobile."

"I've never heard of that," Hanson said.

"You an expert on bookmobiles?" Stump said.

“Point taken,” Hanson said.

“Actually, I only seen a few buses and such with that,” Stump said. “Sometimes it isn’t a gas tank, but a crapper tank. That way the toilet doesn’t need to be emptied out as often. Toilet works, by the way. Everything worked on this thing before it went off the road and took a swim. It has a bit of an oil leak that could be due to the wreck, but I don’t think so. From looking it over I think that’s been an ongoing problem, but other than the window and the original tires gone flat, it’s in remarkably good shape.”

I walked toward the back, looking left and right as I went.

“You two ace detectives find anything, please let me know,” Stump said. “I wouldn’t want to not learn a thing or two from the experts.”

“You don’t know our lives,” Leonard said. “We could actually be smart.”

Stump made a grunting sound. “I got a pretty good idea about your lives, and I’m thinking it isn’t pretty.”

“So you been over every inch?” I said.

“I might have missed a centimeter under the shitter, but yeah,” Stump said. “You see, it’s my job.”

I ran my gloved hand over the top of the backend section, the place where the tank would be contained. “What if it isn’t a tank in here?”

“What else would it be?” Stump said.

“Always ask questions,” I said, “that is the path to wisdom.”

“Fucking Confucius?” Stump said

“Hap Collins,” I said.

“Look, I was about to take the bolts out of that thing. I was even going to lift off the top and look inside. Thought that up all by myself before you got here.”

“Now,” Leonard said, “don’t start selling yourself for more than you are.”

Stump grunted again and left the bookmobile.

“He seems to like you guys,” Hanson said.

A moment later, the man and the woman we had seen wandering the garage entered with battery-powered tools, pushed past us, went to the back, removed the bolts and lifted the top off the covering. They carried it away with them without even looking inside. Curiosity would not kill those cool cats.

When they left the bus with the metal top, Stump reappeared and waddled down the aisle toward the now-open container. He had a flashlight in his hand. He turned it on and looked inside, turned his head from left to right, said, “Huh.”

We went over and looked. Stacked from left to right, six in a row, were oil-covered, time-withered little bodies, and one larger one.

“How about that?” Stump said.

“We told you that you ought to look,” Leonard said.

“And I told you I was about to,” Stump said.

“You say that now,” Leonard said.

“I hate both you bastards,” Stump said.

“You now belong to a sizable club,” Hanson said.

four

You can bet that threw a wrench into things. Where before there was the problem of the long-missing bookmobile and its return due to a twelve-year-old boy driving it for reasons unknown, not to mention his death by accident, now we had six oil-covered bodies to identify, tucked up in the back of the bookmobile.

Who put those bodies there? Where had the bookmobile been for all those years, and why did it look brand-new? And while we're making a list, where was Hoodoo Harry? Was hers the larger oil-soaked body?

Well, I'd like to tell you it all came together, mysteries solved, but it didn't. In fact, a few weeks passed by. They examined the corpses and sent off DNA samples from the bodies, five of which turned out to be kids, but that was all they knew. No DNA matches. The sixth one was a female adult, but if it was Hoodoo Harry, no one had yet tracked down a relative to make the determination. But the search was in progress.

Complication on complication multiplied by more complications.

Me and Leonard felt pretty smart for a few weeks about the bookmobile container, but truth was, we weren't expecting bodies at all. And further truth was, Stump and his forensic crew were minutes from discovering what was there. So had we not shown up, they'd have found the bodies anyway.

As the weeks went by, I began to feel agitated, and had trouble sleeping at night. One night, lying in bed with Brett, I was tossing and turning, and she flipped on the nightstand light, rolled over and lifted herself on one elbow and looked at me.

“What the hell, Hap? You been acting like a jumping bean for a week. Moan and groan all night.”

“I moan and groan?” I said, sitting up in bed, looking at the beautiful Brett, her flame-red hair tied back in a ponytail.

“I’m bothering you?”

“Only when I’m trying to sleep. Or lie still. And you go to the toilet all night. What’s up with that?”

“Poo-poo.”

“Six, seven times a night?”

“Well, I go in there and read.”

“Why can’t you sleep?”

“I don’t know.”

“It’s the kid, isn’t it?”

“Guess it is. Think about him a lot. I close my eyes, I see his eyes, looking out of the windshield of that bookmobile.”

Brett fluffed her pillow and folded it against the headboard and put her back against it.

“You been looking into it?” she asked.

“No. Hanson said it was his case to investigate.”

“That’s never stopped you and Leonard before.”

“It hasn’t, but I guess we didn’t know where to go with this.”

Brett pursed her lips, said, “You know what? Just look up the old route of the bookmobile, and follow it.”

"Marvin's done that."

"But he isn't you, Hap."

"No. He isn't. He's smarter and a good investigator."

"Yeah, well, you do have that going against you. But is he more dogged than you and Leonard?"

"Hanson used the same word. But I think he's the one that's dogged."

"More dogged than you and your bro?"

"I'm not sure how you measure things on a dogged scale. I'm not sure I know what a dogged scale is. I'm not sure there is one."

"I'll tell you right now, you are more dogged. You and Leonard need to get back on the trail and figure things out so I can get a good night's sleep. And here's another idea. How about you look up Cason Statler's friend, the one who runs the newspaper morgue in Camp Rapture. Have him check into things for you. He can find more in a day than the law can find in a month. That guy, isn't his name Mars, something like that?"

"Mercury."

"He has the mind for looking into conspiracies, or whatever is going on here. No one knows odd information and can evaluate it better than that guy. Or so you've told me. Get him to do some kind of . . . I don't know, chart about the route of the bookmobile, then look into missing persons in that area, on the route. Might be something in that."

"You're smart," I said.

"I know that," she said.

"Since you're awake, want to fool around?"

"No. And if you ever expect to again, you better quit tossing, moaning and groaning and talking to yourself."

“I talk to myself, too?”

Brett turned out the light. “Now, close your little Hap eyes and shut your little Hap mouth, and go the fuck to sleep.”

five

Cason Statler is a Pulitzer Prize-winning writer that works at the Camp Rapture newspaper. We've known him for awhile. Handsome and quirky, quick of wit, he can also hold his own in a fistfight. He's a guy with a bunch of odd friends. Including us. He's a big dog over at the paper. His friend, Mercury, works downstairs in the news morgue, sometimes known as the first level of Hell. Mercury is a kind of a genius. Cason told him about us, explained our problem and left us to it.

Down there they have all the back issues of the paper, as well as all manner of stuff, stacked up this way and that. You have to wind your way through it all to find Mercury. Down there he was king. Of course, he was the only one that worked down there, so the job position was easily filled.

Mercury was blond and pale, but looked strong. His job was to put all the old newspapers on the computer, then send the originals off to somewhere where they were collected by someone for some reason unknown. In his spare time, Mercury conducted investigations of his own. Some of them were nutty. Crop circles. Flying saucers. The Kennedy assassination, involving everyone but Bigfoot, though in time he might work him in as well. But he was smart and helpful, if you could point his nose in the right direction. He loved a good mystery, and he had a way of calculating odd situations into a recognizable patterns.

After we wound our way through the stacks and came up on Mercury, he said, "Welcome to the center of the earth."

The overhead light was thin back there, but there was a bright lamp on his desk, and there was another on a table that was pushed up against it. Both lamps had metal shades over the bulbs, but those had been tilted so as to let more of the light leak out.

On the table were books, assorted newspapers, clippings, an old microfilm machine, and on a chair was a small TV and an old-fashioned VCR. The VCR cord was fastened to the back of the TV and plugged into a plastic power strip on the floor. The wire from his computer was plugged into the bar as well.

"How are you men?" he said.

"We're fine," Leonard said. "Cason says you can help us."

"That depends. He told me what you're looking for, and I've pulled out a few things, got some stuff on the computer I can show you."

Mercury inched over to it, seated himself in front of it, touched a button. The computer lit up like a Christmas display. "There's not a lot here, but what's here is of interest. Here is the path of the bookmobile."

We took a gander at the place he was pointing, a map with a moving arrow.

"You can see that it covered quite a bit of ground, but most of it, the places where Harriet stopped, were right near Nesbit. Made a few stops in areas where there were neighborhoods, if you can call a half-dozen houses neighborhoods. Folks wanted books, they either had to be in town at the post office at the right time, or they had to be at one of these stop areas. Six altogether. Last two stops were well out in the country. Wasn't like it was a money-making business, driving the bookmobile. Harry came once a week, three times a month, then there was a week off. When she wasn't making this run through Nesbit and the surrounding area, she was on other routes. She drove four days a week, three weeks a month."

Mercury showed us a few more routes around LaBorde, a spot or two out in the country that were destinations.

"Those are routes on days when she worked outside of the Nesbit area. Way I'd think about it is Harry was from Nesbit, so that would be the hub of everything for her. Also, there have been missing persons cases around Nesbit in the last few years, couple of kids, and Harriet Hoodalay."

"Quite a coincidence," Leonard said.

Mercury considered for a moment.

"Place small as Nesbit, you want to connect anyone to the missing kids, you could make the case for everyone there, the community being so small, being so few people. And the missing kids came from the area. Also possible none of what happened in and around Nesbit is related, but that's where you can make the case that there might be too much coincidence. The law of averages come into play. Someone in or around Nesbit is most likely responsible for the kids, but are they responsible for Harriet and the bookmobile? Still likely."

"Harry and the bookmobile could have come up missing on one of the other routes," I said.

"Merely saying the most likely scenario is it happened near her home, near Nesbit, and probably someone who knew her, and the two missing kids are related to it all, because that's who a bookmobile is specifically designed for. Anyone can check out a book, but it's bored kids, kids that don't have library access, that they are trying to appeal to. Thing is, now even poor kids have computers and the internet, and with all the lights and bells and whistles, books get lost to a time when we had more patience and less to distract us.”

“We found more than two kids in the bookmobile,” Leonard said.

“Can’t help you there, but if you nose around a bit, you might find more missing than have been reported. I’m going to strongly guess they are all from the same area, and what you’re dealing with is a child predator, someone who likes to stick close to the place he knows. Way it usually works in these cases. And one reason you may not know about the other kids is they may not have been reported. Neglect is just the thing that puts them in a bad spot, causes them to fall between the cracks. Not the only thing, but a major factor.”

“Think it could have been Harry?” Leonard asked.

“Could be, but then we got to ask, where has she been all this time? After she disappeared there were no more child abduction cases reported, so that leans toward her possibly being responsible, but she doesn’t fit the profile, and nothing was known about the bookmobile until it nearly ran you over. The kid inside, that leans toward him being a victim as well, or a potential victim. An escapee. But I go back to what I said before. Just because we have a report of two children doesn’t mean that’s all there is. You found six bodies, and one not a child, that could be folks who haven’t been reported, and the adult could just be Harry.”

Mercury paused, tapped the keys. A new image came up. It was of a middle-aged black woman.

“Harriet Hoodalay,” he said. “What I found from looking through older microfilm. You know about her supposedly taking a bus trip to see her sister, I assume. Her not arriving?”

“Do you know who first reported her missing?”

“Gardner Moost.”

“General store guy?” Leonard said.

“Correct,” Mercury said. “Said he got that information from her husband, Tom Hoodalay. Tom didn’t report her missing when her vacation ended and she didn’t come back. Gardner asked why she hadn’t come home and Tom told Moost he figured Harriet had run off from him.”

“What’s Harriet’s sister say?”

“She never arrived, but she did buy a bus ticket. No one was doing a head count when it came time to get on the bus, and the bus line closed down its hub here years ago. Whoever worked there back then has scattered to the wind.”

“Maybe Harriet found out something about her husband,” I said. “Like how Tom was using her connection to children to do something he wasn’t supposed to. She decided to get away from him, go see her sister. He was afraid she’d spill the beans to the law, so he killed her.”

“Possible, but unknown,” Mercury said. “But Nesbit, that’s where you begin.”

six

We drove over to Nesbit in my car.

It was a nice drive and a nice day. Not too warm for the time of year. We cruised along the highway for several miles, and into an area where the trees grew thick and the houses were far apart.

Nesbit was off the highway, down a roughly paved road. As we came into the community we saw the post office on one side, general store on the other. Tire and mechanic shop, and so on, were all nearby. We were through the place before we knew it, and I had to turn around and drive us back. First place we stopped was the general store.

It was like stepping back in time. The place was chock-full of cool items, things that I forgot existed, like mule plowing equipment. Not a lot of it, but even some was surprising. There were long shelves of canned goods, prepared by locals, sold on consignment, and there were the sort of things you expected. High shelves with bolts of cloth. Tools. There was a series of bins in the middle of the store, stuffed with fresh vegetables and, according to a sign, locally raised.

There was a counter with a lot of old candies and soft drinks I had forgotten about. There was a break in the piles of goods on that counter, and there was an old-fashioned cash register with a black man behind it, sitting on a stool. He was a big fellow, and though he was sitting, I could tell he would tower over both me and Leonard. He had shoulders as wide as a bank vault. He had a red tone to his skin, what in the old days they used to refer to as a redbone Negro, when they were being polite. He had reddish freckles scattered on his cheeks. His hands, which were clutched around a hunting magazine, were about the size of catcher's mitts. He looked to be in his sixties, had a fringe of white hair around his head, just over his ears and nowhere else.

At the counter we greeted him. He put down his magazine and eyed us carefully.

"I help you fellas?" he said.

"Maybe," I said. "We work for a private detective agency out of LaBorde. We're trying to find out about James Clifton. I'm Hap Collins, and this is my associate, Leonard Pine."

"Gardner Moost," he said. "Yeah. Sad story. But what can be done for him now?"

"What we're trying to figure out," Leonard said, "is how he came by a bookmobile that had been missing for years, and what was he doing driving it?"

"Don't know what I can tell you. Poor boy was hard luck. Lost most of his family. Good kid, though. Had him a little part-time job at the tire shop. You know, picking up things a couple hours after school. Old tires, this and that. He was sleeping at different homes. He slept in the back here a few times. I was thinking of letting him stay full-time. Maybe give him a little work on the weekends. Tire shop didn't use him all week. As for the rest, I don't know. I don't think I saw him around the week he ended up gone. I doubt he was going to school. Was supposed to be, but I'd see him walking down the road, not really seeming to be going anywhere. An hour later, you'd see him walk back. I guess I saw him last on a Monday. Then the rest of the week he wasn’t about. Didn’t think much of it. Reason I know he was missing is because he finished up at the tire shop, he’d come over, buy him a pop and a candy bar. Every day. Next thing I know he’s dead, and I hear he was in that old bookmobile. Beyond that, I don’t know a thing about him or the missing bookmobile.”

“Did you know Harriet Hoodalay?” I said.

That gave Moost pause.

“Yes. I did know Harry. Lovely woman.”

“Do you know her husband?” I said. I knew he did, from what Mercury had told us, but I wanted to see where he’d go with it.

He nodded. “Yeah.”

“We ask,” said Leonard, “because Harriet used to drive the bookmobile, then she disappeared. Supposed to be going up North to see her sister but never made it.”

“I never believed that story,” Moost said.

“Oh,” I said, “and why is that?”

“I think she might have meant to see her sister, but I don’t think the bus took a wrong turn at Amarillo and let her out in a pasture, or some such. I think her husband killed her. Tom’s a mean sonofabitch. Me and him don’t get along. He shops somewhere other than here. I banned him from the store when Harry came up missing those years back.”

“You say he’s mean,” Leonard said. “But how mean?”

“He beat on her from time to time.”

“So you and her were close?” I said.

“Look, if you two are going to be snooping about, might as well tell you. Me and Harry, we had a thing. Went on for a while. She told me Tom was brutal. I saw the bruises. She was going to take a bus and see her sister, all right, but the plan was me and her would get together later. She'd get a divorce and we'd marry. But she didn't get a divorce, and she didn't come back. At first, at least a little, I thought she had changed her mind, didn't want what I thought she wanted. But deep down, always figured her husband did her in. Told the cops that, some sheriff's deputy, but they didn't find anything to prove it. They dropped it. I told Tom last time he was in here, years ago, not to come back, just because I didn't like him. Later, I married. Still married. Happily. But me and Harry, we had our moment."

"Slightly off the subject," I said, "but the bookmobile. Did she like that work? Ever have any problems?"

"She mentioned a bit of this and that. Kids stealing a book, acting up. But nothing special. She did seem tense days before she was supposed to catch that bus."

"Tense?" Leonard said.

"Maybe her husband was worrying her. He didn't know she wasn't coming back, but I think right before she left, she might have told him. Couldn't hold it in. Figure they got in a fight, he killed her, and she's buried somewhere out in the woods behind their house."

I didn't say we thought she might have ended up in a compartment in the bookmobile.

"Anything special you remember about the bookmobile from that time?" Leonard said.

"That's been awhile."

"Anything?" Leonard said.

"Just that Turner, over there at the tire and mechanic shop, was going to fix the bookmobile up. Needed new tires, some general maintenance. Always leaked oil. No matter what they did to it, it leaked oil.”

“So her route was closed out for her vacation?” I said.

“They had another driver, and I think Harry was supposed to drive the bookmobile over to him, but then the bookmobile disappeared, and that was it. People out of LaBorde who had been paying for it decided they weren’t going to try and replace it, so that was all she wrote.”

“Who was this new driver?” Leonard asked.

“Will Turner, works over at the tire shop.”

seven

Will Turner was a skinny man that I judged to be in his early forties, dark of skin, almost as dark as Leonard. He had a pleasant face and skinned knuckles, probably from dealing with tools and tires day in and day out, though it was hard for me to imagine a lot of business in Nesbit.

“Yeah,” Will Turner said. “I took the job, but then the bookmobile got stolen, and that was the end of it. So I just work here for Donnie James. I been working here since I was a kid, started just like James did, doing odd jobs.”

“What kind of kid was James?” I asked.

“Quiet. Never said much, so you never knew much about him. Did his work, couple hours a day. Except for that, he was kind of wandering about, sleeping and eating where he could. I don’t really know much about him.”

We were standing inside the doorway of the tire and mechanic shop. It was one of those doors that was wide and made of the same aluminum as the building. End of the day you pulled it closed and padlocked it. It was a small building, and it was stuffed with tires, and there was an upper deck supported by a series of two by eights, and one in particular looked as if it was about to retire from the job. It looked as if insects had been at it. There was a long aluminum building out back of the garage. We could see it through the open back section of the shop. Having the doors open on both ends was a good choice, because a nice breeze was blowing.

"That post there," I said, "it looks as if it's about to give up the ghost."

Will looked toward it. "Yep. I have to go up there and get a tire, mostly for older foreign cars, I'm always a little nervous. Take it slow and easy. Been on Donnie for a year to get it fixed. He can be cheap."

"If you don't mind me asking," I said, "you get a lot of business here in Nesbit?"

Will laughed. "Nope. Still, we got a reputation, and folks bring their cars in from miles around. We mostly make money on mechanic work, but we sell a few tires too. But a lot of business? No."

"Moost was telling us you been working here a long time," Leonard said.

"I have. That's a fact."

"Let me ask you something about Harriet Hoodalay and the bookmobile. She was supposed to pass that job to you, right?"

"That's right. I was only a kid then, twenty-three, working part-time here, and I needed extra money. Driving the bookmobile wasn't much, but hey, it was something to add to the pot."

"Did Harriet drop the bookmobile off with you?" I said.

"Was supposed to, that night. She didn't show, though. Thought she might have got tied up with something and I'd find out about it the next day. Figured she could have left it for me here at the garage. We discussed that as an option and I was figuring maybe she got confused on what we had finally decided. Next day I found out she and the bookmobile had gone missing. And I was out some easy money."

"Did you know Harriet well?" Leonard said.

"Not really. Nice lady, far as I could tell. Saw her around. Knew she drove the bookmobile. She brought it here to be worked on time or two. We talked a little. You know, small talk. Nothing special. I think she liked the job, liked kids. Never had any of her own."

"Okay," I said, "we'd like to talk to your boss, Mr. James."

Will looked at his watch. "Back about two. On lunch break. Takes longer breaks these days."

"What's the building out back?"

"Oh, boss has a tractor, some equipment for this and that. He goes around and does farm work from time to time. Breaking up gardens, sometimes large fields. Side work."

"Where would Donnie be having lunch? Home?"

"Naw. He's not married and he's a terrible cook. He can't put a peanut butter and jelly sandwich together without it tasting like tar paper. There's a little place down the road. Ethel's. Not much to it, open for lunch and dinner. Used to be open for breakfast, but stopped doing that last year. Alright food. Ethel and her husband Bernard run it."

"Thanks, Will," I said, and me and Leonard went out.

eight

Ethel's was indeed small. A little, yellow frame house. What would have normally been the living room had been turned into a dining area. A few tables and chairs were scattered about. A counter had been put in, as well as an opening into the kitchen: a cutout in the wall where the food could be passed to the waitress, who I assumed was Ethel. She was petite, had a look on her face of perpetual worry, as if she feared forgetting a French fry order. Through the gap in the wall we could see a big black man, possibly Bernard, standing in front of an old-fashioned grill, flipping burgers. He looked big enough to turn over the grill.

Waitress said, "Pick a seat."

That was easy, the place was packed, except for one small table in the corner, and we took that. The table wobbled when I put my hands on it.

"Shall we eat?" Leonard said.

"Yep. Let's hope the food is better than the furniture."

"It's packed here," he said. "That's a good sign."

"Choices are limited."

I looked around trying to spot someone I thought might be Donnie. That was easy. A man with tire and mechanic shop written across the back of a khaki work shirt was moving toward the cash register, his ticket in hand.

I got up, went over, said, "Are you Donnie James?"

He nodded.

I gave him the synopsis version of what me and Leonard were doing, convinced him to sit down with us, but not before I agreed to pay his check.

“I got to get back to work, fellas,” he said. “Make this quick. I don’t think I know a thing that could help. Thanks for lunch, by the way. I hope you find out who did what to those children. Saw in the paper about all those kids, and the woman in the bookmobile. Terrible. Coated in oil. Why would anyone do that?”

“Preserve the bodies a little,” I said. “I think whoever did it liked looking at them. Oil probably killed some of the stink.”

“I guess so,” Donnie said.

“How well did you know Harriet?” Leonard asked.

“Not too well. Except for driving the bookmobile, Tom kept her on a pretty tight leash. I was you, he’s the one I’d talk to. I figure he’s got her in a fifty-gallon drum under his front porch. Tom’s a jerk. Always thought men were trying to take Harry from him. One time, right here, they got into it at suppertime over something. He called her a bitch. She got up and went outside and stood by their pickup until he paid up and went out. I was sitting over there by the window. I saw him grab her arm and push her into the truck. He’s a bully, even at his age, retired and always on his front porch or he’s out back in the yard lifting weights. Old as he is, I seen him get into it at the post office with a young man over something. I don’t know what. I’m sure it was Tom started things. But he whipped that young man like he was a heavy bag. Hit him at will, and finally dropped him. Gardner Moost stood up to him, though, about how he treated Harry. I mean, hell, everyone here knows everyone else’s business. Gardner’s owner of the general store.”

“We’ve met,” Leonard said.

“Then you’ve seen Gardner. Tom’s afraid of him, and with good reason. When he was younger, Gardner cleaned out a few bars down Houston way, or so I've heard. But Tom is no slouch either. Got a bum knee, but I think Gardner could take him. Someone like you two, he'd run you together so hard he'd make one of you."

"We talked to Moost," Leonard said. "He told us about Tom, how he banned him. Another thing. James Clifton. What kind of kid was he?"

"Didn't say much. Did some little clean-up jobs for me. Knew he had it rough, so I was trying to help him out. That's about all I got. Who works for who, here? You the boss, white man?"

"I want to be, but he won't let me," I said.

"And he won't let me," Leonard said.

"Brett Sawyer is our boss."

"Who's he?"

"She," I said.

"Ah," he said. "Well, good luck finding out what happened to Harry. She was good people. Like me, she cared about children. That's why I fixed that bookmobile on my own time, even donated tires. It was mostly children got something out of that bookmobile. Me, I was never much of a reader. Always figured by not being one I missed out on things. Might be doing something other than a tire shop if I'd gotten a real education. Then again, folks need tires and they need cars fixed."

"No disagreement there," Leonard said.

"I got to go. Good luck."

Donnie got up and went out.

Leonard said, "Tom Hoodalay seems to get a lot of bad marks."

"Maybe we ought to check Tom's report card personally," I said.

“Not until I get a burger. I’m so hungry I could eat the ass out of a menstruating mule.”

nine

The burgers were good. Much better than I assumed the ass of a menstruating mule would be. We ate, and found out from Ethel, who was indeed the waitress, where Tom Hoodalay lived.

It was a small house not far off the road near the center of Nesbit. It was down a narrow, cracked, concrete drive, and at the end of the drive was a small, dilapidated house with an old brown pickup in the yard.

Weeds grew waist high on both sides of the house, out to the edge of the drive, and the drive seemed to be fighting a losing battle against the weeds growing up between the cracks in the concrete. Another few months, you could film a Tarzan movie out there. There was a small overhang porch, and there was a long wooden bench on the porch, and on the bench sat a man I took for Tom Hoodalay. He was crouched there like a frog on steroids.

We parked in the drive next to the pickup, got out and walked up to the steps. There were chunks of concrete breaking off in the drive next to the step. Leonard put his foot on a chunk and wobbled it with his boot.

“Who the hell are you?” the man said.

Up close I could tell he was in his sixties, but it was a powerful sixties. He had a head like a soccer ball. It was shaved and smooth as an oiled doorknob and glistened in the sunlight. He had a lot of white teeth and his eyes were both red where they should be white. His pupils, swimming in the middle of all that redness, were chocolate-colored. He had very little neck and was almost as wide as Gardner Moost. I thought the two of them went at it, it might be a close fight.

Nesbit seemed to have a lot of large people.

“We’re Avon,” Leonard said.

“The hell you are,” the man said.

“Naw, just messing with you,” Leonard said. “You Tom Hoodalay?”

“What if I am?”

“Might be a prize involved,” Leonard said. This had already gone south. Leonard obviously didn’t like the guy on sight. I wasn’t fond of him either, and all he had said so far was “Who the hell are you?”

“We work for a private detective agency out of LaBorde,” I said. “We are looking into the death of a child, James Clifton.”

“That worthless little nigger? Shit, he better off dead.”

“Why would that be?” Leonard said.

“Ain’t got nobody, ain’t got no future,” Tom Hoodalay said.

“He wrecked a bookmobile that had been missing for fifteen years, one your former wife used to drive,” I said.

“Heard about that,” he said.

“Any idea where the bookmobile was all these years?” I asked.

“How the fuck would I know? I been asked that already. Years ago.”

“Your wife used to drive it,” I said. “I thought you might have some clue.”

“I ain’t got nothing to do with where she went, or where that damn bookmobile went. I ain’t got no concern about neither.”

“You’re saying the kid was better off dead, huh?” Leonard said.

“What I said, ain’t it?”

“Cause you wouldn’t want James to end up . . . like you?”

"What the fuck you talking about, nigger?"

With that, Tom Hoodalay stood up. He was even bigger than I thought.

"Way we got it figured," Leonard said, "is you used to slap your wife around, because you could. What happened, Tommy? Wife catch you with your dick up a kid's ass?"

Tom actually yelled. More of a bellow really. He turned, and slammed his fist down on the long bench. It shattered, some of the fragments hitting me in the chest.

"Damn," I said.

"You showed that bench," Leonard said.

My man Leonard is never one to use common sense in an excitable moment. He's more akin to the guy that throws gasoline on a fire, then goes to get more.

Tom Hoodalay was coming off the porch. He limped a little, an old injury was my guess. He brought a leg of the bench with him, and he was swinging it about, and he wasn't all the way down the steps yet.

Leonard picked up the chunk of concrete under his foot, cocked it back, said, "Bet you flinch," and threw it.

The sunlight caught the white concrete and made it shine, and then it hit Hoodalay right between the eyes. He staggered, came tripping along and collapsed to his knees. David had just knocked the shit out of Goliath.

Hoodalay loosened his grip on the bench leg. Leonard sprang forward, grabbed the leg, said, "Give me that."

And then Leonard swung the leg, caught Tom Hoodalay right upside the head, causing him to go face down into the driveway.

“There’s your prize,” Leonard said.

“So much for asking questions,” I said.

Leonard tossed the bench leg away and looked down at Tom’s unconscious body. “He wasn’t gonna tell us anything anyway.”

“You hit him pretty hard,” I said. “Maybe too hard.”

“I just stunned the hippopotamus,” Leonard said. “Wakes up, he’ll wish he hadn’t torn up a perfectly good bench.”

“Or got hit between the eyes with a piece of concrete and then battered with a board.”

“That too,” Leonard said.

ten

As I was driving us away, Leonard said, “I don’t like that bastard, but I don’t think he killed the kids. Call it instinct, and also the fact that though he’s big, he gets around like a pig on stilts. Maybe he killed his wife, but a guy like him strangles his wife, then tells the cops it was self-defense. She came at him with a paring knife, or some such. I don’t think he’s smart enough to plan what to do with the body, and certainly not smart enough to stay quiet about it all these years. He’s the kind of dumbass brags about a thing like that.”

“Maybe,” I said.

I drove us around a bit, nothing really in mind. We tossed out an idea or two, but we arrived at nothing. Anybody we had spoken to could have done it, and none of them could have done it.

I finally convinced Leonard to let me drive back to Tom’s place, just to make sure he wasn’t collecting vultures.

“He might shoot at us this time,” Leonard said.

I drove back there anyway, and as we came up the drive, I could see that he was no longer lying where we left him. Fragments of the bench had been gathered up and stacked by the porch steps.

“All right,” I said. “He lives.”

We backed out, and I drove us back to LaBorde. There wasn’t anything else left for us to do. I dropped Leonard off at his place, and then I called Brett. She was at the office, finishing up some paperwork on a divorce case she had been working. I hated that kind of stuff, but frankly it was the sort of business that kept us in biscuits.

When I arrived at our office and parked in the lot, the bicycle shop lady downstairs was wearing her shorts, as usual. I noticed, as usual, because I'm biologically driven to do so, then I went upstairs and saw the only woman that really matters to me in that kind of way.

Brett said, "So, find out anything?"

"Found out we don't know anything."

Brett was sitting behind the desk with her hair pulled back into a ponytail. She was working on some papers with a pen. She was dressed in jeans and an oversized tee-shirt, had on slip-on white tennis shoes.

"I got a little bit of paperwork left, then we can get something to eat. Nothing fancy, obviously. I want to stay sloppy."

"LaBorde doesn't have much that's fancy," I said.

"True," she said, and got busy on her paperwork.

I picked up the newspaper on the edge of the desk, started reading. The bookmobile and the murder of James Clifton weren't even on the second page. Third page, at the bottom. The article was thin. James had been driving, he ran off the road, hit a truck (occupants unnamed, but unhurt), and there was an investigation into his death and into the mystery of where the bookmobile had been all these years. Some bodies had been found.

By the time I had finished reading the rest of the paper, which didn't take long, Brett was up and we were out. We traveled in my car. After dinner, I would drop her back at the office to pick up hers.

We went to a small joint that served Ecuadorian food. It was off Universal Street, and it was good. After I dropped Brett back at her car, we met up at the house. It seemed a little empty when we first came in. My daughter Chance had been living with us, along with a rescue mutt we named Buffy. Actually, Leonard had rescued her, but I had ended up with the dog. Now Buffy was with Chance. Until last year, I didn’t know I had a daughter. I missed her. I missed Buffy.

We watched a couple TV shows, then we went to bed. I fell asleep quickly. I didn’t sleep long. When I awoke it was still solid dark. I had dreamed I was reaching for a butterfly that kept flittering out of the way. I had an uncomfortable feeling that butterfly was representative of me having knowledge I didn’t understand. A common problem. Then again, I might have merely been dreaming about butterflies. Thing was, now, I was wide awake.

To keep from tossing and turning, I slipped out of bed, went downstairs and made an early breakfast. After I finished my oatmeal, I sat and sipped coffee, glancing out the kitchen window at the darkness. I tried to collect my thoughts, tried to catch my butterfly. I thought about all of the people we had talked to, thought back on that poor kid’s face as the bookmobile barreled down on us. I thought back to finding those oily bodies in the container in the bookmobile. And then I thought, wait a minute.

I called Leonard on my cell. He was none too happy to hear from me.

“It’s dark outside,” he said.

“All the better for clandestine activity,” I said. “Get dressed. I’m coming to pick you up.”

“You don’t dare come this way for an hour,” he said. “I’m going to eat and shower, but right before that, me and the extra-nice Officer Carroll are going to play rodeo.”

Officer Carroll, as we both called him, was Leonard’s new love interest. Nice guy and a nice cop, one of Marvin's people.

"Don't get any rope burns," I said. "But an hour is too late. It still needs to be dark when we get where we're going."

"Twenty minutes, then," Leonard said.

"Bring protection."

"We use protection."

"No. Bring it, and I don't mean the kind you're talking about. You show up with a Trojan and I'll beat you to death."

"I use one of those big garbage bags, you know, something that'll hold the meat."

"Yeah, right."

I had another cup of coffee, took a quick shower, wrote Brett a note, dressed and drove over to Leonard's apartment. Officer Carroll was coming out as I arrived. He's constructed like a large artillery shell.

"I hope you boys aren't going to get in trouble," he said.

"Us? Heaven forbid."

"Don't tell me anything. I know it's best I don't know."

After I got Leonard hustling along, a granola bar in one fist, a cup of coffee in the other, I told him what had come to me, and then I drove us back to Nesbit.

eleven

It was still dark, and in East Texas, wandering about near people's homes and places of business during the night is the sort of thing that could get you shot. Growing up I had been able to walk to people's houses if the need came about and ask to borrow their phone, or some such, without expecting to be shot into Swiss cheese by some fearful and angry homeowner. The days of close neighbors had almost passed, and in its place was a cloud of anger and suspicion and a lot of hardware of the killing kind.

Still, we parked to the side of the general store and chanced it, walked between the store and the tire shop, wandered out to the big building at the back of Donnie James's place. There was a night-light in front and back of the building, and we stood out like bugs in a porch light. I took out my handy little lockpick kit, and easily defeated the padlock. Once we pulled the door aside, there was yet another door, and its locks were a little more difficult.

"Hold it," Leonard said. "Alarm system."

Leonard had discovered a little black panel on the inside of the second door fastened to the wall. He took out his pocketknife and popped the cover, used the blade to cut a wire.

"Might as well have been on the honor system," he said.

We got that door slid aside as well, then closed it behind us. I took out my penlight and flashed it around. There was a big tractor in the center of the building, some farm equipment attachments, and not much else.

We walked around for a while, but no clues jumped at us.

"Okay," Leonard said. "What are we looking for?"

"I don't know exactly, but I have a strong feeling it's here."

Leonard pulled out his own penlight, and we split up and went around the building looking for whatever might look like a clue.

Reason we were there was I had thought about Donnie James. He had mentioned the boys' and the woman's body in the bookmobile, but then reading the paper, where he said he got his news, I realized that the bodies in the bookmobile had not been mentioned. Marvin had most likely not revealed those things on purpose, to have one up on the killer, so how had Donnie James known about it?

It was possible someone leaked the information, but if they had, I doubted it went all the way to Nesbit and to the owner of a tire shop. Again, possible, but not likely. Marvin ran a tight ship.

We met up by the tractor, turned off our penlights and stood there a moment.

"Nothing," Leonard said.

"Same."

After a brief moment, Leonard turned back on his penlight, said, "Place looks bigger on the outside."

"Yeah."

"Because it is," he said.

I turned on my light again, flashed it around. On the right there were windows in the wall, and on the left there were not. That could have merely been a builder's choice, but something didn't seem right.

I started over to that wall, and Leonard went along with me. When we got there he tapped on it with his fist.

"Okay," he said. "Pretty sure it's hollow."

"No doors. No windows, but a hollow wall means another room."

"Uh-huh. And this aluminum looks fresh, like it's been added lately. Maybe after the kid stole the bus and ran off with it."

That got me excited.

We walked along the length of the wall, and near the front of the building I thought it looked a little odd. I pressed against it. The wall moved a little. There was a separate piece of aluminum that had been used to fill out the wall; it looked all of one piece if you weren't paying attention. I worked with it some more and it slid aside on rollers. It left a gap big enough to walk through, but there was a chain and lock through it and the main wall. We could have slipped under the chain, but I decided to make it easier.

I took out my lockpick kit and snapped the padlock open. Once that was done, we were able to push it wider. We slipped in behind it.

Using my penlight, I found a switch and flipped it. Lights came on along the stretch of hidden chamber. It was a full twelve feet wide, and maybe forty feet long. On the concrete floor was a dark oil stain, and at the far end of the room was a metal chair bolted to the floor. There were leather straps on the arm rest and at the base of the chair. There was a freezer behind the chair, and off to the side a metal box with air holes in it.

It was pretty obvious then. Recently the wall had been put up to hide what had formerly been in the open. Unlikely anyone was ever let in, but after James escaped, paranoia set in, and the wall was built to hide where the bookmobile had been parked, where the kidnapped boys were kept, and obviously tortured. I felt sick to my stomach.

Leonard walked over to the freezer and looked inside.

"Empty," he said. That caused me to let out a sigh of relief.

I went over to the box and lifted the lid. It too was empty. At least there weren't any others.

The bookmobile had been setting here for years, part of Donnie's murderous ritual, that and the oiled bodies that he had eventually put in the tank in the bookmobile, along with Harriet Hoodalay.

"Fits," Leonard said. "Donnie has a bad thing for boys, somehow Harry must have delivered the bookmobile here one night, night she was supposed to drop it off at Will's place, got her wires crossed about where, and in the process of leaving it at the tire shop she must have seen something that got her killed. Donnie hid her body and the bookmobile in here. Must have dug up those early bodies, oiled them all down and put them in the bookmobile with Harry's corpse."

"Sounds right," I said.

"Kept the bookmobile running and in good shape, checked on the bodies from time to time, see how they were marinating."

"Jesus," I said. I could visualize Donnie sitting in the bookmobile, starting it up, listening to the motor hum, feeling the thrill of being in control of the machine that brought children to it; that struck me as something the sick bastard might enjoy thinking about.

Leonard was still piecing it out. "He grabbed James, had him here awhile, but somehow James got loose while they were out, opened the door, stole the bookmobile and got away. Or tried to. Goddamn. Donnie is one sick fuck."

"Not sick, just different," a voice said.

We turned, and there was Donnie standing near the open section of the wall. He had slipped in quietly. He was holding a flat, black automatic.

"I thought I was pretty clever," he said, "way I built this room after the kid escaped. Lucked out he killed himself. If only you two had been killed, that would have ended my problems."

"You almost had me convinced it was Tom," I said.

"What was it, the newspaper?"

"Yep," I said.

"I thought about it later, hoped you wouldn't think about it too hard. You know, I don't mean to do the things I do, but I can't help myself."

"Yeah you can," Leonard said. "You don't want to."

"You could be right," Donnie said.

"There's another alarm, ain't there?" Leonard said.

"Yeah. You killed the obvious one, but there's another. You tamper with one, it sets off the spare. Goes off at the house. Somehow, I figured it was you two. That newspaper slip I made."

Will glided in through the gap in the wall and came up behind Donnie. For a brief moment I thought we had lucked out, but he walked up and stood by his partner.

"Took you long enough," Donnie said to him.

"Came fast as I could," he said.

And then I got the rest of it. Will had worked for Donnie for years, been groomed, and then he became part of the operation. Donnie had created Will in his image. It was the two of them doing the torturing, the killing. I was waiting for the inevitable.

That's when a gun went off. I expected I had been shot, but that's not what happened. I watched as Donnie sagged, slightly. There was another shot, and he went down on one knee and dropped his gun. Blood seeped out of his right shoulder and out of his right leg, splashed onto the floor, looked orange in the harsh light.

Will had darted out of the gap at the sound of the first shot.

I turned. Leonard was holding a little revolver in his hand, an old-fashioned snub nose twenty-two. I looked back at Donnie. He was trying to pick up his gun.

"Nope, nope, nope," Leonard said, "or the next one gives you a hole in the head. Did you see that, Hap? I didn't miss either shot. Course I was aiming for his head with the first one."

I had forgotten I told Leonard to bring protection, and hadn't noticed the gun tucked beneath his shirt. I was glad that for once, he had listened to me.

"Go get Will," Leonard said. "I got this one."

I raced past Donnie, kicking his gun to the side as I went, then I darted out the gap in the wall, through the front door and into the crisp night air. I could see Will running toward the tire shop. He was almost there. I jogged after him.

When I got to the shop, Will had already opened the door and slipped inside. I eased into the dark building and fetched up behind some tires on racks. There was a shot and a chunk of rubber flew out of one of the tires and hit me in the face, hard. That shot had missed me by inches.

I kept moving behind the rows of tires. The son-of-a-bitch had run in here to get a gun, and I had followed him inside, the way he had wanted. I was a duck in a shooting gallery.

There were three more pops, but all they did was ruin a couple more tires. At least he was a bad shot. I bent down behind the tires and tried to peek between a gap in them. It took a moment for my eyes to adjust, and I could make out his shape on the landing above, framed by the moonlight slipping past a little window up there. He was squatting, the gun pointing in my general direction, waiting for me to stick my head out.

I pushed a tire loose from the top rack. It bounced when it hit the floor, and when it did Will popped off a nervous shot. I was already moving, back along the row of tires, and then under the landing above. I rushed my way along until I was pretty near under him. I glanced at the sagging timber that helped hold the top floor up. I charged it, hit it with my shoulder, heard it crack—the board, not my shoulder, though I was certainly feeling pain. I hit it again, and I could feel it move this time, and then a third time and it came down in an explosion of lumber, tires, dust and unidentified crap. I tried to get out from under it, but I was too slow. I don't know anyone could have been fast enough.

Junk was lying on me. It was heavy. I was trapped. Looking out from under the debris, I saw Will rise up from the floor uninjured. I had only succeeded in making him fall, and pinning myself under the wreckage. He looked about, spotted what he could see of me under the junk and lifted his gun. There was a shot, and Will did a bit of sideways dance, then toppled to the floor.

I heard Leonard say, "Got 'em Boscoe," and then I passed out for a while.

twelve

Leonard dragged me outside and propped my back against the tire shop. That's where I was when he slapped me awake.

"Damn, quit that," I said.

"How do you feel?" he said.

"Like a bunch of lumber fell on me and then my brother started slapping my face."

"I enjoyed that a little," Leonard said.

"Did you kill Will?"

"Boy did I."

"Donnie?"

"Yeah. I went ahead and shot him too. He kind of died in a gunfight, but I was the only one shooting. Wasn't like I could tie him up. I knew you needed help. I could hear the gunshots."

"Jesus, Leonard."

"Wasn't like he needed a room with a bunk for the rest of his life, sitting in some cell breathing stale air and making turds. He needed a bullet. You dumbass, you should have took his gun with you."

"I didn't want to kill anyone."

"That's all right," Leonard said. "I did it for the both of us. I'm going to go back down there and fire off his gun a few times to make sure it looked like he put up a fight."

"That's cold, Leonard. He was unarmed when you killed him."

“Yeah. He was.”

thirteen

A crowd of people showed up, due to all the shooting. A light was shone in my face. Before their arrival, Leonard had fired off Donnie's gun so he could claim there was a shootout and that he had prevailed. The noise, along with all the other racket we had made, stirred the locals. By the time they arrived, Leonard was leaning against the wall next to me, his gun lying on the ground six feet away. Donnie's gun was back in the formerly secret room, probably firmly placed in his hand by Leonard.

The county was called out. We ended up in the back of a deputy sheriff's car, watching the car hood shimmer in the red and blue from the light bar. In time they brought us in for questioning and locked us up in county for a few days. Leonard at least had a concealed carry license, so illegally carrying a firearm wasn't added to the list.

Brett came to visit. They let her give us food she brought from outside. I don't think they're supposed to do that, but once the county realized what Donnie and Will had been doing, they treated us well. They had discovered photographs of the kids that dated all the way back to the first murder, and the photos had been ugly. The poor kids' dead and rotting bodies had been stacked in seats in the bookmobile and a timer on a camera had snapped away with Will and Donnie posing beside their wrecked remains like hunting trophies, which, in a way, I guess they were. There were all manner of things found on internet files. There were torture devices in Donnie's house. It was a pretty slam-door case. I don't know if they believed Leonard's story about the shootout. But if they didn't, no one said a word. There was also the fact that Donnie and Will had kept records of who the boys were and how long they had kept them, as well as all they had done to them. Their records solved all the murders. The victims, with the exception of Harriet (a relative's DNA proved it was her), were unwanted kids, lost and forgotten, tossed out like used condoms.

I guess Tom Hoodalay still remains an asshole, and Nesbit needs a new owner for the tire and mechanic shop, not to mention some renovation.

We were back home pretty quick, though there was a bit of talk about us getting into trouble for breaking and entering, maybe a fine, a little jail time. That idea got shuffled and forgotten, thank goodness. No one really wanted to punish us for what happened to those two, not even for the lesser charges.

I brooded for a few days over Leonard shooting Donnie in cold blood, stayed home and didn't go visit with him, didn't even take his calls. Then Brett said, "Get over it. Leonard saved your life. And it isn't the first time."

"I know," I said, "but I got to get right in the head. Killing doesn't bother him. Me, I feel different."

"You've killed, Hap, and if you had to, you'd do it again. Quit feeling sorry for yourself. I'm glad Leonard made sure you came home. Stop being a jackass."

She was right. I called Leonard later that day. He answered, said, "You been pouting, haven't you?"

"I have."

"Yeah, well, I knew you'd get over it."

“When it involves you, I always do.”

“One question,” I said. “After all that, after all the things we’ve done, the deaths, how do you sleep?”

“Deeply.”

“I don’t.”

“I know.”

“But, thanks, Leonard.”

“You’re welcome. Still sore from all that crap falling on you?”

“A little. Nothing serious. Thanks for pulling that off of me too.”

“Welcome again. But you owe me. We working out today?”

“I need another day to feel bad about who I am.”

“How about you take this day to know that there won’t be anymore kids abused and murdered by those two, and you don’t have a hole in your head and about six feet of dirt over you? Want to do that?”

“That’s exactly what I’ll do,” I said.

“Alright, then. And Hap?”

“Yeah.”

“Go fuck yourself. Talk tomorrow.”

“Good night,” I said.

Sad Onions

Me and Leonard were cruising back from a fishing trip.

We'd been at a cabin Leonard's boyfriend, Pookie, owned on the lake. Pookie couldn't make it, but we had the key, and we spent a partial day and a lot of the night sitting in lawn chairs on the cabin's deck where it overhung the water, sitting with big glasses of iced tea, now and again casting our fishing lines, hiding during the day under the shadows of our wide-brimmed straw hats, pushing them back on our foreheads at night to feel the cool breeze blowing off the lake, rippling the dark water.

We caught four fish and threw them all back. Those fish would have stories to tell. Hope word didn't get back to Aquaman. Things might turn nasty.

Of course, the trip wasn't about fishing, it was about me and Leonard hanging, without distractions, talking. We had been through the mill as of late, and some time off was doing us good, and it probably wasn't hurting my wife's feelings either. She and my daughter were spending a day doing pretty much the same thing Leonard and I were doing, minus the fish.

Now it was over and it was deep night, and I was driving us home. The moon was a silver slice. Shadows hung from the trees on either side of the narrow road like crepe paper at a funeral. We were fifty or sixty miles from home. I was driving Leonard's pickup and he was dozing on the passenger side. There were a lot of curves in the road and the headlights danced around the curves. I wasn't driving real fast, but I wasn't messing around either. I was ready to be home and in my own bed with Brett.

The road straightened out finally, rose up a hill where the trees were thick on my left and thin on my right. As the truck's headlights topped the hill a woman showed up in my lane, waving her hands.

I swerved and crossed into the left lane, wheeled around her, found the right lane again, skidded to a tooth-rattling stop that nearly sent me off the edge of the road, where I would have bumped over a short drop of weeds and rocks, and possibly would have fetched up against a barbed-wire fence. If the fence snapped, they might have found us and the pickup wearing a couple of cows.

Leonard came awake with a shout, looked at me. I didn't say anything. I got out of the truck and rushed back to where the woman stood in the road wringing her hands, crying and yelling, "He's down there."

She was pale of skin, had her blonde hair up in a pile. Strands of it had slipped loose and had fallen across her face like leaking vanilla. By moonlight, and I assumed by any light, she had a very nice face. She was carrying a white purse. It was draped over her shoulder by a long strap. She was wearing an expensive looking white dress and had on a silver necklace and matching double bracelets on both wrists; they clattered together like the wagging tail of a rattlesnake. She wasn't wearing any shoes.

By that time Leonard was with us. His black skin looked like sweat-wet chocolate in the bright moonlight. It was that kind of weather, even late at night.

I said, "I'm going down for a look."

"I'll get her out of the road," Leonard said. "Come on, lady."

Leonard gently touched her arm, guided her toward his pickup. I watched them go away, him walking slow, her balancing on her naked toes like a ballerina, trying to put as little of her foot on the blacktop as she could manage.

I went down the hill. I could see a white Lincoln at the bottom of it. A ridge of trees stood in front of it, and between the trees I could see the barbed-wire fence that ran behind them. The car was mashed up primarily against a sweetgum tree, though part of an oak had got into the act. White smoke was hissing out from under the hood. The windshield was shattered, but still in place, the front of the Lincoln was as crumpled as an accordion.

I looked through the driver's window. There was an elderly black man behind the wheel, the side of his head resting against it, a semi-deflated air bag pushed up against him; it made him look like a man hugging an oversized pillow. His face was turned toward me and the front of his bald head was warped so bad it looked like some kind of special effect. His face was coated in blood, his mouth was open and there were teeth missing. One of them had nestled on his blood-covered chin.

I tried to get the door open, but it was locked or jammed up. I went to the other side, and that door came open. I crawled across the seat and touched my fingers to the man's neck. He was as dead as my youth. When I got out of the car, I noticed the lady's high heels were there by her door, where she had left them to better climb the hill.

I climbed up the hill and got my cell out of my pocket, tried to call 911, but there wasn't any service.

I went to the truck and spoke through the open driver's side window.

"Listen," I said to Leonard. "You take her into town, or get to some place where there's service and call. I'll wait here."

“How is Frank?” she said.

“We’ll let a doctor decide,” I said.

She burst out crying. She sounded like a banshee. Leonard said something soothing, then wheeled them out of there, leaving me beside the road, standing in the moonlight, smelling the heat from the Lincoln’s engine as steam rose up the hill in thinning, white plumes.

I went back down the hill, hoping I was wrong about him being dead. Nope. He was so dead there needed to be two of him.

As I walked around the car, I noticed there was a mark on the back end of it, and as I continued around it, I saw the front left tire was blown. On the passenger seat, there was blood. I hadn’t noticed any on the woman, so I presumed it was the man’s, thrown there by impact and gravity. I noticed too that some of that blood had got on my pants when I crawled across the seat.

By the time I climbed up to the road again, something was itching at the back of my brain.

Leonard came back not long after, but the ambulance and the emergency crew got there first, followed by the law. It was that county’s sheriff’s department, and we didn’t know any of them. We are usually detained or arrested by someone we knew.

The entire hill was lit up by emergency lights. It looked like a night club up there. I answered some questions, gave the deputy, a stout black woman named Celeste Jones, all the information I had. She didn't look down the hill at the car. I guessed she wasn't the one for that. She made it easy for us and let us go.

Going home, Leonard driving, I said, "How was she?"

"Said she was Terri Parker, and she seemed to be rolling with the punches pretty good. She's twenty-seven, and the dead man is her husband, Frank Parker."

"You have that curious tone," I said. "Like the one you get when you realize you have on mismatched socks."

"I'm thinking I got another pair just like them at home. Hell, I don't know, Hap. I got a funny feeling is all."

"You and me both, brother."

When Leonard dropped me off at home, the porch light was on. I used my key, slipped in quietly. My daughter Chance had stayed over. She was sleeping on the couch. It actually folded out, but the thing was far more comfortable if you didn't bother with the foldout bed, which could feel a bit like a torture instrument from the Inquisition.

Her long, dark hair was hanging off the couch, touching the floor. I couldn't see her face. I had only known about her for a short while, never realized I had a daughter until she was an adult. It was pretty wonderful.

I went quietly into the kitchen, got the milk, poured myself a glass, found some animal cookies in one of the shelves, sat down at the kitchen table to snack on them in the dark.

After a while, I crept upstairs to the bedroom, slipped into the bathroom to brush my teeth, pulled on my pajama pants and climbed into bed.

Brett rolled over and put her arm across my chest. I could smell the sweetness of her hair, strawberry shampoo.

"Catch any fish?" she said.

I thought she was asleep and was surprised when she spoke.

"We caught them, looked them over and sent them home. There was something else, though."

She rolled over again and stacked her pillows behind her head, sat up against them. She didn't turn on the light.

"Like what?" she said.

I told her about the woman, the car and the dead man, ended with, "Something didn't seem right."

"You said the passenger seat was bloody?"

"That's right."

"Did she have blood on her dress?"

I thought about that for a long moment, remembered the shimmering whiteness of it. "I don't think so."

"She had her purse, but left the high heels at the bottom of the hill?"

"Yeah."

"Shock can make you do all kinds of funny things, but why didn't she carry the shoes with her is my first thought? Seems staged."

"That's pretty good for not being there," I said.

"I'm amazing. Now I'm sleepy again. Good night."

Brett readjusted her pillows, put her arm across my chest again, and went back to sleep.

I lay there thinking, which can be pretty painful on most occasions, but at that time of night when I should have been sleeping, it was akin to an injury.

I eventually slept.

I didn't go into the office until ten. By that time Brett had already gone to work, and Chance had gone home. Chance left a note.

daddy. you ate my animal crackers.
love you. buy more.

When I got to the agency, Brett and Leonard were there. Leonard was having his morning vanilla cookies, dipping them gently in coffee. Brett had her long, red hair clamped back and she was sipping from a mug of coffee about the size of a fish pond.

When I closed the door, Leonard said, "Brett asked me about the blood, and I got to say, like you, I didn't see a drop on her."

"I think she didn't want to sacrifice the dress," Brett said.

"Yeah," I said, "something about this whole thing stinks."

"Did you shower this morning?" Leonard said.

"You know what you can do," I said, and then I told him. It was anatomically impossible, but I told him anyway.

We spent the day tapping pencils against things, looking out the window, wondering what we would have for lunch. No one came in with a job. No one came in to ask our opinion on anything. There was nothing outside the window but a parking lot, and across the street some houses, and in the oak by the lot a squirrel jumped about now and then, but it was more like it was squirrel duty, no real enthusiasm there.

Brett made another pot of coffee and we sat looking at one another some more, saying nothing. Arguing politics wasn't going to cut it. We'd been there before. Leonard was the only black, gay Republican I knew who was a Vietnam war hero and only listened to country music. There are others I didn't know, of course.

Talking religion wouldn't work either. We were all atheist. So, we talked about the night before, kicked that around a bit, and since it was really none of our business, we got right on looking into it.

Leonard drove me and him out to the wreck site, while Brett stayed at the office and looked into the dead man, Frank Parker. Out at the hill, we parked off the road and made our way down to where the car had been.

It had been hauled off, but we could see clearly in the daylight where the tires had made deep marks in the earth as it jetted off the road. My phone may not have had service there, but it took good photographs, and I took a lot of them.

"One thing I realize now is the tree impacted on her side," I said. "But it was Frank who was all messed up. She came out pretty unscathed. And as has been noted, she wasn't covered in blood, even though the seat where she would have been sitting was. It was a hard-enough crash to make the bag pop, but was it enough to kill him? He had quite a lick to the front of his head, where the bag would have protected him."

"It do be curious," Leonard said.

"Let me add something else," I said. "The back bumper, I could see it well enough last night to see it was banged up."

"Like someone had used a car or truck to push it?"

"Could have been a bang from a previous accident, but. . . . And another thing, there are tire marks as the car goes off the road, but no skid marks."

"Yeah," he said. "Add it to the other stuff, it starts to paint a different picture. And you know what else I think?"

"She had help."

"Bingo."

Back at the office Brett said, "Frank Parker founded Sad Onions."

Chance worked with us part-time, and she was there too, her pretty face alight with youth, framed by that lovely hair, dark as the far side of the moon.

She said, "Sad who?"

"It's a chip company," Brett said. "They dry out onions into chips, and the chips are in a kind of . . . I don't know. Droopy shape. Anyway, Frank called them sad onions, because they're droopy. It's stupid, but hey, it caught. Company also makes chips made out of other vegetables. Get this, after the onions, their biggest seller is made from a dried turnip."

"Who eats that crap?" Leonard said.

"I've had them," Brett said, "better than you think. Some of them are salted, some are peppered, and some are straight dehydrated vegetables with no frills. Frank Parker started out an onion grower, over around Noon Day. Soil there is supposed to be great for onions. Makes them sweet. Anyway, he figured out how to dehydrate them and turn them into chips before every other company was doing it, and he got rich. And he got married."

"Terri," Leonard said.

"Yep. He was seventy, and she's twenty-five," Brett said.

"And a hottie," I said.

"Watch it, Buster," Brett said.

Chance snickered. She liked it when I was in trouble.

On the way to the sheriff's department that had investigated the crime, Leonard said, "I don't think that woman was ever in the car, that's what I think. She was down there waiting for someone to come by. Standing down there today, a car went by, and I heard it a long time before it got there, because that's how sound is at the bottom of that hill. She left the shoes there to support the idea she had been in the car, and to climb the hill faster."

"I think you're right."

"That's a first," he said. "Next thing you'll learn to love guns and quit supporting liberal politics."

"I don't think so," I said.

At the sheriff's department, they let us cool our heels in an interrogation room, something we were professionals at. It was a full thirty minutes before Deputy Celeste Jones came in.

"You wanted to see me?" she said, and took a chair at the table across from us.

“We don’t think that wreck was just a wreck, and we don’t think the lady fair is true and blue,” I said.

Celeste turned her head and cracked her neck. I almost expected it to fall off.

“Yeah,” she said. “Why are you thinking that?”

We gave her our thoughts on the matter, showed her the photos on my phone. She got out a pad and wrote down some notes, then it was over and all three of us were walking toward the front door.

Celeste said, “Something stinks, gentlemen, but the sheriff thinks it is exactly what it looks like. He’s not the sort to disbelieve a pretty, blonde white woman.”

“But you are?” Leonard said.

“Sometimes,” she said. “But I’ll tell the sheriff what you said, how you feel. Up to him to figure out what to do about it.”

It was about 9 a.m. the next morning when we heard someone coming up the outside stairway to the office. I went to the window that overlooked the lot and took a gander. There was a sheriff’s car from the next county in the lot with a crunched front end. The law showing up is seldom good, even if they’re out of their jurisdiction.

There was a gentle knock. I opened the door. There was a young, lean, black man standing there holding his white cowboy hat. He wore a sheriff’s outfit and a deputy sheriff’s badge. He had hound dog eyes and a soulful look, a smile with enough fine teeth an alligator would have envied him.

I invited him in. He shook hands with all of us, sat in front of the office desk and looked across at Brett, which was a view I envied. I sat in a chair at the corner of the desk, next to Leonard, who had his butt parked on the edge of the desk.

"My name is Journey Clover, and really, that's my name."

I figured that was remarked on a lot, and he wanted to clear up questions right away.

"Okay, Deputy Clover," Brett said.

"I came over to tell you that the whole thing with the wreck, the thing you fellows came across, has been wrapped up."

"You came all the way over here to tell us that?" Leonard said.

"Seemed the polite thing to do, considering you came by yesterday to voice some suspicions. I'm here to tell you we have done a thorough investigation, and it was nothing more than an unfortunate accident."

"That's a quick investigation," Brett said.

"We have good people," he said.

"They must be damn good," Leonard said. "Two days later and it's done?"

"Simple case," he said. "Listen, I don't want to be impolite, and we appreciate your concern, your ideas about this, but people, it's done. It was nothing more than an accident."

"And you'd rather we not poke our nose into it?" Leonard said.

"I suppose that's right. I knew Mr. Parker well, by the way, liked him. I used to be an insurance salesman before I went to work at Sad Onions. Sold him some insurance. He seemed like a really nice guy, did lots of charity work."

"What insurance company did you work for?" Brett asked.

"Regency Mutual," he said. "I wasn't much of a salesman. Sold Parker a policy, liked him, and went to work for him in the office. I have an accounting degree. But it didn't suit me, so I ended up in the sheriff's department."

"That means you knew his wife as well?" Leonard said.

"Not much, a little. On sight, that sort of thing. She came into the office, of course, went to lunch with Parker. But, hey, that's all I got. Celeste wanted to keep you in the loop. She said she had suspicions too, but the investigation closed them out. She feels it's all been answered. Well, got a bit of a drive, so nice to meet you. Just wanted you to know."

After Deputy Clover left, Brett said, "Tell me I'm not the only one that found that odd."

"You're not the only one," Leonard said.

I nodded. "Yeah. Drives all the way over here to tell some civilians how things turned out. Usually you can't get a thing out of the law, even if you're the victim."

"It do be peculiar," Leonard said.

"Yes, it do," Brett said. "Follow the money. Meaning I'm going to talk to some insurance folks I know, then see what I can find out about Mrs. Parker. You and Leonard check up on Clover."

Me and Leonard drove over to Clemency, which was the town where Clover's office was located. Leonard was at the wheel and I was sitting in the passenger seat watching the scenery rush by.

“Front end of Clover’s car was smashed in,” I said. “Wonder what the story is on that?”

“You’re thinking like me. What if Clover gave Parker a little push from behind, sent him down that hill into those trees.”

“I was thinking what if Parker was dead before he went over the edge in the car. His head was really bashed in, and it seems to me the airbag would have prevented a wound that bad. I think they killed him and stuffed him in his car and he bled like a stuck hog. Also thinking since Clover knew him and his wife, maybe Clover wanted to be in the clover, decided to help the wife bump the hubby for some insurance money, and she came with it?”

“But why would he leave Sad Onions, become a deputy, if he wanted to be near her?” Leonard said.

“Husband could have got suspicious, so Clover needed to put some space between them.”

“Maybe,” Leonard said.

We stopped in at a greasy spoon that looked like a railroad boxcar. We had caught it at a time when no one was there but us. We bellied up to the counter, ordered coffee and a burger.

The lady who brought us our food was a middle-aged white lady with a tired face, but a sweet attitude. She wore an old-fashioned waitress cap that was precariously perched on her hairdo, which was intended to be blonde, but looked like an enormous wad of pink cotton candy.

If anyone knows the citizens of a town, it’s a café worker, a barber or a bartender. I gave her my most heart-warming smile.

“We’re wondering about an old friend of ours, Deputy Clover. You know him?”

“I do,” she said, “and if you’re such good friends, why are you wondering to me?”

“Touché,” I said.

“Thing is,” Leonard said, “we’re insurance investigators.”

“Yeah?” she said. “So not old friends.”

“There was an accident outside of town, on that high hill. A man was killed,” I said. “We’re looking into some possibilities.”

“Possibilities?”

We didn’t respond to that.

“Cutting to the chase,” Leonard said, “you ever see Mrs. Parker come in with Clover?”

“Nope, not once, but she didn’t act like much of a wife.”

“No?” I said. I tried to say it like the idea of infidelity was something I had never considered or even heard of.

“Way she hung on that woman when she was in here, in the back booth there . . . I just don’t get it. Two women?”

“What woman?”

“The black deputy at the sheriff’s department.”

Click.

Outside in the car I said, “So, what did we learn?”

“We learned that waitress doesn’t like two women together, so I have to make sure to bring my Pookie here for lunch someday and rub up against him, see how she likes two men."

"You are such a devil," I said.

"We also learned that Deputy Jones talks a good game, but by acting concerned about the event, and then clearing it as an accident, it seems she may be throwing suspicion off herself."

"But what about Clover? He's the one that came over to talk with us, and his car has a banged bumper. Might have come from pushing Parker's car off the road."

"You know, we ought to go to the department, thank Deputy Clover and Deputy Jones in person for keeping us in the loop. See how that plays."

We drove over there, didn't find Deputy Jones, but Clover was still around.

In the breakroom at the sheriff's department, Deputy Clover said, "You came all the way over here to thank me for what you already thanked me for? We talked yesterday."

"We're very polite," Leonard said.

"Sounds to me like you're piling up something I might need hip boots to walk through."

"Your cruiser, man, it took quite a lick to the front," I said.

He studied us for a moment. I kept expecting him to pin us and mount us on a board.

"That's Deputy Jones's car. Borrowed it while mine had some general inspection. Just did a favor for her, letting you guys in on things."

"Where is the good deputy," Leonard said, "so we can thank her in person?"

"Her day off. I'm starting to try and figure how I can make things difficult for you boys."

"Boys?" Leonard said. "You call an alligator a lizard?"

"You should go now," Clover said.

When we were in the car, the phone rang. It was Brett. I put the phone on speaker.

"Insurance payout for Parker's death will be plenty," she said. "Enough to live on for the rest of your life."

"Would it be enough for two?" I asked.

"Maybe for four, five, as long as they didn't trade their Maserati in every year."

I told her what we found out.

"Hang on," she said.

I could hear keyboard keys clicking. In a bit she came back said, "I got Celeste Jones's address for you."

Deputy Jones lived in a simple house outside of town, somewhat secluded. There was a cruiser parked in front of the house. There was no garage or carport.

We went up to the door and Leonard knocked. While we waited, I glanced at her cruiser. It was in good shape. Had it already been fixed?

No one answered the door.

"You know, Hap, I'm not feeling good about this."

I walked over to one of the windows, cupped my hands together, looked inside.

“You’re about to feel less good,” I said.

Leonard came over for a peek, said, “That’s not good.”

“No, sir, it isn’t.”

We could see Deputy Jones sitting on the couch, her head thrown back. She looked very comfortable, not a care in the world, and this was due to the fact that she was as dead as Christmas past.

We hustled around back and used my lock pick to enter through the back door. Deputy Jones hadn’t become undead and gone into the kitchen for a soda. She was still in her position on the couch. She had a small bullet hole right between her eyes.

“Up close and personal,” Leonard said.

“I think Mrs. Parker may have decided she didn’t want to share the money,” I said.

“Bingo,” said a voice sweet as Georgia honey. It was Terri Parker, of course. She was holding a shiny little revolver, and it was pointed at us. “Sit on the couch.”

“By her?” Leonard said.

“Yeah,” she said, “by her. She won’t bite.”

We sat on the couch, away from the blood as best as possible. Terri stood near us, held the gun like someone who knew what they were doing.

I heard a car drive up. From where I sat I could see directly out the window. It was another sheriff’s cruiser. I felt a moment of hope, but when I saw Clover step out of the dented car, I knew we were in a deeper pit than expected.

Terri unlocked the front door and let Clover in. He looked at us and the deputy on the couch.

“Should have left things alone,” he said to us.

“I’m thinking kind of the same thing,” Leonard said.

“I had to shoot Celeste,” Terri said to Clover. “She grew a conscience. Then these two losers came in.”

“That’s all right,” Clover said. “Splits better two ways.”

It clicked then. It had really been Terri and Clover all along, and the whole thing with Deputy Jones had been a cold-blooded attempt to make her sympathetic, help clear up the investigation. But Jones got covered in guilt, so she had to go.

And now, so did we.

When night had settled in good, we were walked out to Clover’s cruiser, forced into the backseat, along with Deputy Jones’s body, which we had to carry. We propped her up between us.

Clover had wrapped Jones’s head in towels and then put a black trash bag over it, tightened it around her neck with a bathrobe belt. Leonard and I were both put in handcuffs. I wished for a moment that I had just taken the chance before that was done, been shot out in the open and had it over with.

As Clover drove, Jones’s body rocked between us.

“You two have made things kind of messy,” Clover said through the wire grating between the seats.

"That's our bad," Leonard said.

"However, there's a nice old abandoned gravel pit full of water where I think Jones and you two will be real comfortable," Clover said.

As Jones wobbled between me and Leonard, I managed the lock pick out of my front pants pocket, and was casually using it to unlock the cuffs. They went easy. When Terri glanced away, I passed Leonard the pick across Jones's body. He sat quietly and looked out the window, but his hands were working.

The car stopped at the end of a narrow road in the depths of the woods. We were near the gravel pit. We were eased out of the car at gunpoint. We could see into the pit, and it was filled with water; it was near big as a lake. The moon was up high and it had grown a little fuller. Its image lay on the dark water like a slice of fresh cantaloupe.

We had the cuffs draped over our wrists and we held our hands close to us. I was shuffled from my side of the car to the other by Terri and her six-shot accessory.

"Drag her out, drop her in the water," Clover said to us, nodding toward Jones's body.

"That's messed up," Leonard said, "us dragging her out and then you shooting us and putting us in the water."

"No," Clover said, "we'll shoot you on the edge of the pit. We won't have to do any carrying."

"Well, you thought that through, didn't you?" Leonard said.

"Get the body," Clover said.

"Sure," Leonard said, moving toward the open back door, "but Hap, first, the elephant of surprise."

That had become a kind of code for us. It meant do something, anything, and do it now.

I wheeled, let the cuffs drop, went low, clipped Terri at the knees, sending her flying over my back. I turned in time to see Leonard fling the cuffs in Clover's face and kick him in the crotch.

Clover staggered, but didn't go down. He fired awkwardly and missed. By that time, me and Leonard were running like gazelles down a wide path and into the woods. The path turned behind a thickness of trees. Several shots were fired at us. They rattled through the leaves like rain, and one of them nipped at my hair.

A moment later, we heard the cruiser fire up, and lights were cutting through the trees. Clover was driving the cruiser back down the path, trying to find us.

The trees were too thick with briars for us to hide in, so we ran down the curving trail until we came to where it ended, the gravel pit, dark water, and the floating moon. It was about twenty feet down to the water and there was a lot of garbage visible. Couches, washing machines, a broken dresser. It had become a dump, and that crap was probably stacked all the way to the bottom. Jumping wasn't going to turn out any better than being shot.

The car came around fast. We were trapped at a dead end. Me and Leonard split up. He went left, and I went right, into the woods on either side where the briars had thinned.

Clover skidded to a stop, got out with his pistol. Terri stayed in the car, slid behind the wheel. The window was down on the passenger side, and I could see her waving her gun through the open window. She couldn't wait to shoot somebody.

"I'm going to make you suffer if you make me hunt you," Clover yelled out, like it was incentive for us to just come on out and be shot.

I looked around, found a piece of pipe that had been tossed in the woods, tried to pick it up, but it was nothing but rust and came apart in my hand. Then I saw an old baseball that had been tossed out. I picked it up. The cover was mostly off, but it was firm enough, and it was all I had.

Clover was moving close to where I was hiding. I couldn't go toward him, because of the gun, and to go through the woods behind me led to the pit. I was between a killer and a wet spot.

I cocked the ball back, stepped between two trees, into the open. Clover saw me. I flung the ball. It was a good throw. There was some real meat behind it.

It sailed beautifully across the moonlit trail, and glided over Clover's shoulder. I felt like an idiot.

Clover looked at me, grinned, raised the pistol.

That's when someone screamed.

Clover wheeled to look, and I dropped back into the woods, out of the line of fire, near the edge of the pit. I saw from my hiding spot the source of the scream was Terri. Leonard had come out of the woods on the driver's side, surprised her, and grabbed her gun arm, which she was hanging conveniently out the window.

Clover stepped to the center of the road, aimed at Leonard and fired. But the shot went wide, punched a neat hole through the windshield. I saw Terri's head fly back, and then, dying, she reflexively stretched out, stomping down hard on the gas.

The car jumped and Clover didn’t. It hit him so hard it knocked him flying ten feet in front of it, over the edge of the quarry. The body of Deputy Jones flew forward and hit the wire grating, dropped out of sight.

I watched as Clover’s body hurtled down and smashed against a washing machine with a cracking sound like a rotten limb. It bounced over some more junk and slid into where the water was deep.

The car came right after him, shot downward like a bullet, right where Clover had gone under. The car hit with a splash and the moonlight shook on the water. The impact drove Deputy Jones’s body back against the rear windshield. Her bagged head hit it hard enough to cause a spider web of cracks, and then she fell toward the front of the car and the car went under.

I walked into the road, stood on the edge of the quarry and looked down. Leonard joined me. The car’s taillights creeped beneath the gurgling water, where they glowed momentarily, then went out. The water rippled for a time, finally went still, and it was done.

The Briar Patch Boogie

“Whose idea was this?” Leonard said.

“I think it was yours.”

“Yeah, probably.”

“You know it was,” I said.

“Hap?”

“What?”

“Can I have a drink of water?”

“If you get up and go get it,” I said. “There’s plenty water in the well. And probably snakes and dirt, and since the outhouse is up the hill, might be some of that in there as well. Who puts an outhouse at the top of a hill so the water might drain in the well? What kind of moron does that?”

“We have bottled water?”

“In the car,” I said. “You drank the last bottle we brought in.”

“You won’t go out and get it?”

“No.”

“Why not?”

“I’m not thirsty.”

We were lying in cots across from one another in a little fishing cabin out at Caddo Lake. It was not a nice cabin, but it was cheap. It was not near other cabins and there were a lot of woods around it. It was deep East Texas, near Louisiana, and it could pass for either state. The lake had a lot of good fish in it and there were alligators and all along the bank there were big drooping trees that made thick shadows.

We had been there two days. We had caught a few fish and had fried them in butter with corn batter and had eaten them. The fishing had been so-so, and the boat we had rented had a leak in it. There were a couple of large tin cans, and we had no idea why they were in the boat until we were way out in the lake and the water began to ease in. We used the cans to bail it out. When we got back to the bank of the lake, we were so pissed at the guy who rented the boat to us, we pushed it back into the water and sat on the side of the lake and fished and watched the boat float out a ways and slowly take on water and sink.

We cheered when it went down.

“So, you won’t go get me a bottled water?

“No.”

“I’d do it for you.”

“No you wouldn’t,” I said.

“Would too.”

“No you wouldn’t.”

“I bet I would.”

“Okay. Go get me one.”

“I asked you first. Look, if you were sick. Say you had a fever, or were dehydrated, and you asked me to go get you a water, I would.”

“I’m not sick.”

“But if you were, I’d get you a water.”

“You’re not sick, so why should I get you a water?”

Leonard thought about that for a moment.

“I really don’t want to go get it,” he said.

"Aha," I said. "Now the truth comes out."

"This seemed like a good idea at the time," he said. "I thought it would be fun. We used to do stuff like this."

"We have been civilized to some extent, Leonard."

"Yeah, I guess so."

"I'm sick of eating fish, and small fish, I might add. We sunk the goddamn boat, and now all we got is bank fishing, and that hasn't been good, and there's not a proper toilet, and there's no running water."

"It's been really hot too."

"It's the summer, Leonard. What did you expect? Seals and polar bears?"

"That would have been nice. I like seals and polar bears."

"You have known neither."

"I've seen them on TV," he said. "You know what would be cool? A goddamn penguin."

"All of them would die of heatstroke."

"Yeah. They would. I'm pretty warm myself. Maybe I have heatstroke."

"I am not going to go out to the car and get you a water. Besides, it would be warm water."

"But it would be water. Hell, it's major hot. Devil's butthole hot."

"We don't need no air conditioning, you said."

"Did I say that?"

"Yep."

"Maybe if there was at least a plug with electricity we could use the fan I brought. That would be okay. One plug. Might be nice too—we didn't have to shit through a hole in the outhouse."

"No electricity and you brought a fan?"

"It's a small one," he said.

"At least it won't work any worse than a big one without electricity."

"See there, Hap. A bright side. Damn. I thought there'd be electricity. The brochure said it was a nice comfortable cabin. I didn't think of it as nice without electricity."

"We used to sleep in tents out in the woods on ground cloths, fish and camp for days," I said. "We didn't have electricity then."

"We were younger then."

"That's true," I said.

"And remember, we had marshmallows on a stick?"

"We did at that."

"I don't guess you brought any marshmallows?"

"Did not," I said.

"That would have been nice."

"Yep," I said. "We could have set this shithole cabin on fire and roasted them in the flames."

"You need a small simple blaze," Leonard said. "That would have been too much. And very warm."

"The marshmallows would have burned," I said.

"That's what I'm trying to tell you," Leonard said. He took a deep breath. "I don't know. Guess it's all right. It's closer to nature."

"Lying under a tree on leaves and dirt with chiggers on our balls would be closer to nature," I said. "I grew up with nature, and I love it. But I like going home to my house and my bed. That has become my true nature.

And I miss Brett."

"She and Chance are probably having a good time," Leonard said.

"Don't you know it," I said. "They're watching old science fiction movies and popping popcorn and the dog is on the couch with them. I think Brett said they were going to make hot chocolate too. I don't know for sure, though, because my cell phone doesn't work out here. Oh, wait. I lost my cell phone in the lake."

"Can't blame that on me," Leonard said.

"I can, and I will."

"I don't know," Leonard said. "We used to get along fine without phones. I think it's not having electricity that makes it suck out here."

"That certainly is a factor," I said. "The only electricity nature likes to provide is a lightning bolt."

"How did we get used to a cell phone? How is that? Why is that?"

"I didn't want pussy until I had some, and then I wanted it from then on."

"A cell phone is like pussy?" Leonard said. "No wonder I'm queer."

"I admit that was a bridge too far as a comparison."

"Maybe if we were home and someone ran a bulldozer over this place and sent us a picture it would be all right. We have caught fish, though. You have to admit that."

"Some extremely small fish. Other fish don't even recognize them as fish. You overcooked them too."

"I'm not used to a wood stove cooker."

"I can't even read."

"You should have learned how," he said. "You went to school."

"That's some funny shit, Leonard. Reading by candlelight is hard."

"Lincoln read by lamplight," Leonard said.

"He wasn't used to anything else," I said. "We're spoiled. We're back to the parable of the phone. Besides, you're the one complaining about how bad things are and how it isn't what you expected."

"Yeah," Leonard said, "but you're thinking it. And if you play fair, you have to admit some of what you're saying sounds like complaining too."

"I'm complaining about you. This was your idea."

"It seemed like fun. We haven't gone off and done something like this in a long time."

"Might be a reason for that," I said.

"This can't be the best cabin the guy has to offer."

"Oh, I don't know, this place may be the pick of the litter."

"All the other places in the brochure cost the same."

"Then they're all like this," I said. "Of course, we may be special with the old spoiled well and the extra smoky wood stove."

"The picture looked good."

"They always do," I said.

"Next time I want to do something like this, will you kick my ass?" Leonard said.

"How about I just kick it twice every Tuesday, just in case you're thinking about doing something like this?"

"That seems fair," Leonard said.

We lay there in the dark on our cots for a while. I kept trying to go to sleep, but that wasn't working out. A mosquito about the size of a chicken hawk was buzzing around my head. I imagined I was a ninja master and I could catch it between two chopsticks. Actually, I wasn’t having much luck swatting it with my hand. He was a wily bugger.

“Hap,” Leonard said.

“What the hell now?” I said.

“Can a mosquito be so big as to have a landing gear?”

And so it went.

Late in the night I fell asleep, and then the rain woke me up, but in a reverse way, it helped me go back to sleep. It rained well into the morning, keeping the sky black. Being tired from talking a lot of the night, we slept on. It was nearly noon when I woke up and got off the cot.

Leonard was still sleeping. I considered smothering him with a pillow, but went out to the car in the rain and brought in a flat of bottled water and set it on the one table in the room, near the wood stove. The table wobbled under the weight.

I used some tender and got a fire going, put a few slivers of larger wood in the stove, and when that was blazing, I put in a larger, split piece of pine. It caught, and then I added more wood, larger pieces. At least the cabin had come with split wood. Eventually, I had even-burning fire. It made the room hot and sticky. I poured bottled water into the old-fashioned coffee pot, and then dumped in some coffee grounds; that’s how old the pot was. It wasn’t even an old-time percolator. It was one of those things that Davy Crockett would have had coffee out of. At home Brett had this coffee maker you stuck little pods of coffee into, then you pull down a lever, and that made the perfect cup, and fast. I missed her and I missed the perfect cup. I missed my daughter Chance. I missed our dog Buffy. I missed my books, television set and my pantry with food in it. I even missed our cell phones. Mine was residing at the bottom of the lake and would have to be replaced. Maybe a perch was making a call to Brett right now, trying to find out if she was having fish for dinner. Leonard had let his run out of juice, and now there was no electricity, and he didn't have a car charger.

I wanted to cook with electricity, not wood, and have something to cook besides bad coffee. We didn't even have fish for lunch now. A can of potted meat with a pull tab would have been exciting right then. I missed the refrigerator back home where I kept my pitcher of iced tea and my carton of Sharps non-alcoholic beer. I really had come a long ways from a fellow who lived in the country on the fringe of the woods into who I was now. A guy who wanted to go home.

While the coffee was making, I looked over at Leonard, and could see under his cot a vanilla cookie bag. That bastard had eaten them all and hadn't offered me one. I didn't even know he had any with him, though I should have guessed. He was about those cookies like a druggie is about crack. He may have had them in a sealed bag stuffed up his ass for all I knew. Of course, it was far more likely he had brought them in with his sleeping bag.

When the coffee was ready, I poured a bug out of one of the two cups we had, left two dead flies in the other, and poured that one full of coffee for Leonard. I poured myself a cup and sat on the cot and sipped it. It was god-awful, tasted as if it had been strained through a used jockstrap owned by someone with a rampant venereal disease.

"Leonard," I said. "Rise and shine, easy money. The coffee's ready."

He moved a little, rolled over, smacked his lips and finally swung out of bed.

"Oh, for shit sakes, Leonard. Put on some drawers."

He got up and rummaged in his backpack and came up with a pair of sweat pants and pulled those on.

“I’d known you’d gone to bed naked,” I said, “I’d have slept out in the rain. Your coffee’s on the table.”

He got his cup and sat on his cot and sipped.

“Damn. You shit in this?”

“Not quite,” I said. “You know what would make this a lot better? A vanilla cookie. Oh, wait. You ate them all.”

“I didn’t mean to,” he said. “I just got started and couldn’t quit. You know, woke up hungry.”

“You meant to.”

He drank his coffee, then spit one of the flies on the floor.

“You knew that sucker was in my cup,” he said.

“I wouldn’t do that to you, Leonard.”

“You might,” he said.

“Okay. I might. Watch out for the other one.”

We went outside. It was still raining. It was a misty rain, and we wore our slickers with hoods and our good boots that laced up high and tight and were oiled to help shed water.

From where we stood we could see the lake and we could see the water sloshing against the shoreline.

“If we had a boat we could have better fishing,” Leonard said.

“Like the one we let sink out in the lake?”

“That one precisely,” he said.

"We can walk in the woods, there, fish close to all those tree roots growing out in the water."

"Tangle our lines."

"Might. But I bet there's some catfish there we could tie to a boat and have them pull us across the lake."

"If we had a boat."

"Yeah, if we had a boat."

"A boat like the one we sunk," Leonard said.

"That would be the one, yes."

We wandered into the woods. It grew dark with the shade from the trees and the clouds from the rain. The mist was nice, as it kept mosquitoes off a little and it made the air taste like greenery and dirt, but it lay on our faces like damp cobwebs. It made me think of when I was a kid growing up, and I'd go out in the mist and the rain until my mother caught me and called me in for fear of lightning.

We walked on, and a few hours later we found a place where the land rose up and was sprinkled with trees and tangled undergrowth. Near our feet a water moccasin crawled out from under a wad of dead leaves and slithered toward the water. As it plopped into the lake, Leonard said, "Won't be any fish there for a while."

"And I won't be anywhere near there for a while myself," I said.

As we topped the peak of the hill, a sound struck us.

Someone was moaning.

We left our fishing gear up on the rise and found her at the bottom of the hill lying in the leaves with her head on a rotting log. She was a young woman with long blonde hair, in her thirties I figured. She might have been pretty before, but the way she had been beat, it was hard to tell. She wasn't wearing much, a formerly white blouse now mostly the color of the leaves and dirt. She wasn't wearing pants or underwear. Her head was swollen and she was bruised on the arms and legs, and her bare feet were a bloody mess. She was lying in an ant bed and was covered with ant bites.

All of that she could get over in time, but the wound in her side wasn't something that merely required bed rest and a couple of aspirin. Something was sticking out of her. I looked. It was an arrow with plastic feathers on the end of the shaft.

I brushed the ants off of her, and we picked her up, Leonard at her head, me at her feet. We carried her to a pile of leaves that was better than the ant bed.

Her eyes were slits. She had taken such a beating she couldn't quite open them, at least not completely. She looked up at me and cried.

Leonard said to her, "We'll get an ambulance."

"They're out there," she said, and when she opened her mouth I could see her front teeth were chipped.

"Who's out there?" I said.

"Those men."

"How many?" I said.

"Two men and two women. They rented me. Like a carnival ride."

"You saying you're a working girl?" Leonard said.

She nodded.

"They're after me. They're hunting me."

“Who’s after you?” I said.

“Them.” By then she hardly had the breath to speak.

I took my canteen off my belt, slipped my hand under her head, lifted her up and gave her a drink of water. She gulped greedily. I only let her have a small amount to keep from making her sick, then I laid her head down gently on the leaves.

“They took me off a Houston street,” she said. “I do it for my daughter.”

“No judgment from us,” Leonard said.

“They spent days raping and beating me, and then they took me out here, drove out onto a trail, made me walk deep in the woods. They raped me again and set me loose, said I had an hour. They caught up with me and shot me with an arrow, but I got away. I don’t know how I did it, but I got away. But they’re coming. They’ll find me.”

“Take it easy,” Leonard said. “When did you last see them?”

“I don’t know. It was night. That’s what helped me. Oh, Jesus, my head is swimming.”

“It’s all right,” I said.

She quit talking and lay still.

“We got to get her back to the car, drive her to a hospital,” Leonard said.

My thought was she wouldn’t make it that long. That wound in her side was bad and she had lost a lot of blood.

“Hap,” Leonard said.

She had stopped moving. One moment she had been talking and now she wasn’t saying anything or making any sounds, no moaning, no breathing.

Her face was slack and her lips were turning blue.

I put my head to her chest. No heartbeat. I touched her throat to feel a pulse. Nada.

“She checked out,” I said.

“Damn. . . . Do you believe her story?”

“There’s an arrow sticking out of her. She was either telling the truth or Robin Hood missed a shot at a deer.”

That’s when we heard a noise, someone coming, being loud, purposely. My guess was they wanted her to hear them coming and cause fear.

Two men began to call out.

“Come on out, whore. We have a few points to make with you.”

“Yeah,” said another voice. “You might as well give it up, cause these points really hurt.”

The voices were coming from out in the deeper woods.

“Come on,” Leonard said. “She’s gone, and she said they had weapons.”

We rushed up the hill, and no sooner had we laid flat amongst the brush and were spying downward, two men came into the clearing beneath us. The two women she had mentioned did not appear.

The men were dressed in camo, carrying modern bows and quivers of arrows strapped to their backs. One of them had arrows fastened to his bow in such a way he could pop them loose and load them up quickly. They had machetes strapped to their sides in scabbards. They had canteens of water on their belts. One of them was wearing a backpack with his quiver of arrows strapped to that. Both wore high-top, waterproof boots. One of them was stocky, but solid, and had on a green baseball cap. The other an Aussie-style hat with one side pinned up.

Making their way down the hill they came to the body and stared at it.

“The arrow is ruined,” I heard the one in the cap say.

“Yeah,” said the other. He was taller. He took off his Aussie hat and ran his hand through his hair and put it back on. “Shaft’s bent, but it made a hell of a hole. Forget the arrow. It was a good shot, one of your best.”

“Bitch,” said the stocky man wearing the baseball cap. He laid his bow on the ground carefully, pulled his machete out of its scabbard and went to chopping on the woman with it, hacking at her legs and privates and chest. She was still fresh enough to bleed, and she bled a lot.

Leonard started to rise up, but I grabbed him. He looked at me. I shook my head and spoke to him by forming words but not saying them. “Not yet.”

Leonard tried to relax and lay still. He managed, but just barely. Leonard is the kind of guy that will attack a rhino barehanded and expect to come home with its horn. Sometimes you have to remind him he’s just a man.

Baseball Cap hacked on the poor woman some more. It was all I could do not to stand up and scream at him and run down the hill with my hunting knife. But the other guy was holding his bow, and from the way they carried themselves I knew they were trained woodsmen and hunters. There was a good chance me or Leonard would look like a porcupine by the time we got down there. A good bowman can thread several arrows and fire far more quickly than you can imagine.

When Baseball Cap grew tired of hacking, he wiped his face with his forearm, took a deep breath and then hacked one more time, cutting off the woman’s head. I heard Leonard let his breath out, or so I thought, and then I realized it was me. Still, I hadn’t been too loud. We were still safe and hidden.

There were strands of flesh still attached to the neck and the head. The man chopped again until the head was free. Aussie Hat brought out a bag, and Baseball Cap put the head in the bag, leaned down and rubbed the machete across her shirt to clean the blade, and then he put it away. Aussie Hat fastened the bag to the back of his pack, which for a moment he had removed, and then re-slung it.

“I forgot the camp shovel,” said Baseball Cap. “Shit. We can push her off in the water, I guess. Gators, fish and the heat will take care of her in a few days.”

“Hell with that,” said Aussie Hat. “Who the hell comes all the way back in here? There are thousands of acres. She’ll rot quick, and then there’s the ants and animals, all this fresh blood. No guarantee a gator will find her, but something will.”

“That’s right,” said Baseball Cap.

“Sure it is,” said the other.

They started walking back the way they had come, and when they disappeared into the trees, I said, “We got to call some law. Bring them back here.”

“By the time we get to the car and find a phone, they’ll be long gone,” Leonard said. “There won’t be any justice for that poor woman. Those guys might never be found. They hunted her like a deer. And you can bet they’ve done it before, and will do it again. We got to track after them. Keep them in sight.”

“You mean more than that, don’t you?”

“Maybe.”

“I’ve seen enough killing in my time,” I said.

“Listen. You go back, drive and find a phone. I’ll stay after them.”

“She said there were four, remember? Where are the other two? Hell. I’ll come with you. I can’t let you go up against four. You might hurt them.”

“There you go,” Leonard said.

We went down to her body for a look. It was sickening.

“Can you believe that shit?” Leonard said. “Chopping off her head.”

“Have to,” I said. “Saw it.”

“We ain’t got time for a burial, Hap. I know that’s what you were thinking.”

That was exactly what I was thinking.

“Yeah,” I said. “I know. And we got nothing to dig a hole.”

We went after them.

The rain had blown out, but with the heat of the day rising there were ribbons of fog in the low land, and it wrapped around us like damp serpents. The trees seemed to come out of the fog and then go back into it. It didn’t take long before we lost them.

We paused to examine the ground and find tracks, but the fog was too thick and too close to the earth for us to see well. We stopped beneath a tree as it warmed up, waiting for the fog to lift, hoping we could follow their tracks as we were once able to do, back when we were younger and had grown up near nature.

We drank water from our canteens and split a granola bar. Until then we hadn’t had anything for breakfast or lunch but bad coffee and some sips of water. The sun melted the fog like cotton candy. Now we could see their tracks, and the limbs they had bent while moving through the brush. They might as well have left us a map.

Looking where they had gone, we saw that there were a lot of ancient cedar stumps in the middle of a long patch of brackish water. It went on for some distance. There were only a few grown trees; most of the others were scrubs. It was patched like that for a long distance, and in the distance we could see those two moving along at no particular pace, seeming to take their time about it, not worried in the least. I figured, why worry when you thought no one had any idea what you had done and where you were.

And then I thought: Well, you sons-of-bitches, we know, and if you knew us, you'd start worrying.

They got well ahead of us, and we let them. We tried to stay near the larger stumps and the clumps of greenery as we went. There were long leaves that grew out of the water, looked like blades, and they were sharp too. We hid behind those when we thought we ought to, and when we had to truck across large expanses of water, we made our way so as not to make the water splash too loudly, in case our prey might look back and see us. We were too far from them to do anything, but with their arrows, they weren't too far from us.

They had planned all this well, let the woman off in the thick of the swamp and hunted her down. Now they had time to walk out and be a great distance away from her body. The question was, where were they going now, and why were they carrying her head in a bag?

Snakes swam all around us, and once we saw an alligator hustle along between two stumps in our direction, but it turned, went out where the marsh was deep, and with a flick of its tail it was gone. Let me tell you that took my breath away.

In time the woods swelled up again and the swamp water thinned. Before long we were in tall grass, and then the grass gave way to even more woods, a lot of thin trees growing close together. The sun had begun to crawl up high. A bit of water had seeped into my so-called weatherproof boots.

Far away we saw a split in the woods and we could see water beyond the split, not brown, but blue. We were coming out of the low-level muck, and to the bank of the larger and cleaner-looking Lake Caddo, the only natural lake in Texas.

I added that because I learned it in school. I wouldn't want you to think I wasted my education.

There was a line of willow and cypress trees along the water, and we could see the men walk out of the green growth, and keep walking onto the water, which for a moment gave me pause until we came up a little higher on the rise, ducked down behind some swamp grass and saw they had stepped onto a large barge. It was like a great, high-setting raft and there was an enormous cabin in the center of it with a band of large windows that went around as far as we could see. Inside the cabin was where the wheelhouse and living quarters would be. The part of the wheelhouse we couldn't see would have to be glass as well, and it would give a good view of the water ahead.

As they stepped onto the barge, two women came out of the cabin and each grabbed a man in turn and they hugged, and then the man with the head in the bag took it out and showed it to them.

You would have thought it was Christmas and their birthdays all rolled into one. The women giggled with glee. They were long, sun-browned women, one with her dark hair tied back, the other with short blonde hair cropped close to her head. They looked good in tight tee-shirts and shorts and flip-flops, and it was obvious both were braless and could make that work. They didn't look like monsters.

Leonard turned and looked at me, his forehead scrunched.

I shrugged. I didn't get it either.

The man with the woman's head, which he was holding by the hair, put the head in the bag, and the women went inside the barge.

We eased back behind the rise.

"What kind of people are these?" Leonard said.

"They're not people," I said.

Easing through the weeds, crawling on our bellies, we made our way down to the trees along the bank near the barge. I took up behind a cypress, and Leonard eased into a clutch of small willows.

Aussie Hat picked up a pole lying in a groove on the barge and pushed at the bank with it. Baseball Cap had already unhooked a line tied to a large root sticking out from the shoreline. He picked up a pole and helped Aussie Hat push off. The motor began to hum, and then the barge began to move. One of the women was motoring them away.

"Damn," Leonard said.

"Wait," I said.

They glided along on the water, not going far from shore. We watched as the barge chugged around a bend in the lake.

"They seem to be staying close to land," I said. "Maybe they're not going far."

"All we can do is follow around the edge of the lake and hope," Leonard said.

We got up and trucked along the way they were going. It was hard work. The trees were thick and there were a lot of mosquitoes now and they moved in little black swarms like living clouds. The sun was dipping and the sky was already dark from clouds filled with rain.

It was a slow slog, and finally it began to rain. It was a soft but steady rain. We stayed close to the curve of the lake and only went away from the shoreline for any distance when we had no choice; when the bushes and trees and vines grew thick enough to make a fence. We went wide then, but we always made it back close to shore. We could see the barge had lights on inside the cabin. It was still close to the bank. Finally it came to a place far up from us and drifted over for a moment, then chugged back out into the lake.

"What was that about?" Leonard said.

"Maybe they thought they'd camp there, decided not to."

"Doesn't matter," Leonard said.

We took a breath and drank some water and split another granola bar, which was good. I was so hungry my stomach was starting to gnaw at my insides.

After a few minutes we got our wind back and started onward. A surprised nesting of birds startled by our presence flew up in a burst, causing me to nearly pass a turd.

Before long the barge pulled over again and stopped and the man in the baseball cap came out and secured a line to shore. He went back inside. It was growing darker, and the lights in the barge looked warm and inviting, even if the people inside were as cold-blooded as a snake. Rain had begun to come down like bullets.

I pulled the hood on my slicker close around my face and we eased closer to shore. We could see through the windows, and we could see people in the light. There was hard rock music coming from the barge and Baseball Cap was dancing with the women. The dark-haired woman was holding up the decapitated woman's head as she danced. I glanced at Leonard.

Leonard pulled his knife from its scabbard. "I say we surprise them and kill their asses."

"The women too?"

"I don't see any difference," Leonard said. "You and your chivalry are going to get you killed some day. I don't make one whit of difference in them."

"We could still go for help."

"They'd be gone by the time we come back, and they'll never get what they deserve."

"I'm kind of worried we might get what we don't deserve," I said.

"Here's what I will do," I said. "We make a citizen's arrest."

"What?" Leonard said.

"I'm not going to kill these people, go back to the cabin and go fishing. When I said I'd had enough of death, I meant it."

"I thought we'd kill them, go back to the cabin, get the car and go home. We might stop somewhere for a burger."

"No."

"So, we going to go in and say 'Citizen's Arrest,' hang out with them and a decapitated head hoping some cops show up?"

"I thought we'd surprise them, tie them up, use the barge itself to make our way back to where our cabin is. We can put them inside the cabin, one of us can watch them, and the other can drive out and get the law and bring them back."

"How about this?" Leonard said. "We make a citizen's arrest unless we have to kill them."

"You're opening a door I don't want to open," I said.

"And they might just kick that door open in our faces, brother. Say we do our best not to hurt anyone, outside of kicking their ass a little and tying them up? But if things get a little wonky, I'm going Attila the Hun on them and I expect you to bring the horses."

I thought about that. Leonard was right. They'd motor away and escape. It might not even be their barge. It could be stolen. They could do this again. And they would.

"All right," I said. "We go for the compromise."

"Good," Leonard said.

Behind us we heard a slight crack of someone or something stepping on a branch. We whirled about. A light came on. The light was a little thing fastened to the top of a pistol, and there was a man behind it, and in that instant I realized something obvious. We had only seen one man in the cabin with the women. I guess we logically thought the other was in the shitter or pausing in a back room to consider the nature of the universe, but now I knew we were a couple of dumbasses and our logic had been full of holes.

"Howdy boys," said a voice. That would be Aussie Hat.

I knew then that when the barge pulled over it was because they knew we were after them, had spotted us. Aussie Hat got off at that stop to sneak up on us. And he had done it well. Until that stick cracked, he could have come up behind me, combed my hair and wiped my ass, and I wouldn't have known he was there. He was that good.

Aussie Hat and his pistol pointed us forward and he trailed behind. He led us to the barge and said for us to step on board. Then he called out, "Open up."

Shadows tumbled through the windows and moved along the wooden deck, and the music went away. Baseball Cap opened the door and the light came with him. He and the women stepped out on the barge deck. We all stood in the rain.

"Well, well," said Baseball Cap. "What have we here? Heckle and Jeckle?"

"Told you I saw someone," Aussie Hat said.

"Hey, we're just fishing," I said. "We don't want any trouble."

"Where's your fishing gear?" said Aussie Hat.

It was back on the hill where we had left it when we started following them, but I said, "We ditched it after we got lost. We been trying to find our way out."

"Have you now?" said Aussie Hat.

"Yeah," I said. "We don't mean you guys any harm."

"You know," said Aussie Hat, "I doubt that."

The short-haired blonde said, "Fresh meat."

"Get their knives and canteens, the belt packs," Aussie Hat said.

Baseball Cap took them away from us and gave them to the blonde woman, who took them inside somewhere.

Aussie Hat beckoned us into the cabin. It was tight in there. There was a fold-down table attached to the wall and there was a gap in the wall where it folded up. There were snack foods on it. Beneath the windows were benches. There were a couple of folding chairs on hooks on the wall. There was a door off the little cabin. It was closed. I assumed it would be the bedroom and off of that would be the wheelhouse. The woman’s head was on a silver platter on the table next to a bowl of pretzels.

Baseball Cap removed the platter and head, placed it on the bench, then he put the food away inside the other room, came back and folded the table into the wall, fastened it there with clamps.

“You boys sit down on the other side,” he said.

We sat on the bench there. I couldn’t take my eyes off of that poor woman’s head.

Aussie Hat nodded toward the head and the platter. “If you didn’t know what we were all about and are just lost fishermen, well, now you know something about us.”

“Is that real?” I said.

“Oh come on,” said Aussie Hat. “That was lame.”

“You guys shooting a movie?” I was still working it.

“It may end up starring you guys,” Baseball Cap said.

The blonde woman giggled. Her hair was wet and plastered to her head, and though she was pretty, something about the way she looked at us reminded me of a ferret. The dark-haired woman’s hair looked like a damp helmet.

“Let’s take them outside and shoot them in the head,” said the short-haired blonde. “I want the black one. I want to shoot him.”

Aussie Hat turned off the light attached to the pistol. He sat by the head and let the gun rest on his thigh. I was watching for my moment. I knew if I went after one of them, Leonard would be on the other like a duck on a june bug. But they were watching us intently. Aussie Hat was probably hoping we'd make that move. He looked like he was itching to shoot that pistol.

The barge bobbed in the water and we could hear the wind picking up and the rain was brutal now. Aussie Hat took off his hat and shook the rain off of it and put it back on. He hadn't let go of the pistol in his other hand.

"Good thing you're inside," Aussie Hat said. "You won't get as wet, and you aren't lost anymore. Isn't that good?"

"It's a fucking treat," Leonard said. "If I had some clout, I'd get you guys some kind of Samaritan medal. . . . You better hope the first shot kills me."

"Oh, it will," said Aussie Hat. "And the second will kill him. I'm a good shot."

"He is," said the dark-haired woman. Then to Aussie Hat, "You're not going to let them ruin our fun, are you?"

"Nah," said Aussie Hat. "We got fun coming out of the ass."

"Let's just do them and toss them overboard," Baseball Cap said.

"Can't we have their heads?" said the short-haired blonde. She was watching me carefully, licking her lips. "For target practice. Like the others."

Aussie Hat said to the short-haired blonde, "I don't like the way you're looking at him."

"What do you mean?" she said.

"You look like you want to fuck him."

"I want to fuck him over," she said. "Not fuck him."

Aussie Hat looked at me. “You want to fuck her? I think she wants to fuck you. That’s what I’m getting here.”

“Actually, that was the farthest thing from my mind, and I’m sure from hers. But I was wondering if maybe you had a cup of coffee, some of those little chocolate doughnuts, and then maybe later, I’d settle for a hand job from any one of you. Provided you’re gentle, of course. And just for the record, I like it dry.”

“You’re not getting coffee or doughnuts,” said Baseball Cap.

“So I could still get that hand job?”

“Just shoot him,” said Baseball Cap.

“We don’t have any doughnuts,” said the dark-haired girl. “But we got coffee.”

We all looked at her.

“Not that I’d give them any doughnuts if we had them,” she said. “Or coffee.”

“You hunt humans,” Leonard said. “And like most hunters, it’s not sport at all. There’s nothing fair about it. You catch defenseless women, run them through the woods and shoot them with arrows. That’s some sport. That’s some brave business. That’s shit. That’s what that is.”

“We give them plenty of a head start,” said Aussie Hat.

“Yeah,” Leonard said. “But they got nothing.”

“They got a chance, and that’s more than they deserve,” said Aussie Hat.

“Some chance,” Leonard said.

“They’re whores,” said the man with the pistol.

“Unlike these two upstanding young ladies,” Leonard said.

Aussie Hat lifted the pistol in our direction. I flinched. Leonard didn't even blink.

"The whores we kill," said Baseball Cap, "they're just a waste on society. Spreading disease. They could do better if they wanted. They are at the bottom of the food chain by choice, by laziness."

"You think so?" Leonard said.

"I think so," said Aussie Hat. "We pick ones that are on the downhill slope, ones that never darken the doorway of a church."

"You are one choice dumbass," Leonard said. "Jesus always said, you don't go to church, you get hunted in the woods with a bow and arrow. I think you can find that in the scripture marked Assholio, first chapter, first verse. What do you do, mount their heads like deer?"

"Of course not," Aussie Hat said. "We're not crazy."

Aussie Hat stood up, pointed the gun, said, "We got to tie you up."

"No," Leonard said. "I don't think so."

"You think you get to choose?" said Baseball Cap.

"You got to get me tied up first, and that will be one hell of a fight."

"Then we got to shoot you," said Aussie Hat.

Leonard shrugged. "What's the difference? Shot tied up, or shot untied. I'm not going to make it easy for you. You're not tying me up, at least not without working for it or killing me."

"What about you?" Aussie Hat said to me.

"Me? Oh, I'm with him. I'm not going to let you tie me up. Shoot or fight, that's what you get from me."

"You can fight now," Aussie Hat said.

"Well," I said. "I'd rather not get shot, as I have plans next week, and I don't mind being cooperative to keep from being shot. But not that cooperative."

"Difference is you two might get a chance to live," said Baseball Cap.

"You don't seem like a couple of fair and square boys to me," said Leonard. "Suddenly when you want to tie us up, you're talking chances?"

I thought: Leonard do not antagonize them too much. Do not poke the dragon too hard. But that was like politely asking a starving dog not to eat a greasy pork chop.

"You let me and him go, you'll never catch us in these woods," Leonard said. "You haven't got any chance unless it's with someone doesn't have the strength to run, or experience in the woods. Your idea of sport is breaking a deer's leg, giving it five minutes' head start with a sack over its head. Me and him, we can give you a run for your arrows, we get loose. We'll give you some real sport."

"Just take them out on the deck and shoot them," Baseball Cap said.

"You shoot us," Leonard said, "it'll probably be right here. I don't have to do a goddamn thing you say. I'd rather get shot right here than make it easier for you to clean up the blood out there on the deck."

"You know," said Aussie Hat. "I think he means it."

"Shoot them," said Baseball Cap, "and then we'll clean up the mess."

"Oh, sure," said the blonde. "You know who ends up cleaning up the mess? It won't be you two. It'll be us. Women's work. Think the black one's right. I think you boys don't want to give someone a fair shake. We don't get to hunt. We get the shit jobs and you two have all the fun."

"Life is just full of little disappointments," said Aussie Hat, as he turned and looked at the blonde woman. His voice was so raw I could feel paint peeling off the wall behind me.

The blonde shut up, looked at the floor and tried to grow small. It was as if she realized for the first time she wasn't the one wielding power. Sex could only take you so far. Step on a man's pride, he can be silly. Step on a psycho's pride, and he can go crazy. A man steps on it, that's bad, but a woman steps on it, that's terrible.

"I'm sorry," said the blonde. "I'm just tired."

Aussie Hat kept staring at her, eventually eased his gaze back to us.

"You're not going to shoot them here, I say we take them ashore," said Baseball Cap. "I say we let them run. Won't be any different than any other time. We'll catch them, cut off their heads like all the others. I say we take their balls too, bat them around a bit."

"Hope you got a tow sack on board," Leonard said. "You'll need it for my balls. And maybe some kind of special knot to keep them hemmed up inside. Kind of got a mind of their own."

The dark-haired woman looked at Leonard and smiled. It wasn't a smile that made you want to start skipping through the tulips. It was a bit more the way a cat looks at a mouse it's cornered against a wall. I think she liked thinking about Leonard's balls in a sack.

"I don't know," Aussie Hat said. "Let me think."

For the next few hours I felt sick to my stomach and scared, but I didn't let them see it. I had dealt with bad people before, and some as bad as this, and the thing is, you got to not let them see how frightened you are. It feeds their passion.

After a while, liquor came out and everyone got drunk, except the man with the pistol. And us, of course. Aussie Hat didn't drink, didn't lose focus. Finally, the women went into the back room with Baseball Cap and closed the door. We could hear them in there, going at it. The barge rocked.

Leonard said, "What's the matter with you? Can't get it up? That gun about as much as a dick as you got?"

"You are asking for it, aren't you?" said Aussie Hat.

"They're in there slamming together like hogs in heat, and here you sit."

"You want a bullet in the teeth," Aussie Hat said.

Leonard was trying to pull the ole Uncle Remus Brer Rabbit trick. The one where Brer Fox catches Brer Rabbit, and the rabbit tells him to go on and do whatever he wants, kill him, whatever, but please don't throw him in the briar patch.

Brer Fox hears this, thinks, so, that's the worst thing can be done to that ole rabbit, so I'm going to do it. Brer Fox throws Brer Rabbit into the briar patch, and Brer Rabbit calls out, "Born and raised in the briar patch, Brer Fox. Born and raised." And away went Brer Rabbit, doing the briar patch boogie.

If they were to throw us into the woods and come hunting us, they'd be throwing us into our briar patch. Born and raised in the woods, we were. Born and raised.

Okay. It wasn't exactly like that. We were offering to head into the briar patch and show our skills there, but in a way, it was the same kind of challenge. Don’t shoot us, Bad Guys, as that’s too easy. Make it hard for us, and show us what sportsmen you are. Throw us in the briar patch and see what we got.

“Listen to that meat slapping in there,” Leonard said.

“Don’t worry about my love life,” said Aussie Hat. “I get plenty. We all share.”

“For the record,” Leonard said, “I have not for one iota worried about your pathetic love life.”

Aussie Hat lifted the pistol and pointed it right at Leonard. Leonard didn’t flinch. After a long moment where my heart quit beating, he lowered the gun.

“Just shut up,” said Aussie Hat.

The night crawled along, and after what felt like about three thousand years and a long afternoon, the morning light came through the barge windows and spread over the floor and lay on the woman’s head on the platter. There was blood leakage in the platter, and the blood had the look of congealed strawberry jam. There was a faint odor of decay from the head, like a refrigerator that had been unplugged for a few days with a ham roast in it. Aussie Hat sat beside the head on the bench and placed his left hand on top of it and held the pistol in his right, resting it against his thigh, his unblinking, lizard eyes focused on us.

“Good morning, assholes,” he said, stood up, touched a switch on the wall and turned off the cabin lights.

It was still raining and you could hear the drops falling into the water like plums falling off trees. The man who had spent the night with the women came out looking the way you might think a man would look who had spent the night banging two women. Then the women came out behind him. It was still slightly dark outside.

The man had his baseball cap in his hand and he put it on his head and then went to adjusting his belt. The four of them spent a few moments watching us, like we were monkeys in the zoo. Like a monkey, I wanted to throw shit on them.

“Move us to the spot,” Aussie Hat said to Baseball Cap, then to the blonde: “Make us some coffee.”

The blonde knew she had pushed a little too hard the night before. She tried to sound sweet. “Sure. Them, too?”

“No. Not them, too. What’s with you two cunts and the coffee?”

“I’d like some coffee,” Leonard said. “We both take it black, though Hap here, now and again, likes some artificial sweetener, though he’s picky on which kind.”

“Cream’s all right if you got it,” I said.

“Fuck you,” said Aussie Hat.

“Oh, that’s a wish you won’t fulfill,” Leonard said.

“Depends on the definition,” Aussie Hat said.

Baseball Cap unfastened the mooring line, came back inside, trudged into the bedroom and on through to the wheelhouse. I knew that because we heard a door open on the far end, and shortly thereafter he started the engine. The barge eased away from the shore, chopping at the water, chugging like a large lawn mower.

Through the row of windows across from me I could see the night had lifted and the rain had stopped. An early morning fog was hovering over the water, twisting in amongst the shoreline trees. Within moments the fog that had so quickly arrived started to lift and fade. Big, white birds dipped into the water looking for a fish breakfast. Blue morning shadows formed by the shapes of trees along the lake made patterns on the water. Squirts of apple-red morning poked between thick limbs. The sunlight fled over the water and made it look brightly dyed, and then the red water gradually became yellow as polished gold, and the sunlight rose higher, and all the woods began to glow, the evergreens shiny with rain, sighing in the wind, their bare limbs shedding sun-sparkled drops of water like tears.

I wanted to feel and see and smell it all. If this was going to be my last time in the woods and on the water, I wanted it to be as much on my terms as I could manage; I wanted to go out with the world I loved nestled in my head.

Throw us in the briar patch, assholes. Throw us in the briar patch and let us run.

The barge chugged along for a while, and then around a bend in the river. The trees cleared considerably there. There was a great patch of darkened land where lightning had struck and trees had burned.

The barge churned toward that spot, and we came up against the shore slightly, bouncing the barge back a bit. The blonde woman, trying to get in Aussie Hat's good graces and be as helpful as possible, jumped ashore with the docking line and tied it off. The barge motor coughed a little, there was another bump, and then we were as still as a craft can be on water.

"Get the whore's head?" Aussie Hat said to the dark-haired woman, and motioned us ahead of him and out the door. I thought as soon as we were on the deck of the barge, where the blood would be easy to clean, he might shoot us in the head.

I considered making a leap for it, hit the bank and keep on running, but I didn't. I gambled there were greater opportunities for us, but I've never been a good gambler. Besides, I wasn't going to leave Leonard behind. We ran together, or we went down together.

Aussie Hat waved us on shore with the pistol, and we went. The others came after, except for Baseball Cap. The dark-haired woman carried the head and sat it on a low, charred stump some distance away, then went back to the edge of the water.

Baseball Cap came out carrying two bows and two quivers of arrows. He gave one bow and a quiver to Aussie Hat, handed the blonde the pistol. She held it on us while he swung the quiver into place, threaded several arrows onto the rack on the bow after stringing it.

He turned then and an arrow flew from the bow almost without effort. It hit the dead woman's head and tore so cleanly through it, it didn't even knock it off the stump. They all cheered like a touchdown had been made.

Baseball Cap fired his bow, and the arrow went into one of the eyes, lodged there, deep in her skull. I thought, you don't get much worse than these assholes, and if you do, it would be so bad as to be otherworldly.

Aussie Hat took his pistol back, and handed the dark-haired woman the bow. She notched an arrow and shot at the head. The arrow stuck in the stump just below where the head was mounted.

"That's why we do the hunting," Aussie Hat said.

"Let me," said the blonde. She took the bow from the dark-haired woman and took a shot. She hit the head in the cheek and the head tumbled off the stump and rolled across the damp, blackened ground.

“That was alright,” said Aussie Hat. “But you shoot it right, arrow hits so hard it’ll go right through it, might not even knock it off, it can be such a clean shot. You got the edge of her face. But it was good. It was good.”

“You think so?” she said.

“Sure,” he said. “It was really good. Hey, give me the pistol.”

Baseball Cap gave the pistol to Aussie Hat. I thought, well, this is it for us. Aussie Hat held the bow in his left hand, held the pistol in his right hand. He said, “Lois.”

The blonde looked at him and he shot her square between the eyes, spraying blood on Baseball Cap. She hit the ground so fast it was as if her legs dissolved.

“What the hell?” said Baseball Cap, his face was covered in the blonde’s blood.

“She talked back to me last night,” Aussie Hat said. “I couldn’t let it go.”

“Jesus, Cameron,” Baseball Cap said. “Jesus.”

“Churchgoing pussy is a dime a dozen, same as the whores we kill.”

Okay. Convictions of any kind were out the window. Jesus had been tossed overboard. I could feel my nerves tightening inside my body like the strings on a well-tuned harp.

The dark-haired woman stood extremely still, as if she might be able to disappear if she didn’t move.

Aussie Hat laughed. “You can relax, Mavis. You’re all right. Nothing’s going to happen to you.”

“I can’t believe you did that, man,” Baseball Cap said. “Lois was all right. Damn, I liked her."

"She had a mouth on her," Aussie Hat said, and gave Baseball Cap a long study.

"All right," said Baseball Cap. "You're right. She talked too much about the wrong things."

"Woman ought to keep her mouth full of dick to keep from talking, way I see it," Aussie Hat said. "You agree with that Mavis?"

Mavis nodded.

"Good, cause your mouth is going to be full of my dick a long time tonight."

Baseball Cap said, "What about them?"

"It's going to go bad for them. I was thinking we could cut Lois's head off and put it on the stump, do the same to these boys, have a few hours of target practice, but you know what? I think we let them go, see what kind of sport they are. But I'm not giving them an hour. I'm giving them fifteen minutes because they're such smart-mouth boys. I don't like smart-mouths. Ask Lois. Well, never mind on that."

I was hoping Leonard wouldn't say anything at just that moment, wired as Aussie Hat was, and thankfully he didn't.

Aussie Hat held one of the arrows up. "See that point," he said. "That's real fine steel. That point, I've shot it through old refrigerator doors. Went right through it and ripped the feathers off the shaft."

"Yeah, but we ain't no refrigerators," Leonard said.

"No, you are not," said Aussie Hat.

"Giving us less time, why not make it a little more sporting?" Leonard said. "Give us our knives and canteens back."

"You're not going to live long enough to need a drink," Aussie Hat said. "Shit, give them their knives, not that it'll matter. No canteens."

Mavis, wanting to make an impression, hurried to get them.

No one said anything until Mavis came back with the knives. She handed them to us, and then looked at Lois's body on the ground. A fly had lit on one of Lois's blue eyeballs. Mavis trembled ever so slightly.

"I knew her for years," Mavis said. It was something that just slipped out.

"Well, you won't be knowing her next year," Aussie Hat said. "You got any complaints you want to lodge, baby?"

Mavis shook her head.

"So, you got no problem with holding down the barge and not going hunting? Am I right?"

Mavis nodded.

"Am I right?" Aussie Hat said again.

"Yes," Mavis said. "You're right."

"Thought I was. All right, then. Fifteen minutes for our Daniel Boones here, and then we pincushion their asses. See that path there? You are clear to begin there, and you get a fifteen-minute start. After that, hell's coming."

"So far we're still standing here without a countdown," Leonard said, "and I can smell your rotten breath from over here. I'd like to move on, if you mean it."

I saw Aussie Hat's eye twitch.

Leonard could do that to a person.

"Go now," Aussie Hat said. "Or I'm going to kill you both right here.

Mavis, mark the time."

Mavis grabbed Baseball Cap's wrist, lifted his hand and looked at his watch. Baseball Cap let her. His face looked as if it were full of Novocain. I believe he was still thinking about Lois. Even he had been surprised at that.

"Starting . . . now," she said, and dropped his arm.

We started running across the burnt clearing and into the woods where there was a wide deer trail. It went straight for a while and we went straight with it. When the trail bent around behind some trees and we were concealed by them, we darted into the first slightly clear spot we saw in the underbrush, hunkering low, crawling through gaps in the greenery, raising up when we could, running hard when we were able to.

The sun was full up now, and we wanted to go in the direction from which it had risen—East. That led back across the water, back to our crummy rental cabin and to our ride. We could drive out of the deep woods then, down the red-clay road that led to the highway.

We came to a small run of water that wetted down our boots and jumped on the other side of it and ran along the edge of it. It was down below the main trail bordered by brush and trees and wads of vines.

The assholes had actually waited fifteen minutes, or so I estimated, because we could hear them running along the main trail. They hadn't figured out we had gone off the path, thinking maybe we were complete rubes. Soon they would realize our footprints weren't showing up, and they'd backtrack and find where we had dodged into the thicket.

On the other side of the thin run of water was another hill, but we didn’t go up that. If they were to come through the brush fast as we had, along the path we had made, they would see us up on that hill, and with their weapons they wouldn’t have to be close to get a bead on us. We continued along the edge of the little creek, leaving tracks, but too much in a hurry to worry about it. Finally the hill sloped off sharply, and there was a rent in the trees to the left of the creek. That’s the way we went, along another animal trail, this one much smaller than the first.

We eventually halted long enough to see if we could hear them coming. We couldn’t. They could have been sneaking, but I didn’t think so. They were confident and had been charging about like bulldozers. Not being able to hear them meant they had gone the wrong way, or had paused and were trying to figure which way we had taken. If they had any hunting skills at all, that wouldn’t take long.

“We ought to fix ourselves up,” I said.

“You got an idea?”

I found a small tree and bent it over until it snapped. Where the little tree had broken off there was a somewhat sharp point. I edged this keener and shaper with my knife, trimmed the small limbs off until I had a spear of about seven feet long and about half as thick as my wrist. Leonard did the same with another young, thin tree. When we had spears made, we started moving again. I was beginning to feel thirsty, and I might have been hungry as well. I couldn’t tell if the gnawing in my stomach was a need for food and water, or the churning acid of fear.

They found the way we went, because we could hear them back there. Pretty soon they would cross the creek and be on the path we were running along, and they could come quickly too, and they could shoot at us with the arrows or the pistol, and they could do it from a distance.

Without really talking about it, we found a path between two great oaks, and we took that. It didn’t go far before the trees were entwining and it was hard to go that way, but by then there was no going back. We kept at it and fought our way through. After that we came to the swamp we had crossed before and started wading into it. It wasn’t deep, but as before, it was a slow slog. Snakes were everywhere, though I only saw one moccasin; the rest of them were water snakes of one sort or another. The water was a scummy-silver in the sunlight.

Through the trees to our right was a slope, and down the slope were weeping willows, and between them you could see the lake. The slope actually rose up like a rim at first, and then where the water was high it flowed over a little in a shiny waterfall, more of a trickle really.

About halfway across the swamp, with thicker woods in sight, an arrow passed over my shoulder with a sound like someone sucking in their breath real hard. It missed me by less than an inch.

I glanced back, and there they were, stringing arrows and sending them at us. One clipped the top of Leonard’s ear, shooting up a little streak of blood. Leonard veered right and yelled for me to follow. To stay where it was swampy was suicide. They could stand where they were for a long time and have us in range as we mucked along.

Toward the slope we went. Another arrow slipped between us, close enough had I been an inch thicker I’d have been wearing it. We jumped down the slope, still holding our spears, slipping and sliding on our asses, coming to the willows below. We both laid on our backs and let the wet slope of wild grass coast us down. I went right through a split in willow trees and was jettisoned off into the lake with a splash as loud as if an anvil had been dropped from an airplane. I tried to cling to the spear, but lost it. Leonard was hung up between willows by his spear, the ends of it sticking out on either side of his body. He turned it so it was straight, pushed off, and was sailed out into the water near me.

By this time I realized the water along the bank was shallow because of sand deposits, and I had recovered my spear. When I looked up, the two of them were at the top of the slope. I could see them through the trees.

Aussie Hat was stringing his bow, and about that time Baseball Cap, who was standing too close to the edge, slipped, and down the slope he went on his belly, losing his bow and the arrow. I watched as he sailed perfectly between the trees I had gone through, and then he shot up and out, like he was doing an impression of Superman. I stuck the butt of my homemade spear in the sand, buried it deep, and lined that point up with him, the way a Masai warrior might do on dry land with a leaping lion.

He came down on top of the spear point with a hard impact. I could hear the thud of the spear, then a ripping sound. Baseball Cap screamed and the force of his hit rocked the spear backwards and I lost my grip and he went sailing over my shoulder, speared on my crude lance.

Leonard had managed his way back to shore, where he picked up the bow Baseball Cap had dropped. The bow had three arrows in the special rack on the side of the bow. Leonard pulled one into position as an arrow whizzed past him, lifted it and shot. His aim was terrible. He might as well have been trying to hit a gnat on the other side of the swamp.

“Hap,” he said, and gave me a look of frustration.

I half-walked and half-swam to him and took the bow and pulled another arrow in place, just as Aussie Hat, who had now dropped to one knee on the edge of the swampy slope, was aiming down at us. I don't know how to explain it, but I have an unerring aim with most weapons, rifles, shotguns, handguns, and from past experience, I knew I wasn't any slouch with a bow and arrow either. I pulled the arrow back, the bow cord groaning as I did, and let it go. The arrow flew straight with a whistling sound. Aussie Hat moved to one side, so it didn't hit him in the throat like I had hoped. Still, he took the shot in the shoulder, grunted, dropped his bow and fell back out of sight. His bow tumbled down the hill and caught up amidst the willows. We waited to see if he would show with the pistol, but he didn't. A few minutes later his hat came floating down on the water slide and hung up in some brush growing out of the side of the slope.

Edging my way along the bank, I found a place where I could get behind some trees. I strung another arrow from the bow rack, crouched, peeked between the trees and waited, but Aussie Hat didn't poke his head over the slope.

I looked back in the water. Leonard had gotten the spear I had stuck in Baseball Cap, and he was using it to guide the body to shore. Except Baseball Cap wasn't dead. He was stuck like a fly on a display pin. He groaned slightly and blood ran out of his mouth. His cap floated between his legs.

Leonard got hold of his head, pushed him under water and held him there. After a glance up the slope, assuring myself Aussie Hat wasn't in sight, I slipped back down and into the lake, and partly swam and partly walked over to them.

"Leonard," I said. "Let him go."

"He's going to die anyway."

"Let him die then. Let him go."

"You're no fun."

Leonard let him go and dragged him up so that his head and shoulders were on the bank. He stuck his arms through roots growing out from the bank, and they held him in place. The back end of the spear stood straight up out of his chest.

Baseball Cap, minus the cap, coughed blood and water. I eased over to him. He looked up at me.

"You're the only ones ever got away," he said.

"Told you we would," Leonard said.

"Goddamn it," he said. "Lois. She was all right."

He gulped big and was still, his eyes open and unmoving.

"One down," Leonard said.

Leonard and I went wide of each other, made our way up the slope. It was a hard go, but we made it by using the willows and wet roots sticking out of the grass on the incline. I had taken the quiver from Baseball Cap's body. It was one of those things where the arrows are well-fastened in them and are not easily able to fall out. They had survived his slide and his dunking in the water, not to mention a spear through him where the point came out of his back and moved the quiver to one side. I gave Leonard three arrows, and I took three. Leonard found Aussie Hat's bow, and he took that. Now we were both armed. Leonard couldn't have hit an elephant in the ass with one of those arrows, if he was standing twenty feet away, but it was something.

When I got to the top of the slope, Aussie Hat wasn't there, nor did he seem to be lying in hiding. He didn't take a shot at us from concealment.

It made sense to us that he would try and go back toward the barge. He was wounded now and it seemed smarter of him to try and escape than to stay with the hunt. But a guy like that, you couldn't be sure.

Wet to the bone, and sliming with the swamp and the lake, we stayed apart, but within eyeshot, and made our way back the way we had come. When we got out of the swamp water, we found blood in the brush and against trees. Aussie Hat was making his way back the way we had come. When we came to the last true trail we were on, we found him lying in the center of it with his back against a tree and the pistol clutched in his hand, his hand on his right thigh. The arrow I had shot was sticking out of his shoulder.

It was obvious he was dead.

"Bleed out," Leonard said.

I took the pistol. We decided we'd go back to the barge and get Mavis, and use the barge to make our way around to the part of the lake where our cabin was, but when we got to where the barge had been, it was gone. Lois's body was gone. The head of the poor murdered woman was still there.

Without any recourse, we started back through the woods, past Aussie Hat's body and on through the swamp. Eventually we passed the woman's headless body. It took some time, but finally we came to the cabin and our car. We didn't get anything out of the cabin. Leonard had the keys with him. I put the pistol on the seat between us, and Leonard, without a word, drove us out of there.

Not a whole lot to tell after that, but I will say this. We were jailed for three days. They wouldn't let us go and show them where the bodies were, and they didn't believe our story. It was obvious they thought if anyone was dead out there, it was because we killed them. They were partly right.

Finally they let Leonard call Marvin, our cop friend in LaBorde, and some words were exchanged between the chief there and Marvin. We spent another night in the cell, Leonard on one cot, me in the other across the way.

Silver lining was they gave us plenty of water to drink, and they were serving macaroni and cheese again for the third time in a row. For lunches we had been having peanut butter sandwiches with water, but it wasn't perfect. What kind of heathen serves a peanut butter sandwich without a glass of milk?

Marvin came, and at first that didn't help much, but finally he talked them into letting us lead them to the bodies. We showed them the woman's body first, and in that short time it had already started to decompose in the heat and as the two men had predicted, animals had been at it. It had been pulled about ten yards from where we had seen it last, and it was ripped up good. Ants and maggots had done their work as well. We took them on a guided tour that ended up with the bodies of the men, Baseball Cap still floating partially in the lake, and Aussie Hat still holding down his spot on the animal trail. The barge and Mavis, and Lois's body, were still gone, of course.

We described Lois and Mavis to the cops. Three days later, they found Lois's body on the barge, which had been abandoned, tied to the shore in a narrow cove off the lake, about a mile from where it had been the last time we saw it.

They found the skulls of other women at the spot where the barge had been parked. All the skulls had arrow or bullet holes in them. They finally took our detailed statement and let us go home.

To shorten it up, the two men's bodies were identified. Both had been in prison, and though there had been suspicions about them before for other crimes, none of those suspicions had anything to do with missing women. Nothing had been proved, but much had been considered.

Lois was discovered to have been a hard worker in the medical profession, a party girl who liked to run with a rough crowd, or so her co-workers said. No one really claimed to be her friend, but her penchant for men on the bad side was well known. And though the cops were certain once they found Lois it would lead to them finding Mavis, none of the people Lois worked with had heard of anyone named Mavis. In spite of her party girl persona, no one could believe Lois would be involved in what she was involved in. Mavis went unfound.

I checked six months ago and they still hadn't found her. I hope they do, but I have this odd and unfounded feeling they may not. I figure soon as those two men traveled down that trail, she had dragged Lois out of there as a sign of respect, and then sailed away, severing ties with the men because she had realized that she, same as Lois, was expendable, nothing more than a warm body to pass the time with.

Yet, she wasn't one of life's innocents. She may have taken Lois's body away from there, but I had seen her dance with a dead woman's skull, and didn't have one ounce of sympathy for her. I hoped she was somewhere in a dark room hanging from a rope with a turned-over chair at her feet.

Me and Leonard got lectures from the cops, but in the end we got a nice write-up as heroes in a few newspapers. Our involvement in the whole mess was ruled as two citizens trying to find out who the killers of the young woman were, and it was more importantly decided those two who had died at our hands were killed in self-defense, which was true enough.

The woman we had come upon, the dying lady, had been named Sally Ernst. She had a daughter. I wondered how the kid was doing.

So far, neither me nor Leonard have talked about going fishing again.

“You know I’ll love you, no matter what,” Brett said, “but I think maybe you ought to get something.”

“Something?” I said.

We were lying in bed. I had just made an attempt to make love to my wife and had failed. It was starting to be a regular thing. I had the urge, and just looking at her always warmed me up, but now my mind warmed, but the tool for the job didn’t.

“You aren’t a spring chicken anymore,” Brett said.

“But we aren’t that old, either,” I said.

“I know I’m not,” Brett said, “but we’re talking about you.”

“Oh, that’s nice.”

“Okay, here’s the thing. You can’t get the sock to fill up, you can always do other things.”

“I’m all for that,” I said, “and we already do other things, but what’s the end game for me?”

“Yeah, I guess it ought to be good for you too.”

“Ha, ha.”

“All I’m asking is you go see your doctor, ask him about it.”

“Don’t think I need pills.”

“You can be sure with a checkup.”

"What's he going to ask me do, get a hard-on in his office, jack me off? I don't think so. It's all guesswork."

"Right now, it's not any kind of work."

I turned on my side and looked at her. She showed me a Bugs Bunny grin.

"Love you," she said.

Who would have thought me worrying about my erection problem was going to lead to murder?

two

“I think I’m okay, just tired,” I said.

I was in the doctor’s office and he had me sitting on the end of one of those tables they have, a paper cover stretched over it. I was only wearing my shorts and socks, as he’d given me an overall exam. I noticed one of my socks had a hole where the big toe goes.

“You’re okay, but you can’t get it up?” Doctor Sylvan asked.

“I haven’t been able to get it up lately. It’s a phase.”

“How long is lately?”

“I don’t know, couple months.”

“You are older, but you know, we can fix that.”

“You can make me young again?”

“Very funny. All the king’s horses, and all the king’s men, they couldn’t put your ass together again.”

“You mean Viagra?”

“Perhaps. You know, Hap, been your doctor a long time, and we’re close. I can’t tell you how many times I’ve had my finger up your ass feeling your prostate—”

“Always my favorite part of an exam,” I said.

“And mine. You are about as affable as anyone I know, a little smart-mouthed, but considering I have that disease, I let that go. Thing is, though, there’s rumors all over town about you and Leonard.”

“About our clandestine sexual encounters in the men’s restroom at the bus station?"

"No. About how maybe you two have done some things that are, shall we say, on the dark side."

"Rumors. Said it yourself."

"Lot of rumors, and some from good sources, and listen here, any of what I've heard is true, you're doing what a lot of us would like to do."

"Really?"

"I too would love to fuck sheep, but, you know, I have to be careful, being a doctor."

"Oh, fuck you."

"Look. Not kidding. I know you and Leonard have had your moments with miscreants. I tend to believe those stories. Some of the scars you got, I didn't sew those up, and some of the work looks like it might have been done by a veterinarian."

"Their work looks different?"

"Not so much, but I can spot a different kind of stitch, also, some of those scars you got, they look to me to have been from knives, and gunshots."

"I've been in the hospital for being stabbed, Doc. You know that. You were there."

"Uh-huh, but a lot of those wounds, don't remember those."

"I was out of town. I live a clumsy life."

"Here's what I'm getting at, Hap. I'm all for giving you a pill that will turn your pecker into a Zeppelin, but I'm not eager to give out things like that if I think there might be another reason."

"You're buying that whole thing about me being tired?"

"Nope. You look pretty perky to me, and you're in good health for someone your age."

"I think Mickey Mantle said if he knew he was going to live this long he'd taken better care of himself."

"What I'm going to suggest is you see a therapist."

"A therapist? What the hell for?"

"If, and I say if, you have done what I think you've done, you might ought to talk to someone. Things like I think you might have done, and we'll say it in code, killing a lot of fucking people, might build on your conscience. This tough guy thing, I don't buy it."

"I'm not really trying to sell that image. And by the way, that wasn't code."

"No?"

"No."

"Gonna give you a name. See her a couple times, and there doesn't seem to be something under the surface, we'll talk about Viagra. Thing is, though, if it is something other than needing lead in your pencil, and this other stuff is causing it, it's probably affecting you in other ways as well."

He leaned over and tapped my head with his finger.

"Might be a lot of stuff in there you're dealing with and you just don't know it. Little therapy might help you do more than get a stiff one back."

"I don't know Doc."

"I'll go get her card."

three

The name on the card was Carol Cotton.

I sat out in the car in front of the doctor's office for a few minutes and looked at the card and thought about things. I could go see her, spend money I didn't want to spend, and really, what could she tell me that I didn't actually already know?

I had killed a lot of people.

I'm mixed on the whole idea of therapy. I think it's more of an art than a science, and I felt like I would be a kind of art project. Still, I knew of people therapists had helped, but I wasn't sure I was one of those it would do much for. As for those people who went to see them because they had been named after a successful father, and just couldn't live up to the name, or some such problem, fuck it. Get over yourself.

I had some real shit in my lunch pail.

I had done my killing in self-defense, and in some cases for justice. Saying that was the way I made myself feel better about it, but all of it haunted me from time to time, though I had learned as of late to deal with it better. It didn't quite settle the reptilian stirrings and the dark red memories at the back of my brain.

Recently, I had died and come back, gone way down there in the big deep dark, and had resurfaced, seeming whole, and feeling whole for quite some time. Then the deep dark rose up again.

That was the problem. I knew that as I sat there in my car in front of the doctor's office and wondered how I could explain that to anyone who had not been there. Leonard had been there, and talking to him helped. Both of us had been close to death a number of times, but the thing about Leonard was when something was over with, it was over for him. Oh, I can't say I know what all went on deep down in his brain, what memories he carried from being in a war, and what memories he carried since we had been friends, but whatever they were, he could tote that water better than me.

How do you tell those things to a shrink, let them in on your innermost thoughts? Tell them you have killed and nearly been killed, and that things would be fine for long periods of time, and then one day you can't get it up because you are riding the nightmares while solid awake. How do you do that?

I decided I couldn't.

I drove home.

Me and Brett had finished up a light dinner of salad and iced tea, and were about to sit on the couch and snuggle and watch television with bowls of popcorn, when my cell phone rang.

I picked it up and went into the living room and sat on the couch.

It was my doctor.

“Did you call her?” he asked.

“Who?”

“Don’t play games with me, Hap. You know who. Carol Cotton.”

“Are you minding my business after your business hours?”

“I am. I contacted her, didn’t tell her a damn thing about what your problem might be, didn’t mention the rumors, but told her you might call and set up an appointment.”

“That is nosey of you,” I said.

“I told her you’re a smartass.”

“So are you.”

“Yeah, but I wasn’t recommending me, I was recommending you.”

“I thought about it, but I didn’t call her.”

“You should. She’s good. I had a time or two when I talked with her.”

“Yeah?”

“Yeah. I got a few war memories.”

“It helped?”

“It did. It’s not like a headache, you go in and take one session like you take an aspirin and the headache quits. But it helps."

I listened to the microwave humming in the kitchen as Brett popped corn. I turned my head and watched her move about, filling our tea glasses up while the popcorn popped.

"You still there, Hap?"

"Yeah. Thinking. I hear you. I'm not miserable, but I'm not good either," I said.

"Call her."

Brett came into the living room as I clicked off the phone. She was carrying two bags of popped microwave corn. She gave me one, sat the other on the coffee table. She went back into the kitchen and came back with two glasses of iced tea. She placed them on the coffee table, sat down and tore open her bag of corn. The aroma of it filled the air, and the memory of trips to the theater in Marvel Creek filled my head, then faded away.

"Anything important?" Brett asked.

"The doctor. He gave me a card today. A shrink."

"Oh. How do you feel about that?"

"I don't know. I mean, do I tell a stranger about what I've done, what we've all done, and let her ride around with the guilt of being my doctor and not being able to say a thing about it to the law, and then me worry she might anyway? I don't know."

"Draw a line."

"What?"

"Decide you will tell only so much, and don't tell the stuff like that. Hint at it maybe. I don't know, but don't tell it all."

"Wouldn't that go against what I'd be trying to accomplish?"

"It could. Hell, Hap. I don't know. But I can tell you're aren't quite yourself, and I'm not just talking about sex. Doctor says you seem fine physically, then it might be in your head. You might need to get it out, or learn to find some place comfortable inside your head to put it, some way of dealing with it."

"I'll think it over," I said.

We watched an old silent film on a movie classics channel, The General with Buster Keaton.

I laughed a lot. Maybe a little too loudly.

I didn’t call Carol Cotton after all, but she called me two days later.

I was sitting at the kitchen table, sipping coffee, reading the New York Times headlines on my cell phone, when it buzzed and I answered.

After she introduced herself, I said, “I thought I was supposed to call you? I wasn’t sure I was going to.”

“Understand,” she said. She had a nice voice, and I couldn’t help but imagine that she was lying in bed as she called, nude, nice-looking. For all I knew, she was seventy-five years old, sitting on the toilet working out a big one, and that gave her the throaty sound, but I liked the other idea better. Of course, even if my gal let me date, I probably couldn’t get it up with a rope and a pulley.

“I’m not sure I need a doctor,” I said.

“That’s up to you, and frankly, it’s not why I called.”

“What else could you be calling for?”

“You’re a private investigator, right?”

“I work for an agency and I’m private, and I investigate with my boss, Brett Sawyer, and my brother, Leonard Pine, so I guess I am.”

It was still hard for me to think of myself as a private eye. In my mind, real private eyes, they actually knew something about investigation. All I knew was persistence. Also, unlike private eyes in stories, I didn’t drink or smoke cigarettes or chase women. I had the woman I wanted. I looked at the supplies and fantasized about it now and again, but I wasn’t shopping.

“That’s why I’m calling. I need your services. Maybe we could find a way to trade our expertise. If not, I can just pay you. But I need someone.”

“To do what?”

“To make sure I don’t get killed.”

six

"Who's trying to kill her?" Leonard asked.

Me and Leonard and Brett were at the office. They were seated. I was standing at the big glass window that looked out at the parking lot, two stories down.

"She doesn't know," I said.

"But someone is?" Leonard said.

"That's what she wants us to find out," Brett said.

I had already told Brett about the call, and what Carol Cotton had told me.

"We go over there around eleven, have an early lunch at her house, and she's going to give us the whole nine yards and a fat retainer," I said. "She has had threats and she doesn't know who it is. She said she had a whole roster of patients, some of which might want her dead, simply because they are disturbed, or have somehow latched onto her in an unhealthy way."

"Disturbed means crazy motherfuckers, right?" Leonard said.

"It just might," I said. "But she doesn't know it's a patient. That's merely a possibility. She may just want a bodyguard for a while. It could be nothing. I mean, the threats might be real, but then they might be idle. She thinks that's possible too, but reasonably, she wants that sorted out. She said someone killed her cat."

"That's low," Leonard said.

“Could be it merely died, she said, but she thinks it was poisoned. She admitted that because the cat is dead and the threats are real, she decided they were connected, but they might not be.”

Brett glanced at the clock on the wall.

“We better saddle up,” she said. “Hope she’s serving something good. I’m hungry.”

seven

Carol Cotton's therapy business looked to be booming. Had to be. She lived behind a high wall with an electronic gate. When I leaned out of my open window and told the speaker who it was, the gate snapped open instantly, and I drove us inside.

First thing we saw was a very nice three-story house only a little smaller than Buckingham Palace, but maybe with a better lawn.

We drove up the winding drive that curled around to the back of the house and parked next to a tennis court. On the other side of the court there was a pool house about the size of the house where Brett and I lived, and there was a large heart-shaped pool near the tennis court full of bright blue water. Between the pool house and the pool there was a gazebo with a table and chairs inside, a curtain of netting around the gazebo to keep out flies and mosquitoes.

Inside the netting a woman sat at a table. She had on a white pool robe and as we parked and got out of the car, she stood up, came through the netting and started walking around the pool to meet us.

As she walked toward us, the robe swung open and I saw she was wearing a two-piece bathing suit, and both of those pieces were having quite the workout. The bottoms were light on material and hid only the main goodie. The top barely contained her breasts the way a thimble contains a cantaloupe. Her hair was short and black and shaped her face beautifully. She had tanned skin and long legs. Perhaps there is a god after all.

"That can't be her," Brett said. "She looks to be in her twenties."

"Maybe she is real smart and got through college quick-like," I said.

"Has she cured your problem already?" Brett said.

"Very funny, dear."

As she got closer, she pulled the robe together and tied it with the cloth belt. Woman like that could make a eunuch grow balls.

"Pardon me for the informality," the woman said, extending her hand to Brett. "I let the time get away from me."

She and Brett exchanged names, and she was in fact Dr. Carol Cotton. She shook hands with me and Leonard. She had long fingers, warm to the touch, that wrapped around my hand like a sweet little spider.

"If you would like, you can wait under the gazebo and I'll dress and be right back out." I will say this, she didn't have that nice throaty voice I had heard on the phone, but it wasn't bad.

We agreed it was fine that we would wait for her. She sashayed to the main house and we trucked on out to the gazebo.

Inside the netting, Brett said, "She let the time get away from her? Shit. I think she just wanted to show off the merchandise."

"It is nice merchandise," I said.

"You think you aren't getting any now," Brett said, "keep at it."

Leonard said, "How about them Mets?"

"She isn't what I expected," Brett said. "I've decided you don't need therapy. Not with her, anyway. I had in mind someone like Doctor Ruth."

"She's dead," I said.

"No. It just seems that way."

Leonard said, "Aren't we here about something else other than Hap's pecker? Threats?"

"She doesn't look all that scared to me," Brett said. "Sitting out here in her underwear."

"That's a high-priced bathing suit," I said.

"How would she have felt had I worn mine to this meeting," Brett said.

"Jealous," I said.

"Oh, you are winning back some points," Brett said.

It was then that Dr. Cotton came out of the main house and headed toward us. She had put on jeans and a white tee-shirt and was still wearing the pool shoes.

When she pushed aside the netting and stepped into the gazebo, she wore a big smile but no bra; she bounced under the shirt. This was either a woman comfortable in her own skin, or something of an exhibitionist.

"Thanks for coming," she said. "Linda is bringing out lunch."

Linda was a short, stocky Mexican lady whose birth name was probably not Linda. She came out with a younger woman who looked like a younger version of her, minus the stocky. She was cute and had a nervous smile, and like Linda, she had a tray with food on it. She said her name was Mindy.

The two women looked at Dr. Cotton, both with expressions that were hard to read, except to say they were uncomfortable.

"Thanks so much, ladies," Dr. Cotton said.

The women put the trays on the table and we thanked them and they smiled.

"They are so sweet," Dr. Cotton said.

The sweet ladies stepped off quickly and went into the house while Dr. Cotton told us about how much she liked tennis and swimming, and then from the house a woman dressed in jeans and a loose, blue top, blonde hair swinging around her shoulders, was walking fast toward us.

Leonard had just picked up a finger sandwich when the woman came through the netting carrying a tote bag. She looked at Dr. Cotton, and said, “Katherine. Sugar Muffin. You know better than this.”

Dr. Cotton, a.k.a. Katherine, giggled, got up and nodded at us, walked by and touched my face with the back of her hand, and then she was through the netting and heading toward the house.

The blonde lady, who was a fine-looking woman herself, probably in her forties, said, “So sorry. You might say that’s one of my patients. I’m Dr. Cotton.”

eight

"Does this mean we're still having brunch," Leonard said. "I'm damn sure hungry."

The real Dr. Cotton laughed, and sat down. "Of course. That woman is my niece as well as a patient. It's a long story. She was supposed to be in her room. She isn't really sick, she just has . . . well, a need to be noticed."

"Don't we all?" Brett said.

"Not like her. She has to be the constant center of attention. I probably shouldn't tell you much about her condition, but, since she's my niece, and not really an official patient, I can say it. She's sexually dysfunctional, or what they used to call an exhibitionist with nymphomaniac tendencies."

"Is that a bad thing?" I said. "I mean, it sounds functional."

Brett slapped me on the shoulder with the back of her hand.

"Don't mind him," Brett said. "I rescued him from a wolf den, where he was raised."

The doctor laughed, and she had an even throatier voice than on the phone; it seemed to come from someplace dark but sweetly nasty. "I'm really more of a caretaker, and I am her therapist as well, but not in an official way. It's personal, and I'm aware that I have limitations when I'm dealing with my own family. She has an official therapist for that."

"Is it helping?" Brett asked.

"Sometimes you don't know until you do know," Doctor Cotton said.

"I know that sounds vague, but that's how it works."

Leonard was eating another sandwich when Carol said, "Go ahead. Dig in."

We ate and drank ice tea for a bit, and then I said, "Doctor. Seems to me you're playing it pretty loose here if you're being threatened."

"The wall around the house is reasonably high, and there are cameras and alarms. So, I don't know there's much more I can do as far as normal security. That's why I want to hire your agency."

She said that like we were part of some big network of investigators.

"Tell us about the threats," Leonard said. He had moved onto the cookies by this time. He ate one delicately, nibbling around the edges. Had it been a vanilla cookie, especially a vanilla wafer, he'd have been all over it like a termite on rotten wood.

"I have my office here, and I've decided to put my practice on hold for the time being—briefly, I hope. I have inherited money, so that's not the problem, but wanting to get back to my patients is, but right now I'm scared to let anyone in that isn't vouched for. Doctor Sylvan was your voucher. But frankly, I'm just being cautious. I don't think it has anything to do with my patients. I don't have any with violent tendencies, nor have I ever felt any of them pose a threat. What happened was I began to receive things in the mail. . . . A dead rat in box. A letter with a photo of my face attached to a nude foldout from some men's magazine. And then it got worse. Notes made from letters cut from magazines or newspapers, very crude notes saying what they wanted to do to me."

"You have them?" Brett said.

Doctor Cotton picked up the tote bag and rummaged through it and came out with a fist full of letters. She handed them to Brett. They were all copies.

“Where are the originals?” Brett asked.

“Police. I went to them first.”

“Wise idea,” Brett said, and she began splitting up the notes, handing me and Leonard a few. “They didn’t find prints, anything like that?”

“Nothing,” Doctor Cotton said.

I looked at the notes. They were all vulgar and said things about what they’d like to do with her, and maybe they were sexual, and maybe they were just mean, and maybe they were lots of things I couldn’t figure, but one thing was certain, they were indeed threating. Some had photos taken of Doctor Cotton in public, and they had arrows drawn through her body, and one spelled out how the note maker would like to cut Doctor Cotton’s head off and shove it up her ass, and how there was a way to do that if the ass was cut open wide enough. It was more than a prank, that was sure. Were they meant merely to unsettle Doctor Cotton? Maybe, but she was wise to take them seriously.

“When did you get the last one?” Brett said.

“Yesterday,” she said.

Doctor Cotton leaned over her bag and came out with one last note, as if it were the saved pièce de résistance, and handed it to Brett. “I copied it, and had it sent to the police as well.”

It was a note like the others, only it had a photo stapled to it. It wasn’t a very good photo, but it was of the area where we now were. It had been taken at night, and as I said, not a good photo, but clear enough to recognize the location. Someone had been inside the walls.

"Damn, girl," Brett said. "And what did the police say about this one?"

"They came in, took a look, and they have a patrol car drive by, but that's it. Something to do with their budget."

"Yeah, chief before Marvin Hanson, who's there now, spent all their money on riot gear, as if that's our big problem here in LaBorde," I said. "They even have a military assault vehicle. I think it did get used once to take everyone at the cop shop to Dairy Queen for ice cream. All that money was eaten up for stuff like that, you know, but not real police work."

"All I know," Doctor Cotton said, "is I'm scared. I have a gun in this bag. I carry it in my purse when I go out, and frankly, I rarely go out. I have it on me at all times. And I hate guns. I've become paranoid."

"Being paranoid don't mean they ain't out to get you," Leonard said.

"Popular therapy joke, actually," she said. "What I figured is maybe you could find out who this is, and in the meantime, give me some protection. I can pay whatever you require."

"You know," Leonard said, "I don't want to be a jackass about this, but did you consider maybe your niece?"

"I knew that might be your thought. Police had the same one. But she's harmless. I love her, and she loves me. I take care of her since my sister couldn't. She became very ill, and then died."

"All right," Leonard said, but like me, I knew he was thinking just because you don't think a person is dangerous or incapable of a thing, didn't mean they weren't dangerous and capable. But, on the other hand, the doctor struck me as someone who knew her business.

"What we can do," Brett said, "is start by giving you a bodyguard, and in the meantime, we can see if we can figure out what's what."

"I still don't know why the police couldn't do it," Doctor Cotton said. "Budget or no budget."

"Because they have a number of crimes to attend to, bureaucracy, and we don't," Brett said. "We can devote pretty much full time to it."

"Thing I figure," Leonard said, "is I'll stick around first, as a bodyguard, and I'll need to look through the house, get the lay of the land, that sort of thing."

"Of course," Doctor Cotton said.

"I will need a couple boxes of vanilla wafers."

"We'll provide those," I said.

"You know, I think I have a box, for banana pudding," Doctor Cotton said.

"If I wasn't gay," Leonard said, "you'd be the woman of my dreams."

nine

Leonard stayed behind with a pistol of mine he took from the glove box, and me and Brett drove over to the police station, caught Chief Marvin Hanson in.

"Hey," he said after we were buzzed into his office, "one of my favorite people, Brett Sawyer, and one of my least favorite, Hap Collins."

"It never grows old," I said.

We were in his office and we all took chairs, and Brett told him we were taking the job with Doctor Cotton.

"Ah. Well, I hate we couldn't do more. I tried to have a cop put there for a week, but the money folk didn't like that idea. They agreed to having a car drive by a couple times a day. I send it a little more than that, a lot more than that, but it depends on someone trying to do something bad while they're driving by, and being visible while they're doing it. She's got a good rock fence and all, but frankly, someone wanted to get over it and inside, it's not that hard. Course, she's got the alarm and the cameras, but that wouldn't stop someone determined and didn't care if they were seen, and from the nature of those notes, I'm thinking it's a nut. It could be someone merely trying to scare her, get her goat, but I recommended you guys to her."

"As did Doctor Sylvan," I said. "Well, indirectly."

"We were wondering if you had any ideas," Brett said. "Thought we'd start with you, and also so you can let your drive by know we'll be around. We don't want to get shot doing our job, cops thinking we're someone else."

"I'll do that the minute you leave," he said. "As for anything else, we had the original notes dusted for fingerprints, but they only had Doctor Cotton's on them, her niece, who is a piece of work, and her servants. The niece ended up opening a couple of the letters herself. Doctor Cotton says she does that. She invades privacy, among other things. I'm afraid that's all I got. Other than saying it all feels screwy. Since your main man isn't with you, I assume you left him at the doctor's place."

"Good assumption," I said.

"Well, that's a good choice," he said.

"Did you consider the kooky niece could be behind this?" I said.

"Did, but nothing led there. Then again, as you know, we were sort of in and out."

"That's what she said," Brett said.

"Really, Brett," Hanson said.

"Yeah. I know. Been around Hap too long."

"Five minutes around him or Leonard is too long," he said.

"All right," Brett said. "Good enough. We're out of here."

ten

So, we got it going, the three of us taking turns for the first few days, and then we got Leonard's boyfriend, Officer Curt Carroll, known to us as Pookie, to come in now and again on his day off.

Me and Leonard and Brett had the one pistol between us, as we felt that was sufficient fire power. We traded out each time we had the changing of the guard. Pookie, he had his own gun and always brought snacks, even though anything he could have wanted was provided by Doctor Cotton.

After a couple weeks, we hadn't seen a thing, and Doctor Cotton hadn't received another message. Each time it was my turn, I spent at least an hour a day fighting off Katherine, a.k.a. Sugar Muffin, who would have screwed a doorknob and called it sweet baby.

Brett said she even tried it on her, but Brett said she told her, "I'm on duty, and the only thing you're going to get off me is a black eye for taking my mind off the job."

Brett also assured her that she was batting for a standard team.

Harsh, but effective. Sweet Baby decided she was through bothering Brett.

Leonard said she tried it on him, but he was on a different team too. He said, "Hey, I only suck dicks," and it was over for him. He said Pookie had a similar experience, and he had to explain his position being similar to Leonard's, though I suspect his comments were kindlier. Pookie is a nice person.

That left me. She knew my affiliation.

It was a big house, and when on duty we wandered throughout, not really expecting anybody, but it was part of the job, checking the place for ninja assassins in the sock drawer or the shower stall.

What I figured, due to the nature of the threats, was whoever was doing this would hope to scare his target for a while, then maybe come in by means of subterfuge, claiming to be someone they weren't, or catching Doctor Cotton out doing errands. We put an end to the errands, took them over for her.

One late morning, Sweet Muffin made the usual play for my Johnson. We were both sitting on the couch. Suddenly she was sitting very close. I could smell her perfume and something more primal drifting off of her.

She put her hand on my thigh.

I turned and looked at her. Her eyelids were heavy and her lips seemed fat and desirable. I like to think it wasn't just my erection problem that cause me to make the choice I did.

I gently lifted her hand off my leg and placed it on the couch, said, "My gal doesn't let me date."

"She wouldn't need to know."

"But I'd know."

Katherine turned to pout mode and moved away from me and sat on the far end of the couch. She said, "I'm not being threatened. I should be able to go out."

"They might use you to get to your aunt," I said. "Sorry, we got to wait until they make a play or the threat seems to be gone."

"Haven't heard from them in a week," she said.

"That's not very long."

"It is when you're horny."

"Don't you have any toys?"

"Plenty, but I've never found it to be the same."

"We can agree on that," I said. "But really, Katherine, you have to go somewhere else and play."

"I don't think I like you, Hap."

"There's a club you can join," I said.

She got huffy then and left the room.

Doctor Cotton was entering the room as Katherine was going out.

"I heard her," she said, "and I'm sorry."

"Not a problem. I figure she's doing the best she can about the whole business. I think she's tired of being cooped up in here."

"I know I am," she said, "and I'm sure you are."

I shrugged. "It's the job. Beats working at the chicken plant."

"I'm about to make myself lunch. Would you like a sandwich?"

"I would," I said.

We went into the kitchen and I sat on one of the stools at the long bar there.

Doctor Cotton opened the refrigerator and pulled out some cheese and lunch meat, slices of tomato, mustard and mayonnaise, a few odds and ends, put those on the bar. Then she got bread from the shelf by the refrigerator and put that with the other goods, grabbed us both Diet Cokes.

We had done this routine before with me and her.

She placed silverware on the table with plates, and we made ourselves sandwiches.

"Katherine really can't help it. It's the same as if she were an alcoholic."

"I understand," I said.

"But you played it right. I'm sure that's not the first time you've had to with her."

"We've all had to," I said. "But it's fine."

"So, Leonard and Curt?"

"She's hit on both of them, even though they're gay."

"I think she likes the challenge, Hap. And she can't help herself. So, Leonard and Curt, they are a serious item?"

"We call Curt Pookie. And yes. They are an item. Pookie really seems to make Leonard happy."

"And you and Leonard are good friends?"

"We are closer than good friends. We're like brothers."

"Yeah. Well, it's obvious Leonard is crazy about Curt. Sometimes he stays a second shift when Pookie is here."

"It won't keep them from doing their job," I said.

"Oh, I know that. I didn't mean that. I like it. It's sweet."

"This is a red-letter day. Someone has called Leonard sweet."

"I was wondering, why no more messages? They came like clockwork before."

"I was wondering the same thing. Whoever has been threatening you knows we're here, and they haven't bothered. I think whoever is doing it needs to scare you, and with us here, I don't think you getting a note or some such is going to be the same to them. They know you have us to fall back on. They want you on your own and afraid."

“Do you think it’s one of the servants? I can’t imagine that, they’re so nice, and I like to think well paid and appreciated, but I won’t lie. I wondered.”

“That was considered, of course, and Brett looked into it. Nothing seemed to point in that direction. They appear to be hardworking people, end of story. No. This is someone who knows you, or knows of you, and they want you scared, distracted.”

“You’re still thinking Katherine?”

“I don’t really know what I’m thinking,” I said. “But there’s something screwy about the whole thing. Who could be that mad at you, and why?”

“I don’t know. I really don’t. I’ve been taking care of Katherine ever since my sister died. She had her problems, but I have a hard time believing it has to do with her. Still, the notes and threats have stopped since you’ve been here, and she’s been under closer surveillance, not allowed to leave.”

“We really can’t tell her she can’t leave, but we don’t mind giving her that impression. Maybe . . . well, let’s say we consider her. Why would she do such a thing?”

Doctor Cotton shook her head.

“Could she be mad at you for monitoring her sex life? Mad at you because she’s obviously immature for her age and doesn’t like being told no? Another thing is there’s no one on your cameras from past events, no recordings of anyone that shouldn’t be there, I mean. Whoever is doing this knows how to avoid the cameras. Have to so they can put notes in your mailbox.”

“Meaning my niece again.”

"She has to be considered."

Doctor Cotton nodded. "I suppose so."

We ate lunch and went on about our day, and things continued like that for another two weeks, and no note.

But the next week, on Wednesday, a note was found in the drive when Leonard drove in to trade places with Brett. I got a call, and joined them.

The message was not sealed, but was inside a loose-flapped manila envelope. Leonard gave it to Brett and Brett looked at what was inside. Then I showed up where they were waiting for me in the driveway outside the gate. Brett showed me and Leonard what was inside the envelope. It was certainly a surprise. I got back in my car and drove inside and parked near their cars.

We went and got Doctor Cotton, who was dressed in a white tennis outfit, and we all went out to the gazebo. Brett placed the envelope on the table.

"Would you check your cameras from last night until now before you look at the envelope?" Brett said.

Doctor Cotton got up and went inside to look at her monitors.

We sat there a while and I tried to tell a joke, but neither Leonard nor Brett would listen. After quite a while, Doctor Cotton came back.

"The cameras were turned off last night," she said.

"Do they switch off inside or outside, or more than one place?" Brett asked.

"No."

"Okay," Brett said, and tapped the envelope.

Doctor Cotton pulled the envelope to her and opened it, looked at what was inside. The tan drained out of her face, her lips trembled and she let out a little gasp, one hand going to her chest as if to hold her heart in place.

“Oh, my god,” she said.

eleven

It happened kind of quick. Doctor Cotton was on her feet, stomping across the concrete, and then the grass, toward her house. After a moment, Brett said, "I think Sugar Muffin is about to get the shit stomped out of her."

"We better stop it," I said.

"Let's give her a moment."

When we heard the screeching inside the house, we sauntered over, went through the sliding back doors. Katherine was in the living room and Doctor Cotton had her by the hair and had pulled her head to the side, and with her other hand she was knocking knots on Sugar Muffin's head faster than a cobra can strike.

Brett went over and caught Doctor Cotton's arm with her own, and then she twisted and threw Doctor Cotton over the back of the couch and onto it. The good doctor rolled off the couch and onto the floor.

Sugar Muffin went for Brett, as if to claw her. Brett stuck a finger in Sugar Muffin's jugular notch, causing her to gag and go to one knee.

"Uh-uh, sister," Brett said. "You might find yourself in need of a nose job and a wig."

Katherine sat on the floor and started crying. By this time, Doctor Cotton had gotten up, brushed herself off, straightened her tennis dress and fluffed her hair. She was once again a professional.

"I apologize for that," Doctor Cotton said.

"Nah, that's all right," Leonard said. "Brett can handle herself, and Sugar Muffin had it coming.”

twelve

I suppose you could call it puppy love, sweet, sweet, puppy love, but not exactly the kind you might be thinking. They were photos of a woman, obviously, photos of Doctor Cotton in her teens, nude, lying partly across a bed with a Rottweiler mounting her. I shit you not.

There were several shots that showed Doctor Cotton's good angles, and the Rottweiler's as well. I think the dog looked best from the left side. He looked happy in his work. His tongue was hanging out.

There was also a note inside the envelope requesting five hundred thousand dollars or the photos would hit the internet with explanations of who was in them. Something like that could be devastating. At least the dog wasn't around for the humiliation, though my guess is he could have gotten over it.

Within minutes the lady servants appeared, drawn by the racket. Linda and her daughter stood close enough together they were almost Siamese twins.

Doctor Cotton looked at them and smiled. "It's quite all right," she said. "A bit of a misunderstanding."

"Yes, ma'am," Linda said, took her daughter's elbow and walked her out of the room.

Doctor Cotton didn't look directly at us when she said, "I can't tell you how embarrassed I am. About those old photos, and doing what I did."

"Like I said," Leonard said. "She had it coming."

Doctor Cotton went out of the house and we followed her to the gazebo. We all sat in chairs. She picked up the envelope, said, “I was young and stoned, and my boyfriend had a dog. Katherine is not the only one who had problems with exhibition and what you might call kinky sex. I was pleasing someone important to me, doing what I thought I was supposed to do. He took some of the photos. The rest were taken by my sister, Katherine’s mother. She did it for the same someone. My god, a Rottweiler.”

I wondered if she would have felt better had it been a German shepherd. Somehow, I couldn’t imagine a chihuahua that could do the work without a footstool.

“I didn’t know those pictures still existed. They must have been in my sister’s stuff. After she died. She died of a drug overdose. I had her stuff brought here. Her personal items. Katherine has been looking through those. I encouraged her do that. To get in touch with her mother that way, to deal with her death. But those photos, I thought I had destroyed all the copies. They were taken before the internet was the big thing and there were only a few copies, or so I thought, and I was sure I had destroyed them.”

“Could it be the person who you made these photos for?” Brett said.

“No. It can’t be him. He died years ago. Car wreck.”

“Why would your sister keep them?” Brett said.

“To hold them over my head at some point. She was always jealous of me, my becoming a doctor, changing my life. Taking control of my sexual problems. It had a lot to do with how we were raised. Part of a commune that lasted up into the nineties. Way past the expiration date. It was started in the early seventies by a preacher, a hippie preacher. Only he was more of a pervert. Cult leader. He thought all the females were his, like we were cows and he was the bull. I was very young when he started having sex with me.

Eleven. My sister was a year older. It messed us up, and in turn, my sister messed up Katherine. It's complex, but those are the roots, an explanation in a peanut hull."

"The preacher was for the dog business?" Leonard said.

"Yes," she said. "He took some of the photographs."

"Bless the beasts and the children," Leonard said.

I elbowed him.

"One thing, though," Brett said. "It looks as if it's been your niece all along."

"It does," Doctor Cotton said. "She could only have gotten those photos out of my sister's things. What an idiot. Like I wouldn't know where they came from, wouldn't figure she was behind all this. Oh, hell, sure she knew I'd know. Goddamnit. She wanted me to know. She constantly torments me. I don't know why I put up with her. I should put her out. I really should, but I don't know where she'd go, what she'd do. She's pretty helpless, really. I'm all she's got."

"That's one way of looking at it," Leonard said.

"What do you mean?" Doctor Cotton said.

"I think she's an ungrateful shit," he said. "She gets out there and has to asshole and elbow it a bit, she might get over a lot of things."

"It's not that simple, Leonard," Doctor Cotton said. "It's like telling you to stop being gay."

"No," Leonard said. "It ain't a damn thing like that."

Doctor Cotton sat with her head hung. I think she was beyond argument now, beyond believing she knew shit from wild honey or piss from lemonade.

After a while, she picked up the envelope from the table and put it in her lap. “I suppose I won’t be needing your services anymore.”

“Listen,” Brett said. “I know it seems obvious your niece has been behind this, but maybe she isn’t.”

“No one else would have the photos,” Doctor Cotton said. “They had to be in my sister’s stuff. It’s her.”

“Still, there might be more to it.”

“No. It’s Katherine. My sister reaching out through her beyond the grave. I would like to ask that you never mention this. I’m going to destroy the photos, look through my sister’s stuff, see if there’s anything else of this sort. I hate to admit it, but there might be. This gets out, my career is over. Not to mention my life. I won’t be needing you anymore. Please leave, and send me your final bill.”

“All right,” Brett said. “But if you think there’s more to it, need us back, you have our number.”

“I do,” Doctor Cotton said. “But I won’t be calling.”

thirteen

We thought it was over.

It wasn't.

We'll come back to that.

That night Brett and I lay in bed in the dark. She lay with her hand across my chest. She said, "Why would you fuck a dog? Is that some kind of neurosis? You didn't get a puppy when you were little? Dog was the only one that seemed to love you? What is that all about?"

"Like I'd know. I think it has to be about pleasing whoever asked her to do that, the preacher. Probably did as she was told, thought it was god's will because it was coming from a man of the cloth. Hell, she had been groomed to be a plaything, like her sister. Others I presume."

"I can see nymphomania being a mental or emotional condition, but dog fucking. How do you get there?"

"Again, not about the dog," I said.

"When you're getting off, you look a little like that dog," Brett said.

"Do I?"

"Oh yeah."

"Grrrrrrr."

"Down, Rex, or I'll get the rolled-up newspaper."

"The problem is I haven't been able to get it up, let alone off."

"I thought the growl was a sign of things to come, so to speak."

"Dogs growl to fool people into thinking they are fierce. And you know what else, I lost my therapist to be. So now I don’t get to find out why losing my teddy bear at three is keeping me from laying pipe.”

“Poor baby.”

“Don’t worry. We’ll get there. The other day when you bent over at the stove, I thought I felt it rustle in my jeans.”

“This is where I say things are looking up.”

“It’s not you that’s the problem,” I said. “Wanted you to know that.”

“Hell, I know that,” Brett said.

fourteen

The next day was the day of the discovery of the mass murder. Murders happen in LaBorde and on its outskirts with greater frequency than would be expected. But nothing like this.

We had just made it to the office. I was standing at the window looking out at the parking lot. Leonard had parked outside and was walking toward the stairs. I watched him saunter. Today he had on his fedora. That and cowboy hats were what he rocked best.

By the time I heard him coming up the stairs, the office phone rang. I turned and watched Brett pick it up.

The moment Leonard came in the door, Brett said, “Oh hell. Yeah. We’ll be there.”

Chief Marvin Hanson wanted us there due to our association with the victims. Pookie was there too. He wasn’t in uniform. Marvin had us all meet at the curb in front of Doctor Cotton’s house.

We could see the cop cars parked directly in front of the house, but not in the drive leading to the gate. Pookie was standing with Marvin on the short lawn that divided the curb and the big house. From a distance, they looked like a salt and pepper shaker.

We parked down the street some distance from the house and walked over.

“So, what exactly?” Brett said, after we had all nodded at one another.

“You saw them last yesterday?” Hanson asked.

Brett nodded, started answering Hanson's questions. They're the things you expect a cop to ask. None of us believed he thought we did it, but certain questions had to be asked.

"Can your people tell when this happened?" I asked.

"Not yet," Hanson said, "but since everyone was in night clothes, they think last night."

"Doctor Cotton and a young white woman?" I said.

"And another woman," he said. "Mexican. Cuban. Whatever."

"Hispanic," Pookie said.

"There you go," Hanson said.

"The Hispanic lady?" I asked. "Older, younger?"

"Middle aged, I guess. Certainly not getting any older."

"Probably Linda," Pookie said. Like us, he hadn't seen inside, and because he had been helping us part time, he was not at this point allowed to be part of the case, lest there was some great conspiracy between him and us.

"I'm going to need you folks to put on some footies and a paper suit and come with me," Marvin said. "Since you knew them a little, I need some identification."

fifteen

The paper suit was blue, which brought out Pookie's eyes. The suits rustled when we moved, and the footies made crunchy sounds as we walked.

We went through the open gate and just inside the gap was a large pile of cut flowers heaped on the driveway, wilting in the heat. They were all manner of colors. There were enough flowers there for an Easter Parade float. A cop was there filming the flowers and moving the camera around to take in other things.

"What's the flowers about?" Brett said.

"No idea," Marvin said.

We were led by Marvin to the pool.

He stopped and stood at the edge and we joined him, looked down. In the pool, strapped with duct tape to a chair, was Doctor Cotton's nude body. The chair sat on the bottom of the pool and there was blood in the water, and though there was a lot of blood, there was more water. The blood gave the water a thin, crimson sheen you could see through. Doctor Cotton's hair floated up like seaweed above her head. The blood was spreading slowly. Pieces of flesh had been peeled back from her face and breasts but were still attached; the pieces drifted in the water.

Taped to another chair, this one turned over, was Linda, fully clothed. Through the thin haze of blood, I could see her eyes. They were open and the whites appeared red. She hadn't been cut up from what I could tell, maybe a closer look would reveal otherwise.

"It didn't happen here," Brett said. "Not enough blood."

"You been reading again, haven't you?" Hanson said.

"I've seen a thing or two," she said.

"Come on," Hanson said.

We went in the house, on back to one of the bedrooms. It was neat, even Katherine's corpse was neat. It lay on the bed with her hands crossed over her chest. She almost looked peaceable, except for the bullet hole in the center of her forehead. Where the bullet had exited the back of her head, the blood had soaked into the pillow, into the sheets and the mattress. There was a lot of it. You could smell it in the air, a kind of coppery smell.

"Now here's a surprise I saved," Hanson said.

He walked us around to the other side of the bed. A young Hispanic male lay on the floor, face down. He didn't look as tidy. His leg was bent and his arms were spread. His head was turned to one side and we got a good look at his face. What was left of it. He had been shot with a larger caliber in the back of the head, and the entry had scooped some skull, but the exit wound had knocked a hole in the front of his face about the size of two fists pressed together.

"Who is this?" Hanson said.

"Ain't anyone we know," Leonard said. "Or if we knew him from somewhere else, we don't recognize him now 'cause he hasn't got much of a face. Right gang?"

Brett, Pookie and I nodded.

"This," Hanson said, "is what we in police work call a goddamn mystery."

"Do you?" I asked.

“No,” Hanson said. “I just thought it sounded cool. We already ran his fingerprints. His name is Jaime Cabalas. Ring any bells?”

“Nope,” I said.

Pookie raised his hand. “My bell rang. We arrested him and his brother, separate times. The brother for breaking and entering, the younger brother, the fellow you see napping before you, on shoplifting cold medicine. He had a face then. Nice-looking kid.”

“So, his dear old mother had a cold,” Leonard said.

“Probably not,” Pookie said. “He stole a case of it out of the back of the store’s warehouse. The case meaning several boxes taped into one container setting on a forklift. He also stole the forklift. Might have got away with it had he driven the forklift into the back of an enclosed truck, but no, he drove the forklift down the road. It being a forklift, and it being about three in the morning, he was thought suspicious right off. The only thing missing was a pirate flag waving off the back of the forklift.”

“That happened when?” I asked.

“Some time back,” Pookie said. “Spent some time in jail, but he paid off the theft, and got out pretty quick, all things considered. He was going to sell the cold medicine to some tweekers to make meth. I guess the forklift was going to be his around town ride. He’s been a good boy since then.”

“He’s a really good boy now,” Leonard said.

“Going to show you another little something,” Hanson said. “I shouldn’t, but hey, if you’re going to get the tour, why not the whole tour. And, you knew Doctor Cotton, and maybe you’ll shake an idea loose if I show you around.”

“Didn’t know her that well,” I said.

“Knowing her at all is more than I know,” Hanson said.

In another room, we saw a large painting had been removed from the wall and leaned against a dresser. There was a place in the wall with a large safe stuffed in it. The huge painting had obviously hidden it. The door to the safe was wide open.

“There was money in it at one point, is going to be my guess,” Hanson said. “I think they tortured the folks here to find the safe, to get inside. It hasn’t been blown, so I think it had to be cracked, or more than likely Doctor Cotton or Katherine gave it up and they took what they wanted, what they had been blackmailing her about.”

I told Hanson about all that, about the dog picture.

“Ah, a nice family portrait,” Hanson said.

“Thing I got to wonder about,” Leonard said, “what’s the Mexican boy doing here, and how did he end up dead?”

“He ended up dead because someone shot him in the face,” Hanson said.

“Ah,” Leonard said. “Part of the mystery solved.”

“Someday I think I’ll get tired of you jokesters,” Hanson said.

“Our personalities remain fresh,” I said.

“And I have good legs,” Brett said. “And I’m smart.”

“Yeah,” Hanson said, “but that don’t explain the other two guys or why you hang around with them.”

“Hap has nice legs,” she said.

As we came out of the house, I said, “Linda’s daughter works here too. Didn’t see her. I’d find out if she’s home and okay.”

“I’ll do that,” Pookie said. “I’ll do it now.”

"You're not on duty," Hanson said.

"I can be, though," Pookie said.

"Cameras?" I said. "Anything there?"

"Another sweet thing, the cameras and the alarms were turned off. So, nada. Come on, let's stroll."

We left the house, and as we neared the front gate, one of the uniforms came over and said to Hanson, "We got a little treat for you, Chief."

He walked us over to where the shrubbery was thick and up close to the fence. Between the fence and the shrubbery, off the ground due to being caught up in the shrubbery, was a dead man. Or he was very good at being still and looking dead.

A closer look.

Nope. Dead.

He had a large hole in his chest and his mouth was twisted into what could have passed as an ironic smile.

"Seems to have been trying to climb over the fence, and someone popped him, fell back here," said the uniform. "My guess is the shooter, and maybe some compatriots, hoofed it out pretty quick after this, as I don't think this was a silenced weapon. Lady down the road said she heard some loud pops about four a.m. last night."

Hanson said, "Okay, does anyone know him?"

"Yep," Pookie said, "That, sir, is Vincent Cabalas, the young faceless Cabalas's older brother."

"I can see the family resemblance," Hanson said. "They both have a hole in them."

That night I dreamed the world was full of marching people, marching around the globe in circles, and I was with them, and we marched over the oceans because they were covered in concrete.

We were in rows, all of us marchers, but we were no more than an elbow length apart. We were marching and we couldn't stop marching. Space kept getting smaller, filling up, and there were people with whips. Fat people with meat-greasy lips and protruding eyes, very froglike, very satisfied looking, and the rest of us were part of this marching system, and I realized our marching was turning the world, and all of us were making it happen, the world turning for the fat frogs who I guess owned everything, and as we marched, our clothes were rotting off some of us, and there were some men and women marching who were completely nude, and the flesh was falling off many of them, as if their skin was the same as the rotting rags. As I marched, I began to wish for a plague to kill the fat frogs, maybe kill us all, and then I came awake.

I got up and went to the bathroom and washed my face and sat on the commode with the lid down, sat there and gathered myself. I felt as if I were trying to figure my place in the new world, one where everything that was good seemed to be going backward, and everything that was bad was moving forward at a high rate of speed, and all the poor people, all those who might have been considered well off some time back, were now not so well off, and were marching for the big, fat frogs. Keeping the machine working. I couldn't shake the dream, silly as it was, and silly as it was, it made me sad and scared and disappointed, and not sure of what it was I was dreaming about.

The kind of greed that destroys everything, maybe. The kind of greed that drives people to kill other people, the kind of greed that allows someone to lock themselves behind a wall and think they're safe, removed from the daily grind, avoiding brushing up against the unwashed masses, and there were those among the unwashed who wanted to be less unwashed, wanted what the big frogs had, and they were willing to do whatever it took to have a piece of that, even murder.

As I sat there, my legs felt as if they were hurting from all that walking.

Hanson stopped by mine and Brett's place the next morning about nine. I invited him in and fixed him some buttered toast and a cup of coffee.

Brett, who had been showering for a late entry into our office, came out of the bathroom dressed in jeans and a loose shirt, barefoot with her damp hair mounded up under a towel.

She came over to Hanson's chair and gave him a hug, then she joined us at the table.

Hanson sipped coffee, said, "I didn't want to take Linda's daughter in, on account of she might be illegal, and with things insane like they are now, I fear she'll be on a bus to Mexico, compliments of Immigration. You know, she's been here so long, she doesn't even speak Spanish. Don't get me wrong, she had something to do with the crime, I'll put her behind bars so fast the door will lock before I close it. Otherwise, I might have a witness, or a suspect being shipped across the border, and might not can get them back."

"And you've come to us why?" I said.

"I need you and Brett, Leonard if he wants, to go over there and talk to her, obviously not in a police capacity. She knows y'all a little, and she might be more comfortable talking to you. Way her mother, everyone at the house was murdered, Mindy thinks she might be next. She's scared to death. That's about all I could get out of her, really."

"Maybe she's scared with good reason," Brett said. "Seems Doctor Cotton and us thinking the niece was behind it were wrong."

“You did warn her to not drop us right away,” I said.

“Whole thing looks like an inside job, and she’s the only survivor. Got to consider her for it, at least a little. Maybe she had help. Might have been responsible for the threats, building up to blackmail, scaring Cotton, and then she found those pictures, and figured it was time to go for the whole enchilada. Another thing, she might have seen how this would make Katherine look, and that meant Doctor Cotton would decide it was her niece and she didn’t need you guys for protection. That would damn sure make it easy for her and accomplices to get inside and do what they did.”

“But her own mother?” Brett said.

“I’ve seen enough to think people are capable of anything,” Hanson said.

“They seemed close,” Brett said.

“Still, I got to think scenarios. Find out what you can for me, and that’ll take care of some of the favors you guys owe me.”

“Fair enough,” Brett said.

“Here’s another little tidbit. Photo of Doctor Cotton and the canine. It’s on the internet this morning. Dead or not, someone still went after her. Maybe someone posted the photo out of spite. If Doctor Cotton were alive, she’d been selling up and packing out, maybe looking for a job in dog porn. Tell you another thing, whoever tortured Doctor Cotton the way they did, they didn’t do it for money. They did it for fun. First time they cut her face she’d have told them where the safe was, gave them the combination and helped them carry the goods to the car. No one is that tough, not when they’re having their skin ripped off. People did this, I think they got the combination, and after checking it out, taking what was inside, they decided to finish what they started. Maybe Cotton gave them the combo without them laying a hand on her. Could be they just decided to do it because they're mean. Think that's why they went ahead and posted the photo. It can't hurt Cotton now, but it shits on any reputation she might have had. Whoever did this is into slash and burn."

"You got Mindy's address," Brett said, "soon as we can get out of here, we'll go over and talk with her."

eighteen

We decided to fill Leonard in later, tell him what we found out. We thought it might seem less overbearing for two people to show up instead of three.

When we got there, we saw that Pookie was parked down from the house in his own car. He saw us and gave a little wave but didn't get out. We waved back and went on up to the house.

Mindy answered. She looked as if someone had run over her with a truck. She seemed barely able to stand.

She grabbed Brett and hugged her. "Oh god," she said, "it is so horrible, horrible."

"I know," Brett said. "And we're so sorry."

Mindy began to bellow and bawl. It was tough to listen to. It made me sad and sick.

Brett eased her back into the house and I shut the door and followed them into a modest living room with cheap paintings of Jesus and biblical scenes on the wall. A large cross hung above a small screen TV, and another had been placed above the portal of the doorway we came through.

After we were in the living room, Mindy sat on the couch, which was covered over with a plastic protection sheet, and Brett sat by her. I sat in a stuffed armchair across the way. The air smelled clean and sharp with disinfectant and a sheen of lemon deodorizer.

A few minutes passed with Mindy clutching Brett, and Brett holding her back, saying soothing things to her. Eventually Mindy got control of herself.

After I let a few more moment pass, I said, “I know it’s horrible to discuss, but why weren’t you there last night, when this happened?”

“Mom asked me to stay home. She said things were tense at the house, and Doctor Cotton was feeling private. My mom had worked for her so long, the doctor felt comfortable with her. Me, I had just started working there. I was still a bit of an outsider.”

“Did you know of Katherine having a boyfriend?” I asked.

“She had plenty, but she had a main one,” Mindy said. “I knew that much.”

“Katherine seemed a little too, shall we say, free-spirited for a boyfriend,” I said.

“I heard her tell Doctor Cotton her boyfriend didn’t mind what she did with other men, that he liked the idea. That they belonged to some group, sliders or some such.”

“Swingers?” Brett said.

“That’s it. Katherine, she was always talking about things like that, to embarrass me, and she even tried to get me to go to bed with her once, but I hit her. I thought I was fired. I busted her lip. But she put her finger to the blood and looked at it and laughed at me. She was very strange.”

“This boyfriend, he come around?” I said. “Ever see him?”

She nodded.

“What did he look like?”

“Not so tall, kind of thin, and good-looking. Mexican, illegal like me.”

The general description fit the body by the bed, except I couldn’t say about the handsome part. He didn't have a face.

"Do you know anything about the boyfriend, where he worked, anything?"

"Katherine said he was going to be a painter. His brother was a painter."

"When you say the boyfriend wanted to be a painter," Brett said. "Do you mean an artist?"

"A house painter. He was trying to start his own business with his brother, but he didn't have the money for it. I heard Katherine say that. He came to the house once, no twice, which is how I know what he looks like. Doctor Cotton didn't like him. She wouldn't let him come back."

"Do you know why she didn't like him?" I asked.

"She said because she thought he was no account, but I think it was because he was Mexican, same as me. We were all right, me and my mom, because we worked for her. Had he been the yard or pool boy, he'd have been fine. She used to have men who worked there daily, doing the yard and the pool, but Katherine wouldn't leave them alone, so she let them go. Got a service to come in and take care of things. They did their work and left."

"Did you ever meet the boyfriend's brother?" Brett asked.

"No."

I said, "I'm getting a vibe here that you think Doctor Cotton wasn't really as open-minded as she seemed?"

"I got that feeling," she said. "I don't know. Maybe with all what's going on, way people talk about us, way I got to worry about being picked up and sent to Mexico, I might not be thinking straight. . . . You aren't going to send me back, are you?"

"We don't do that," I said. "We're private. You know that."

"Yes, but. . . ."

"We're white?" I said.

She nodded and looked slightly embarrassed.

"Far as we're concerned, you're fine. Listen, any idea where we can get in touch with the boyfriend's relatives?"

"Like we all know one another," she said.

"No," Brett said, "like maybe you heard something through Katherine."

"I'm sorry," Mindy said. "I'm feeling sensitive."

"No problem," Brett said. "You have that right."

"I think he worked for a painter in town, but I don't know the name, but I think he did. Like I said, he wanted his own shop."

"I know the police didn't tell you all that happened, merely that your mother, Doctor Cotton and Katherine were dead," I said. "But, Katherine's boyfriend, or who we think is her boyfriend, and the boyfriend's brother are dead as well."

"I don't understand," Mindy said.

"That's all right, no one does," I said.

Mindy sat quietly for a moment, her hands folded in her lap.

"You know, I think they said something about Smatterly Paint or some such," she said. "You know, I'm not sure. But something like that."

"Let me ask something else," I said. "The safe. Who knew where it was? Did you?"

She nodded. "We all did. It wasn't a secret. I knew it was there and so did everyone in the house, and we all knew Doctor Cotton had expensive jewels in it, as well as money.”

“Who knew the combination?” Brett asked.

“I don’t know. I didn’t know it. Mother didn’t.”

“What about Katherine?” I said.

She shook her head. “I don’t know. But I got the impression that Doctor Cotton was the only one.”

We couldn't locate a business by the name Mindy gave us, but we did find one called Smallette's Painting. We thought that might be close enough to be the right one. Me and Brett drove over there.

It was on the loop well outside of town, and it was a large building with a larger fenced-in area off to the side and attached to the main building. Signs said they painted houses, cars, and there was a sign that read: if it isn't moving, we can paint it.

Behind the desk, toward the back, was a middle-aged woman with her hair combed straight back and tied with an orange scrunchie. She didn't wear makeup and had on coveralls. She was a little plump and was leaned back in her chair doing damage to what looked like a leaky meatball sandwich.

Me and Brett walked up to the desk. The lady reluctantly stopped eating, stood up and walked over. She was tall and broad-shouldered.

She looked at Brett. "Damn, aren't you the pretty thing?"

"You ought to see me on Tuesdays," Brett said.

"We're looking for the owner," I said.

"No, you're not," she said, "you're looking at her."

"Ms. Smallette?"

"Small. My mother and father called me Smallette as a joke, 'cause I was the youngest and the only girl, only I turned out bigger than they expected. My dad never could quite get over that. I think he wanted a girly-girly who didn't like girly-girls, but that isn't how things shook out. He stopped calling me Smallette when I reached my twenties. Everyone else kept calling me that, though. When Dad died, I took over the business because both my two older brothers, and my mother, are in prison for fraud. I decided to call the business Smallette's instead of Small's."

"That's really interesting," I said, but really, I didn't give a shit.

"What you need painted?" she said.

"Nothing," I said.

"You're looking for the taxidermist, that's down the loop a little."

"No," Brett said. "We're looking for you."

"Oh, that's nice. I hope you're especially the one looking."

"We're married," I said.

"So are a lot of people," Smallette said.

No way to contradict that.

"The Cabalas brothers worked for you?" Brett asked.

"Still do, but after today they may not. Didn't show for work last couple of days. Course the day is young enough. I'm flexible 'cause good painters are hard to find, but they may be asking me to be too flexible."

"You know," I said, "you might want to put a want ad in the paper for a painter."

Smallette studied me for a moment.

"Something happen?"

"They got dead," I said.

twenty

Smallette brought us behind the desk and into a small office with a struggling air conditioner. She sat behind a desk that took up too much room, and Brett sat in the only other chair while I leaned against the wall and listened to the air conditioner try not to die.

From where I stood, I could see she had a pistol on a stool next to the desk. If you were sitting where Brett was sitting you wouldn't be able to see it. It looked like a .22 revolver from where I stood.

Painting business must be a tough gig. Then again, in Texas, every asshole walks around with a gun and thinks they're Wyatt Earp. I tell you straight, it doesn't make me feel safer. Even preachers have guns.

"Man, that's some shit," Smallette said after we explained what happened to them, told her about Doctor Cotton, her niece and maid. She didn't seem all that torn up about it actually. We could have told her they were having a two-for-one sale on socks at Walmart, and it might have got more of a reaction. "Any idea why?"

"We got some thoughts," Brett said, and we did. We had discussed them in the car on the way over. I thought I'd give Smallette a taste of our idea, see if that elicited anything. I gave her a general rundown on what had happened, that the doctor was murdered, very general stuff, then laid out some things that were more specific.

"Way we're thinking," I said, "is the brothers, along with the murdered doctor's niece, were trying out intimidation, which was a plan to have Doctor Cotton real scared before they tried out blackmail. They finally got there, but that didn't play out the way they wanted. We're thinking the brothers wanted their own paint business, and we're thinking they had partners to help them get it, but those partners wanted the jewels and fewer partners."

"So, they were going to leave my ass," Smallette said.

"We're here to see if you got anything you can give us that will help us figure out who the brothers were in with," I said.

"Not an idea one," she said. "Thought you said this doctor laid you off."

"She did," Brett said, "but you might say we feel unfulfilled."

"That so. Well, they were good painters and will be missed, but you know Mexicans wanting work are a dime a dozen. They hadn't been in some kind of bad business, they wouldn't be dead."

"You have an address for them?" I asked.

"Yeah, I think so. I got cell phone numbers, but I bet no one answers," she grinned when she said that. "Hey, they were going to fuck me over, leave me high and dry, start their own paint business. Oh, hell, bless the goddamn dead and their family, of course, but one thing I don't need is more competition."

Charming.

I got a card out of my wallet. It was a little dog-eared. I gave it to her. It had the name of the agency on it and two numbers, the office landline and my cell. Each of us had the same cards, except our personal cards had our individual cell numbers on them. Brett had a set of cards with all our numbers on it, written on the back. On the front was brett sawyer investigations, and under her name was the silhouette of a bloodhound.

“Think of something, anything might help, give a call,” I said.

“Sure,” she said. “Shame the way they were done. Tortured and murdered, the safe robbed, and that being a walled home in a good neighborhood. You can’t be too careful these days, no matter where you live.”

“This is true,” Brett said, and we walked out.

twenty-one

Outside the paint business, I said, “She didn’t seem particularly curious.”

“No, she didn’t,” Brett said, “First thing I want to do, we leave here, is buy today’s paper.”

“And I know why,” I said.

We passed the fenced-in section. Through the fence, we could see three men air-blasting a travel home. Well, one was doing the blasting. The other two were standing around, as if holding the concrete flooring in place.

I found the gate and opened it and we stepped inside.

As we got nearer to them, one of the men who was watching one of the others use the air blaster noticed us. Or rather he noticed Brett. You can always tell when they notice Brett.

Brett showed them all her teeth, including the caps she had on a couple of back teeth, and said, “How are you boys?”

The boys all looked pretty much alike, except one of them was very tall, six-seven, if I had to guess. They all wore gray coveralls and gray caps and work boots, had long, ragged beards that rested on their chests, had faces that looked like the seats of a well-worn saddles. They had small noses, noticeable small, as if genetics was all out of the good noses the day they were born, so they had to take the emergency back-up children’s variety.

“Damn, ZZ Top,” I said. “As I live and breathe.”

“Well, we do have a band,” said the one switching off the blaster, turning to give Brett the once-over. “We ain’t any good, though. We was going to be rock stars once, twenty years ago. Turned out we can barely carry a tune in a bucket with a lid on it."

The third man, the smaller of the three, was standing by the travel trailer. He looked at Brett and actually licked his lips. Not something I enjoyed seeing, but Brett was a big girl, and no doubt luscious looking, so I decided not to kill him.

"You work for Ms. Smallette, of course," Brett said.

"We got a piece of the pie here," said the man with the blaster.

I held out my hand. "Hap Collins."

The air blaster man put the blaster on the concrete and shook my hand.

"Wilson Small. That goober by the trailer, that's Rat, least that's what we call him, and this fellow by me is Too Tall. We're brothers."

No surprise there.

"Smallette is your sister," I said.

"Yeah. She kind of runs the business."

"No offense," Brett said, "but Ms. Smallette said her brothers and mother were in prison."

"That's right, but we're the other brothers."

"Oh," Brett said.

"Yeah, there's a bunch of us," Too Tall said. "Us three are fancy-free and looking for love."

He showed Brett a big smile when he said that.

"I'm sure you're going to be a fine catch for some nice woman," Brett said.

"Hell," Rat said. "We don't want them nice."

The brothers laughed together, ended up making snorting sounds. Ain’t genetics wonderful?

We told them the same thing we told Ms. Smallette, and they said that was too bad about the brothers, but Rat added, “Them spic brothers wasn’t good workers anyway. Jaime, he could paint, but he was slow as Christmas on a crutch. Always had to get everything just right, like people can tell two coats of paint from one.”

How picky of him, I thought.

We gave them our cards and went away.

twenty-two

We drove over to the newspaper office. They have machines out front, and they have papers in them. We bought one and went back to the car and sat there. Brett read about the murders on the front page.

"Here it is," she said. "I was thinking Marvin wouldn't have told reporters all the details. There's nothing about torture or a safe, so even if Smallette read the papers this morning, how would she know that?"

"Maybe she's psychic," I said.

"I'm thinking it might have something to do with her being in on that shit," Brett said. "That's what I'm thinking."

"Me," I said, "I'm sticking to psychic."

"Sure, you are," she said. "I think Smallette not only was in on it, but so were those bearded, moronic brothers of hers."

"Do we tell Hanson?"

"No, we caught this one and we dropped the ball, so we got to pick it up."

"Doctor Cotton dropped the ball," I said.

"Still, I feel we have to pick it up. I think we start by checking florists, see if anyone bought a hell of a big load of flowers this morning. Something they took from the florist to deliver themselves. My guess is that's how they got through the gate."

She didn't start the car up though.

"Little turns of fate can sure mess a person up," she said.

“Fucking a dog on camera is bound to lead to bad things,” I said.

“That was years ago. She had changed her life, was trying to do good for people.”

“You were less on her side when we talked about this before.”

“I’ve had time to think. Doctor Cotton didn’t start this, the niece did. The ungrateful bitch was going to rob her. She knew her aunt knew her boyfriend. Which means to me, she might have planned to kill her aunt and the maids right from the start. She was bad as the Smalls. Then she got snookered. There’s some cold irony in that.”

“I’m thinking the boyfriend shot Katherine,” I said. “I like to think they forced him to. She was the only one that was killed in a, pardon the term, comfortable way. Lying in bed with her eyes shut. They let him do that, and then he thought he was still going out with the money and jewels. But he wasn’t. They killed him. The brother made a break for it, and Smalls nailed him too.”

“There’s a reason those other Smalls are in prison,” Brett said. “They’re a family of vipers.”

“Now, now, don’t insult vipers.”

twenty-three

Brett took me to my car and caught up with Leonard and filled him in with what me and my lady were thinking.

"I was thinking that too," he said.

"So now you're going to pull that," I said. "Me and Brett do all the work, and all the thinking, and you're going to claim you were all over it."

"I was."

"No, you weren't."

"I kind of was."

"You are priceless, Leonard."

"I have my fedora on."

"Yes, you do. And I'm sure glad you explained that, and here I sit looking at it on your head. That's something," I said, "but it wouldn't surprise me if you had your underwear turned around backwards."

"You want to check, don't you?"

"I do not."

"I think you're thinking about it."

"Don't change the subject," I said. "You didn't know shit."

"Where's Brett?"

"You're changing the subject."

"Am not."

"Am too. . . . She's checking out florists," I said.

"What are we doing?"

"Lunch," I said. "Brett wanted to do the florists by herself. She likes flowers. I'm also supposed to tell you not to tell Pookie what we think we know. We're keeping the law outside of this. Brett wants to get even with the sonofabitches did this, let it be us that proves what they did and turn them in."

"Brett knows what the fuck is up," Leonard said.

We went to the El Salvadorian restaurant we like and had a light lunch, and then to a coffee shop on North Street. I had hot chocolate, Leonard had coffee, and a couple sitting at a booth against the wall almost had sex. I think they were getting the better deal.

"Let's change seats," Leonard said.

We took our drinks upstairs and went out on the veranda that overlooked the parking lot.

"You know, one of the cops at the scene might have blabbed to someone about what was found and seen at Doctor Cotton's, and this Small lady picked it up from somebody who heard it from somebody."

"Maybe, but then again, let's see what Brett says about the florist."

"By the way, how's the old pecker?"

"The pecker is fine, just a little limp lately."

"Man, Hap Collins with a limp pecker. Who'd have thought it. Listen, my man. It happens. Even my very well-trained anaconda has days. I get up, fix breakfast, my oatmeal is lumpy, I get backed up and can't shit, lose my keys, spill my lunch, you know, a bad day, and when I have one like that, well, the snake can go to sleep."

"No matter how bad my day is, I don't normally have that problem. Getting the tool to work usually makes a bad day better."

"Now, though, I'm thinking you might want to go into the priesthood.”

“Shit, they get more nookie than I do these days. Sometimes what they get they shouldn’t get.”

“Yeah, they use priests to scare children now,” Leonard said. “You better be good, or the priest is going to molest you.”

“Watch out for the politicians too,” I said.

“Yep, they fuck you then pass a bill that makes you the rapist.”

The phone rang.

It was Brett.

She’d found the florist.

twenty-four

We stayed where we were and Brett drove over to join us. She came upstairs with a coffee and sat with us on the veranda. We were the only ones out there. The air was beginning to become sticky, and out to the west we could see a bit of darkness as rain clouds drifted in our direction. It would be drizzling by nightfall, if not sooner.

"The florist said a lady paid in cash for the flowers, didn't give her name, but had them loaded into a large van. That's where Small messed up. The van had Smallette Painting written on the side. A name like that the florist remembered."

"So, Smallette did, in fact, set this all up," I said.

"Yeah," Brett said.

"Wow," I said. "We did some detective work and it worked."

"And I think the robbery, the whole thing, went down pretty much like we were thinking it did," Brett said. "I looked into the Small family, the ones in prison. They were in there for fraud all right, but they were also in there for jewel robbery. Pretty big heist in Houston."

"No shit," Leonard said.

"And the rest of the family was under suspicion for the same thing," Brett said. "Wasn't enough proof. I'm thinking if Smallette and the Small brothers have the kind of jewels I think they got from Doctor Cotton, they haven't moved those yet. They'd be the kind of things you wouldn't deal out to a crooked pawnshop dealer. You'd need professional fences, and to do that, to get top dollar, they’d have to wait for the theft to cool.”

“Look at you,” Leonard said, “all robbery expert and such.”

“I know where this is leading,” I said. “You think they stashed the jewels.”

“Yeah,” Brett said. “And my guess is somewhere at their place of business. They aren’t suspected by the cops, so that’s safe enough. Stuff can cool down there, and the whole family is around, so no one has to depend on anyone else to watch the goods. They may have already spent the money from the safe, or they’ve split that. May never find that, but we just might discover the jewels. We do, their gooses are cooked.”

“That means we got to go take a peek,” I said.

Brett sipped her coffee, said, “That’s about the size of it.”

twenty-five

I'm a feminist, but that only goes so far. I insisted that when we arrived, Brett should stay in the car. She had done things that showed she was tough, but still, me and Leonard were way more used to the rough and tumble stuff, and besides, if she heard gunfire, she could call the cops. Sue me. I didn't want my woman hurt.

My hope was they wouldn't be around, and Smallette would have packed up the jewels in a nice tote bag and left them on her desk with a note that read: here they are.

We veered off the loop and parked off the main road not far from the Smallette Paint business, among some trees, and unless you were looking for our car, you couldn't see it from the road, not the way the shadows clung.

It was starting to mist a bit, and now and again I could hear a rumble of thunder. I got my automatic out of the glove box, and Leonard left his fedora in back and took my sawed-off club from under the seat, stuck it in his pants, beneath his windbreaker, and away we went, two soldiers in the mist.

Well, Leonard was a soldier. I was just some guy with an automatic pistol and a dick problem. But we did have matching black windbreakers. Brett insisted. They had deep pockets for lockpicks, our flashlights, and my pistol.

Still, the windbreakers were heavy for the sticky weather. I was sweating like a goat at a barbecue who had just realized he was the guest of honor.

As we came up on the paint shop, we avoided the lights that were out front of the place, the ones out back as well. We took to the side fence where it was dark, and stopped at the gate. Leonard went to work on it with his lockpick. Bolt cutters would have been better. Enough time passed with him working that lock I almost walked back to the car to see if Brett could drive me into town to pick up some coffee.

Finally, there was a faint clicking and the lock snapped open and we cracked the fence gate and slipped inside. There was the obvious smell of drying paint in the air, chemicals I couldn't identify. The travel trailer was still in its place. Off to the side were black, metal barrels containing who knew what. No junkyard dogs reported for duty.

We crossed the fenced-in lot and came to a back door. It was locked, of course.

Leonard went to work again with his lockpick.

This one was much harder than the first, but with diligence and a lot of soft cursing, the lock finally opened and we slid inside. We were damp from the mist in the air and sweaty from the windbreakers, and inside it was as stuffy as having a wool sock forced over your head.

We took out our flashlights and turned them on and poked them around. On tiptoe we went along, hoping not to trip any burglar alarms, but there didn't seem to be any.

It was easy.

twenty-six

Easy up until it wasn't.

Let me tell you. I been to a bunch of county fairs, a dozen goat ropings, and once saw a fat tourist woman in Mexico so drunk her ancestors were drunk get up on a bar, drop her drawers and pick up a cigarette lighter with her snatch, and that didn't surprise me as much as the sudden coming on of the lights in the paint shop.

I felt as if Leonard and I were on stage under a spotlight and that we should break into song. We had actually done that once, but that hadn't worked out too well. This looked to work out worse.

When my eyes adjusted, I saw Smallette and the ZZ Top imitators standing in a kind of horseshoe shape no more than twenty feet in front of us. Too Tall had a shotgun pointed at us, the opening of which looked about the size of Carlsbad Caverns. The others looked as content as if they'd just had a wet dream.

"You've brought a little friend, huh," Smallette said. "Bad choice for a playdate, but I'm glad you're here. I was afraid you'd go to the police, on account I realized I slipped up. No one knew about the torture but us."

"Let's just go on and blow their heads off," Wilson said. "I got to get home and set the DVR."

"I like to gloat," Smallette said, and then to us: "My cousin works at the florist shop, told me that redheaded smoothie talked to her manager. Overheard her. Ain't that some shit for you?"

"Ain't it," Leonard said.

"So, she tells me we was asked about, and I think about the ego that redhead has got, how the only real proof would be the jewels, maybe the flowers, but I'll figure out a lie around the flowers eventually. But if you were to get your hands on the jewels, well, that could cook our gooses. That redhead, I figured she'd want to solve this herself, or send someone to do it for her. And here you two are. By the way, where is she?"

"Bali," I said. "Took a vacation."

"I don't think so. I think we got to find and kill her too, and I tell you, I hate that. I could lick that redhead's ass until her crack grew flowers."

"Eeeeeewwww," Wilson said.

"Just 'cause you don't never get any," Smallette said, "ain't no reason to wish it on others."

Now she gave us her full attention. "Come on, assholes. We got a room with a drain in it. Easier to clean."

"What the fuck, sis?" Too Tall said. "You a James Bond villain? Let's get this over with. Come on prune balls, march."

"She's talking to you," Leonard said.

I started moving slowly, and Too Tall stepped to the side to let me get in front of him. Me and Leonard know each other's moves as well as a trapeze act, so when he sort of shuffled a step, looking like he was moving forward but wasn't, I yelled out, "The Elephant of Surprise."

That was code for the element of surprise, and that's when Leonard moved, hit the shotgun up and it went off. Leonard twisted the weapon from Too Tall's hands, but he couldn't hang onto it. It sailed away, went clattering into cans of paint, tipping them.

Smallette produced a pistol from inside her coveralls, that little dear of a weapon I had seen on a chair in her office. A bullet whizzed by my head as I gave Rat a left and a right so fast it was almost subliminal. He went down.

Leonard kneed Too Tall in the balls. Too Tall staggered. A bullet from Smallette's revolver nipped the air, but didn't hit anyone. Too Tall was bent over, grunting in pain. He managed to say, "Goddamn, sis. You near shot me."

Me and Leonard dodged behind some racks of paint cans as another bullet punched a hole in one and paint shot out like a geyser, splashing my shoulder with a very attractive blue color. We hustled down behind another row of paint cans, and then veered off, heading toward the door through which we entered. We pushed a rack of paint over as a distraction, then bolted toward the door. The space between there and freedom seemed the length of a football field.

As I pulled the door open, a bullet smacked into it. Glancing back, I saw Smallette and Wilson running at us. Too Tall was in the background, still bent, spinning around and around like a top, clutching his balls.

We went through the door and I jerked it closed. As we hustled toward the gate, I saw that Rat had got his shit together and had made his way through the main building, out to the gate, into the misty rain, and what was now a high wind. That little fucker was quick and, like a real rat, had good recovery skills. I saw too that he had produced a pistol from somewhere.

"We got you now," he said, and it certainly appeared that way. I heard Smallette and her brother coming through the door behind us.

"Trailer," Leonard said, and we darted toward it.

twenty-seven

We jerked open the trailer door, thankfully unlocked, and jumped inside. Rat's bullets smacked the door and the side of the trailer. Fortunately, the Smalls were all terrible shots; they couldn't have committed suicide with a shotgun under their chin.

I locked the door and pulled my pistol out.

"Now you draw it," Leonard said. "That's like closing the toilet lid before you shit."

"Is it?" I said. "Is it really?"

I lifted my head and peeked through the window, yelled, "Duck."

A shotgun blast took out the window, raining glass down on top of us.

"Guess who's up and running?" I said.

"That would be Too Tall," Leonard said.

I yelled out to them, "You're going to have to repaint, I think."

"Come on out and get yours," Too Tall said.

"Nice invitation, but no," I said.

Leonard had pulled the club out from under his windbreaker. Considering the situation, he might as well have pulled a toothpick out.

I heard something rolling then, but I was afraid to look out the window again; I figured they were focused on it. I moved to the rear of the trailer. There was a kind of bunk bed, and near the top bunk was a small, round window. I climbed up on the top bunk, eased my head up and looked out the window, saw what was rolling.

It was a big black barrel, and it was being rolled on its side toward the trailer by Wilson. He stopped it about six feet from the trailer, grabbed a crowbar off the floor, jammed it into the edge of the lid and popped it.

A clear liquid chugged out and fled toward the trailer.

Even inside, I could smell what was in the barrel. Paint cleaner.

Smallette moved out of the shadows and into view, walked over to the barrel, pulled a cigarette lighter from her highly practical and well-pocketed coveralls, and flipped it open. A little flame popped up, guttered savagely in the wind, so much so that Smallette cupped the flame with a palm.

“Ah, shit,” I said. “We’re about to get lit up.”

With a shit-eating grin, Smallette flipped the lighter into the paint thinner.

Let me tell you how it rose, the fire I mean.

It jumped, baby, and I mean jumped.

There was a roar and a flash of light, and I guess the shifting wind was the bulk of the intensity, though that paint thinner had an intensity of its own. But the wind, like the proverbial worm, had turned, and it wasn’t blowing in our direction. The gust caught the flames and carried them to Smallette.

Once, when I was a kid, my friend, Richard, stuck a feather in the ground and doused it with gasoline and lit a match to it. Having some fear of gasoline, I stood back a few paces, and when the feather lit, it went up in a rocket of flame and the flames licked high above the peak of the feather.

That’s how it was with Smallette. That flame grabbed her and wrapped her up as it blew off the gurgling paint thinner. Almost simultaneously the can, which still had the bulk of the thinner in it, exploded.

Shrapnel rattled through the air. Some hit the trailer, but most of it blew over Smallette and her family in a wave of fire. One moment she was standing, and in the next she was a blackened shape within a wad of flame. She crumpled to the ground and ash wafted up from her and spun away on the wind.

The fire kept whipping, and I could see shapes moving in and behind the flames. I heard shots, and then I heard screams, and then I could see the far fence through the flames, and I could see police cruiser lights flickering on the other side of it.

It was like an arsonist’s Christmas.

twenty-eight

We got heated up pretty good inside that trailer, and then the heat wave passed, and it was merely warm.

Leonard was looking out the window below the bunk, now. He said, “I think Smallette is well done, and them other motherfuckers are kind of medium rare.”

I slipped off the bunk and came down for a look. The flames had spread and the building to the right had caught on fire. I guess all those paint products weren’t helping. Cans were popping, flames were leaping up here and there, but there was a gap in front of the trailer and to the side where the fence ran.

We didn’t even consult one another. We headed out the door and went to the left. We climbed over the fencing. The fence was warm, but not too hot to climb. We went over it like squirrels. That fire was a great motivation. Barrels exploded behind us, nearly knocked us off the wire.

Dropping to the other side, we looked back as the flames hopped and crept across the lot.

Hanson and Brett and Pookie came around on our side, hustling toward us.

“You dumb motherfuckers,” Hanson said.

“Hey, how’s it hanging?” Leonard said.

“Goddamn you, Leonard,” Pookie said, grabbed him and kissed him like it was the end of World War II.

Brett came over and grabbed me. I held her, and we walked around to the front of the place. We stood for a moment in front of my car, which Brett had driven up, and watched the flames. Wilson had not only been burned, but shot by the police. He was lying on the ground next to a cruiser, his hands handcuffed behind is back. He was dark as inside of a hog, smoking like an overheated hot dog. I thought the handcuffs were probably not needed. He was done.

Rat was handcuffed and smoky, but alive. He was leaning against a cruiser. His beard and hair were cooked off, his face blackened in spots, raw pink in others. He looked stunned.

We could see what was left of Too Tall cooking inside the flames. The fire had jumped him too quick for him to escape, and police bullets hadn’t helped.

Smallette was little more than a bent crisp of meat, though I could make out her hands, clutching inward like talons.

Hanson said, “Good thing Brett called. We’re going to need the fire department.”

“Yeah,” I said, “my guess is what they stole is inside the shop, so you might want them to try and save that first. Whoops. There goes the travel trailer.”

It had caught fire now with a re-shifting of the damp wind. It cracked and wrinkled and began to collapse.

“Damn, that’s quick,” Pookie said. “If you had been inside, Leonard.”

“I wasn’t. But if I was going to go I had good company.”

I reached out and patted his arm. “Thanks, Leonard.”

“I was talking about the Smalls.”

“Fuck you, Leonard.”

twenty-nine

We didn’t know about it for a couple of days, but the fire department got there in time to save the shop, and they did find what was stolen. Some of it was jewels, some of it was money, and there were some odds and ends from the house in there. Expensive crystal, that sort of thing. It was all worth close to a million dollars fenced, which split four ways beat splitting seven ways.

“Well,” Brett said, after Hanson phoned and told us all the skinny, “our client is dead, robbed, and the bad guys are burned up, and you can say with confidence we lost money on this deal. We may not get in too bad trouble for breaking and entering and trespassing, but Hanson said a fine might be in order.”

“And I never did get that therapy.”

thirty

That night I showered and readied myself for bed, because I realized that the whole excitement of what we had done, some of it successful, some of it not, had cleared my head a little. I felt good about myself. Maybe Leonard was right. We were doing our best and we were doing it for good, and that was all you could ask.

If I thought too long, I would start defining good, and then splitting hairs, and trying to make a chart in my mind, positive on one side, negative on the other, but tonight, I didn't want to go there.

Brett had been in the bathroom a long time, and I had been reading a bit of Lewis Shiner's novel, Black and White. I had just laid it aside when Brett said from the bathroom, "Turn out the light."

I did.

The bathroom door opened and there was light in there, but it was a blue light, and then there was a click of machinery in there, followed by music, Frankie Lymon and the Teenagers singing "Little Bitty Pretty One."

I knew the song from the first moment it began.

That humming is magnificent.

Brett's long, naked leg appeared, gently kicking the air, a red high heel on her foot, and when Frankie got to the lyrics, Brett shook out of the bathroom, dancing, wearing as little as one could wear without being naked, and somehow, it was sexier than if she were nude, a red bra, red panties, and high heels, a blue light behind her, and a shimmy vigorous enough to make the statue of David have an erection and cause California to slide into the Pacific.

When she turned, and worked her butt left and right, up and down, I can assure you any feelings of needing a therapist went south, and I knew I was back because I had reconciled things with myself, at least for now. I was for the moment off the trek around the world, across the concrete ocean, turning the earth with a crowd. I was free.

Brett moved toward me, and as she did, she worked her red bra loose and dropped it. She swung it over her head and all about, snapped it off and over the bed and out of sight. She stopped dancing as the song neared the end, brought her legs together, pushed at her panties, let them drop. There was a bright red nest in the fork of her tree, and I wanted to live there.

And then the song was over and she was in bed with me and I was holding her. She touched me in the right place and said, “I see Little Hap is back in the game.”

“He’s been on vacation.”

She took hold of me, “Welcome back, honey,” she said.

I rolled her over and kissed her and she kissed me back. She said, “Had that song had one more lyric, I would have fainted, and let me tell you, try doing that in high heels.”

“I’ll leave that to you,” I said.

She wrapped her legs around me and clicked those heels together behind my back, reached between us and pushed down my pajama bottoms.

“How about an expedition to the cave?” she said.

“Packed and ready,” I said, and indeed I was.

EDGAR AWARD-WINNING AUTHOR OF THE ELEPHANT OF SURPRISE

HAP AND LEONARD
THE EARLY YEARS

OF MICE AND MINESTRONE

Praise for Of Mice and Minestrone

"An absolute treasure trove for Hap and Leonard fans. Going back to the beginning only deepens our love and appreciation for these guys. This collection proves once again why Joe Lansdale is one of our very best."

—Ace Atkins, author of The Shameless

"Of Mice and Minestrone is the last bit of connective tissue missing from the Hap and Leonard Mythos, which is one of the most entertaining series in modern literature. This book, which deals with abuse, friendship, violence, growing up, race, food, and justice, is full of the wit that's made Lansdale a star."

—Gabino Iglesias, author of Coyote Songs

"Five stories, four of them new, filling in more of the early years of that imperishable East Texas duo, Hap Collins and Leonard Pine. Kathleen Kent's brief introduction suggests that the running theme here is 'Kindness and Cruelty.' An even more precise motto might be 'Violence Is Inevitable,' since Lansdale consistently treats the often lethal outbursts of his characters in disarmingly matter-of-fact terms, as if the boys couldn't help it . . . laden with the same irresistible combination of relaxed badinage and playful threats that sometimes spiral into serious consequences while still remaining playful. The 17 down-home recipes contributed by Lansdale's daughter, Kasey, many of them as chatty as the stories, are a bonus."

—Kirkus

"There's a place in East Texas where story shades into memory, where violence and tenderness are just part of the wonder of living, and that's precisely where Joe Lansdale lives, and writes from, and we're all the better for it. The eating's pretty good there, too, as Hap's recipes more than attest. You leave this book hungry, both for food and to start the whole series all over again, live through it one more time, maybe just live there a while."

—Stephen Graham Jones, author of Mongrels and The Only Good Indian

“In these character studies of his two most charismatic protagonists, Joe Lansdale takes us to the dark side of Mayberry—authentic tales of small town life in the heart of the twentieth century that also provide an unflinching look at the violence that charged the last gasps of Jim Crow, with all the force of the Sabine River at flood stage.”

— Christopher Brown, author of Tropic of Kansas

Praise for Joe R. Lansdale

“A folklorist’s eye for telling detail and a front-porch raconteur’s sense of pace.”

—New York Times Book Review

“A terrifically gifted storyteller.”

—Washington Post Book Review

“Like gold standard writers Elmore Leonard and the late Donald Westlake, Joe R. Lansdale is one of the more versatile writers in America.”

—Los Angeles Times

“A zest for storytelling and gimlet eye for detail.”

—Entertainment Weekly

“Lansdale is an immense talent.”

—Booklist

“Lansdale is a storyteller in the Texas tradition of outrageousness . . . but amped up to about 100,000 watts.”

—Houston Chronicle

“Lansdale’s been hailed, at varying points in his career, as the new Flannery O’Connor, William Faulkner-gone-madder, and the last surviving splatterpunk . . . sanctified in the blood of the walking Western dead and righteously readable.”

—Austin Chronicle

Praise for Hap and Leonard: Blood and Lemonade

“Blood and Lemonade is the best of Lansdale and the best of Hap and Leonard. As urgent as it is timeless. As fun as it is thoughtful. It haunts you while it kicks your ass. Joe never lets you down, just shows you over and over why he’s the best.”

—Jim Mickle, director of Cold in July

“A brilliant ‘mosaic’ novel. An amazingly vivid style that feels like Hemingway. Themes that are especially important for our time. With these early adventures of his compelling Hap and Leonard characters, Joe R. Lansdale hits a new high.”

—David Morrell, New York Times bestselling author of Murder as a Fine Art

“Magnificent storytelling.”

—Char’s Horror Corner

INTRODUCTION

KATHLEEN KENT

WESTERN WRITER J. FRANK DOBIE said at the beginning of his novel Coronado's Children, "These tales are not creations of mine. They belong to the soil and to the people of the soil." Joe R. Lansdale, one of the most prolific and natural-born storytellers I've ever known, seems to summon up his far-ranging narratives not so much from the heady ether of the Literary Muses, but from the Martian-red dirt of East Texas.

He's written at least forty-five novels, thirty short story collections, many chapbooks and comic book adaptations, but while I've spent several weeks reading this newest collection of early Hap and Leonard stories, Of Mice and Minestrone, there's a good chance he's published even more. Some of Joe's awards include ten Bram Stoker Awards, a British Fantasy Award, an Edgar Award for The Bottoms, and a World Horror Convention Grand Master Award. There are many other awards, both national and international. He's been inducted into the Texas Literary Hall of Fame, and several of his novels and short stories have been adapted to film.

I'd already been a fan of his, especially of his darkly majestic novel The Bottoms, but I'd never met him until we were on book tour together and at the Texas Book Festival in Austin. We shared the same publisher, and he'd just launched Rusty Puppy, number twelve in the Hap and Leonard series. I found to my delight that his growing up in East Texas mirrored a lot of my own childhood experiences, including the Piney Woods lexicon of Guns, God, and Grits (and usually in that order). Shared also was the frequently challenging work of rising out of the black tar of, as Joe would put it, "not being poor, just broke," and of subsequently being rescued by books, reading, and writing.

This new collection of Hap and Leonard stories takes the duo back to their youth, and illuminates, on a very personal level, the origins of their friendship. Sometimes painful, sometimes hilarious, the stories may not be completely autobiographical, but there is a strong thread of authenticity in the development of Joe's characters. The people he writes about who inhabit the sometimes-fictional towns behind the Pine Curtain feel real. The reader loves Hap and Leonard because Joe Lansdale loves them. They bleed, and sweat, and make love, and do actual work. And even the most despicable of the villains in the series are lovingly drawn, even if they are developed with a very dark, nightmarish ink.

A lot of Joe Lansdale's writing, whether it be westernthemed, science fiction, or contemporary crime, is violent. He has the soul of a poet, but he's also a realist and understands the often-confounding truth of living behind the Pine Curtain. “In East Texas,” Joe has said, “there’s a kindness and a violence that’s like a two-edged sword. You can find the kindest, most hospitable people here—and they’ll shoot you over what I might think of as a mere slight.”

If there is one theme running through all the Hap and Leonard stories within this collection, it might be “Kindness and Cruelty.” The tension throughout the narratives is not if the violence will erupt, but when. In “Sparring Partner” a boxing coach named Dixie says to Hap, “Leonard would make a hell of a boxer . . . Could go all the way. And you too, except you got a streak of kindness in you.” That streak of kindness does not in any way prevent Hap, however, from beating someone’s ass when the occasion calls for it.

There is a strong sense of the moral “rightness” of things that seems inherent in both Hap and Leonard, even if—as is illustrated in the title story, “Of Mice and Minestrone,” where Hap tries to rescue a battered woman—no good deed goes unpunished. But there is no preciousness, no sentimentality to these moral corrections from the two friends, and often the lesson is learned through the criminal’s blood, sweat, and tears.

The stories are redolent with details of growing up in East Texas, a place that is not really the South, and not really like the rest of Texas. The weather is hot and humid, the vegetation lush, the spiders and snakes venomous, the women often more so. But Joe Lansdale’s true genius lies in revealing his characters’ strengths and weaknesses through dialogue—sometimes sparse, sometimes loquacious, but always true to the time and place. And, often, the simplest dialogue addresses the most weighted social issues, like racial injustice, sexual and family violence, and the repercussions of fighting in foreign wars. In the story “The Sabine Was High,” Leonard talks about his time in Viet Nam: “You know, I’d be lying there in the jungle . . . and I could hear people praying, but I didn’t pray, because, like you, I’m not a believer . . . But I damn sure believed in hope then, because that’s all I had to believe in, except being ready.”

These stories deepen and enrich the already iconic standing of the Hap and Leonard series. Although, the adventures are new, they all feel as comfortable and familiar as a long-anticipated homecoming. As Hap says, “There are some people you don’t talk to for a couple years, maybe more, and soon as you see them, it’s like they have only left the room for a moment, and that’s how it was with me and Leonard.”

HAP AND LEONARD, THE EARLY DAYS

Hap and Leonard have been with me a long time, and since their source comes from the well of my experience, in another way they have been with me even longer.

I have enjoyed writing about them over the years, and they are without a doubt my favorite character creations. I might have written some stand-alone books that will register higher on the critical meter, but the characters and their conflicts and adventures have gone on steadily to my delight, and gratefully, to the equal delight of the readers.

This book is a collection of short stories written about the duo in their early years. In the TV show Hap and Leonard they met as children, but that was TV. In my world they met later, as teenagers, and it wasn't until they were young men out of high school, one coming back from prison, the other from the Vietnam War, that their friendship was solidified to the status of brothers.

A previous volume, Blood and Lemonade, deals with this meeting in a story titled "Tire Fire." The stories in that book deal mostly with Hap and his parents, and some with Leonard, and they are all tied together by a connecting tissue that is a kind of story unto itself.

I had great fun writing those stories, as I did with these. Here Hap and Leonard are together much more, and as the stories continue, they are about the both of them. Navigating their world, growing tough and, in Hap's case, disappointed in love (hinted at) and in his lifetime ambitions.

There are other stories about the pair I may eventually tell. I've wanted to write about Hap's meeting with Trudy and how he chose to go to prison to protest the draft, and how Trudy, who encouraged him to do just that, abandoned him while he was behind bars, sent him divorce papers. But that story is yet to come.

The first story, "The Kitchen," more of a vignette really, sets the tone for who Hap was, and the last story sets the tone for who he has become. "The Sabine Is High" deals with the aftermath of Hap's marriage and his time in prison, and at the same time deals with Leonard's return from Viet Nam, and how they both have some heavy experiences to deal with, which may in ways explain at least some of their penchant for righting wrongs and dealing with both the light and the darkness in their souls.

One thing that is unique about this volume is not just a few stories were written for it, rounded out with already published stories. This volume contains only one story that has been previously published, “The Watering Shed,” and all the others appear here for the very first time, and currently this is the only place you can read them.

Another unique element is the recipes. They are inspired by the food mentioned in the stories, and my daughter Kasey provides those. We thought they might be a fun addition, since food is important to the Hap and Leonard stories, the same as music.

I hope you enjoy reading these stories as much as I enjoyed writing them.

And so, from the wilds of East Texas, I bid you adieu.

THE KITCHEN

I MUST HAVE BEEN SIX or seven at the time, and it was an event that went on for years, this gathering of relatives. Neither do I remember the occasion, or if there was one. Meaning it had nothing to do with Christmas, Thanksgiving, or any holiday. I believe it was just a visit to Grandma's house. She lived about an hour from us, in a big old house on about thirty acres. She was quite old then, but still very mobile. She was the only living grandparent I had. The others had died long ago.

My grandmother had been born in the 1880s and had come to Texas as a child in a covered wagon from Oklahoma Territory. She had seen Buffalo Bill's Wild West Show, and she had seen men land on the moon. She lived to be nearly a hundred years old, until a bout of pneumonia killed her chance at achieving a centennial.

On this day it was cold. Not common in East Texas, but we have a couple, sometimes three months or so, when it's that way. It wasn't icy or wet, just cold.

The smell of chicken frying in lard after being dipped and rolled in flour and eggs and dropped into the hot grease was the smell that woke me up. I don’t remember what day of the week it was, but my father wasn’t there, so it was most likely a workday. That could be any day from Monday to Saturday, and sometimes on Sunday, though my mother and other religious folks didn’t like the idea of working on the day of the Sabbath.

“Let God come get me,” my dad used to say, and I could envision him whipping God’s ass. My dad inspired a lot of confidence.

When I got up, my mother fixed me breakfast. I remember I had what she called cornmeal mush. It was essentially grits with butter and a tablespoon of sugar and a dash of milk. It was my favorite breakfast food at that age. Now and again I added a sliced banana.

While I ate, my mother dipped the fried chicken out of the deep skillet with tongs, and put it on a plate covered with paper towels, and then she covered the chicken in paper towels.

After my breakfast, I got to mix the cornbread batter with a wooden spoon so big and long I had to rest it on my shoulder. When that was done, she made cornbread in the oven, and then we packed everything in boxes and brown paper sacks to be loaded in the car. I don’t know what kind of car it was, but it was green. She let me carry some mixing bowls and a sack that had some cooking utensils and a box of Lipton Tea, which most East Texans back then viewed as the nectar of the gods.

I still do.

Mama drove us to Grandma's house. Her house smelled of food, and I think it was then that food began to matter to me, not just to eat, but to smell and delight in.

No food has ever tasted as good to me again as the food our family shared.

Grandma's cooking smells were of dried pinto beans being made less dry, simmering on the stove. It was a gas stove, but there had been a wooden one in its place only a few years back. I had never seen her cook on that stove, it was before I was born, but the stove was in the barn out back. My uncle had pointed it out to me.

My grandmother lived with my uncles, and they had just begun to move into the present with a gas stove, and though they had electricity, kerosene lanterns were placed about the house and not too long back, my mother told me, that was all the light they had.

Other conveniences were to follow, though I remember drawing water up from the well in the backyard with a rope, bucket, and pulley. The only thing I hated about visiting my grandmother, and my uncles, was the outhouse. I hated the smell and the discomfort of sitting there in the heat waiting for a turd to pass, wiping my ass on magazine pages, a method that only slightly had the edge over dried oak leaves. Another worry was there always seemed to be a nest of wasps or yellow jackets in the corner of the ceiling.

My aunts from both sides of the family were there when we arrived, as well as my cousins, and I had a lot of them. We were close then, and saw each other frequently, but over the years moves and adulthood responsibilities had displaced us. At family gatherings we were close and played chase and hiding-go-seek outside while the grownups cooked and talked about bills and illness and a better job.

My grandmother had a huge table in her dining room just off the kitchen. She had photos framed on the wall of family members, living and dead. I remember one of my uncles when they were kids, standing with a goat between them. My Uncle Charlie leaned on crutches, his reward for having had polio. My Uncle Jimmy stood straight and tall with his chin slightly lifted. He had served in the Philippines during the war, and kind and gentle as he was, there were shadows in his eyes, and as I grew older, I knew why. He had been part of some of the hardest fighting that had occurred. Now, as an adult, I recognize those same shadows in my eyes, but for different reasons. And, from time to time I see and recognize the darkness lurking in the eyes of my best friend and brother Leonard.

As time for supper neared, the cooked food was pulled from the stovetop and oven, and the already cooked goods were re-warmed. I was told to go out to the smokehouse and fill a large straw basket with potatoes. The potatoes were kept in burlap bags, and on the opposite side of the log-and-lumber shack meat hung, cool and snug, smelling of salt and hickory smoke.

I was always unnerved to go out there. I had seen those hogs alive earlier that year and had patted one on the head. I wondered if that hog was one of those that was split and cured, hanging from a rafter with his friends and family.

I dug around in the bags and filled the basket with red potatoes. I was about to leave, when a long chicken snake slid out of the stack of potato bags and decided to stop right in front of the closed door, the smokehouse's only exit.

I knew from experience it was a chicken snake. We had a chicken house out back of our house, and we had rows of chickens there who laid eggs in straw-lined boxes. A few times, when I had gone with my father or mother to gather eggs, I had been startled by the same sort of snake. But I had my parents with me then, and my mother always kept an old hoe inside the door for just such incidents. Chicken snakes ate eggs and baby chicks, and we ate eggs too, so it was a survival of the fittest.

I didn't have my parents and I didn't have a hoe, but I had a chicken snake and a closed door. I decided I had to make it move, so I took potatoes from my basket and threw them at the snake. Frightened, it rose up and extended itself, its body cocked to strike. I didn't know then a chicken snake wasn't poisonous. All snakes were venomous in my view. I had heard tales that snakes could bite their tail and roll downhill like a wheel. I had heard of milk snakes that latched on to the udders of cows and sucked their milk. I heard of snakes that could fly.

For me snakes were all a dangerous and mysterious breed of crawling critter. Armed as I was with spuds, I continued to throw potatoes, and finally the snake zipped off, between the other lumpy potato bags. I raced to the door, and leaving it open as I stood just outside, I picked up the potatoes I had thrown, and put them back in the basket.

Rushing back to the house, I had my snake encounter to chatter about, hoping I would be rewarded for my bravery. Instead, my grandmother said, “Oh, that’s Charlie. He’s all right. He eats the rats that get in there.”

My mother said, “Oh, I hate snakes. Even the rat eaters. I’m always reminded of the Adam and Eve story, and how the snake convinced Eve to eat the forbidden fruit.”

“Charlie’s all right,” Grandma said. “I don’t think he and the Bible snake are kin.”

Some laughter went around, and then the women—my grandmother, mother, and aunts—reached into my basket of potatoes and sat in chairs placed in a circle with newspapers placed on the floor in front of them, and began to peel potatoes, the peelings dropping onto the paper, later to be tossed into the garden to naturally compost. The potato peeling went fast, and the potatoes were fried up fast in deep fryers of hot lard.

Eventually my father and uncles showed up from work. My crippled Uncle Charlie came in on his crutches, and they all spoke to me and ruffled my hair, except my dad, who merely said, “Son.”

Before long the food was all cooked, and the latest and strongest smell was off the French fries and pinto beans. With the recently cooked food, and the food brought for the event by the family, there was so much food one would have thought it was our plan to feed the local chapter of the National Guard.

It was all placed on long folding tables with folding metal chairs pushed up under them. All the kids were called in, and we all had to wash up. It was done in a big pan of water that was set into a basin, and we made a line in front of it that trailed into the living room. We took turns, and my Uncle Jimmy emptied the pan from time to time by standing in the backyard doorway, pushing the screen back, and tossing the water into the grass. He would then pour fresh water from the well bucket into the pan, and the line of hand washers would continue until we were all finished.

The youngsters' table and chairs were directly under the pin oak tree. We sat, and food was brought to us on plates. We didn't ask for anything in particular; the food was prepared for us, and there was no question of what we would eat.

We ate until we couldn't eat, and then the short day ended and the night came in, and with it the sounds of crickets, and the big bullfrogs down by the creek. Had it been the right time of year, the night would have been filled with fireflies.

A big metal oil drum with an opening cut into it set in the yard near the pin oak. It was stuffed with kindling and logs and the faint aroma of kerosene. It was lit by my Uncle Jimmy, and the fire licked out of the top and through rusted gaps throughout the barrel. The logs crackled, and the air several feet from the can was warmed.

When the food was eaten, the adults had coffee and the coffeepot was sat on top of the barrel to keep warm. And then came the sweets.

My grandmother, mother, and aunts brought paper plates, cloth napkins, metal forks, and covered pies and cookies, German chocolate cake, which I hated, and thick but soft bricks of pecan bread. It all smelled wonderful. I zeroed in on my favorite: rich chocolate pie with high-mounded meringue.

These treats were stuffed into already full bellies, and in time my cousins wandered off to play chase in the dark, as was often done, and I played too, but soon I found myself back at the circle, listening to the adults. They were beginning to tell stories.

Stories of the Wild West Show, Billy the Kid, how my grandma and her kids had been so poor during the Depression that they had nothing to eat but a tow sack full of onions. And then my father told why he wouldn't eat mashed potatoes under any circumstances. As a child he had lived off of them for several months, potatoes being the only available food. He didn't care if they had butter on them, gravy, or were coated in bacon grease, the mere thought of them made him sick.

The stories dribbled out as it got late, and cars filled with the cousins, aunts, and uncles, and went away. We went away last, loading Mom's pans and plates and some of the leftovers into the back of her car. Every car had departed with leftovers.

Daddy went on ahead to the house in his work car, and we followed.

I sat in the back with the sacks of food, listened to pans and empty platters rattle in the trunk. I finally leaned against the car door. I could see bright stars in the clear night sky. I felt warm and sleepy.

The moon made the road in front of us shine, as if waxed. I drifted off. I dreamed of space travel like I had seen in the comic books or in the Buck Rogers and Flash Gordon serials on TV. I imagined I was a space captain, and my family always stocked my spaceship with home-cooked food before I started my space adventures with my trusty ray gun and extreme confidence. My spaceship, like those of Buck and Flash, spurted sparks and blossomed smoke, and the smoke ridiculously floated up.

Even dreaming, I smelled the aroma of fried chicken and pies and biscuits and cornbread. Smells of family gatherings and the warm kitchens where it was all cooked. The smells of contentment and security, all the grand things that a child adores before the illusion of magic and endless possibilities is broken by experience and time and life’s plans tumble like meteors from the sky.

But in that moment, in that warm car with all those smells, I was as close to nirvana as a being could even be, or would ever be again.

PART I

THAT SUMMER I got a job at the police station, which was also the city jail. These days a kid wouldn't be thought of for such a job, but back then it wasn't so uncommon, and a kid, like me, worked cheap.

It was in the little town of Marvel Creek, tucked tight in the East Texas pines, near the meandering brown river called the Sabine.

The police station was positioned near the center of town, and there were big oaks and massive pecan trees in the front yard, and it was cooler there in the summer than in a lot of places, because the trees had a nice shade. Inside the building it was comfortable too, because it was built of large blocks of granite and they stayed cool. There was an industrial-sized water cooler in one of the windows at the end of the hall, and if you came in during the dead of a hot summer day, it was pleasantly damp inside and the wind from the fan was enough to ruffle your hair.

I was sixteen then, and I was trying to make enough money to put gas in my car. My mother and father were far from well-to-do, but they had bought me a very fine used car, a bronze ’64 Impala, and I thought I might actually start being able to date, taking a girl to the one theater in town, or driving her over to Tyler so we could go to movies there, or drive-in theaters, go out to eat, maybe just ride around, the evening culminating in a parking place somewhere that was romantic and quiet under a dark sky and bright stars.

The job made me feel older than my sixteen years. At the jail I heard a lot of cussing from inmates and cops, and that’s where I stored up a lot of future verbal ammunition. There was one cop, Hilo Barnes, who I thought was exactly what a cop ought to be, just from the way he looked. The police department were all white guys, and wore uniforms, but the uniforms were tan and looked more like the sort a sheriff’s crew would wear. They all had cowboy hats and .38 revolvers, and every man, for there were only men then, wore cowboy boots. All of them had blackjacks or slamjacks that they either carried in a back pocket or strapped to their gun belts. Hilo had dark sunglasses, and when you looked at him you could see yourself in them. He walked tall and had a kind of confidence that radiated off of him.

There were people behind the bars of the three cells much of the time, and it was usually the same drunk who got hauled in on Friday night, and sometimes even voluntarily showed up to arrest himself, so that he might have a place to sleep it off. The other two usually held black prisoners who were in trouble for a variety of infractions, most often drunk and disorderly, fighting, and in a few cases certain things that were listed simply as “too uppity.” Meaning that they had been acting too much like a white person, not strictly following the unwritten code that was the Jim Crow laws.

I would sweep and clean up and deliver meals to the prisoners, and most anything they needed there, and at the end of the week, on Friday, the eagle flew, as they used to say, meaning we were paid.

One late afternoon, not long after work, I stopped at a filling station on the way home. I pulled up at a pump with a car parked on the opposite side of it. A woman was sitting in the car on the passenger side, looking straight ahead, and the driver’s side seat was empty.

Back then it was common for someone to come out and run your gas for you, wipe your windshield, check your oil and transmission fluid, make sure your tires had the right amount of air. It was part of the service.

But the station I stopped at was a one-man operation, and frequently the customers pumped their own gas, and paid afterward.

I got out of my car and got the pump going, put the gas nozzle in the tank, and started pumping. I didn’t have enough money to fill the car up, but back then a dollar’s gas would go a long way, even though it was almost as hard to come by as twenty dollars is today, maybe more.

The gas was pumped, and I went to hang up the nozzle, and as I did a bit of the gas inside of it splashed out, and as fate would have it, that’s right when a burly, balding man stepped up to take the nozzle next, and some of the gas splashed on his boots.

The man said, “Goddamn, boy.”

“Sorry, sir. I didn’t mean to.”

“You don’t watch what you’re doing.”

“Sorry.”

His face had turned red, and his shoulders looked tight under his loose-fitting black T-shirt, and he had rolled the T-shirt’s short sleeves even shorter and tighter to show off his arms, which sported biceps only slightly smaller than a fat baby’s head. He had on cuffed blue jeans and big black motorcycle boots that had almost seen their better days.

“Way to be more careful is to take an ass whipping, boy.”

“I apologized, sir.”

“Apology don’t do my shoes no good, now does it?”

“No, sir, but it’ll wipe off.”

“That’s the thing, boy. I shouldn’t have to wipe them off at all. I think you’re going to wipe them off, and you’re going to do it with your shirttail.”

“No, sir. I’m not going to do that.”

He was bigger than me and no doubt more ruthless, but even at sixteen I was stout and quick and had been training in boxing and wrestling and had just started training in judo at the Tyler YMCA. I hadn’t arrived at where I was going to arrive in that training, but I had been in more than a few fights, a couple of them of a serious survival nature, and I knew one damn thing for sure, I wasn’t about to wipe that asshole's shoes with my shirt, or anything else.

"I say you are going to do it."

That's when I heard the car door open, and the lady got out and grabbed him by the arm and said, "Dash, he's just a kid. He didn't mean nothing by it."

He turned his head slowly. It seemed dreamlike the way he turned his head, and as he did I saw the woman sort of sink inside herself and lift her hands, and then the left hook came, and it knocked her hand aside and caught her a solid one in the right eye. She staggered like a drunk and fell back against the fender of the car and sat down on the ground.

"You son of a bitch," I said, and right then the station owner, Mr. Carlson, came out carrying a nightstick.

"Dash, now you go on, or I'll have to wrap this stick around your head. Get your wife there, load her up, and go on."

"You ought not get into my business," Dash said. "You might end up with that thing stuck up your ass."

"Now, you go on. Get Minnie and go on. She may be your business, but this place here, it's my place of business."

Dash did that slow head turn again and looked at me. "It's your lucky day, punk."

He turned and grabbed the woman under the arms and pulled her up, leaned her against the fender, opened the door, then grabbed her as she started to sink again and put her in the car with all the delicacy of a carny folding up a circus tent.

Turning, he studied me, raised his hand and made a finger gun of it, and brought his thumb down slowly, said, “Pow.”

He got in his car, an old Dodge, started it up, and drove out of there.

That night when I got home Mom was fixing some pinto beans she had soaked, adding whatever goodness it was she added to them, and she was heating up some collard greens in a pan next to them. The greens were what was left from the night before, and she had made two pans of cornbread. One had jalapeños in it like I liked, and the other didn’t, like Dad liked. They had been pulled from the oven and were on the wooden block on the drain board, ready to be sliced and lined with butter.

“You all right?” she said. “Look like you walked over your grave.”

“I’m fine,” I said.

“Well, okay. You sure?”

“Yeah. I’m fine.”

“All right then, supper’ll be ready before long.”

I went into the bathroom and took a shower, combed my hair in front of the mirror, wrapped a towel around my waist, and went into my room.

We didn’t have much in the way of money, but being an only child allowed me to have my own space. It was dark in my room. I pretty much kept the curtains drawn. There was an air conditioner in the window, and I went over and turned it on and soon the stale air in the room began to fade and turn cool. I dropped the towel and put on some underwear and went over and laid down on the bed and thought about what had happened.

I wasn’t sure why I didn’t tell my mother about it, but I think it was because I was a little ashamed. I hadn’t stood up for that woman and she had stood up for me. But the worst of it was she had gone home with Dash, as he was called, and if he hit her like that in public, what the hell did he do in private?

Not long after that, Dad came home from work. I heard him come in, heard my mom say, “Supper’s near ready,” to him.

I got up and put on some jeans and a T-shirt, slipped on my socks and shoes, and went to eat.

I thought about the event for a few days, dodged going to that station when I needed gas, went to a Conoco on the other side of town, which was no great journey, as town took about fifteen minutes to cross.

After a while, the whole thing faded from my mind, but I was in the downtown Piggly Wiggly one day, shopping for a few things for Mom, when I saw the woman from the filling station come in. She walked slowly with her head down, and through the front plate glass I could see Dash’s Dodge in the parking lot, and he was outside of it, leaning on the hood, smoking a cigarette, dressed just as he had been the day I first crossed his path.

The woman moved swiftly past the checkout counter, on into the depths of the store, grabbing a buggy as she went. She was about to start shopping when she looked up and saw me. She looked like a raccoon. Both eyes were black, and the bruises were fresh. She had a knot on the side of her head that was lumped up like there was a rock under her skin. It was the first time I got a good look at her, and without the knot and the black eyes, I could see an attractive woman there, someone who had given up on being attractive. Her hair was tied back severely, as if to match her existence, and when she saw me looking at her, I knew she recognized me too.

She turned quickly with her basket and went down a row of groceries. I couldn't help myself. As my dad once said about my mom and me, if something was not our business, we'd be sure to stick our nose into it.

I tried not rush up behind her, but instead went along the left side of the aisle, as she pushed her cart along the right side. She turned and looked as I came up on her left, said, "Now you go on."

"I just wanted to say I'm sorry he hit you because of me."

"He hits me on account of anything. But you stay out of it. It's husband and wife business."

"It's not the way my parents do it."

"It's the way Dash does it, and that's my concern. It's in the Bible."

"What is?"

"A woman obeying her husband. I smarted and got corrected."

She had stopped pushing the basket now, and we were standing in the aisle talking. She wouldn't look directly at me, kept her head turned slightly to the side.

"That may be, but you don't have to take this kind of thing. You don't have to. Call the cops on him."

"I did. Know what they said? It's husband and wife business, not our business, not law business."

"If this isn't their business, I don't know what is."

"I know this. I got a worse beating after that, and I've learned to live with it."

"You call this living?"

"Who are you to know anything. You're a kid. Let me tell you something. Enjoy being your age, and skip marrying. You do, your life is over. It's all downhill after that. Life is a misery. I got the next life to take care of me."

You can't argue with people who are that deep in religion, so I didn't. I said, "I don't know it has to be that way, but if you get tired of it being that way, why don't you leave?"

"A wife is supposed to stick with her husband through thick and thin."

"And he's supposed to be a husband, not use you for a heavy bag."

"You go on now, ain't nothing going to change. I take too long in here, he sees me talking to you, it wouldn't be good for either of us."

She abruptly shoved the basket forward and went down the aisle, pausing to pick up some cans of soup and drop them into the buggy.

I got the RC Cola I had come in for and a bag of peanuts. I paid for them and went out. I glanced at Dash. He wasn't looking at me. He was still leaning on his car, smoking a cigarette. I walked on down the sidewalk and out to the side of the Piggly Wiggly and got in my car. I opened my drink with a church key I had in the car. I drank a bit of the cola, then opened my bag of peanuts and poured them down the neck of the bottle and listened to the salty nuts fizz in the soda. When it settled, I took a swig and chewed the wet peanuts. I felt like I ought to do something about that poor woman, but I didn't know what.

I backed the car out with one hand and held my drink in the other, and then I drove home to shower and go on a date with a girl I had wanted to go out with for some time. I began to think about that. I didn't think about the woman anymore. Like before, she and her situation drifted to the back of my teenage mind as they had before and rested there silently.

Several months crawled by, and one day as I was driving up to the Piggly Wiggly to do some shopping for Mom, I saw Minnie going inside. She looked older to me than the time before, stooped, walked as if dragging a ball and chain.

Inside I caught up with her as she pushed a basket down the aisle.

She said, "You again."

"Listen. I'm not trying to meddle."

"That's exactly what you're doing."

"Sorry. Fair enough. I'll go on."

Before I had made more than a couple of steps, she said, “Thank you. If there was something I could do, I would do it.”

I moved closer to her. “You can leave.”

“And go where?”

“Don’t you have any relatives?”

“I have a sister in Lubbock.”

“Are you on good terms with her?”

“Yes. But I haven’t spoken to her in several years. Dash doesn’t like me talking to people. Anyone, but especially men. He’s outside in the car, you know, listening to the radio.”

I thought for a moment, said, “Listen, here’s what I can do. I have enough in my pocket to put you on a bus and send you to your sister’s, if you’ll do it. I’ll give you a little more so you can buy something to eat.”

“That’s expensive.”

“Not really,” I said, though I knew I would be spending my money plus the money Mom gave me to buy groceries.

She stood there for a long moment, thinking.

“You’d do that?”

“I would.”

“He’s watching for me to come out, you know.”

“I’ll pull around back. He probably doesn’t even remember me or my car.”

“Enough he blacked my eyes and . . . Well, it was rough.”

In that moment, when she looked at me with her bottom lip fat and cracked, her face aged, her body bent, I wanted to kill that man.

But what I said was, “You decide to do it. I’ll drive around back and pick you up and take you to the bus station.”

She nodded. “Okay. Okay. But please, don’t let him see me. He stops me, he might kill me this time.”

I went outside and spotted Dash sitting in his car behind the wheel, nodding to music. I couldn’t hear what it was because the windows were rolled up. I was glad for that. I would have hated for it to be a favorite song of mine that I would ever after have to associate with him.

I drove my car around back and went inside there, walked through the storage area, waving at a friend of mine who had a summer job working for Coca-Cola putting out bottles of Coke.

“What’s up, Hap?”

“Nothing much,” I said. “Giving a friend a ride.”

Inside the store she was waiting, having abandoned the buggy. I guided her through the back and past my friend, who waved again, and we went out to my car and I drove her to the bus station.

Inside I bought her a ticket and gave her some coins to call her sister. When she came back from the pay phone, she said everything was all right. That her sister wanted to help, and so on. If she hadn’t wanted to help, I guess I would have been out a ticket. I gave her the rest of the money I had, and then I sat with her for about an hour until the bus arrived. I walked her out to the bus. She looked miraculously younger; her chin was lifted, her eyes had a sparkle.

As she was about to step on the bus, she said, “I’ll never forget you."

"All right if you do," I said. "I hope everything is fine with your sister."

As she stepped on the lower bus step to go through the door, I said, "Good luck, Minnie."

She nodded at me and got on the bus. The door hissed closed, and I went back to my car and drove home, needing to explain to my mother that her grocery money was on its way to Lubbock.

I continued to work part-time at the police station and jail, sweeping and mopping, feeding the prisoners, who were mostly overnight visitors who couldn't stay away from the bottle. I became friendly with the chief and his officers. I can't say I felt like one of the boys, but I felt good enough.

As for the woman, Minnie, I felt good about that, and sometimes when I tucked in for the night, I thought of my good deed and felt like a comic book hero, even though all I had done was buy a bus ticket and give her some lunch money.

I even saw Dash at the station one night, roaring drunk. They had him come in and sit on a bunk in one of the cells, left him there for a while without locking the door. They had me make him coffee, which I brought to him, a bit nervous-like, but he didn't recognize me. He drank the coffee, and a little later he was less drunk, and he napped, and then he woke up and had a pulled pork sandwich they brought in for him.

Hilo came in shortly before my shift was to end. They had given me extra hours on my summer job by adding a night shift. I was working about six hours a day. Three in the morning, and three at night. During the middle of the day they had what we called a colored man back then come in and polish the cops' shoes and do more severe cleaning than I did. They called him Pop. He had a limp from when a tire he was airing up at filling station got too much air and blew and the rim hit him in the leg and crippled him a little. He always walked like his right leg was sleepy and couldn't keep up.

Hilo sat with Dash, who was groggy, but doing okay, and they laughed about how drunk he'd been, and so on. The whole thing made me uncomfortable.

Seeing Dash in the cell earlier made me think of the woman that night when I crawled into bed, and I wondered how she was doing and what kind of life she was having. I had a hard time sleeping.

It was the very next day that I saw her. After school I drove over to the Piggly Wiggly to get myself an RC and a bag of peanuts, and when I parked and got out, I saw her walking away from the store. I thought at first it was someone who just reminded me of her, but there was something about the way she held her head, how she walked, but with a worse limp than before, that had me walk and catch up with her as she passed the corner of the store. I wanted to see if it was really her, and damn if it wasn't.

When I got up next to her, she shifted me a fearful look, reminding me of a mouse that had seen a hawk's shadow. She looked terrible. Her eyes were blacked and her nose had a knot on it and her lips were busted and scabby.

"Minnie. What are you doing here?"

"You go on now."

"No. What are you doing here?"

She hadn't stopped walking, and I was walking with her.

"You don't want him to see you, now."

"You went to Lubbock. Why did you come back?"

She stopped, looked at me. "Oh, kid. You don't know nothing. He come and got me. He come and got me that very week. He knew where I went. Where else was there for me to go?"

"You didn't have to go back with him."

"Yeah. I did. It's in the Bible. I'm to obey."

"Oh, hell, Minnie. That isn't true, even if it is in the Bible. Some Old Testament bullshit."

"Don't talk like that."

I didn't normally talk like that around women and adults then, but in that moment, I sure did. I couldn't hold it in.

"Look what you've come back to. Why?"

"Didn't have no other place to go, and he come and got me and put me in the car, and I've accepted that. I smart-mouthed him and he gave me this just this morning. I've learned my lesson. His word is law, and that's how it is. That's my life."

“That’s no life. You don’t deserve this.”

She lifted a hand in the direction of her face.

“I had it coming.”

“No you didn’t.”

“You go on and leave me alone now. Nothing you can do for me. Nothing anyone can do for me. You go on. Don’t bother me again.”

I stood on my spot and watched her limp off down the sidewalk with the attitude of an outcast leper, limp on across the park where there were seesaws and swings and tall oaks and pecan trees, and the shadows of the trees lay over her like a shroud.

PART II

I WAS DOWNSTAIRS in the police station, sweeping up the corridor with a dust mop, when he came staggering in the front door and partially collapsed near the receptionist's desk, leaving tracks through a place I had just mopped. He kind of heaved himself forward, made as if he was about to burp, defeated the need, said, "I think I done been poisoned."

What?" Constance said. She was a middle-aged lady with a pile of dark hair on her head stacked so high she almost needed a donkey ride to reach the top of it.

Right then the man went to his knees and his wad of greasy dark Elvis hair fell on his forehead and into his eyes. He tried to get his feet under him, but they weren't interested. He let out with a groan like he was passing a turd full of razor blades, then fell on the tile.

I knew the man, and what passed through my mind was pretty cruel. Whatever was wrong with him, it couldn't happen to bigger and more deserving asshole than that guy.

I had two weeks left on the cop shop job before I started back to school. It was my last year. I liked the money I was getting, but I was bored with the job, and to tell you the truth, the whole thing just depressed me. You can only be around drunks and crazed rednecks so long before you either go numb or you start to be like them. I wanted to finish up my senior year and get on with my life, do whatever it was I was going to do. I wanted out of Marvel Creek. You might call it a one-horse town, and if you did, that horse was crippled and blind in one eye and needed to be put down.

It was Dash, Minnie's husband. He had threatened to fight me once, but since then I had seen him a couple times in the jail, sleeping off a drunk, and he didn't seem to recognize me. Maybe it was because my hair had grown out a bit, but more likely it was because the alcohol didn't help his memory any.

Hilo came out from the back. A lean, handsome cop who always looked crisp and polished, a man I had once admired. Over time, I liked him less, if for no other reason than he was a friend of the wife-beater, good ole boy, Dash.

I put my mop aside and went over and helped Hilo lift Dash up and we stretched him out on a bench and put a book from the receptionist's desk under his head. It was a thick and ragged hardback of Gone With the Wind.

"Dash," Hilo said. "Can you hear me, fella?"

Dash couldn't hear him. He had grown as white as the peaks of the Himalayas except for little pink clouds that spotted his skin around the cheeks. I could hear him breathing. It didn't sound like distressed breathing, but nonetheless, it didn't take Ben Casey to tell he was in bad way. Lassie would have given up on him.

Constance called an ambulance, and since they were pretty much next door, they were there in a matter of seconds, parking outside at the curb, then coming up the walk between the pecan trees with a stretcher. I held the door open for them.

They put Dash on the stretcher and carried him out, one arm dangling, his knuckles nearly dragging the ground.

Hilo said, "I want you to go over to the hospital with him."

"Me?"

"Who the hell else am I talking to?"

"I'm not a cop."

"No, you ain't. But I'm all that's here at the station now, and you have just been promoted to cop helper. Go over there and find out what the doctors say and come back and tell me. If he's been poisoned, I want to know how. He may have just got some spoiled food, but the way he came in, I got to wonder. Now go on. Drive over there. No use getting in a hurry. They got him."

This was a fine howdy-do. I hated that bastard, and now I had to go check on him, babysit a bit. Hilo, of course, didn't know I had been in a situation with him, and I didn't tell him. I just went out the door and started walking to my car, which was parked out to the side in the parking lot next to a line of sweetgums.

The wind was stiff and hot as a mad dog's pecker. I felt heavy and tired immediately in the summer heat, as if the weather had a wool-gloved hand and was pressing down on the top of my head. I was instantly coated in sweat, and inside my car, the back of my shirt stuck to the seat covers.

I didn't get in any rush. I drove to the Dairy Queen and stopped and went inside and got myself an ice cream cone and ate it sitting in a booth, then I bought a tall paper cup of Coke with shaved ice in it and drove over to the hospital. I finished the Coke in the car and got out and made my way inside as if I were going to my own execution.

Not everything was air-conditioned back then, but the hospital was, and the cool air made the sweat on the back of my shirt feel good. I went to the registration counter, where a woman with hair that could compete with Constance's sat in a chair and smiled at me. She wouldn't tell me anything about Dash's condition, and for some reason, she was reluctant to tell me what room he was in. I told her I was sent there by the police, but if she was moved by that information, she concealed it.

I found a candy striper who was hustling through the hospital. She was a cute brunette girl and the outfit made her cuter. I knew her a little from school and would have liked to know her better. I stopped her and told her who I was looking for, stressing I worked for the police department, to see if I could impress her. Like the receptionist, if I had she held her excitement close to her chest. But she did show me where to go by walking down the hall with me. Her perfume was heavenly and prominent enough I could have closed my eyes and followed her scent.

When I was at his room, my candy striper companion headed out and left me feeling sad and wistful. The door was partially open. I looked inside. He wasn't in there, but I understood then this was the room where he would end up.

I went and sat in a chair in the hallway and watched some more candy stripers go by in their cute uniforms. They were all pretty. I recognized some of them from school but didn't really know any of them.

I sat there hoping Dash would die, and his wife Minnie would be free, and then I felt bad about it for a time, and then I decided I still wished him dead, and kept wishing, as if that really mattered. As my dad said, "Shit in one hand, wish in the other, and see which one fills up first."

After a while they wheeled Dash into the room assigned to him. I went over and spoke to the doctor when he came out of the room, told him I had been sent over by the police department, and they wanted to know how he was and what was wrong.

"I can only talk to the police or a family member. You're neither."

"Cops sent me over."

"Tell them to send someone else over. With authority."

That gave me a way out. I went back to the station, but they were still short-handed, including the chief, so Hilo told me to drive over to Dash's house and see if his wife knew that he was in the hospital, did she even know he was sick and maybe poisoned somehow. He gave me the address.

The idea that anyone would do that now, have a citizen do the cops' work for them, is unthought of. But back then, in the sixties, in small towns, they sort of made up their own rules.

I drove over there, and it was out in the country a little, down a red clay road. A car in front of me was driving fast, and the dry red dust rose up in clouds, and when I drove through the clouds, the dust coated my windshield.

I was thinking it was a good day to be home in front of the window fan, reading, or maybe out fishing with my friend Leonard. Me and him, we knew all the good fishing holes.

When I came to the house, I parked in the dirt driveway. It wasn't a good house. It was small and had last been painted about the time of the Pliocene. Gray shingles flapped on the roof like hot tongues begging for water. Where they lifted up, I could see tar paper. There was tar paper over some of the windows too, and the steps in front of the door sagged a little to one side.

I walked with hesitation up the drive, mounted the leaning steps, and knocked on the door. No one answered. I went around back, and as I did, I had a queasy feeling if I knocked on the back door she might answer this time, and I would see her wearing her raccoon eyes and knotted forehead from his blows. Her nose might be broken, her lip fat. I didn't like the idea of that. I knocked, but no one answered back there either. There was a fan humming in the window by the door. It had a screen wire netting over the back with flies resting on it.

There were always flies resting on the back of a cooler, or most anything that time of year.

I walked around front and got a little notepad and a pencil out of my car and wrote out a note and stuck it in the crack between the screen door and the door frame and drove out of there.

I hadn’t gone more than a mile when I saw some crows rise up, startled by my motor. They flew off quick, having come out of a swirl of blackberry vines that grew alongside the road. Beyond the vines was a ditch, and because I was coming up on a hill I could see down into it, and there was something odd in it. At first, I thought it might be a store mannequin, what we called a dummy back then, but I recognized what the shape was wearing. The same dress Minnie always wore, thin and gray and sad-looking.

Feeling a knot growing in the pit of my stomach, I parked the car on the edge of the road, got out, and made my feet move, went over to look in the ditch.

It was indeed poor Minnie.

I gathered myself and slid down into the ditch and took a look at her. Flies were buzzing on her eyes and in her open mouth. Her face was battered and she had fat finger marks against her neck. I shooed the flies and went back to my car and got an old blanket I had in the back seat and took it down and put it over her after I shooed the flies again.

Her feet stuck out under the short blanket. She had on one shoe. I found the other one nearby, and for whatever reason, I slipped it on her bare foot, which was more difficult than I would have imagined. She was pretty stiff. None of this was something you should do with a crime scene, but I didn't know that back then, and frankly, I'm not sure a lot of our police knew it, and I don't know if it would have mattered to me. I felt she should be covered and have her shoe on. Great police work was most likely unnecessary. We had our share of murders in and around Marvel Creek, but it was usually obvious who did it, and I felt this was pretty obvious as well.

When I got back in the car, my hands were trembling, and I could hardly turn the key. I wanted to go to the hospital and smother Dash in his sleep. I wanted to do a lot of things to him, and none of them good.

Finally, I got the motor humming and drove back to the station.

There was quite a bit of excitement over the next couple of days about Minnie's murder and Dash being in the hospital. It was a real-life murder mystery, the paper said, but it didn't seem that mysterious to me. I had gotten Minnie away from that horrid bastard once, and then she had gone back to him, and now this.

I gave my statement to Hilo, and then a reporter came around to see me, but I didn't tell him much. I had him talk to Hilo.

Next day I heard them chatting around the station. Dash had indeed been poisoned. Arsenic was suspected, rat poison the culprit. Found on the stove at Dash's house was a large pot of minestrone soup, and at the bottom of the pot two rats, dead of poison it was surmised.

No doubt about it, Minnie had boiled a couple of poisoned rats in his soup, hoping to put him down. It was suspected that she had liberally dosed the soup with rat poison too.

Hilo had been to the hospital to talk to Dash a couple of times, and he said Dash grinned and said, "I thought it was some of the best soup she had ever made. The rats gave it flavor for once."

As for Minnie, well, a woman who picked up soda bottles to sell came into the station the day after I found the body, and said, "I seen that woman that got killed. Seen her picture in the paper. One that boiled the poisoned rats in that man's soup."

I was mopping the lower floor bathroom, the one the receptionist and the cops used, when that woman came in, but I could hear her talking clearly. She sat in a chair at the receptionist's desk, and Hilo pulled a chair up for himself, and Constance wrote down what the woman said in shorthand to be typed up later.

"I like to pick up pop bottles. I carry me a bag, and if I have a good day, I can darn near fill it. I fill it, well, then I can't carry it. I walk that road once a week to get them tossed bottles, but I won't no more, not since they found that woman dead, and then of course, there's the colored man."

“Who would that be?” Hilo said.

“I seen him that very day. He was walking along the railroad tracks. It was that fella that sharpens lawn mower blades and such.”

“You mean Calabash?”

“That’s him. Yeah. I seen him walking along the tracks, and then when I heard they found that dead woman, well I put two and two together and come here to give you my arithmetic.”

I backed out of the bathroom, still mopping, listening.

“You see, it was along about the same time the paper said she must have been killed. I figured that big buck got her.”

“That makes some things clear,” Hilo said.

I thought: what’s clear is Dash killed her.

I went mopping along the hall, and pretty soon I was at the end of it and couldn’t hear them anymore.

About a half hour later, I couldn’t stand it, so I found Hilo. He was in his small office with a rotating fan on a table next to him. He was rocked back in his chair with his feet on his desk, drinking a bottle of grape soda.

He looked up as I came in, almost smiled.

“Hey, boy. Take a load off.”

I sat down in the chair in front of his desk. The fan rotated my way and cooled me for an instant before turning back toward Hilo and leaving me in the heat.

I said, “Hilo, I know you know Dash beat his wife.”

“Now and again.”

"He hurt her pretty bad and she reported here but wasn't nothing done about it."

Hilo's face soured. "Listen here. We know Dash and his wife fought. Husbands and wives do that."

"I'm not talking about having an argument."

"Some women, they just don't know when to shut up. Dash had to pop her one now and again. It was for her own good."

"Her own good? How is her being dead in a ditch for her own good?"

"Whoa now. Dash is a good ole boy. He didn't kill her. Fact is, pretty sure we know who done it. You know the big nigger works here shining shoes and such, takes your place in the summer."

"Pop? He gets around so slow Minnie would have had to strangle herself. Besides, he doesn't sharpen lawn mower blades."

"I mean Pop's son. He was the one she seen near the railroad tracks, not far from the ditch where you found Minnie."

"That don't mean he did it."

"It means he likely did it. He's been in prison for rape and was suspected in a murder once. His own cousin. She had gone off with him and was found in the river bottoms next day, naked with her throat cut. He's had a bit of trouble around town more than once after that. Had light fingers. He seems likely for it."

"But Dash beat his wife regularly. Gave her a limp. She reported it to the station here. No one did anything."

"She could have left at any time. Staying was her choice. Again, boy. Husband and wife business."

"Sounds to me like murder is Dash's business."

Hilo's face colored, and he pulled his feet off his desk and settled into place and slammed the bottle of grape soda down on his desk hard enough to make me jump a little. Little beads of the drink bounced in the air and splashed on the back of his hand and onto the desk.

"You ain't no goddamn policeman, boy. I've known Dash all my life. We hunt and fish together. He's a good ole boy. His wife, she was a real bitch. She had ideas about how she should do this or that, and he didn't want her to. Man has the say, not the wife. She had to be corrected now and then for smartin' off or trying to wear the pants in the family."

"Did that correction and those pants get her in that ditch?"

"You talking pretty sharp to a man you work for. You got about a week and a half to go. You don't have to finish out."

I thought of the gas I wanted to put in my car, and I shut my mouth. I'm not proud of that. All I can tell you is I was seventeen.

The storm cloud on Hilo's face went away, and he grinned. "It's all right. You're just saying your piece. But now you've said it. Go on back to work, now. We won't talk about it no more. It's best we don't, hear?"

I nodded and went out, ashamed of myself for agreeing.

I was coming back from the café after lunch, when I saw a struggle out front of the station. There were three cops, Hilo one of them, grappling with a big black man, trying to get him up the steps. He was throwing them loose of him like a dog shedding water.

He knocked one of the cops out in the yard and up against one of the pecan trees. The thrown cop got up like he didn't really want to and went back at it. Finally, one of the cops dove for his legs and Calabash fell and his head cracked on the steps, and it was a loud crack, like a car tire rolling over a walnut. They eventually got him up and into the station, and I came in as they were trying to wrestle him upstairs to the jail cells.

It was quite the fight. Smacking his head on that step outside hadn't worried him long. Hilo came rolling down the stairs, tumbling out on the lower floor. When he went back up, his face red with embarrassment, he pulled his slapjack from his belt and went to work on the big man while the other cops held him.

It was a horrible beating. Blood was on the stairs and on the walls along the stairs, and some of the blood had flown down and spotted my face where I stood in the lobby. The big man was still standing, and though he stood for a long time, even he could only take so much. He went to his knees and Hilo hit him a few more times with the slapjack, each blow hard enough to drive a nail.

They got him upstairs, and I watched them disappear around the edge of the stairway and the wall.

I don't know exactly why, but I followed them up, and when I got up there they were still working on him. Now they were punching and kicking him, and Hilo was using that slapjack like he was swatting flies, only what that poor man was getting was a lot worse than what he'd have gotten from a fly swatter.

They got him in a cell, threw him in there, and closed the door and poked a key in the lock and penned him up. The prisoner got up and stumbled to the bars and took hold of them and tried to shake them, but they were so imbedded in concrete King Kong couldn't have made them move. He did that for a moment, blood running down his face and all over his once-white shirt. His teeth were gritted in a fence of anger and were stained with blood. He sat down suddenly on the floor. His legs had turned to rubber, and once he sat, he wavered there a moment, then fell back on the cement, turned over as if to crawl, and then he was still as stone.

"Hope that nigger dies," Hilo said.

Hilo, who was always crisp and neat, looked like a long-haired cat that had been groomed with a machete. His hat was gone, his hair was sticking up like weeds in a briar patch, and his shirt was torn as well as one of his pants pockets. There was blood on his face and on his shoes. He looked in better shape than the other two.

Then he saw me. "What the fuck you looking at, boy? Get a mop. Clean this place up."

I almost threw in the towel, right then, but I had a little more than a week left, and then I was back in school. Still, I didn't move. I stood my ground and the cops passed me and went down the stairs, fuming and cussing.

I went over to the cell and looked in. The big man had woken up. He put his hands under him and made a sound a little like a dying mouse, and then slowly, as if he were building himself into place, bone by bone, muscle by muscle, he made it to his feet. He saw me looking at him.

“Go on, kid. Get the hell away from me.”

I went and got the mop out of the closet, and the mop bucket, and filled it with water and floor soap, and went to work mopping up blood on the second floor and on the stairs. Blood sheds easier than it cleans, but I got it mopped up and the walls wiped.

When I had that done, I went downstairs and told Constance that she ought to call a doctor, because the man upstairs was in a bad way.

She got up and went into the chief’s office. I didn’t even know he was around. He had been out for a week or so. He came out of his office with his thumbs hooked in his gun belt. He was Hilo’s cousin. He was about ten years older and he was a little fat and worn-out looking.

“Is that what all that ruckus was about? A nigger whipping?”

I didn’t say anything, but he could tell from my face that that was what it was about. He hadn’t even bothered to come out of his office with all that fighting going on, perhaps for fear of having to deal with the big man himself.

“I was trying to do some goddamn paper work. Hilo!”

Hilo came out of the downstairs bathroom wiping his face with a bloody towel.

“What the hell happened to you? Look like you got caught up in a lawn mower.”

“Nigger trouble. Jake and Earl, they’re patching each other up in the back.”

“He whipped all three of you?”

“He’s the one in the cell.”

“But it took all three of you?”

“I hadn’t never had hold of anyone like that. It was like fighting a goddamn octopus.”

“He the one that lady, whatever her name is, reported?”

“Yes, sir.”

“I assume you asked him if he’d come in before you decided to flail on him?”

“Yes, sir. He didn’t have a mind to come in. Said he didn’t do nothing.”

“Might not have.”

“Well, sir. He’s got a record.”

“Investigate it. Maybe give him a solid interrogation, if you know what I mean. But I think you’re going to need more men and maybe a hammer.”

Hilo didn’t like that he hadn’t been able to handle the man upstairs better than he had. And, of course, now I knew they were talking about Calabash, the one they decided had strangled poor Minnie.

Pop's hands were like leather mitts and his face looked to have been irrigated, his wrinkles were so deep. His hair was snow white and cut close, and his eyes were as sad as those paintings of Jesus on the cross, and they had scar tissue above them, thick as tree bark and similar in appearance. He was big and slightly bent, and when he walked, he lumbered and limped. When I saw him, he was usually carrying his shoe box. He worked at the barbershop now and then shining shoes and was brought into the police station to do the same for the cops from time to time, and when the summer was gone, he would be my replacement at the jail and police station as janitor and errand runner. There was a rumor that he had once been a professional boxer.

He came into the station without his shoe box and asked politely at the front desk if he could see his son, and got the nod. He went upstairs behind me. I was carrying my mop bucket up to do some work in the back room, and frankly, when I realized he was going up, I started ahead of him, being curious.

I went on into the janitor closet just beyond the cells, near the room where they interrogated people, sometimes with words, sometimes with fists. I slowly went about pouring dirty water out of the bucket down the drain and refilling it with fresh hot water from the floor sink.

I got the bucket full, added a bit of floor soap, and put a new mop head on the mop. Pop had arrived and pulled up a folding chair that had been against the wall and parked it in front of the cell and eased himself into it. I could see him through the crack in the door as I went about my preparations.

“What you done got yourself into, boy?”

“I didn’t do nothing,” Calabash said.

“You’ve done something before.”

“Said I didn’t do nothing. Before ain’t now.”

“You always doing something.”

“Back then, yeah, not now. How come you don’t never stand up for me?”

“You got to stand up first.”

“Self-righteous, ain’t you, old man? You always got the do-right talk, but you ain’t nothing but an old Uncle Tom. They snipped your nuts long ago.”

“You weren’t behind them bars, I’d slap your face, boy.”

“Tell them to let you in.”

“You ain’t the bad man you think.”

“Tell that to all them cops it took to put me in here. Tell them that. You fought some in the day, but you ain’t nothing now. Not a thing. I could bend you over my knee and paddle your ass way you used to do me.”

“You’re not tough. Not in the way it counts. You’re just mean and low down. I never could understand you.”

“No. You never could.”

I had the rolling bucket ready now, so I pushed it out of the closet with the mop and gently closed the door. Pop looked up when I did. It was like he had just noticed I was upstairs.

Pushing the bucket along, I made my way to the back room. I could still hear them talking.

"You done this, you ought to come clean, boy. You done this, you got to pay."

"Ever nigger ever born pays, old man. Even the Uncle Toms. Where's being the good nigger got you, huh?"

"You don't need to use that word about our people. Let the white man use it, not you."

"We let them do it a lot."

"Our day will come."

"You still counting on Moses to bring you to the promise land, old man?"

"I'm counting on time."

"Not in your time, old man. You got maybe a year or two left, and you'll be leaning on the door to hell."

"That's your place to go," said Pop.

"You want me to tell them I did it so I can fry like ham in the electric chair? That what you want?"

"It's your soul I'm worried about."

"I ain't got no soul."

"I hate to hear that, son. I really do."

"You ain't got one neither. Ain't no one got none. Us niggers ain't even got a toilet in town. Got to piss out behind a building, and heaven help you if anyone sees you do it. Then you're showing your stuff. Can’t buy a goddamn hamburger without going through the back door. I’d like a place to eat and I’d like a place to shit in town, same as white folks. Look over there at that commode. I ought to rip it out of the wall, lean up against the bars, and shit through it. Mess on the floor there.”

“You just being vulgar. Ought to be a man, Calabash. That’s what you ought to be. Your mama—”

“Don’t bring her into this. She done worked herself to death. She worked herself to death for Jesus and Heaven tomorrow. When it come tomorrow, she just died, old man. Just died.”

“You don’t know a thing about her. She raised you, and you don’t know a thing about her.”

“Go on now. I’m through with you, Uncle Tom. I’m ashamed to say you my daddy. All you did was shoot some juice in a good woman. You ain’t no kind of daddy.”

“Don’t talk like that.”

You just say what’s supposed to be right, and ain’t none of it right. Come up here close, old man. I got something to tell you. You want to hear something, I got it for you.”

I heard Pop’s chair scrape closer, and they said something else to each other, something soft. I swished my mop past the open door, and Pop was close to the bars looking in at Calabash. I could just see Calabash’s face. He had it pressed tight against the bars and he was saying something to Pop, something mean. I saw Pop sink in his shoes, and then he started shuffling toward the stairs.

“Put that in your pipe and smoke it,” Calabash said as Pop moved away.

Pop looked at me as I swished back across the doorway. He smiled a little. It was a habit smile, not a real one. It reminded me of one I had seen him give the cops in the station, right after they insulted him: a hard, little smile full of pain and remembrance.

Nodding, he went on down the stairs and I went back to mopping.

“Hey, white boy,” Calabash called out to me.

I left the mop in the bucket and went over to where Pop had left the chair.

“Hey, boy. Why don’t you drop your pants and back up to the bars here and I’ll fuck you. You’d like a black snake, wouldn’t you?”

I didn’t say anything. I took the chair from where Pop left it and put it against the wall and went back to mopping. I could hear Calabash laugh and then he was quiet, and then I thought I heard a noise like someone with a cold, and then he was quiet again.

Later, when I put the mop up, I glanced in the cell. Calabash was lying on his cot with his arm flung over his eyes.

It wasn’t none of my business, so I got right on it.

I went over to the hospital to see Dash, but he wasn’t in. They had let him go home, though I was assured he was doing poorly. I think the nurse who told me this thought I was on a police matter, a helper they had sent for information, and I let her believe it. No one had before, or no one thought it mattered, so it was all right to have a moment of power, minor as it might have been.

Driving over to Dash's house, I was trying to figure how I would go about what I had in mind, but nothing presented itself, so I just drove there and got out and knocked on the door.

After a long time, the door opened, and there was Dash. The poison had given him a stroke. He limped along on his left leg, his left fist clenched.

When he saw me at the door, I could tell he didn't recognize me. He never did. Right then, though, hating him as much as I did, seeing gray in his hair he hadn't had before, him weak and pale like that, I felt sorry for him. I'm always like that. So is my mother. My father is kind, but he isn't sentimental about assholes. I sometimes think I'm sentimental about everything and everybody.

"Who are you?"

"I work at the police department. You've seen me there."

"Yeah. Long-haired kid. What do you want?"

"Calabash. I don't think he killed your wife. I'm thinking it was you."

For a moment his pale face had some color.

"Who the fuck did you say you are? You're not old enough to be a cop. Shit, boy. I didn't kill anybody, but I could start with you."

"I think if the next line is 'I'm going to get my gun,' you should note that I got you beat if it comes to a foot race."

"You think you're a funny little fucker, don't you?"

"I think there's an innocent man about to be railroaded for murdering your wife, and you did it."

"She damn sure deserved it, but it wasn't me. It was that nigger. Calabash. He did it. Get the hell out of here. I don't want you around. Why'd you come here?"

"Just wanted you to know someone knows, even if there may not be a damn thing I can do about it."

"You don't know your ass from a hole in the ground."

"I'm the one who put her on a bus so she could see her sister. But you went and got her."

"That was you . . . Oh hell. I know you. I not only seen you at the jail, you was the one at the filling station. See that now, you long-haired motherfucker. I should have kicked your ass."

"Should have tried, but instead you took it out on a woman that might have weighed a hundred and twenty pounds with rocks in her pocket. She wanted to be away from you, but you made her stick. You treated her like she was a cow you bought at an auction."

A crooked smile crawled across his face.

"Not quite. You can fuck a cow, but you can't get them to do laundry. Besides, I went to her sister's, and she was ready to come home. She didn't have no money, except what little I gave her."

"It had to be very little."

"You need to go on and get out of my business. I'm going to phone Hilo and tell him about you. You won't have that job long."

“Go ahead. I just wanted you to know I know, and I think the law and such know, but it’s easier to pick on some black man who can take the fall for you. Hitting a woman like that. Shit, you ought to have poisoned yourself and been glad to do it.”

“Go on, kid. I’ve had enough of you. I was at myself I’d whip your ass all over the yard. Shit, boy. What you think? They’re going to arrest me on some suspicion you got? Them boys know me. Hilo especially. Women, you got to keep them dick-whipped. Man’s woman is a man’s woman, and she has to know her place. The Bible says that.”

“That’s one reason I gave up religion. As for her place, I think she sure showed you yours. How were those poisoned mice in minestrone?”

“Get off my place.”

“Gladly.”

I hadn’t really accomplished anything, but I wanted that mean, poisoned, crippled son of a bitch to know someone knew, and Minnie mattered to someone, even if I only knew her from a few short conversations.

Dash went back inside, maybe to get his gun, and I went out to the car, walking pretty fast, just in case he had that gun close and handy.

I didn’t have any doubt my sweeping and mopping days at the jail were done, and probably before I could get back there. Dash would be on the phone already.

I didn’t give a shit. I had had it up to the top of my head with all the crap that went on down there, all the crap I was learning that went on underneath the façade of my little Andy of Mayberry town.

Driving up to park in front of the station, next to the curb near the great pecan tree, I saw Pop limping up the steps and going inside. He had his shine box with him. They had probably called him over to shine cop shoes, which struck me as brutal, considering his son was in a cell upstairs. The back of Pop’s shirt had a V of sweat on it and it was stuck to him. The sides of the steps had a concrete support, and he had the box in one hand and the other on the support, using it to help him move up the steps. All in all, he was moving swiftly.

I got out of my car and saw a squirrel at the base of the pecan. He gave me a cautious look, then jetted up the trunk and into the green leaves above.

The air was still and smelled like an oncoming rain.

When I was inside, I saw Pop turn up the stairs. I decided before they fired me, I would go up and tell Pop goodbye. I stopped and let him reach the top before I started up. When I got to the top of the stairs, Hilo was there, coming out of the back room. He had his hat in his hand and his hair was ruffled from having been cooling himself off in front of the window fan.

“I got a call, boy.”

“I know,” I said.

“You might as well pack up anything you got up here and take it with you.”

“You don’t get to fire me,” I said. “I quit.”

“Think of it any way you like. Chief done told me you’re through here, now, next year, anytime.”

“Glad of it.”

“Don’t get smart with me.”

“I’m not getting smart, I’m getting my work shoes, and then I’m saying bye to Pop, and I’m gone.”

That’s when I noticed Hilo wasn’t looking at me anymore. He was looking down the gap that led to the cells. His brow was wrinkled. He dropped his hat.

I turned and looked down there too.

Pop had a pistol. It was a big revolver and looked old enough to have been used in the Civil War. He cocked the hammer back and pointed it at the cell where his son was.

I glanced back at Hilo. He was drawing his gun. He had it halfway out of his holster when his left eye and half his face jumped away from him and slapped against the wall with a sound like a wet rag. The wall smeared red.

I turned and looked at Pop. The gun was pointed in my direction. He studied me for a long moment. He turned back to the cell.

“You ain’t never gonna do right,” he said, and cocked back that single-action again.

I took one step forward without even realizing it. I should have gone down those stairs like a hurricane, but I took that one step for whatever reason, and when I did, I could see Calabash standing in his cell, his hands on the bars.

“That’s right. What you can’t fix you shit on,” Calabash said.

“You sure can’t be fixed,” Pop said.

“Go ahead. Do me a goddamn favor.”

The gun snapped and nothing happened. The load was bad. Pop cocked back the hammer again, causing the cylinder to rotate.

“It’s best, son.”

“For who?” Calabash said, and lost his nerve, backed away from the bars. The gun fired. I heard a sound like someone coughing, and then Pop cocked the gun again, and it jumped in his hand once more. Then he walked over to the cell, stuck the gun through the bars and popped off another shot. Way he was standing I couldn’t still see in the cell.

I put my back to the wall as he turned and looked at me.

“Wasn’t nothing for it,” Pop said. “Told me he killed and raped that girl, just like last time. Said he liked it. I turned out his light, boy. I turned it out.”

He dropped the pistol and walked past me, then turned and went back and got his shine box, like he had an appointment to polish shoes. He passed me again with his box, his old face suddenly smooth as a baby’s ass, and went around the side of the wall and started down the stairs. I realized I had been holding my breath. I moved away from the wall and went over and looked in the cell. The back wall and floor were red with blood and Calabash was on his side. He had big red blooms of blood on his chest and abdomen. His eyes and mouth were open. He looked like a man who had found a snake in his mailbox.

I hurried back to the stairway, eased my head around the corner, saw Pop going out the front door with his box. I turned and looked at the wall. Part of Hilo's face was stuck there, but it was sliding ever so slowly down the wall, like a slug on a windowpane.

When I got downstairs, the chief was standing in front of the reception desk. He had a pistol in his hand. He looked and saw me and the pistol pointed at me. If he had looked any more frightened, there would have to have been two of him.

"Pop shot Calabash," I said. "And Hilo."

"They alive?"

"Not likely."

"I guess I better go get him." But the chief didn't move.

At home that night I would have thought I wouldn't have had an appetite, but it was as if I was a hollow in the earth that couldn't be filled.

I told my parents what had happened, and my mother tried to talk to me, but my dad said, "Let him be."

I sat at the table like always, and Mom brought out what she called Mexican Mess, and put it on my plate, and cut me some jalapeños and grated some cheese on top of it, and then brought out Mexican cornbread and butter, and all manner of other things. When we had the food, she always cooked like she was expecting the Mormon Tabernacle Choir.

She kept looking at me like she expected me to levitate or something.

Dad glanced at me now and again, but he didn't try to hold my gaze. I must have had that thing they call the thousand-yard stare. He leaned out from his chair and touched me on the shoulder gentle as a butterfly, then turned to the food Mom was heaping on his plate.

I ate more than Dad did. I ate more than anyone did since the creation of the world, and Mom even made me oatmeal on the stove after that, as I kept saying how hungry I was. By bedtime I was sick to my stomach, and ended up throwing up, and if I ate more than anyone since the creation of the world, since humans walked the earth, I also puked more than anyone ever. I thought my insides were coming out. But when it was all over, I felt marginally better, dissolved some baking soda in a glass of water, drank that to settle my stomach, and went to bed.

My life was a staggering blank for a few days, and I saw things different from then on. Colors changed, then wind blew strange, and the rain was the heavens' tears. People's voices sounded piped in from afar, and when I spoke my own voice sounded strange to me, and when I looked at people I saw flesh bags full of blood and bone, all of them heading for a ride in the hearse, a hole in the ground. My own face in the mirror was strange and pale, and my eyes were small holes that I kept staring at, trying to rediscover myself inside of them.

For a long time, I slept poorly, with the closet light on, the door to the closet partially open to spread the light across my room. Most nights I dreamed I was in the cell and Pop was pointing the revolver at me. I would then see Hilo's face on the wall, oozing down in what looked like strawberry jam spotted with bone and a clinging eyeball. I saw Calabash on his side, his eyes open, and one night, in a dream, Calabash winked at me, said, "Do me a god-damn favor."

It seemed so real I jumped awake with a yell.

Dad came in the room then. He sat in a chair by the bed. I noticed in the thin moonlight from the window that he looked tired and old for the first time in my memory. Maybe I just hadn't been paying attention. Wrinkles covered his face like map lines, and his missing teeth on one side had caused his jaw to sink. He had pulled them out when they were bad by tying a cord to a doorknob, then the other end to the tooth, and then he would slam the door by kicking it with his foot. It was cheap dentistry.

I was already sitting up when he came in. I was sweating cold sweat.

I didn't say anything to him. He sat silent for a long time, but it felt fine to have him near. I had once seen him bend a crowbar across his chest, crush an apple in his hand as if he were wadding up cellophane. If there were haints, they would fear him, not the other way around.

It startled me when he spoke.

“Thing like that, it don’t never go away completely, but you learn to get on with things.”

I didn’t ask him how he knew what I was dreaming about. He just knew. I’m sure it wasn’t the first time I had yelled in my sleep since it happened, though it was the first time it had brought me awake in the manner it had that night, and it was the first time it had brought Dad into the room, that I was aware of anyway. It was like all those nights and all those dreams had been building up to this explosive moment: the Vesuvius of nightmares.

“I thought Dash did it,” I said. “I was sure he killed her.”

“Another day, he might have.”

My dad always thought a black man was prone to that kind of thing, murder and rape, but tonight he didn’t say that. He held that back. I think he didn’t want to start a fight. Not that night.

“A fella can see something like what you saw, and it can hang in the back of his mind like a goddamn bat, but finally that bat will fly off. Sometimes it’ll come back and nest, but it won’t be around as much as it’s around now.”

“How do you know?”

“Things happen in life, you live long enough,” he said.

And in that instant I knew he too had seen some bad things. I didn’t ask him what. I didn’t want to know right then. Maybe later. But I realized, with some kind of odd comfort, that we were now, father and son, part of some rare and not-so-coveted club.

He got up and went out and came back with a damp washrag, gave it to me. “Wipe your face down, son.”

I did that. He took the rag.

“Here’s a thing I’m going to tell you that’s all I know about a thing like this. You move on. You got to. You don’t, well, that bat never flies out of the cave, just hangs around inside of it. Things that can’t be changed won’t be changed. You want some milk to help you sleep?”

“Okay,” I said.

Dad went into the kitchen, and I heard him pouring milk into a pan, and I knew the next move would be to heat the milk on the stove.

After a bit he came in carrying a glass of warm milk with a pot holder. He sat the glass on the nightstand and left the pot holder with it.

“Don’t burn yourself.”

“Thanks, Dad.”

“You better?”

“Yes, sir.”

He gave a bit of a grunt and went out.

I drank the milk, and when I went back to bed, I thought of my dad in the next room with Mom. I thought of the sad club we belonged to, and for some reason, knowing that, I slept much better, and as the days passed, better yet. As Dad predicted, the bat flew away more often, but now and again, in an unsuspecting moment, asleep or awake, it flapped back into the little dark cave inside my head and made its presence known.

After the shooting Pop had walked down to the café and gone through the front door like a white man and found a table and sat there and placed his gun on the chair beside him. He called out for a hamburger and fries and Coke, and you can bet he got those. He sat there looking around, taking in the café, a place he had never been allowed to enter, and when the food came he started eating. One of the black cooks slipped out the back and went and fetched the police.

The chief finally arranged for some cops to get there, and they came and it was easy. Pop went without incident, giving up his gun. He only asked to finish eating the hamburger, and they let him. He went away with them then, pleaded guilty, ending up going to prison, and then the electric chair. My uncle knew a fellow worked at the Huntsville prison outside of Houston, and that fellow told him Pop had a cheeseburger, fries, and a chocolate shake for his last meal, and ate every bite. He carried a Bible with him to the execution chamber and a reverend walked at his side praying.

“The reverend walked with him,” my uncle said. “He thinks niggers got their own heaven, that’s what my friend told me. I ain’t so sure about that. My friend, they call him Captain, said Pop looked happy to go, like he was starting out on vacation. He had his head shaved, and Captain said it was so shiny in the lights it made you have to look away, but Pop didn't have his head hung. He kept it up. Captain said he didn't have that wild dog look in his eyes they get, and when they put the cap on him he smiled and asked if it would take long.

"'Naw,' said Captain, 'but you might jump a little.' But he didn't. They hit him the first time and he was gone quick, his skull smoking under his metal hat, but by the time they gave him the backup jolt, he had done crossed Jordan in a motorboat."

They buried Calabash in a colored graveyard out in the country, and I don't know who or if anyone came to the cemetery to see him go down. I only know he got buried. I don't know where Pop ended up, but my guess is the prison graveyard, most likely unmarked.

Dash, he got better and was still alive last time I heard. I really don't want to know any more about him. Not now, not ever.

THE WATERING SHED

When me and Leonard were young men, we decided to drive out to the Watering Shed to drink. We were underage, but we heard Shank figured if you could drive and had money, you could drink. I didn't even drink, but the Watering Shed was a kind of rite of passage, and we wanted to go there just to prove our balls had dropped. It would be our first visit.

Leonard, being black, wasn't exactly welcome. Though on the books East Texas was integrated, a lot of white folks were having a problem embracing it.

I think Leonard half-hoped he'd be denied, and that he could cause some trouble over it. Leonard has always been kind of angry, and he may have been even more angry then.

There was also this: he was queer as a six-toed cat and proud of it, and was as tough as a nickel steak and so masculine he made the macho tough guys look like they wore lace panties and shaved their balls.

The Watering Shed was well out in the woods, down by the river, and there were stories about how people went out there and didn't come back, were later found in the river. Shank was known to settle some matters with a baseball bat or a cutoff shotgun he kept behind the bar. As for the clientele, well, let's just say they weren't sophisticated.

Frankly, I don't know how it happened, but since Leonard and I met, we had become friends, and had bonded because of certain incidents, and truth was, we were moving beyond mere friendship and were becoming like brothers. Him being black and me being white broke some unwritten rules, and me hanging with him and him being queer, that just made it all the worse as far as many Southern folk were concerned.

When we got to the Watering Shed, there were a few cars parked out front, and the night was settling down on the world, and there was a glint of silver moonlight on the tin roof. We went in, Leonard bold as a cold, bare titty at a strip show, and me a little nervous, like a long-tailed cat in a room full of rocking chairs.

When we entered, you could have heard a microbe drop.

There was tobacco smoke in the air, and it was a little warm, and it smelled funny, an accumulation of sweat and alcohol. It wasn't packed inside, just a few folks here and there. Near the door was a round table, and there were four men at the table playing cards and drinking beer.

At the bar were two others, and in the back, at two different tables, a couple of men sat sipping beer. Joe Shank, who I knew from around town, was behind the bar. There wasn't a woman in the place.

It wasn't me they were looking at, of course, it was Leonard, black as an eggplant, cocky as a rooster. He sauntered over to the bar like Wild Bill Hickok, leaned on it, said, "Bartender, how about a beer?"

"How about some money?" Shank said.

Shank was a big redheaded guy with a big belly, but he gave you the immediate impression of someone who would charge a rhino, thinking he was going to run into its mouth and come out its ass.

Leonard paid for the beer, and Shank placed a bottle of Jax in front of him and used a church key to pop the top.

I ended up sitting on a stool next to where Leonard was standing. There was a large, flyspecked mirror behind the bar, and the bottom of it was covered by the tops of liquor bottles. I could see the men at the table by the door in it, and it was easy to turn my head and see those who were at the end of the bar and in the back. They seemed to have gone into comas, but the ones at the table by the door, they looked alert, like hungry lions that had just noticed a gazelle had wandered into their path.

"You want a beer, Hap?" Leonard said.

"No," I said.

"You might ought to have one," the bartender said.

"That's all right," I said.

"No," said the bartender, "you might ought to have one. You're taking up a drinker's space."

"You got ghosts for drinkers?" Leonard said, taking the beer Shank had set in front of him, tossing back a deep swig. "It's not like the house is full and there's a line at the door."

Shank made a grin so thin you couldn't have slipped a razor blade between his lips.

"Come into this bar, you buy a drink. You can pour it in your boot or take it in the shitter and pour it down the drain, you want, but you buy one. That, or some other liquor. What will it be?"

"A beer," I said.

"Don't want it, don't have to buy it," Leonard said.

"Yes, he does," said Shank. "He has to buy it."

"It's all right," I said.

"Not if you don't want it," Leonard said.

"Want it or don't, he's got to buy one," Shank said.

"He's gonna buy a beer," said a man at the table. I glanced at him. He was the only man at the table below thirty, probably not a whole lot older than us. He had a long face and fat lips and a lean body made hard by work, and a gleam in his eye like a man looking for a slight.

"You buying?" Leonard said, looking over his shoulder at the man at the table.

"What's that?" said the young man, turning his head slightly, like maybe if he did, Leonard's color might change.

"You heard me."

"Don't think I did."

“Ought to get your ears checked then,” Leonard said. “Get them flushed out or some such, ’cause I know I’m talking clearly. You heard me, didn’t you, Hap?”

“I heard you.”

Shank said, “That’s enough. Kid, buy a beer or hit the road.”

“Sure,” I said. “Jax. Whatever.”

The two men at the far end of the bar picked up their beers and drifted toward the back, to a free table.

Shank went to a cooler and brought me back a bottle of Jax and set it in front of me and used the church key to pop the top off. The beer hissed a little and foamed over the rim, and I could smell the alcohol from it, a smell I’ve never liked.

“Enjoy,” Shank said.

I looked in the mirror, at the young man at the table. He was staring at us, and not because he was trying to figure our dress size. I let the beer stay where it was, forming a wet ring on the bar, and carefully watched him in the mirror.

Leonard had turned around so he could lean his back into the bar, and he was looking at the young man and smiling between sips. He has a great smile, like a shark.

The young man said, “Shank, I think you’ve done let this establishment go to the fucking buzzards.”

Shank said, “That’s enough, Philip. That’s plenty. Times change. I get paid whoever buys a beer. A turkey comes in here, wants a beer, I’ll sell it to him he’s wearing pants and he’s got money.”

“Turkey came in here, he might get plucked,” Philip said.

“Only in that I jack up the prices,” Shank said.

“Ain’t that the truth,” Leonard said. “I could have had a beer and barbecue sandwich for the price you ask.”

“Then you need to go somewhere where they got a barbecue sandwich,” Shank said.

“But I’d miss the company here.”

“Yeah, well, it might not be as good as you think.”

“Naw,” Leonard said. “It’s fine here. Right, Hap?”

I didn’t answer. I eyed the front door without being too obvious about it. I wondered if we could make it if things got out of hand.

“I don’t like your kind of business, Shank,” Philip said.

“That’s all right,” Shank said. “You don’t have to like it.”

One of the men at the table gently scooted his chair back, creating a bit of distance between him and the conversation.

“Bottoms up,” Leonard said, and drank the rest of the beer with a series of gulps. He put the bottle on the bar, said, “How about another one?”

“You pay, you drink,” Shank said, and went to get another Jax. He came back with it, placed it in front of Leonard, opened it with the church key, nabbed the empty, and carried it away.

“There was a time when a nigger knew his place,” Philip said.

“All right, now, goddamn it,” Shank said, tossing the bottle into a big can behind the bar. “I told you enough is enough. You need to hit the road, Philip, and now. Don’t let your shirttail catch in the door when it closes.”

Philip turned red as a new rose.

“I can’t believe you’d talk to me like that,” Philip said. “I come in here all the time and spend good money, and this nigger and his nigger-loving friend come in, and now you’re on their side.”

“I’m on my side,” Shank said. “I’m running a business.”

I glanced at Leonard. He was sipping his fresh beer, and didn’t seem to have a care in the world. It was like he might be gathering up thoughts for future plans that evening, though I was beginning to feel any plans we might want to make were about to be cut short.

It was then that I noticed he had slipped his free hand into his pocket, and I could see something in his hand as he pulled it out. My guess was it was a pocketknife. I knew he had it set so he could thumb the blade open. It wasn’t long but it was sharp. He used it to clean fish and squirrels, and I had seen him at work with it. He was as smooth as a surgeon operating on his own child.

I looked at Philip. I could see something behind his black eyes, dark and mysterious, dangerous and bold. The air was thick with tension.

“Maybe we should go,” I said.

“Sounds like a good idea,” Philip said.

“No, I don’t want to go, not if I’m made to go,” Leonard said. “I want to leave on my own.”

“Don’t cause trouble, you can stay,” Shank said.

That surprised me somehow. I thought Shank would tell us to leave, as we didn’t exactly fit in out there, but I realized then that the macho code was at work. Shank wasn’t going to be told what to do any more than Leonard was. He wasn’t going to be pushed around by some customer, even if he’d just as soon me and Leonard had stayed home. Leonard, especially.

“I don’t like the way things are going out here,” Philip said to Shank. “I don’t know I want to give you my business.”

“I don’t need your goddamn business,” Shank said.

“I don’t need this shit hole either,” Philip said.

“Yeah, but it’s my shit hole, and you can get your ass out and don’t come back.”

Philip stood up. He was wearing a loose, blue shirt with the tails hanging out, and his hand pushed his shirt up in the back.

“I can’t walk out of here and you let a nigger stay,” Philip said.

“You got a problem with me,” Leonard said, “come to me and we’ll sort it out.”

“I’ll sort it, all right,” Philip said, and that’s when he reached a little Saturday Night Special out from under the back of his shirt. “I’ll put a hole in you, nigger.”

Leonard lifted his hand quickly and then the knife was open in it. Philip lifted his gun to fire, and I don’t know what came over me. Maybe it’s the same thing that makes a soldier in combat leap on a grenade, but I stepped in front of Leonard and the bullet hit me in the chest at the same time Leonard’s arm flicked over my shoulder and he let the knife go.

Next thing I know I'm on the floor, my head up against the bar. I felt strange and winded, as if I had been kicked in the chest. I could see Philip, Leonard's knife sticking out of his shoulder. He didn't seem to notice it there, but there was blood spreading around it, turning his light blue shirt dark. He pointed the gun in the direction of where I had last seen Shank.

The men at Philip's table were already on the floor, trying to make themselves as flat as pancakes.

The world roared. There was a rattling as shotgun pellets clattered around the room and picked some wood out of the table by Philip. Philip had blood spots all over him. He didn't go down though. He had lost his aim for a moment, but now he regained it. The little pistol barked a couple of times, and I heard a bottle break, and then I heard Shank say "shit," and then the Saturday Night Special barked two more times. I heard another bottle break and something heavy hit the floor behind the bar.

Fearfully, I touched my chest. I expected to touch a wet spot, but I only touched a tender spot.

Philip walked toward Leonard with the gun pointed at him. He pulled the trigger and it made a little snapping sound, but it didn't fire. He tried again with the same results.

Leonard had his fists up, but there was still too much space between him and Philip for him to throw a blow.

And then Philip said something I couldn't understand. A bubble of blood came out of his mouth like a chewing gum bubble. It popped apart, and Philip turned and walked toward the door, making each step with precision. He opened the door slowly and carefully, as if uncertain how it worked, went out and closed it politely behind him.

Leonard squatted down beside me and grabbed my shirt and ripped it open.

“You don’t do that, Hap. You don’t take shit for me, god-damn man, what is wrong with you?”

“I don’t know,” I said.

“You don’t take a bullet for me, you dumb bastard. You just don’t.”

“I’d do it different, if I could,” I said.

“Shit,” Leonard said, looking at my chest. “It was a bad load. It just punched you. Shit, how about that? You are one lucky son of a bitch.”

I looked down. A large bruise was forming, but the skin wasn’t even broke.

Leonard helped me up. I felt better knowing I didn’t have a hole in me. I went to the edge of the bar and looked behind it. Shank lay there with his eyes open. He was clutching a sawed-off double-barrel shotgun to his chest. A broken bottle of whiskey lay next to him, and it was mixing with the blood spreading across the floor from under his head. There was a perfect little hole in his face, just above the bridge of the nose.

I felt weak in the knees. Shank had caught the wrong bullet, and I had caught, at least from my viewpoint, the right one.

I started to tremble.

Leonard picked up the shotgun and cracked it open. It was empty. Shank had fired both shots at once.

“Damn,” Leonard said. “What am I thinking?” He snatched up a rag from the bar and wiped the shotgun clean of his prints.

By this point the bar was empty. The door at the back was wide open and swinging in the wind.

We went out that way, and we could see a couple of the men from inside disappearing into the woods. We eased around the edge of the place and moved toward the front of it, and the lot where my car was parked. When we got there, we could see Philip.

He was at a Studebaker, and his back was to us. His chin was caught on the side mirror where he had fallen, and he was dangling from it, his knees almost touching the ground. His hands were open and there was something dark dripping from his fingers. I could see the little cheap-ass Saturday Night Special on the ground.

Leonard walked over and kicked the gun under the car. We both walked around and looked at Philip. His eyes were open, and the moon shone against them as if they were stagnant pond water.

Leonard reached out and took hold of his knife and pulled it from Philip’s chest.

“Goddamn,” I said, “you killed him.”

“Don’t be silly,” Leonard said. “Shank’s shotgun killed him. It just took a while.”

Of course, the shotgun killed him, but the idea that during all that action Leonard had hit him with the knife amazed me. Philip’s shirt was dark and wet with blood, and it was running down his arms and over his hands and fingers and dripping on the ground.

Lurking around the edge of the Watering Shack, we could see the men who had ran out the back door and into the woods. They quit lurking and hustled toward their cars, and before we could get to ours, they were starting theirs up, turning on lights, and roaring away.

We got in my Impala and I drove us out of there. The trees grew close to the road and dipped over us, and the shadows danced across the hood. I rolled a window down. I needed fresh air, and lots of it. I could hear the crickets sawing away as we went.

It was a couple days later that the news about the deaths at the Watering Shed showed up in the local newspaper. Someone had found the bodies, probably whoever came out there the next night to drink beer.

The paper said the dead were Shank and Philip Atkins, and that was the first I knew of Philip’s last name. It was thought they had killed each other in some kind of argument, which was accurate. It was noted that the Watering Shed had been subject to violence in the past. The paper also said no one had come forward with any information.

A year later, in the daytime, I drove out to Shank’s by myself. In the harsh light of day, the place looked smaller and less mysterious than it had at night. It was funny how in that short bit of time the weather had worked the place over, ripped off a few sheets of the tin roof.

I walked to the front door and opened it and looked in. The back door was open and hung loosely by one hinge. Sunlight came through the gaps of missing tin from the roof. There were empty and broken bottles strewn about, and there was a pallet of some kind on the floor where some transient had made a nest. I went over to the bar and looked where Shank had lain. It was dark there. The blood and whiskey had turned black and had seeped into the wood floor. It looked like a varnish spill.

About a year later me and Leonard were in Marvel Creek, walking along the street, and a man passed us that I was certain was one of the men who had been playing cards with Philip. If he recognized us, he didn't let on, and we didn't make a thing of it either. We merely walked a little faster.

SPARRING PARTNER

THIS HAPPENED DURING SUMMER BREAK before I graduated high school.

Leonard found me at the end of the day when I had finished and stacked all the lumber and was putting up my tools. I was in a good mood because my employer owed me some nice money, and now I was done with a week’s work and it was time to collect.

I was happy too because I had met a girl I liked. I met her at an out-of-town dance. But that is another story, and that girl, later in time, when me and Leonard were older, nearly got us killed. But right then I was thinking about her and how warm she had felt to dance with and the way we had touched, and later in my car, down a pine-bordered trail, we had parked and made love. She was not shy or hesitant about it, and up to that point it was the greatest moment of my life. I still rate it highly. It made me weak in the knees, and in time

I realized it made me weak in the mind, but right then I was thinking good things about her, and sadly I knew I wouldn't see her next week, as she had gone out of town for a few days.

Leonard helped me put up my tools, which were an assortment of crowbars, hammers, and chisels.

It had been one hot, tough job, but the house wasn't too big, so all things considered, it had come down fast.

"What you up to?" he said.

I gave him a look.

"I'm putting up my fucking tools and you're helping me."

Leonard smiled at me. He had a very nice smile when he wanted to use it, and sometimes it could be fun and inviting and at other times it reminded you of a shark, right before its eyes rolled up in its head and its mouth opened wide and the teeth came together, with you between them.

"I got us a job," Leonard said.

"I just finished a job."

I closed up my box of tools.

"This is a good job."

"This was a good job. Not a career, but a good job."

"I got a better one doing something you and me are good at."

"What's that?"

"Knocking people down."

Me and Leonard had both been fighters, and in different ways. Leonard had been a fighter because he was black in a small town in deep East Texas during a time when Jim Crow was still alive and well, long after the time when slavery had been abolished, but the degradation of it had been kept alive: a soul-sucking day-to-day existence designed to remind a black person that they weren't on the same level as a white person, and that they were never going to be.

Leonard hadn't read that memo about how he should act, or maybe he had, but if so, he had torn it up and wiped his ass on it.

Me, I fought because a lot of people fought. It was damn near like a hobby in that little one-horse town, and the horse had a limp.

Later that day, after Leonard and I made plans to meet so he could tell me about the mysterious job, I got the money owed me, went home, ate a good dinner Mama had made. Sausage, spicy grits, and biscuits soft as clouds, tasty as ambrosia. Next morning, I drove out to meet Leonard on the black side of a town called LaBorde. It wasn't too far from where I lived in Marvel Creek. Years later, I would move there to live.

It was one of those days of summer when everywhere you went smelled like mowed grass and pine trees. The sun stayed bright for a long time, and the moon would come up in a thin wafer with the sun still in the sky. It was so beautiful it made me want to whistle and pull my dick.

As I drove into the black side of town, I saw young black men standing in ragged yards, or hunched on porches, as if those porches were their rafts in an awful churning ocean. They watched me drive by with cold eyes and stiff bodies. Nobody waved at me.

I stopped where Leonard was staying. The yard was nice and the house was well painted. It was a big house with a high porch and a kind of fenced-in crawl space. Leonard had parents, but he was staying with his Uncle Chester. They had their problems, he and his uncle, but there was no doubt in my mind that he was Leonard's true role model.

I parked at the curb, went up on the porch and knocked on the door. Next door there was a young black man with a bright red rag hanging out of his back pocket. He had a big-handled, black, wide-toothed comb buried in his bristling hairdo. He was about my age, strong-looking, with wide spaced front teeth, each of which seemed abnormally large.

He saw me and yelled out, "What you doing around here, white boy? You selling Grit door to door? Ain't nobody reads that shit. You ought to just pack on up and go before they don't find you no more."

Leonard came out of the house then, nearly knocking me over when he pushed the screen door back. He yelled to the kid on the porch.

"Come on over here, Lashawn."

"No, I'm all right."

"Come over here, goddamn it."

Lashawn's face lost its bright countenance. His mouth closed over his big teeth.

"Come on over here, I said."

Lashawn hesitated, came down off his porch and over to us, and up on the porch where we were. When Lashawn was close to Leonard, he touched the big comb in his hair. Up close I could see it was made of metal, and I could see Lashawn had got back some of his confidence, and he put it on display.

"You gonna get rough, Leonard, I'll cut your ass with this comb. It's a weapon."

Leonard hit Lashawn with a sharp jab that knocked him on his ass and made him do a somersault into the yard.

"What the fuck," Lashawn said, sitting up with a hand to his forehead where Leonard had popped him.

"Don't be talking to me like that. I done got a guest coming up in here, and you talking to him like he's a god-damn dog catcher."

Lashawn was still rubbing his head. "I didn't know he was a guest."

"He knocked on my door and is standing on my fucking porch. You don't know much of any kind of shit, do you, Lashawn? Can't have you bad-mouthing my visitors. Right, Hap?"

"Well, I don't know. That was pretty harsh."

"Naw it wasn't," Leonard said. "Was it harsh, Lashawn?"

"Damn right it was. Wasn't no cause to hit me like that."

"I just gave you the cause. You deaf or just stupid? Why don't you go back over to your house and put some ice on your forehead? That's going to leave a knot. And you need to rearrange your comb."

When Lashawn went into his house, Leonard said, “I can’t stand that country nigger. He’s a goddamn thief. Can’t abide a man that steals. Or wears a fucking comb in his hair.”

“Aren’t you from the country?”

“Yeah, but I’m sophisticated as poodle shit.”

This event would be reminiscent of many in our future relationship.

We left there in Leonard’s pickup, which rattled as it went, made a sound like a rod was loose and there needed to be a about two hundred dollars’ worth of piston work. Leonard had a box of vanilla cookies setting between us, and now and again he’d dip his hand into the box and have one. He didn’t offer me any.

I said, “Man, that was kind of unnecessary. He was just an asshole, not Attila the Hun.”

“Way I see it I’m keeping him from growing up to be Attila. If not, motherfucker won’t be Attila in my neighborhood.”

I knew it was time to let the Lashawn discussion lay still.

“You say we got a job, but you haven’t told me shit, except for that knocking people down part, and by the way, you like that better than I do, so do I really want to get in on this?”

“Thought I told you what it was, you might turn me down.”

“I don’t know I like a job that’s a secret until you show it to me.”

“Do you like four hundred dollars?”

“A piece?”

“No, split, but hell, two hundred dollars apiece, that’s more than ass-wiping money.”

Back then it sure was. Some people worked two, sometimes three or four weeks to make that much. Things were cheaper then, but cheap is relative.

“How much work?”

“A few partial days.”

“Sounds too easy.”

“Sometimes things are easy.”

Leonard drove us into town and parked in front of a local café. “Let’s get breakfast first.”

“I don’t know, Leonard.”

“Mean ’cause blacks don’t go in here? There ain’t no law against it, you know. Lincoln freed the slaves.”

“I don’t know, man.”

“I always wanted to try this place. I hear from some white folks it’s good, and the cook is a cousin of mine.”

“I don’t know, man.”

“You scared to go in there with a black man?”

“Yeah.”

"Damn, really."

"Yeah. I'm scared what they might do to you. And I'm more scared what they might do to me. May not be a law on the books, but there's a kind of unspoken law."

"You hungry, ain't you?"

"Yeah. But I haven't been eating vanilla cookies. Where the hell do you put it all? How could you eat breakfast after all that?"

"With my precious little mouth."

"What say I get us some breakfast to go, bring it out to the truck."

"Don't insult my ass."

"I'm trying to save your ass. And mine."

"Well, you sit in the truck, and I'll go in and have breakfast, and I got something left over, like maybe a biscuit, I'll bring it out to you."

"Ah, Leonard."

He got out of the truck and was going up the steps and onto the sidewalk. I got out and walked after him, went in behind him. I think he wanted that to happen. For him to go in first.

There was a kind of buzz in the café and it smelled of coffee and grease and toast, but when Leonard came in people quit talking and looked at us as if we had been made of tubercular spit and garbage.

Leonard said, "There's a booth, let's take that."

He said it loud.

We sat down at the booth, and both of us sat on the edge of our seats. Growing up where we grew up, we were wise enough not to end up trapped in a booth up against the wall. We weren't wise enough to stay outside.

People watched. Leonard waved at an old lady and her husband. A young man, a few years older than me, wearing a blue work cap, a khaki shirt and pants, work boots, got up and came over. He had a toothpick in his mouth, and he worked it from one side to the other. He stood at the booth, between me and Leonard, and looked down at Leonard.

Leonard isn't a moose, but he's a tall, solid guy and he was tough. We had trained in boxing together, and I had started taking martial arts at the Tyler YMCA twice a week most weeks, and I was teaching him what I knew, as a black person would get nothing but the runaround if he tried to sign up for class. The true nature of budo at the YMCA was you best be white.

"Ain't you in the wrong café?" the young man said, dropping his chin a little.

Leonard looked around, then up at the man. "I don't think so. How's the breakfast here?"

"If you're white, it tastes pretty good."

"Yeah, what if you're black?"

"You don't get to taste it."

"Who's going to stop me? You?"

"Me, maybe some others. Maybe all at once."

"You know what?"

"What?"

"I wouldn't count on it."

The white man smiled a little, then looked at me. “What you doing hanging around with him?”

“I work for him. He gives me a dollar at the end of the day, though I still got to shine his shoes.”

“Yeah?”

“Yeah,” Leonard answered for me. “I’m teaching him to be a nigger in ten easy lessons.”

“You’re a smart ass, aren’t you?”

“Better than a dumb ass.”

“You’re looking for trouble, colored boy.”

“You call an alligator a lizard? Don’t call me boy.”

The man opened his mouth to say it again, but Leonard said, “I wouldn’t.”

The man looked at me. “You backing his play?”

“All the way.”

Leonard glanced at me and smiled, and then he turned and stared at the man, and Leonard’s face changed. His eyes turned sharklike, like I was talking about, and his mouth made a smile that sent a chill up my back.

“You want to play, white boy?” Leonard said.

“You need to stay out of here,” the man said. “It ain’t right.”

“I got the message, considered it, discarded it.”

The man started walking away. “It ain’t right.”

No one else moved. Leonard stared at all of them. As for me, all I could do was sit there and feel my ankles vibrate a little in my work boots. I had crossed the color line and I had to decide. Walk and go my way and be safe, or protect my newfound friend. The thought of leaving was there, but it passed quickly.

I called to a middle-aged waitress, “Ma’am. We need some service, please.”

She hesitated, looked around and walked away, disappeared behind the counter and went into the back. When she came back, a big black man wearing a white, food-spotted apron and a white cap was with her. He came over and said, “Leonard, you crazy?”

Leonard said, “Yep. This here is my buddy, Hap. Hap, this is my cousin, Simon. He is a very safe kind of man.”

“Hey,” I said.

“Damn, man, you crazier than Leonard. You ain’t going to cruise the world like you did before, not after this. You know that?”

“Crossed my mind.”

“You our waitress?” Leonard said.

Simon studied Leonard, then sighed gently, like that was all the air he had left in him.

“Someday it’s all going to catch up with you, way you are around white folks. You got to know how the game is played, and you’re playing it wrong.”

“No. You’re playing it wrong.”

“What we’ll have is a menu,” I said, all of a sudden feeling my oats.

Simon stood there for a long moment. We could hear muttering in the crowd. Someone said nigger under their breath. It wasn't the same as when Leonard said it.

"I heard that," Leonard said. "I'm putting you on my list."

Things got quiet.

Simon went away, came back carrying two menus. "Okay, there ain't no law says you have to leave, but another law's going to catch up with you. White man's invisible law."

"And there's that whole God's law too about us queers."

"Oh, God, don't bring that up. That there is not a law to be broken by man or woman, white or black. God has his rules."

"Does he?" Leonard said.

Simon gave us the menus.

"What the hell do you want? Let's get this over with."

Leonard studied the menu, said, "They got corn muffins on here for breakfast."

"I think I'll try one," I said. "Make it two and a cup of coffee."

"Corn muffins for breakfast, Hap? What the hell?"

"They're new," Simon said.

"Say they are," Leonard said. "What they like?"

"Cornbread," Simon said.

"Cornbread. Hell, for breakfast? I don't want no cornbread for breakfast. I was having lunch, had some pinto beans to go with it, some collards, I'd be in, but corn muffins for breakfast? What the hell, man?"

"I don't make the menu."

“You can eat whatever you want for breakfast, Leonard,” I said.

“I know that, and I will, but it won’t be no corn muffin. Give me some scrambled eggs with some of that homemade hot sauce I know you got ’cause my friend Linson’s mother makes it for here, and give me an order of sausage and four pieces of toast, some jam or jelly of some sort, and while you’re back there, make sure no one spits in my food, and that means you too.”

“Goodness, Leonard,” Simon said, took the menus and went away fast.

We didn’t get glasses of water, but while we waited on the food, a man leaned out from the booth behind us.

He looked about forty, a rough forty, had on work clothes and a weathered gray cap. He looked as if he went to bed tired and woke up tired, and with that cap on.

“You’re right about them cornbread muffins. Who the hell eats those for breakfast?”

“What I was saying,” Leonard said.

“And they have the lunch, they don’t serve them then. And who the hell calls dinner lunch? Next thing they’ll call supper dinner.”

“They do that up North,” I said.

“Well, there you go. Up North they got a lot of funny ideas. But the thing I was saying is it’s bad enough they don’t know the name of the meals, but you order pintos, you get some light bread with it. I say you can make a corn muffin in the morning, you can damn sure make one at dinner, and not serve some damn tasteless light bread with pintos."

Leonard nodded. "It's the same ingredients. Right?"

"You know," said an elderly man sitting with an elderly blue-haired woman at a table near us, "you're right. I'm going to go talk to them."

The man got up and went to the back. He seemed quite determined. When he returned, he sat down, said, "They say they're going to put the muffins on the lunch menu, but they're going to leave them on the breakfast menu, 'cause some people like them. Can you believe that?"

"I'm going to try them," I said.

No one seemed interested in what I was going to try.

"That Simon," said the man at the table, "he sure can cook."

"He don't put enough bacon in the beans, though," said the blue-haired woman. "He skimps on that."

"Maybe that's the management," said the man in the booth next to us. "I mean, they got to be the ones came up with cornbread for breakfast, so maybe they skimp on the bacon."

He was still leaning out. Cornbread muffins seemed very important to him.

I had often had slices of cornbread with syrup for breakfast, and bet some of them had, but maybe because it was in muffin form, they felt it was all wrong. I decided not to bring that up.

"Well now, y'all enjoy your breakfast," Leonard said.

"You too," said the man in the booth. "What's that them frogs in France say. Bone up a tit."

"I don't think that's exactly it," I said.

"Close enough," Leonard said. "Bone up a tit."

The cornbread muffins with butter and jam were good, and I ate them a little fast and slurped my coffee down, wanting to get out of there. When Simon came around with the check, which he had written out quickly, Leonard asked for more coffee, so I said I should have some too. I didn't want it, but Simon poured it. I drank it black, and it made me more nervous than I already was.

Leonard sopped up his well-peppered eggs with the toast and took his time about it all. When we finished, he pushed the check over to me.

"Why don't you take care of that, Hap, you done got all that big money."

I took the check, and Leonard paid the tip. I noticed he put a big tip on the table. I got up and went to the cash register. Leonard went over to the elderly couple and asked the lady how much bacon she put in her pintos and they shared a recipe or two, like maybe they were planning a picnic or some such.

The woman behind the register was the waitress who wouldn't wait on us. She took my money and said to me so she couldn't be heard.

“I couldn’t wait on you two, ’cause I did, it would be the end of my job.”

“I know,” I said.

“But I got to say, things didn’t go like I thought they would.”

“Me either,” I said, and I was happy about it.

She gave me some change and I gave her a dollar of it for no real reason at all, went over and got Leonard by the elbow and started us out of there.

The elderly woman said, “I always put a bit of lard and a touch of sugar in there with my bacon.”

“That’s because you know what you’re doing,” Leonard said, and she smiled her false teeth at him.

It was starting to turn rain-cloud dark as we drove out into the deep country, and tooled along the back roads where shacks seemed to be more thrown up than built. There were more black people on porches, mainly kids and old people, and they were watching us drive by, a salt-and-pepper job in a time when those human condiments didn’t much exist on the same table in the South.

Finally, we went down a narrow country road of red clay, snaked along between the trees as the rain clouds continued to gather and the shadows swelled and covered the road in darkness that was sliced only by bits of cloud-muted sunlight. That’s the thing about East

Texas. Sunny one moment, raining the next.

“How’s that girl you seeing?” Leonard said.

“Haven’t seen her that much, but it’s going good, I think. She’s out of town for a few days with her parents.”

“Yeah?”

“Yeah.”

“I got a feeling you done whipped, Hap. I ain’t known you that long, but I know you like that stuff like a hound dog likes a pork chop.”

“I wouldn’t know. Queer niggers ain’t popular around here, and other queers, white or black, they kind of stay silent. For me it’s whacking off to the men’s section of the Sears catalogue.”

A year back one of the kids in our school, younger than me, Sammy Lean, had paid some kids to let him suck their dicks. They took the money and let him do the deed, and then they beat him up. After, they told him he had more money, he could suck them again, but each time a beating would come with it. I heard they did that two or three times, and finally Sammy had been humiliated enough. During a dark night he hung himself with a jump rope from the Sabine Bridge in Marvel Creek.

He wasn’t found for three days. A fisherman in a boat looked up and saw him dangling. He had bitten through his tongue, almost severing it. He had died fully dressed but with his dick hanging out. He had painted it bright red with spray paint. Or so it was said. There were suspicions he might not actually have hung himself, or owned the paint that decorated his pecker. But after a few laughs from the kids he had been paying, and a brief investigation by the police, which amounted to a fifteen-minute query with his parents and a slap on the back for the kids that he had paid for sex, Sammy and his red dick were buried out of town with all the ceremony of a backyard cat funeral. His parents moved away, more shamed by his death than grieved.

How the hell Leonard survived in that time and climate, bold about his blackness and his sexuality, is beyond me, but it not only made him tough, I think it made him damaged. Darkness crawled around inside of him, and sometimes showed itself in his eyes. Later, he would add the Vietnam War to that.

When we arrived at our destination, it was raining fiercely. The place was a large barn out in the woods off a trail barely wide enough for a car, the trees tight on either side. There had been a house not far from the barn, but it had burned down and all that was left of it was a chimney and some burnt wood, and possibly the mineral rights.

“What the hell, Leonard?”

Leonard parked near the barn, and we got out in the rain and pushed the barn doors open and went inside. There was a boxing ring put together on a platform in the middle of the barn. There was a young black man in the ring with an older black man, and he was knocking the kid around like he was a paddleball.

“Cover up,” a big black man at the edge of the ring was yelling. “Cover up, you stupid son of a bitch.”

There were a dozen other black men standing around, assorted in ages and sizes, but all of them had the same look now, one of surprise as we came in. But their focus wasn’t on Leonard, it was on me.

“Leonard,” the big black man who had been doing the yelling said. “What the fuck is this?”

“It’s a guy named Hap,” Leonard said.

“He’s white.”

Leonard kept walking and I kept walking with him, but I won’t josh you. I was starting to feel nervous. More so than in the café.

“You said you’d bring me a sparring partner,” the big black man said.

We were standing by the ring.

“Listen here, Bus. Said I’d bring someone with me to help you train your guy. This is that someone. Me and him, we can train your boy, but we can’t give him left tit. He has to have that already.”

“I don’t know what all he’s got. Just know he’s got a hell of a hook, no footwork, and he gets hit a lot. But when he makes contact, sounds like two cars running together, and I hear the angels’ harps playing.”

“Is that him?” I said, nodding at the kid in the ring.

“No, this is Will, and he’s someone I’m teaching to be a sparring partner. Right now, I think he’s starting to regret it.”

“Got that right,” said the young man in the ring. He grabbed a towel hanging over the ropes, wiped his face with it, slipped through the ropes, and dropped to the ground.

“I don’t think I want to be a sparring partner no more,” he said, and started walking away.

Bus yelled to the kid as he headed out of the barn. “You couldn’t be a boxer if they spread your ass with salad spoons and stuck Sugar Ray Robinson up there.”

“You got that right,” said the man at ringside who had been yelling for Will to cover up.

“This boy you got, me and Hap can show him some footwork, teach him to cover up.”

“What I need,” Bus said, “is sparring partners for him, someone won’t get knocked down or out first time they get in the ring. You calling him a boy, that’s your choice. How old are you, and this cracker? What’s he? Twelve.”

“Thirteen, sir,” I said.

“Oh, good, a wise-ass white boy,” said Bus. “You know how much I like that, ain’t that right, Dixie?”

He was speaking to the man who had told the young man to cover up. He had a big belly and wore a white T-shirt that might have fit him at birth but now was straining over his gut. For the record, it was more of a pinto-colored shirt. There were tobacco spit stains on it, and I think the stain on the loose neck of the shirt was maybe cheese, possibly mustard. I decided on mustard.

"Yeah, you love that shit," Dixie said. "Me and you both."

"Hap's all right," Leonard said. "Just got a mouth sometime."

"Choice," said Dixie. "I like that, coming from you."

"I need someone better than alright," Bus said.

Dixie said, "Joe, come over here."

About this time one of the men in the crowd, an acne-scarred black man who I judged to be in his late twenties, early thirties, came over. His shoulders rolled from side to side as he walked, and his chin was slightly down, as if he were about to rest it on his chest.

Bus said, "This here is one of my fighters, he's seven and one, and that one he lost was on a technicality. But the guy he lost to couldn't get a job sorting socks now, beating he took."

Joe looked me up and down. "Shit. Sparring partner. This honky looks more like a punching bag."

"Take it easy, Joe," Leonard said. "Or you might wake up with a crowd around you."

"Man, you got some faith in this cracker?" Joe said. "What are you doing here, peckerwood? On break from kindergarten?"

"I'd stop if I were you," Leonard said.

By now all the men, young and old, had gathered around us. Joe was looking me up and down. "Naw. He ain't much."

"Have it your way," Leonard said.

Joe grinned, said, "I think a strong wind would blow white boy down."

"It would have to be a really strong one," I said.

Joe reached out to push a hand against my chest, said, “Let’s see what it takes.”

I slapped his hand aside, stepped in, and hit him with an upper cut under the chin so solid it lifted him on his toes, and then he dropped on the dirt floor. All he needed then was a blankie and a teddy bear to snuggle with, possibly a surgeon to open his head and put a new brain in it.

Bus looked down at Joe. Blood was filling up in his open mouth. Bus bent down and turned his head so the blood would flow out on the ground and not down his throat.

All the other black men came over to look at Joe napping.

“Man,” said Dixie. “I believe that nigger is trying to row a boat over River Jordan.”

Leonard laughed a little. “That there is my boy, Hap. Got another one you want knocked down, set him up.”

Bus studied me. “I reckon you’ll do.”

Me and Leonard were still on the floor near the ring, and I was sitting on a stool, and he was pulling boxing gloves onto my wrapped hands. I was still wearing my jeans, but I’d taken my shirt and shoes and socks off.

“This tough guy they got,” Leonard said. “He’s just another tomato can, you see. All Bus’s guys are tomato cans. He keeps a steady shelf of them so he can pull down one when he needs it. He only wants this one to get a bit of learning so he can last longer, make Bus some money on bets."

"He said he had a good hook."

Leonard was lacing up my gloves, pulling the strings tight.

"I know what he said, but I know Bus. He only does so much work on a fighter, only gives Dixie so much time with them, then a new nigger's up. He had a peckerwood once, Jimmy Oasis they called him, on account of they couldn't pronounce the last name. He became Oasis. And that guy could fight, until he couldn't. Got so someone closed their fist, he was starting to faint. Bus pushed him too fast and too hard. He could have been good, but Bus ruined him."

"I haven't ever been a sparring partner."

"Now you will be."

"You seen or fought this guy Bus has?"

"Nope. But Bus thinks maybe this fucker might be his meal ticket. A real boxer who might even fight another real boxer and go big-time."

"Thought you said Bus is small potatoes, burns fighters out?"

"Well, from what I hear, it might take some real fire to burn this guy out. What he lacks in skill he makes up for it in having the brain of a dinosaur. Bus is hoping he'll get some local championships out of him, maybe get a well-paying fight. You can bet, whatever the purse is, it'll be Bus pulling the purse strings, and the guy wins, he'll end up with chewing gum money, and Bus will keep pushing him, not preparing him. He just wants his boxer to quit blocking with his face. You're ready."

"Where's the fighter?"

"I don't know. Let's ask."

We walked over to where Bus was leaning on the platform for the ring.

"Where's your boxer?" Leonard said.

"He's in the back," Bus said, "getting his muscles stretched, getting oiled down some. And they're trying to find some shorts big enough for him to put his balls in."

"I didn't get to stretch," I said. "I don't have a mouthpiece or a cup."

Bus said, "Ain't got no cups or mouthpieces, and shit, who wants to share. Should have brought your own. Do a couple knee bends, swing your arms a little. You'll be all right. And you look like you have plenty of room for your balls."

"I'm wearing jeans, shouldn't I at least get some shorts?"

"You don't want the ones they got back there," Leonard said. "No telling whose ass has been in them and when they were last washed. That shared junk is a chocolate party."

"Can't disagree with that," Bus said.

That's when the fellows on the floor near the ring stood up and looked to the rear of the barn. Out of a room on the side came a black man shiny from a fresh rubdown, about six-four, with shoulders wide enough and thick enough you could have laid a picnic table across them. His stomach was flat and his head was large, resembled a block of granite.

“Goddamn,” I said to Leonard.

“Yeah, well, he’s bigger than I expected. Keep your hands up.”

The guy came over to stand by Bus. He punched one gloved hand into the other, like he was kneading bread dough.

“Which one of these fools is going to show me some footwork?” the fighter said.

“The fool wearing the gloves,” Bus said.

“Yeah,” the fighter said, “thought it was him.”

“This here,” Bus said, “is my fighter. We call him the Man Slayer.”

“Wow,” Leonard said. “Cool nickname. Listen here, Bus, this fella is way bigger than Hap.”

“You noticed,” Bus said. “White boy’s big enough. They ain’t fighting for the fucking title. You worried about his height, Leonard, you can stand him on a stool.”

“That’s nice of you,” I said.

Leonard talked them into letting me go to the dressing room so he could help me stretch.

“Listen here,” Leonard said, “I didn’t know this guy was going to be the Jolly Black Fucking Giant. You want out, I can get you out. Shit, we can go through the window there, be gone by the time Man Slayer figures out how to climb in the ring.”

“In for a penny, in for a pound.”

“Good news is you’re getting more than a penny.”

“Yeah, well, I hope I’m in the condition to spend it afterwards.”

“Out-footwork the motherfucker. Looks to me his ribs would be a good target with hooks.”

“You mean because I can’t reach his head.”

“Yeah, what I was thinking. You’re just supposed to give him a workout, but Bus, he has his boys wear their sparring partners pretty hard. He’s not worrying about your fucking health. He wants his boy to have a punching bag, so you play this like it’s a fucking title bout.”

“Seems to me you know a lot more about this than you told me.”

“I needed the money, but hey, so do you.”

“I got some money.”

“After a few days, you’ll have even more money. Maybe a nice funeral, with a wreath.”

We went out and I climbed in the ring with the big guy. He looked at me the way a snake looks at a mouse it’s decided on for dinner.

“Watch him, Man Slayer,” Bus said. “White boy here knocked Joe on his ass with one punch.”

Joe was awake now and was sitting in a chair in the front row rubbing his jaw. “He caught me by surprise.”

Leonard was up on the platform, outside the ropes by my corner. I sat down on the stool in the ring to think about what kind of plans my folks might have for my body.

Leonard said to Joe, “He caught you by surprise all right, but if he had sounded a siren and flashed some lights and called you by name, he’d still have knocked you on your fat ass. You was playing all bad and shit, pushing on Hap, and he knocked your little train off the tracks.”

“I’ll get you, Leonard,” Joe said.

“No, you won’t,” Leonard said. “They’ll find you in some weeds out back of this barn.”

“That’s enough tough talk,” Dixie said, climbing up on the platform. “That’s plenty, even if you got more to go around. And I know you do, Leonard.”

“I got enough everyone here can share a bit of it,” Leonard said.

Dixie climbed into the ring and came over to me. “Look here, this is Bus’s boy, but he fights dirty because that’s how Bus taught him. He’ll try to hook your balls or thumb your eye, rub his laces across your face. He’s big and looks dumb, but he’s not. But that don’t make him a boxer. He winds up and throws haymakers. He’s got a hook that could knock a fart out of a rhino’s ass, but if you got any footwork at all, you can probably stay out of range. But he gets your ass in a corner, he can do some damage, that hook, you know. Gets you cornered, you better cover up, ’cause that hook gets your head a time or two, you’ll be lucky you got enough brain left to get a job sacking groceries on crutches."

"Okay," I said.

"Okay my ass, white boy. You pay attention."

"I didn't exactly think you were on my side."

"You in my corner, ain't you? You move and stick with a jab. Bus, he don't have me teach no jabs much. He's all for getting in there and throwing hammers. You can't throw a hammer, you got to use a razor, hear me?"

"Yes, sir."

"All right, then. Listen here, you get carried out, wake up on the floor over there, like Joe did, there ain't no shame in it."

"Don't over-encourage me," I said.

Bus was over in the corner with Man Slayer, holding one of his wrists in each hand, shaking them. I heard him say, "Don't take it too easy. Don't go easy at all."

"I won't," Man Slayer said.

"Sitting right here," I said.

They looked at me and grinned as Leonard leaned over the ropes and Dixie climbed through them and stood out on the platform at the edge of the ring.

"Hey, brother," Leonard said. "I got your back. Look here. I think that motherfucker looks in better shape than he is. Make him work for it."

"You think he looks in better shape than he is? What kind of evaluation is that?"

Someone banged a bell. I stood up, and Leonard reached through the ropes and took my stool away. Man Slayer moved into the ring like a bull that was about to mount a cow. I got on my bicycle a little, started shuffle-stepping around, making Man Slayer chase me.

“Cut him off,” Bus was yelling. “Corner his ass.”

Man Slayer was too slow to corner my ass. I kept shuffling.

Bus said, “You get in there and punch some, you god-damn cracker. Ain’t paying you to cut a fucking rug.”

That’s when I skipped in and jabbed Man Slayer in the nose. It wasn’t a hard jab, but Man Slayer started bleeding right off.

“It’s all right,” Bus said to him. “You ain’t hurt.”

Man Slayer touched his bleeding nose with his glove, gave Bus a look that indicated he might think otherwise.

“You’re all right,” Bus said. “Shake it the fuck off. Knock him on his ass. Blow right through him.”

“All right?” Leonard called to Bus from across the ring, “That motherfucker’s bleeding like he’s on the rag. What you mean he’s all right?”

“Shake that shit off,” Bus said to his fighter.

“Everybody shut up,” Dixie said.

Man Slayer was mad now, and he came at me running. I sidestepped a little, hooked him with a left to the ribs, and that made him blow out his air. I turned then and hit him with an overhead right in the jaw. I had to go up on my toes to reach him.

His head moved slightly, and then he looked back at me. I thought, Oh hell.

But that look of fire and ice didn't stay long. Man Slayer's eyes glazed over and he stumbled a little, tried to hit me with his famous hook, but he might as well have been offering me his hand to dance. I ducked under that easily. I could have stopped and had a cup of coffee before that fist got to me. I caught him in the ribs again, and when I did, he bent over, and I caught him with my right again, this time in the temple. As he tried to pick his head up, pull his hands in front of him, I slipped an uppercut through his arms and caught him on the center of his chin. It was like someone turned out his lights. He fell over and lay on the floor of the ring in a fetal position and wiggled a little. Slowly his legs stretched out and he quit moving.

"Goddamn," Joe said, standing up from his chair. "Son of a bitch did it again."

I bent over Man Slayer, and shook his shoulders with my gloves. One of his eyes flickered, like someone was trying to raise a window shade, then the shade went back down and lay heavy over his eye.

Dixie and Bus came into the ring, went over to make sure Man Slayer was all right. I hoped he was. When I hit him, I could feel the electricity of that uppercut from my fist all the way down to my toes, and on point of impact, my balls tingled like the vibration from church bells.

I climbed through the ropes and Leonard started taking the gloves off of my hands.

"Shit, Hap. Hit that fucker any harder, they'd have to put a monkey and some Tang on board with him so he could circle the fucking moon."

Joe came over and looked up at me.

"All right. I'll say it. You damn sure know how to knock a brother out."

When Man Slayer got some ammonia under his nose and they brought him around, Bus and Dixie got him on his feet and helped him get through the ropes and down on the floor. Bus and Joe helped Man Slayer stagger back to the dressing room without falling over.

Dixie came down from the ring and walked over to us.

Leonard said, "Tomorrow, it's my turn."

"You ain't coming back tomorrow," Dixie said.

"What the hell you mean? You wanted sparring partners, so here we are."

"Yeah, well, he wanted some stiffs, and Hap here, he ain't no stiff."

"Nah, he ain't," Leonard said. "And I ain't neither. Was you thinking I was a stiff?"

"What I'm thinking," Dixie said, "is Man Slayer ought to change his name to the Marvel Creek Bleeder. I told Bus he wasn't no good against someone with some skills, a dancing master, a jabber. Bus thought his size would overwhelm whoever was out there."

“He is big,” I said, “and for the record, he scared me pretty good.”

“Scaring you didn’t do him no good,” Dixie said. “For him to win, he’s got to hit somebody. Only way he’d have hit you solid is if you were tied to a tree.”

Dixie took out his wallet and gave me and Leonard two hundred dollars apiece. That was a lot of money for one round and a knockout.

“Hey, man,” Leonard said. “I don’t want to look a gift horse in the mouth, but this is more than I agreed to for one day. I figured we’d have to go a week or two for this much.”

“Rest of that is so you don’t go around town saying how bad a boxer Bus has.”

“I was you,” Leonard said, “I wouldn’t put the gloves on that ox again. I’d maybe get him some kind of job hauling bricks or some such. Otherwise, you might ought to just go on and order him a tombstone and buy a burial plot and order the flowers.”

Dixie nodded, and me and Leonard went out of there with our money and no more job.

I was having an early breakfast one Saturday, munching on homemade cinnamon rolls, hot sauce grits and gravy, sipping coffee, watching my dad sitting across from me at the table, finishing up his breakfast. He had a saucer, and he put a tablespoon of Brer Rabbit Syrup and a tablespoon of butter in it, and was tipping hot coffee from his cup onto the saucer. It melted the butter and spread the syrup. He used a piece of toast to sop it up. The phone rang.

Daddy was closer to it, and all he had to do was reach out and pull it out of its rack on the wall. He answered briskly, put the phone down on the table, said, “For you. Sounds like a nigger.”

I got up and went around the table and picked up the phone. Dad took a last sip of coffee, got up and said, “Going to work,” and then he was out the door.

I put the phone to my ear and said, “It’s Hap.”

“Surprise, it is a nigger.”

“Shit, Leonard. Sorry you heard that.”

“Like I don’t know there’s people call me that. I don’t like it, but it’s not like it’s some kind of surprise. I say it’s all right, by the way.”

“What you keep telling me.”

“I got something for you. Remember that job as sparring partners we had?”

“Of course.”

“Well, they want us back.”

“Nope.”

“Look here, you’re not going to believe this. They’re offering us a hundred a day.”

“No one has money like that.”

“You mean no one black has money like that.”

“I didn’t say that.”

“But you were thinking it.”

"Leonard, we don't have money like that. I don't know anybody that can pay us a hundred apiece to go in and dance around with some half-ass boxer."

"They got a new boy, and they think he's got something. He has all the moves."

"That so," I said.

"Yep. Lot of money, man."

I considered. I still had some of the money we had been given by Dixie, as well as some stash from the job I'd finished, but some of it had gone for jeans and union shirts I had tie-dyed, and I had a new pair of desert boots, as we were calling them then. I had bought a bunch of paperbacks off a drugstore rack. Replenishing of funds would be nice.

"We'll get hit a lot," I said.

"Didn't get hit so much last time."

"Yeah, but this is supposed to be their new badass."

"True," Leonard said. "But hey, we got some moves."

"We like to think we do," I said.

"Don't be modest and I won't."

"Are you ever?" I said.

It was a dry, hot day when we drove out to the boxing barn again. We got out of my car carrying boxing trunks and boxing shoes wrapped up in towels, had them tucked under our arms. Leonard had driven to Tyler the day before and had got us some jocks and cups and mouthpieces. He gave me mine.

“You were pretty confident I’d be back, buying this stuff,” I said.

“Just pretend you got something to put in that cup,” he said.

Inside the barn a big swamp cooler had been set in a window and it was beating the air without much success. Way it whined from time to time, I thought it might back out of the window and run off.

The crowd was smaller this time. Dixie, Bus, and Joe, who had the air of retirement about him, and a white guy we hadn’t seen before, along with this tall, lanky, good-looking, brown kid with close-cropped hair. He was wearing new, white boxing shorts and white boxing shoes. They were all standing inside the raised ring. The boxer was a little shiny, like he’d just gone a few rounds of shadow boxing. I didn’t see another fighter there, so I took that to be the case, like he had been showing his moves against the air. The air is a favored opponent.

Bus and the white guy were both wearing sports shirts and slacks and sports jackets, and the white guy had on sunglasses. There were bands of speckled lightbulbs hung across the ceiling, and light also came through in alternating blades of the swamp cooler. It wasn’t a place you needed sunglasses.

This white guy’s hair was cut close and it was graying and prickly looking. He had a belly pushing against a nylon pullover shirt with a collar that was blue and white and draped by a plaid sports jacket. His face had a banged around look. Dad always said a guy that has a tough face isn't any more than a guy that can't keep his hands up. Guy gave him that face, that's your boy, he said.

Still, he wasn't a guy I wanted any part of. There was an air about him of a guy that would steal a child's orthopedic shoes.

Bus had on a nice, dark sports jacket and slacks and a button-up white shirt, but he was the kind of guy that would always look like what he wore was supposed to fit someone else. Yet, him being dressed up meant something, I figured, like he was trying to impress the cracker in sunglasses.

Dixie's T-shirt had a different arrangement of stains this day.

The young man in boxing trunks and boxing shoes looked down at me in a slightly surprised way. Dixie saw him looking, said, "Ty, Hap looks like a hippie, but he can hit. I bet if he or Leonard wanted, I could turn them both into fighters."

Bus turned his attention to us.

"I've had Dixie working the kid here, Ty, but he might need some harder hitters, some quicker hands to deal with. Some guy like you rides the bicycle."

He was indicating me, of course, and it was meant to be something of an insult, something to explain his fighter Man Slayer getting knocked on his ass. Like I had ran from him until he knocked himself out.

Leonard said, "Ought to change your man's name from Man Slayer to Likes to Get Knocked the Fuck Out."

“Don’t pay him no mind,” Bus said. “He don’t know nothing.”

“He knows a little,” Dixie said, and grinned.

I was starting to like Dixie.

“Man Slayer has moved on,” Bus said.

“I bet,” Leonard said. “What about Joe here?”

“I’m on what they call hiatus,” Joe said. “See you fellows.”

Joe climbed through the ring, dropped to the floor, and moved back toward the dressing room, and we never saw him again. He either went out the back door or is still in the dressing room trying to decide which side of his shorts go in front.

Anyway, while Joe was walking to the dressing room, we all watched him go like we were observing the departure of the last of the dodos.

The white guy still hadn’t said a word.

Leonard studied the white man, said, “What the fuck is he, a deaf mute?”

“He finances,” Bus said.

“What’s he finance?”

“Fights,” Bus said.

The white man slowly smiled and spoke. His voice was surprisingly high, like a eunuch’s in the Venetian choir. “Had a black boy talked smart to me once. High school boy like you. Word is he got set on fire.”

“Try setting me on fire, motherfucker,” Leonard said.

I watched to see if Bus and Dixie were going to turn on this white guy, talking like that, but they didn't. They just looked uncomfortable, like they were in the midst of a rectal exam and the doctor had just announced he'd found a dick broken off in there.

The white man's face was as unmoving as one of the faces on Mount Rushmore, but his fingers clenched slightly where they rested against his legs. He looked at Leonard for a long time. "Me and the shine here got to go," said the white man.

Bus cleared his throat and the two of them climbed through the ropes on the other side of the ring and started walking across the barn in the direction Joe had taken.

"Bus fixing to give whitey a back rub, maybe a quick hand job?" Leonard said.

"Keep it down," Dixie said. "That's trouble you don't need. I sure don't need it. And Bus, he's a dick, but he don't need it from that honky neither. No offense, Hap."

"None taken."

"That peckerwood knows some fellas that know some fellas, if you know what I mean."

"No, I don't know what you mean," Leonard said. "That milky motherfucker looks like someone that doesn't know shit from wild honey to me. And this guy. What the name again? Ty? He's your fighter."

Ty dipped his head, like the most important thing for him to do was to examine the canvas and see if ants might be crossing it caravan style.

“What the fuck’s going on here?” Leonard said.

“It’s complicated,” Dixie said. “Thing is, ain’t neither of you need to worry your pretty little heads about it. Go back there and get dressed. And you, Hap, you put the gloves on.”

“Ain’t I going to get to hit nobody?” Leonard said.

“Somebody,” I said. “You can’t hit nobody.”

“I’m trying to bottom out with the atmosphere here, man. Getting in the common language groove.”

“Well pardon me all to hell,” I said.

“What the fuck are you guys chattering about?” Dixie said.

“They’re discussing diction,” Ty said, finally raising his head. He had a nice mellow voice, and he gave us a slight grin.

“Listen to the man,” Leonard said. “He knows of which he speaks.”

“The rain in Spain stays mainly in the plain,” Ty said.

Leonard was wrapping my hands. He hadn’t bothered to put on his shorts and shoes, as I was the one Dixie had asked for.

“Asked you up first ’cause they want to see if he can corner you, case whoever he fights is a dancer too.”

“Anything but the polka,” I said.

“Thing is, Dixie, he ain’t quite the dick Bus is, but they probably want the kid to come on hard, so it’ll be more than a sparring match. I suggest you don’t knock him on his ass right away, earn some time and we'll make more money, we can stretch this out a few days."

"What if I can't knock him on his ass?"

"I guess it'll work out for me either way."

"That's sweet. What do you think about Mr. Sunglasses?"

"Some big ass trying to make money off black folks' hides and call it sport. My figure is Bus and Whitey are going someplace where Whitey can tell Bus how he better muzzle me, or me and Bus are going to end up in a ditch someplace."

"Maybe you ought to quiet it down some."

"Not my nature."

It was really a light time in the ring, and Ty didn't try to take any cheap shots against me. He looked pretty, was quick on his feet, had fast punches, but I knew something right off. He couldn't crack an egg with either hand even if he was hungry.

Because of that, I flicked him with a jab a lot, but didn't let it clobber him. I threw some light crosses and hooks and he dodged a few. He ought to have. I threw them slower than usual. Even a man blind in one eye with his back foot in a bucket of cement could have slipped or padded them off.

When we finished, I came down out of the ring, and Leonard handed me my towel. I wiped the sweat off me as best I could. It wasn't like they had a shower at the barn. They barely had a working toilet.

Ty climbed through the ropes and came down out of the ring and smiled at me. “Thanks, man. You move quick.”

“Thanks, Ty,” I said, and Ty went away whistling toward the back to change.

Dixie climbed down out of the ring.

“Only thing you didn’t do in there was give the kid a kiss and a dozen roses.”

“You hired me to work him, not knock him down,” I said.

“Ty’s got some moves,” Leonard said, “but they’re mostly for the dance studio.”

“Bus don’t think so,” Dixie said.

“Bus don’t give a shit,” Leonard said. “He’d put an infant in the ring if they could fit the gloves.”

“He’s not so bad,” Dixie said.

“Yeah he is,” Leonard said. “Looking pretty, having the moves, doesn’t make you fighter.”

“Yeah, well,” Dixie said. “Gonna help Ty get those gloves off. Can you come back in a couple hours, give him another round? Leonard this time.”

We agreed we could.

Dixie nodded and started toward the back.

“Give them a minute before you go back and change,” Leonard said.

“All right. Hey, it’s odd, but Ty, he can’t hit any harder than a paralyzed grandma. You see that one he caught me with. He punches to you, not through you."

"Thought that looked like the case. He's got the shoulder launch, the hip switch, but you can see it's a butterfly."

"Float like a butterfly and sting like a moth," I said.

When me and Leonard finally went to the back, Ty was still there. He was sitting alone in the dressing room on a wooden bench.

"You got some moves," he said to me.

"Thanks."

"I can't do the kind of footwork you do. I mean, I got footwork, but it's not helping that much."

"That's because you got footwork for footwork's sake," Leonard said. "You got to have a reason to shuffle, to step and lunge, to skip on back or to the side. You're just moving around, Ty."

"I know it."

"How did you get into this?" Leonard said.

"One of them things, you know. How old are you guys?"

We told him.

"You look my age."

"Which is?" Leonard said.

"Twenty-one."

"Yeah, well, you just got a few years on us," Leonard said.

“So, you’re sitting at home, and one day you jump up and decide to be a boxer,” I said.

“Nothing like that. Well, kind of like that. I went to a club in New Jersey when I was in high school, that was a couple years before we moved here to be near my mama’s sister. I learned to box in Jersey. I liked it okay, for exercise. Kept me in shape. Jumping rope, bag work. I won a lot of club fights.”

“Pillow fights?”

“Oh, hell, Leonard,” I said.

“No, it’s all right. He’s not wrong. I won on points a lot. I could keep from being hit by those guys, outpoint whoever I fought, though I don’t think I can outpoint you, Hap.”

“On a good day, maybe,” I said, “but you need to work on your striking power.”

“I have. It isn’t there.”

“Least you know that,” Leonard said. “Look, you got someone can move and hit, most of the time, they practice enough, they develop punching power, or more punching power, at least. But, Ty, I’m trying to save you some hurt here. You don’t have it, and you ain’t gonna have it. You’re throwing picture-perfect punches, doing everything right, and the only way you’re going to win a fight outside of points is wearing brass knuckles under your gloves, and they don’t allow that.”

Ty nodded. “Tell you another thing. My heart isn’t in it. I don’t want to be a boxer. I want the money to go to school.”

“Like a college school?” Leonard asked.

"Like that, yeah. I've been interested in history for as long as I can remember. I think I'd like to teach it, or write books, or some such."

"Then go to college," I said.

"Can't afford it. I got a mother needs takin' care of. It's just me and her. She needs me to make some money, so I have to put college on hold. Bus saw me at the tennis courts, out there boxing with some friends, and he liked what he saw."

"You do look good," Leonard said, "but Bus, he sees a cleaning lady that can kick a mop bucket over, he might sign her. He uses boxers up and spits them out. White guy here today. Know him?"

"Not really. Met him couple times."

"Well, my guess is he sells these fights in some out-of-the-way place, and it's always some black kid against a white kid," Leonard said. "The great white hope, or some such shit, like it matters. Bus, he'll tell you how you're going to go big-time, jump to fighting big-time, make that big money, but he pushes too hard and too fast. And frankly, not only does he not give a shit about you, I don't think he knows talent when he sees it. Don't know or care you couldn't beat your way out of a wet paper bag."

"Don't sugarcoat it for him, Leonard."

"It's all right," Ty said. "Got in there with you today, Hap, and I could tell you were the first real fighter I'd been up against, way you moved, way you hit, caught me at angles. And I knew too, you were taking it easy on me. Thing is, they got me signed up and I need this fight, because I need the money. It's a big enough purse I can get Mama moved to a nicer place to live, and I can enroll for a semester."

"You got to win to spend it, Ty," Leonard said. "And say you did win, way Bus takes his cuts, well, it'll be less than promised. The towels are going to cost you, your space on that fucking bench, or wherever you sit before the fight that night, all goes on the tab. Fucking air you breathe, the sweat or blood you drop on the floor, the cleanup for it, that all goes on your tab. Even if you win it on points, then you got to go on to the next one, because that's the way it works. This white guy, the financier, he's just looking to see a black man get beaten by a white man. He probably made his mother pay him to suck her titty. You're in the water with sharks, Ty, and they are about to feast on your ass."

"They've promised me a certain amount, win or lose. So, I got to do it. All I can have you do is train me as best you can. I got a few days before the fight, and I have the athletic skills, just not the knockout skills. You say I can't get them, Leonard. But I have to believe I can."

"You can believe you can shit a sack of cat's-eye marbles, but it don't mean you can."

We drove to the tennis courts. We took some gloves with us. Wearing our regular clothes and shoes, we put the boxing gloves on him, and I put the other pair on Leonard.

“One thing Hap here showed me, out of Kenpo Karate, instead of always stepping and dragging the foot, leaving it in the bucket, he pushes off the back foot, which lunges him forward. That’s how he’s getting inside of you way he does. It has a lot of power too, because you got that train pushed from behind, not pulling the load forward. It ain’t a boxer thing, but it’s a real thing.”

“Okay,” Ty said. He was so earnest I wanted to hug him.

“I assume, Bus, bad a promoter and manager as he is, has told you a few things. I know Dixie has. Dixie knows his stuff, by the way, but he’s limited by the guy who pays him, that being Bus. He can only spend so much time, so he tries to give you the tools quick, same as us. They don’t usually work when you get them wholesale. Understand that?”

Ty nodded.

“All right then. I’m going to move around with you a little, and we’re going to do it slow, and Hap here, he’s going to tell you the things you ought to know. Basic shit, and you’re going to try and do them. Once we kind of got your warmed up, then me and you, we’re going to go for it. I’m going to knock the shit out of you unless you cover up, do what’s needed. I’ll do it so you won’t have brain damage, but I’m going to give you a taste of what you got coming.”

“All right,” Ty said.

“Hap,” Leonard said. “Talk to him.”

They started moving around, Leonard pawing light at him, the kid trying to outdance him. Leonard didn’t have the footwork I had, and it wasn’t as pretty as what the kid had, but Leonard didn’t just move to move.

“Cover up,” I said. “Flick his punches off by padding them, not just letting them hit the gloves solid, the arms solid. Punch catches you hard enough on the elbow, any part of your arms, if they guy is a thrower, you can get so you can’t pick your arms up. Hard enough keeping them up during a fight when they’re not hitting your arms, or you, so you can’t just cover up and let your arms take a beating.”

They moved around some more, and Leonard was cutting him off, slipping in closer. I kept talking.

“Thing I noticed when we were in the ring is you turn your head a lot, kind of narrow your eyes. Keep them open. Punches you see don’t hit you more than the ones you do see, and psychologically, you see it coming, you can deal with it better if it does hit you.”

“Really?” Ty said.

“He reads a lot of books,” Leonard said, as they moved in a circle, pawing at each other lightly.

“Stay balanced. Don’t stretch a punch too wide, because you do that, it won’t have power and it’ll get you off balance. You can get hit and knocked down just because you’re off balance, but for them that don’t know, it looks like a solid knockdown, and it sure as hell counts as one. Keep your feet under your shoulders, a little wider maybe, but not too wide.

“Here’s a biggie. You got to hit back more often, and not just touch the opponent. Best way to keep your head on your shoulders is make him worry about his own. He throws something, you step back, or better yet, go sideways and inside and hit. Don't move your head right, then back to where it was, because that's how a combination finds you. Move your head when you need to, but don't just move it. You go from A to B, and back to A, you're going to get your brains scrambled.

"Jab, then a combination is good. But you don't need to jab to combine. Pad a shot off with your left, hit with the right, follow with hooks, uppercuts, whatever your guy is in position for. Know how to put a series of punches together, but know you got to sometimes put them together in different ways. And again, got your eyes open, you can pick your shots better. You got all that?"

"No."

"Sadly, that's just basic information, Ty. Now, here's what Leonard was telling you. You use your back foot like a springboard. Best to do this when he's in the process of throwing a punch, or it's about to arrive at the station. You got to get off the tracks and push in at the same time. Push off that back foot, which launches the front foot forward. Got to bring the back foot into position right away, not let it get stretched out. You got to push in so close you're damn near wearing his trunks, and I repeat, as you come in, you punch through him, not to him. All right. You two can start to boxing."

Leonard started off a little easy. The kid looked good, because he had that kind of body, but Leonard slipped him once and gave him an uppercut to the gut, and then doubled it up with a same-hand hook to Ty's jaw that sat him on his ass.

"You all right," Leonard said.

"Think so. That's the hardest I been hit."

"That's not good news," Leonard said. "That was my old-man-with-arthritis punch."

"Oh."

"Can you stand up?" I said.

"No."

"Sit there a moment, 'til you feel better."

We left him sitting there, and me and Leonard walked off to the side of the court and leaned against the high chain-link fence that bordered it.

Leonard said, "If he had six months to train, did it regularly, he'd still get knocked on his ass. He has one of those bodies, light as a feather when he moves, and heavy as a bag of cement when he hits the ground."

"Yeah. But on the positive side, you're getting that push-drag down."

"Yep. Look here, Hap. This guy, he wants to take care of his mother. I get that, but he'd better off working in the aluminum chair plant, saving up for about ten years."

"I don't think he'll go for that idea."

"Guy like that, ought to go to college, because he needs to stay away from things where he gets hit."

Ty was up by then, but he looked shaky.

He wandered our way.

"I can go again," Ty said.

"No, you can't," Leonard said. "I got a question for you."

Ty leaned against the fence next to me.

"So, this white guy, Mr. I Burned a Nigger Up," Leonard said. "He's seen you, all of us at the barn have, but the guy you're to box, his management, have they seen you?"

"First time I'll see them is the night of the bout."

"Yeah, well," Leonard said, "let me offer you an alternative to a cooling board in the funeral home."

Back at the barn, there was just us and Dixie. When we came in, Dixie was standing on the floor near the ring platform.

"Get dressed, Ty, we need to get cracking."

"We need to talk to you," Leonard said.

Ty wandered over to the far wall where there was a folding chair, and sat down in it. He looked at the floor.

"This guy," Leonard said. "We been working a little at the tennis courts. He could not get any older than he is now, be in the shape he's in, which is good, and train for six hundred years, and he couldn't knock a hole in a slice of Wonder Bread."

"And that might be an exaggeration of his punching power," I said.

“Yeah, well,” Dixie said. “Figured as much. But you know, I just help train. I don’t manage.”

“That’s a dodge, Dixie,” Leonard said.

“Don’t talk to me like that, you young pup.”

“You mean don’t tell you the truth,” Leonard said. “That’s what you mean.”

“Maybe it is, but I’m in for the penny, so in for the pound.”

“You’re in for the money man,” Leonard said. “You’re in for that peckerwood with the sunglasses.”

“All right. Guess I am.”

“Ain’t no guessing about it, Dixie. You’re working for the man. You’re the head field nigger, now, and you don’t care what happens to the others long as you got your three squares and a cot.”

“Goddamn you, Leonard. I ought to knock your block off.”

“You ought to try.”

For a moment, I thought Dixie might try.

“Guys,” I said. “Bottom line, we don’t need this to happen to Ty. Way me and Leonard see it, the guy he’s supposed to be fighting, his management, they don’t know Ty from a hole in the ground.”

“Different fighter shows up,” Leonard said, “they’re none the wiser.”

“Ah, but Bus knows,” Dixie said. “Money man, he knows.”

“Don’t matter,” Leonard said. “I show up ready to fight, they got to let me go in, or forfeit the match. Whatever way it turns out, Ty doesn’t end up with his brains scrambled, and if money is won, he gets it. Shit, Dixie, he’s professor material, not boxing material.”

“They won’t like I’m in on that,” Dixie said.

“No, they won’t. But you can be that head field nigger, or you can help Ty out.”

Dixie took a deep breath. He turned his head and watched the light come through the beating slats of the swamp cooler.

“All right,” he said.

Fight night was a rainy night, and the place where the fight was held was deep in the woods on a huge concrete slab inside a big aluminum building that had all the architectural class of a boxcar.

A man just inside, tall and white and bald, was taking money for seats. There were bleachers on three sides of the ring, and one side had fold-out aluminum chairs. There was a section of bleachers for black attendees and the rest were for the whites, except for the fold-out chairs that were for the fighters and their managers and trainers and the like.

The ring in the center of the place was lower than the ring in the barn, and there were lights set up everywhere, and it would have been hot in there except for the big fan in the ceiling that was beating the air around.

The white man who had been with Bus was with Bus again. When we came in, Leonard wearing a pink bathrobe got a big laugh from the crowd.

The white man came over with Bus, and they looked at us, then they turned their attention to Dixie.

“What’s he doing here?” the white man said.

“Why, he’s going to knock your boy out,” Dixie said.

“What the hell, Dixie?” Bus said.

“Ty has a replacement tonight,” Leonard said. “Me.”

“Where’s Ty?” Bus said.

“Home reading a book, I figure,” Leonard said.

“It’s supposed to be him, not you,” the white man said. “I didn’t make any agreement with you.”

“You got one now. I’m fighting for Ty, and no one but you folks know me here, so I’m as good as being Ty as not. I’m also a better fighter. That worry you?”

“Not in the least,” the white man said.

“You can cancel, you want,” Leonard said.

“Okay, smart guy. Have it your way. You’ll wish you stayed home in about thirty minutes or so.”

Bus said, “You in on this, Dixie?”

“Might as well be.”

“You and me are done.”

“No. I quit first, soon as this fight is over, no matter what the outcome.”

“I hope Hedge beats your brains out,” the white guy said, “but I don’t figure you have any to begin with.”

“Maybe,” Leonard said. “But I got a big dick.”

The white man walked away practically with a rain cloud hovering over his head. He crossed in front of the ring and went through a door on the far side. I got a glimpse of light from in the room there before he closed the door.

“He doesn’t like you,” I said to Leonard.

“I don’t like you or him,” Bus said. “And Dixie, I wouldn’t have thought this of you.”

“That’s what worries me,” Dixie said. “You had me all laid out in your mind. Ty could have been killed. He couldn’t hold his own with either of these boys, and you didn’t care long as he looked like he could fight, and you got paid.”

“It’s a business,” Bus said.

“Yeah,” Dixie said. “So was the slave trade. Thing is, though, Leonard here, he’s our fighter tonight, so accept it.”

“What’s with the fucking pink bathrobe?” Bus said.

“A tip,” Leonard said. “Don’t wash your whites with your reds.”

“Goddamn you fuckers,” Bus said, and walked over to one of the folding chairs near the ring and sat down.

“He’s pissed,” I said.

“Think so?” Leonard said. “I thought he seemed all right.”

“He don’t matter no more,” Dixie said.

“One thing,” Leonard said. “You’re going to be in my corner, Dixie, but I want Hap there too.”

“Doing what? Holding your hand?”

“If it comes to it.”

There was some commotion across the way, and the door on the far side opened wide and the white man came back in, and now he had two others with him. A chubby white guy wearing a T-shirt and loose pants and tennis shoes, and a beer truck of a man that had on a white sweatshirt with a white hood. Under the hood was a white face and eyes as blue and cold as glacial ice.

Their boxer was wide across the shoulders, thick in the chest, at least six-four, with legs like the trunks of trees, massive feet and hands. His chin was as solid-looking as a cement block, and the ridge of bone over his eyes was thick. His ears looked like cauliflowers and his nose was flat. He smiled at us. He had a missing upper front tooth.

“Man, that’s a face only his dog could love,” I said.

“Damn,” Dixie said. “Makes Man Slayer look like a yard gnome. It’s not too late for an early retirement, Leonard.”

“I’m all right,” Leonard said, but the words took time to arrive.

They pulled wooden steps from under the ring platform on both sides, as well as stools. The steps were pushed against the ring, and the stools were put inside the ring.

Leonard and the walking mountain went up their steps and stood in their corners, neither bothering with the stools. The white crowd called Leonard everything but a human. He just grinned at them.

The black crowd cheered for Leonard. The white crowd cheered for the mountain. A theme had developed.

I came up the steps after Dixie and stood next to Leonard in his corner.

Leonard said, “This does not look good.”

“No, sir,” I said. “It does not.”

“Before things get started,” Dixie said, “you could say you got to go pee, and just not come back.”

“I’m all right,” Leonard said.

“Well yeah,” I said. “For right now.”

A stocky white man with a crew cut, wearing a white shirt and black pants, climbed into the ring carrying a megaphone. He looked out over the rambunctious, loud crowd.

“Cut it out!” he called into the megaphone. He had to repeat that a couple of times, but the crowd finally settled down.

“Tonight, I’m the referee, Tom Ray. We got ten rounds of boxing. And boxing it will be, and the crowd will maintain itself. White folks will watch and enjoy. Colored folks will watch and enjoy. I don’t want trouble. In this corner,” he pointed to the big man, “is James Hedge.” He then pointed to Leonard, and called out Ty’s name. He ended with, “Now, let’s get on with this event.”

Leonard and the mountain moved to the center of the ring and got instructions from the referee. While the ref talked, they were glaring at one another. If someone had crossed their line of vision, I wouldn’t have been surprised if they had burst into fire.

They went to their corners, and neither he nor Leonard sat on their stools. They stood and rubbed their shoes in some resin that had been put there for just that.

Leonard said, “I got this guy.”

“Of course, you do,” I said.

“What is he, thirty years old?”

“He’s twenty-four,” Dixie said. “Twenty-four hard fucking years. Five in prison. Before that, a bit of reform school. Trust me, don’t put your guard down.”

“I’ll have my hands up plenty, and they’ll be hitting him.”

“That’s right,” I said.

“Don’t get cocky,” Dixie said.

“You know of any weak spots he’s got?” Leonard asked.

“He gets tired around round nine.”

“That’s a weak spot? That’s damn near the whole fight.”

“Sorry, Leonard,” Dixie said.

The mountain’s cornerman was standing behind him, rubbing his shoulders. After a moment, he stopped and pulled the stool and himself through the ropes, stood on the edge of the platform. Me and Dixie did the same.

A guy on the side of the ring hit a piece of angle iron with a short piece of pipe, and that served as the bell. We were into round one.

Leonard was strong for his age, and pretty damn quick, but when Leonard hit Hedge it was like hitting a six-foot-four fireplug. The guy’s defense was his face, which seemed hard to hurt.

I tell you true as the night is dark, Leonard was hitting Hedge so hard a bull would have gone to its knees and begged for mercy. But this guy, he just kept coming, didn't move his head at all.

Leonard hit Hedge over the eyes with a series of jabs, kind of shots that normally bring blood, but this guy, the ridge over his eyes was hard and scarred and didn't seem to have any blood in it.

First round was mostly Hedge inching forward and Leonard hitting him with jabs and a couple of crosses that were picture-perfect. When he hit Hedge, the sweat came off Hedge's face and sprayed up into the light and made a kind of golden mist. Toward the end of the round Hedge caught Leonard in the ribs with a couple of hooks that probably gave Leonard's childhood teddy bear consternation.

When the bell rang, Leonard came back to the corner and sat on his stool this time. The muscles in his back were jumping a little, and Dixie went into rubbing him down.

"You think I hurt him any?" Leonard said to me.

"Nope."

"Aren't you supposed to encourage me?"

"Well, he hasn't really hit you good yet."

"He hit my ribs pretty good, my left elbow. He's slow, but when he lands one it's like a sledgehammer."

"I think you got to stay away from his head a little more, work his body. Frankly, you get a chance to rabbit punch him or slip one into his balls, you might want to do it. Something needs to make him tire a little. Look at him."

He was sitting on a stool, looking like he felt good enough to take time to read a magazine—if he could read.

"I got this," Leonard said.

"So you say."

"Yeah, I might ought to catch him one in the balls."

Bell clanged and Leonard went back out there, coming to the center of the ring first. He gave Hedge a series of jabs to the head, and then started slamming hooks to the body. They didn't seem to be doing any more harm than the jabs.

They clenched a couple of times, and once or twice Leonard hit him in the back of the head, and got separated by the referee and got a warning.

Leonard didn't take the warning to heart. Next time in he swung an uppercut to Hedge's stomach, then another to his balls.

It was solid, and the referee stepped in, and Hedge said, "Nah, it's all right."

Leonard said it was an accident, which it wasn't, and they went at it again.

Hedge took a series of jabs, and then he swung a hard hook. Leonard put his arm up, but this one was a really good one, and hit Leonard's arm and slipped off the sweat and caught Leonard over the left ear and knocked him down.

I was wishing he'd stay down, but I knew better than that. Not while there was life in him. Leonard got up on the count of four.

"I slipped," he said.

"Yeah, after he knocked your black ass down," said the referee.

Leonard rode the bicycle for the rest of the round, the white crowd booing, and even some of the black crowd.

When the bell rang and Leonard came back to his stool, he said, "He's going to kill me."

"What I was thinking."

Dixie gave Leonard a sip of water and Leonard spat it into a bucket.

"You can box him all day long, and you might even get some points," Dixie said, "but these motherfuckers don't count points. They count knockouts and dead."

"Your suggestion for me is what?" Leonard said.

"Don't get hit."

"That's it?"

"Listen, you got to tie him up a couple of rounds, let him wear down."

"I'm the one wearing down."

"Dance with him, then grab him and get in close. Step on his foot, and soon as you do, uppercut him to the chin, hard as you can. Not on the point, like you hear, but just behind that, so you don't break your goddamn hand. It'll do the same thing as a tip-of–the-chin shot. Side of the jaw is even better than that."

"All right."

"But mostly, don't get hit."

"You finish up here tonight, Dixie, you ought to maybe be like a motivational speaker," Leonard said.

The bell rang, and Leonard went back out.

Well, there was dancing for a while, and then damn if Leonard didn't hit Hedge so hard with a hook to the face, the force of it knocked Leonard off balance and he fell down.

The white crowd went wild for a moment.

The referee did call that one a slip.

The white crowd booed. The black crowd cheered.

I studied Hedge. He looked calm and dumb, like he was thinking about something less than profound. Like why do dogs like bones? If he was any calmer, they could let him fight from an easy chair in front of the TV.

Leonard was shuffling a lot, dancing still. Getting in close hadn't worked as well for him as he had hoped, so he was back on his bicycle. He was really starting to sweat.

The bell rang.

Back on the stool, Dixie worked on Leonard's legs. The muscles and nerves in them were jumping like frogs.

"You okay?" I said.

"He hasn't really nailed me but a couple of times, but those times worry me some. There might be more of them."

"That one you hit him with when you were in close," Dixie said.

"That hurt him."

"Think so?" Leonard said. "I didn't notice."

"He actually blinked once or twice," Dixie said.

"Probably had something in his eye," Leonard said.

"His legs bent a little," Dixie said. "Not much, but a little. A little ain't much, but it's something."

"You notice that, Hap? Me making him sag a little?"

"No," I said.

"Telling you, you hurt him," Dixie said. "You need to do it again."

The bell rang, and Leonard went back out. He gave Hedge a series of blows, and I mean they were good ones. Anyone else had taken shots like that, they'd be in a padded room trying to figure out how to sort white socks by colors.

But Hedge, he didn't seem to notice. It went on like this for a couple more rounds.

Back in the corner, Dixie said, "You want me to stop it?"

"Hell no . . . Well, not yet," Leonard said. "Hap, you got a blow gun, maybe you could shoot that motherfucker with a poison dart."

"Get back inside of him," Dixie said. "Listen to me, and you might get to go home and not in a box. You might survive, anyway. But you got to get in there and do what I'm telling you. Close in, and work those uppercuts."

"All right, Dixie. Bury me in blue, please. Hap, put my cowboy hat on my chest. The one with the chin string."

Bell rang. Leonard went out again.

It was as before for about half the round, and then I noticed when Leonard tied Hedge up, got those uppercuts in, as Dixie said, Hedge was buckling a little. Very little, but his knees bent and even wobbled slightly. Weren't watching for it, it didn't seem like much, but I was watching hard. Hedge was blinking too, like he was trying to find focus.

Dixie knew his stuff.

When the bell rang, Hedge went back to his corner more slowly than before. Leonard sat on his stool like a sack of potatoes.

"You got him," Dixie said.

"I'm what you might call uncertain."

"You don't get hit solid in the next round, he'll go," Dixie said.

"You base this on what?"

"I saw it too, Leonard. It's those uppercuts under the chin that he doesn't wear too well."

"That's right," Dixie said. "You got to tie him up more."

"He's stronger than me," Leonard said.

"Yeah, but he isn't hitting you much."

"Funny, I feel like he is."

"He's not," I said. "Not like you're hitting him."

The bell rang and out Leonard went. As he neared Hedge, Hedge threw a lazy left hook that Leonard ducked under, but then a right hook caught him and knocked Leonard on his ass. Leonard lay back on the canvas, looked at the ceiling lights.

Leonard slowly rolled on his side and got his hands under him and got up at an eight count. He tried to dance a little after that, but he didn't have much dancing left in him. Now it was toe-to-toe, and Leonard got in some damn good hooks to the ribs. Those hooks were having serious effect now. Hedge started dropping his elbows to cover his ribs, and then Leonard started jabbing him, and I could tell those jabs were beginning to work too, due to plain old attrition.

Leonard got inside of him, tied him up. Hedge slung him around a bit, but Leonard got an uppercut in, and it was solid. You could hear it all over the place, like someone had dropped a bag of dry concrete.

Leonard had begun to chip off Hedge's armor. He got inside again and tied Hedge up, slipped a double uppercut with the right in. Hedge sort of bounced back on his heels, stumbled, righted himself, then fell back again, against the ropes.

Leonard skipped in and started hooking Hedge to the head, one shot after another. Then he zipped an uppercut in, caught Hedge just under the chin, and Hedge did that little hop again, hit the ropes, bounced forward, and Leonard threw a right cross at him that was loaded with everything but the kitchen sink and a blacksmith's anvil.

Hedge fell backwards, stiff as a board, hit the ropes, rolled off them, landed facedown on the floor with a smack, spit his mouthpiece out, and passed a little fluttering fart that sounded like a weak blast on a kazoo.

"Knocked him right into the shit house," Dixie said.

Leonard returned to his corner. The referee started counting, and when he got to nine, I knew there wasn't any way Hedge was going to get up short of a winch and a pully.

“And the winner,” the referee said, and called Ty’s name, which, of course, was Leonard.

Leonard lumbered to the center of the ring and the referee lifted his hand and held it up.

There were yells from the white crowd, and cheers from the black crowd, and Leonard said, “I need me a steak and a jug of ice tea, and a goddamn big-ass bowl of banana pudding with vanilla wafers in it.”

“Come on, let’s get a move on,” Dixie said.

When we climbed out of the ring, Bus came over. “You did it, Leonard.”

“My name is Ty,” Leonard said. “It’s better for all of us you don’t forget that.”

“So it is,” Bus said.

“What about the prize money?” I said.

“Come by and get it tomorrow, at the barn. Three o’clock.”

“Don’t try and play me none now,” Leonard said. “I can do to you what I did to him.”

“Don’t get too proud of yourself,” Bus said. “You had some luck.”

“No,” Dixie said. “Luck had nothing to do with it.”

Leonard didn't have a steak or banana pudding. When we came out, it was raining and the white crowd was aggressive and the black crowd was pushing back at them.

I thought it might all go to hell, but the referee came out and pulled a pistol from under his rain slicker and fired a shot in the air.

"Now back off," the ref said. "Nigger won fair and square."

"He's just the sweetest," Leonard said.

We got in the car and Dixie drove us out of there.

Leonard ended up staying at Dixie's. I stayed there too. Leonard hurt too much to eat. His jaws couldn't have worked over a spoonful of tapioca pudding. He was asleep on Dixie's couch in an instant. I unbuttoned his boxing shoes and slipped them off; Dixie covered him with a blanket.

At the kitchen table, Dixie said, "I'm going to be moving. What about you and Leonard?"

"We'll play it out."

"Good luck on that. Want coffee?"

I didn't know what I wanted, but I said, "Yes."

Dixie made coffee and we sat at the table and sipped it.

"Leonard would make a hell of a boxer," Dixie said. "Could go all the way. And you too, except you got a streak of kindness in you."

"Just a streak," I said. "Look, you really think you got to run from all this?"

"I'm thinking that. Yeah."

"Me and Leonard, we'll get the money for Ty tomorrow. You don't need to be there."

Dixie was silent for a time. He sipped his coffee.

"Yeah. I need to be there. You might want to call Ty, tell him he won."

Ty didn't go with us the next day, partly because he was embarrassed, and mostly because we asked him not to.

"There's no point to it," Leonard said. "You're there, they're going to be mad at you more than us. And by the way, you been in that ring other night, you'd be dead, or close enough to it they'd have the food tube down your throat."

So we left him home, bought Leonard a Dairy Queen vanilla cone, and drove out to the barn. When we walked in, it was sticky hot and the fan wasn't on, and there was no wind moving through the open windows or the gaps in the swamp cooler. Just dead air, heavy as disappointment.

Dixie, Bus, Hedge, and that asshole white-guy promoter were all standing at the bottom of the platform that held the boxing ring.

Hedge had taken Leonard's shots without much blood, but on this day, he looked a lot worse than Leonard, who was wearing Band-Aids like a fashion statement, and had a bit of a hitch in his get-along.

In contrast, Hedge's face was swollen and could have been mistaken for a volleyball with bits of hair on it. I got the impression he had been too sore to shave. His eyes were narrow due to that swelling, and his shoulders were slumped. He gave the impression he was ready for a trip to the garbage dump and willing to be shot dead before he got the ride.

When we got close to them, the white promoter stepped out, said, “I guess you’ve come for the other nigger’s money. You ain’t getting it.”

I said, “Why not?”

“You cheated. You put in a ringer.”

“You cheated, your guy is a ringer and Bus here knew Ty would wind up in the cabbage bin at the Piggly Wiggly, and he didn’t care.”

“I didn’t know any such thing,” Bus said.

“Yeah, you did,” Dixie said.

“I thought I told you, you were through.”

“You did, but I’m here today, gone tomorrow.”

“You could end up gone for a long time,” said the white promoter. “Look here. I got the money your monkey won, but it was the wrong monkey.”

“You let the fight go on,” I said. “Had Leonard lost, you’d be expecting some dough. Way I have it figured, you and Bus are like Siamese twins. You had your bets on one guy, Hedge here.”

“You broke the rules,” the promoter said.

“So did you, planning on throwing some showboat who couldn’t fight into the path of this semitruck,” I said. “Leonard here just happened to be better. Hedge, they don’t care about you. They put you out there until you can't be out anymore, then they get a new semitruck."

Hedge didn't say anything.

"Well," the promoter said, "however you see it, you aren't getting the money. Hedge here gets his cut, and me and Bus take ours, but your monkey has to buy his own bananas with his own money."

"Call me a monkey one more time," Leonard said. "Please do."

"I think he's talking about Ty," Bus said.

"Ah," Leonard said. "That makes it all right, don't it? So, let me rephrase it. Call anyone a monkey, I'll fix your little red wagon good."

The promoter might have considered saying something, but he didn't. He just took a deep breath.

"Give 'em the money," Hedge said.

"What?" the promoter said.

"You heard me. Man here beat me fair and square."

"You ain't listening here," the promoter said. "They didn't play fair."

"Didn't you tell me to try and kill this fella?" Hedge said.

"Symbolically," the promoter said.

"Give him the money."

"I'm not—"

He didn't get another word out. Hedge swiveled and hit him square in the face with a nasty left hook, and the promoter fell back against the ring and then onto the floor.

"Damn," Leonard said. "I remember those hooks. One more round of those and I'd have lost."

"You know that's right," Hedge said, bent down and looked through the promoter's coat pockets, came out with a stash of cash. When he stood up, he had a folded wad of money with a rubber band around it.

Hedge said, "I got some coming for being in the fight. The rest of it, you can do with what you want. You earned it."

Hedge removed the rubber band and slowly peeled off what he was owed, wetting his thumb and finger between bills until he had his share.

He handed Leonard the rest of the money.

"I'm going to go home, have some coffee, fuck the wife, then go see if I can get on at the foundry in Tyler. Boxing is tiring and the pay sucks."

"Good luck," I said.

"Same to you, kid." Hedge reached out and gently touched Leonard on the shoulder. "I never fought nobody harder and never been fought as hard. Couple years on you, and you'll be hard to beat even with a pipe wrench."

"I know that," Leonard said.

"He knows it," I said.

Hedge laughed and walked away and was quickly out of the barn and gone.

Leonard said, "What's your share, Dixie?"

"Keep my share. Ty will need it."

“All right,” Leonard said.

“I got a cut coming,” Bus said.

“No,” I said. “No, you don’t.”

“This won’t go over well with me and some other folks,” Bus said.

“Woo, the spooky I-got-assholes-in-high-places card,” Leonard said.

“Gonna be what it’s gonna be, Bus,” Dixie said. “And part of what it’s going to be is you ain’t getting paid.”

“You were a part of it,” Bus said.

“Yeah, I lied to myself a lot. But I’m done quit with that. I fucking resign big-time, and you can kiss my black ass bye-bye on my way out the door.”

We went to Ty’s house and gave him the money and met his mother, who was a nice lady with faded clothes that smelled faintly of laundry soap and starch. She gave us each a slice of buttermilk pie and a glass of milk.

We sat at the table and ate. After we talked about how Ty was going to college, how he would do great things, his mother cried a little.

Later, me and Leonard and Ty went out in the yard and stood by my car. It was a bleak spot where Ty was living. We could see the smoke from burning garbage at the city dump.

“I can’t believe you did this for me,” Ty said.

“Me either,” Leonard said, touching one of the Band-Aids on his head.

“I feel like a fraud.”

“You are,” I said, “but it’s good that you are, or you’d be busted up something awful.”

“I know that’s right,” Ty said.

“Damn straight,” Leonard said. “Listen here. Bus was the fraud. He fed you some shit about your skills. He knew you looked pretty but hit soft. Or he didn’t care enough one way or the other, however you want to look at it. But here’s the thing. I was made for battle and you were made for the books. You go on and do good with yourself.”

“Will the promoter and Bus be coming after you fellows?”

“I don’t think so,” I said. “I think the promoter was a blowhard and wanted people to think he was tough. I think Bus might pack up a grip and move on.”

“Thinking the same,” Leonard said.

“I guess we’ll be leaving soon,” Ty said.

“Just in case I’m wrong about how the losers feel and what they can do, I’d suggest it, and right away,” Leonard said.

We shook hands with Ty, and got in the car.

I said, “You really think the losers are done with us?”

“I think so. We might want to be cautious for a while, but I think so.”

We drove away, and by the time we did that it was close to noon.

I drove us to the café and parked in front of it.

Leonard said, “What are you doing?”

“I don’t know about you, but that pie was like an appetizer. I’m still tired from watching you take a beating and give one, and I’m thinking I need a good meal to boost back my energy.”

“You ought to be on this end. But I thought you didn’t want to have me go in a café like this with you. A white café.”

“Like you said, there’s a law now. Besides, we’ve done been in there and you gave your opinions on breakfast items, and I’m thinking about the lunch special. Saw it on the menu. Beans and greens, or you can go for chicken and dumplings and greens. That’s the way I’ll go. Shit, man. I might even get another piece of pie of some kind. They might have chocolate meringue. Some coffee would be nice too.”

“I ain’t having none of that pie they use whip cream on the top and not meringue, I’ll tell you that.”

“You’re saying about something you don’t even know is a fact.”

“I like to be prepared for disappointment. Fact is, screw chocolate pie, meringue, whip cream, or dog sput. I’d like some banana pudding—they got that and they put actual vanilla wafers in it, I’ll be all over it like a duck on a fucking June bug.”

“What’s with you and vanilla wafers, vanilla ice cream, cookies and such?”

“I like vanilla.”

“Fair enough. Shall we go in?”

“With bells on. Just let me shift five or ten pounds of my balls to the left, where I feel the most comfortable, and I'm ready."

We got out of the car, and Leonard, splotched with Band-Aids, went up the walk with a skipping motion, and moved ahead of me through the door into the café.

THE SABINE WAS HIGH

“Home from the war, home from the seas, out of the skies, and weak in the knees.”
—Jersey Fitzgerald

I HAD GOTTEN A PHONE CALL from Leonard a few days before he was to be mustered out, and he told me where he would be coming in, told me he wanted me to pick him up at the bus station in Tyler. From there, he wanted to go camping and fishing.

It was raining that day, and the water ran across the highway in silver sheets and filled the ditches on either side of it. The Sabine River actually touched the sides of the high bridge’s upper railing, and the water sloshed onto the highway.

I tooled on into Tyler, over to the bus station. The old colored section was still there, and most of the black people were sitting there, even though legally they didn’t have to.

I looked at the clock on the wall. I was early. I went to the coffee machine, dropped a few coins in. The cup came out upside down and the coffee hit the bottom of the cup and sprayed out onto me. The coffee was the color of diarrhea.

I tried again, and the cup was right this time, but the coffee tasted like what it looked like. I threw it in the trash and bought a package of peanut butter crackers, but the crackers were stale, and the peanut butter had a nasty taste somewhere between river mud and brick mortar. I tossed the crackers too.

I went outside. The rain had stopped. I walked out to my car and sat in it, read from a book I had in the glove box. I always had a book. It was science fiction. But I wasn't in a mood to read. I walked back to the station. I looked at my watch, but I wasn't wearing it. Inside the station I glanced at the clock again. It was five minutes until arrival time.

At the ticket desk I asked if the bus was on time.

The fat man behind the counter, who looked as if he had been built by stacking snowballs in three piles like Frosty the Snowman, and may have bought his clothes from a clown store, said, "We'll know if they show up on time, won't we?"

This was impossible to argue with. I thanked him and went back outside. I leaned on the wall. I saw there were flies on the wall next to me, high up close to the roof. I guess they were having a picnic, or maybe just a family reunion. I watched them for a while, and then I watched the road in front of the bus station.

The Greyhound came rolling in, shiny from the rain. The hound design on the side of the bus looked happy and in a hurry. The bus brakes hissed and the bus bumped a little as it stopped.

The bus door whispered open, and people started out. The first one out was a tall, well-constructed woman in her thirties wearing a blue miniskirt and blue top with the confidence of a nun who thinks being a bride to Christ means she'll someday get epic action from Jesus. She had on white boots, and her brown hair was piled at the top but long in back. Watching her walk into the station, I almost forgot I was there for Leonard.

Looking back at the bus, I saw Leonard get off. The sunlight made his black skin shine. I guess I was expecting him to be in uniform for some reason, but he wasn't. He was wearing blue jeans and cowboy boots and a blue western shirt with a blue jean jacket. He had a brown cowboy hat in his hand and a duffel bag slung across his back on a strap. He looked at me and smiled.

There are some people you don't talk to for a couple years, maybe more, and soon as you see them, it's like they have only left the room for a moment, and that's how it was with me and Leonard.

In the car, we chatted about this and that, nothing special. We hadn't gone far before we stopped at a Brookshire's store, bought some food and drinks for the fishing trip.

We bought some lard and hot dogs, a carton of eggs that we well-padded with paper bags, and put them in a Styrofoam cooler, along with some Dr Peppers and some Budweiser, bought some chips and buns, a few assorted items, along with a couple boxes of vanilla wafers. We packed them and the cooler in the back seat of the car. I had rods and reels and fishing tackle in the trunk, along with a folded tent and some other camping goods.

“So, how was it over there?” I said.

“Wet like this, but a lot more of the time, and maybe wetter. Definitely wetter. You walked through the jungle after a rain, the foliage steamed when the sun came out and there were more snakes and insects there than here, and there were these folks in black pajamas who wanted to kill you with guns. They made booby traps too. Pits with spikes coated in dung down at the bottom. Fell on one of those, spike didn’t kill you, the infection would. The Cong were tough. It was dark in the jungle, sometimes even when the sun was high, and at other times you went along trails where the moon was so full and bright, you could see in front of you better than if you had a flashlight. The enemy killed friends of mine, and I killed the enemy when I could. I did my duty, Hap, and I’d do it again, I was asked to. That’s how it was in a nutshell.”

“I did my duty too, Leonard.”

“Yeah. I know. How was prison?”

“Not as damp as the jungle, but it’s a jungle of its own, concrete and bars and people who got nothing to gain or lose by sticking a knife in your gut, saying they just wanted to rid the world of cowards who wouldn’t fight a war. I had to adjust their thinking a little from time to time. I only got stabbed twice. Minor stuff.”

“So, like me, you had it pretty easy?”

"I wouldn't have traded with you."

"You know, I wouldn't have traded with you. I don't know I could handle prison, even a short term. Hey, you know what's good?"

"What?"

"You get a big glass mug, and you put it in the freezer section of the refrigerator until it frosts over, and then you pour it three-quarters full of Dr Pepper, and top it off with vanilla ice cream. Don't let it set long, just drink it right away, and it's like a gift from the gods."

"Which gods?"

"Whichever ones I want to make up in the moment."

"We didn't buy any ice cream."

"I'm just saying it's good. We don't have any frosted mugs either, but I'm telling you, try it, it's so damn tasty, while you're drinking it, you could jack off with a hand full of briars and feel nothing but that cool drink and that ice cream sliding down your throat."

We nearly drove all the way back to Marvel Creek, but just before, took a road into the Sabine River bottoms. It was a gravel road, and it went by a place where the woods had been cleared and there was a big building and some concrete slabs. They used to hold illegal fights there. Once, Leonard had boxed against a behemoth named Hedge, and Leonard beat him, but it was close.

I drove us to a place near the river where the woods had been beat back and there was a concrete picnic table under some trees. A square of fire-stained bricks with a metal grate over it had been put near it for cooking. Table and cooker had been there for years. No one knew who built either. There were beer cans scattered about. Over the river you could see an old rickety metal bridge supported by cables and rust. Soon the bridge, like a lot of my plans, would fall into the Sabine and be carried away.

I parked, and the first thing we did was pick up all the beer cans. We put them in a tow sack I kept in the trunk of the car for this and that, and then we tied the bag off and set it in the back seat of the car.

We decided to pitch our tent over the picnic table, so we'd have it inside. It was the perfect campsite.

When the tent was pitched, we were covered with sweat. Now that the rain had passed, the air had become humid, and it stuck to us like Brer Rabbit Syrup.

Going through the fishing tackle, we found what we wanted and got our hooks set, pulled a couple of folded lawn chairs out of the trunk and took them and the rods down to the edge of the water.

We unfolded the chairs and sat and cast into the muddy Sabine, which was rolling along high and furious, rushing its water toward the Gulf of Mexico.

We weren't using live bait, just the stuff from the fishing tackle box, the false flies and so on. Neither of us were particularly good fishermen, but we had discovered long ago that we liked to sit and anticipate. We had rods, but we often used the old standby, cane poles. Fishing gave us something to do that didn't really matter. If we caught fish, I had the fry pan and the stuff to cook them; if we didn't, there were the hot dogs.

A big water moccasin swam by in the center of the river, either caught up by the churning water or on his way down deep south for a snake fiesta.

“Big motherfucker,” Leonard said.

“You should see his brother.”

“You don’t know he’s got a brother.”

“You don’t know he doesn’t. He might have a sister.”

That was our way, stupid jokes and companionship. There were moments when we didn’t need anything other than that.

Leonard said, “When’s the last time we did this?”

“I don’t know. Been a while.”

Leonard breathed deep, let out a sigh.

“One time, over there, long before I was back in the world, I saw a Vietnamese, little guy, riding a bicycle. He wasn’t a soldier, or at least he didn’t seem to be, but he was in the wrong place at the wrong time. We were on a hill and we could see him in the distance, riding along next to a huge stretch of jungle. Our jets were flying overhead, coming down close to the tops of the trees because it was thought the Cong were in that piece of forest, hiding, and that’s where our squad was going. The lieutenant, to make it safer for us, called in a napalm strike. Nasty stuff, dropped out of the jets in a thick, fiery goo.

“I’m watching this guy, and he’s pedaling fast. Hears the planes, looks up, pedals faster, thinking maybe he could outrun them or some such stupid thought, and out comes that dark burning mess from a couple of jets, and it falls fast and hits him the way it hits the jungle, and zap, the jungle disappears in a roar of flame and this crackle like dry leaves underfoot, but way louder, and the bicycle guy, he disappears too. Just plain ceased to be. He wasn't boiled. Wasn't set on fire. He was gone, Hap. And you know what? I thought it was funny as hell. We all laughed. Just some poor guy riding along on his bicycle, and the next thing you know his village is looking for him. You know, hey, anybody seen Bob? Wasn't he supposed to bring some rice home for supper? They not only weren't going to find him, they weren't going to find his bicycle either. I mean that shit disintegrated him and his bike, like pouring salt on a slug, but a faster process. I laughed, Hap. Funniest thing I had seen in months, just hysterical. I didn't think about his family, probably never knowing what happened to him, or why. I just thought it was funny, so funny, I cried. I still think about it, and now, when I wake up thinking about it, I don't find it so funny."

"Release valve, Leonard. Fireman, policeman, the military, they all do it. Probably emergency room folks as well. Sometimes, you got to laugh to keep from crying. Prison could be like that."

"I don't know I felt that way, though, Hap. I got so if their eyes were slanted, I hated them all. I don't have any regrets fighting for our country, but I sometimes got to wonder where the line really was, you know, and I got to think too how it changed me for a time, maybe forever, and I'm not sure I got enough excuses to make me comfortable about it."

"Why I didn't go, Leonard. No war is good or pretty, but that stuff with Hitler, I'm pretty sure had I been around then, I would have got into that. Vietnam. Different thing. Political war over unclear politics. The line was firmer between us and them in World War Two. Guarantee you, no matter what flag they fly under, won't be long when they'll be as capitalistic as us, and we'll be visiting them for vacations, and because of the money, they'll be glad to see us."

"I suppose. But I did what I thought was right."

"But it may not have been right."

"Could be, Hap. Could be."

We cranked in our false bait and cast again, but with the water the way it was, it just carried our lines, and it was all we could do not to tangle them together or mix them into the debris of limbs and leaves that were washing by.

"One time, in prison, I'm in one of the many lines we had to make to do this or that, and we were so close you damn near got your dick in the guy's ass in front of you—"

"Maybe I did make the wrong choice."

"I think you might have found the company less than romantic, Leonard."

"Didn't say anything about feeling romantic."

"So, I'm in a line, and this guy, he breaks the line, and he's got this little sticker, shank, whatever you want to call it, though I never hear anyone say shank when I was in prison. He comes up to this one guy in line and reaches out quick with his free hand and wraps his arm around the guy and pushes the knife into him, uses his body like he's fucking, you know, pushing it against the knife, back and forth, did that fast as a bunny gets pussy. This other guy in line was in on it, you know. He grabs the poor guy from behind and helps hold him so he won't fall, and this other con keeps knife-fucking him until there's blood all over the floor. Usually, something like that, they stab quick and they're gone. But these guys, they were in for life and didn't give a shit. They didn't stop until the guy was dead. It happened fast, but there was a part of me that thought I should help. But the guy they killed, he was no peach either, but still, I felt helpless and guilty for not at least trying to stop them. The guy getting stabbed, he turned his head toward me once, like he was asking for help, and I didn't do anything. No one did. It was over pretty damn fast.

"Found out later the beef was over one of them feeling he had been insulted by that guy, but no one remembered the insult. Think about that, Leonard. They killed him in a horrible way over one of them thinking he was insulted, yet he couldn't remember the insult. And here's the corker, guy did the stabbing. Guards figured out what was what pretty quick. They took him away, put him in the hole, and then for whatever reason, they let him out a few months later. He and his buddy, one who had held that guy while the stabbing was done, they got into some altercation over a chocolate bar. The stabber wanted to eat it, and the erstwhile assistant to the murder, he was saving it to melt so he could grease up a convict's asshole for fucking. Guy who had helped the stabber kill that guy over an insult, was stabbed by his friend who just got out of the hole. Where the fuck did he get a tool that quick? Why did they let him out of solitary confinement after what he did, just drop him back into the prison population, this guy from hell? Right then, I understood the death penalty, at least for a select few, and I've never had a moral question about it since for creatures like that.

"Anyway, the stabber got taken away this time, put in the hole again, and a few days in, he decided to beat his brains out on the wall rather than be there. He succeeded. Can you imagine that type of determination?"

"I think he was a good judge of character," Leonard said.

"Let me tell you something. Soon as I heard he beat his brains out on a concrete wall, I laughed. Funniest goddamn thing I could imagine. It wasn't just me, the guards and the prisoners heard about it, they thought it was hysterical. One of the guards said, 'So he beat his head on the wall and all that came out was oatmeal, no brains,' and at the time that seemed damn funny, and it's just silly."

"Makes me laugh a little," Leonard said.

We quit talking. It was quiet for a while, except for the sound of the river rushing along. We kept reeling in our line and recasting. After an hour of this, Leonard said, "I think we need some different bait."

"Maybe," I said.

We didn't get up to dig for worms, and we were too far away from a good spot for grasshoppers. The sun started going down, and darkness slipped in over the pink light of the evening sun, slid through the trees with carbon-stained fingers, fell over the water and made inky splotches. In short time, through the limbs and leaves, you could see the sun swelling red like a big rubber ball, falling behind the world in slow motion. Finally, it was dead dark and the mosquitoes came out, big guys that could straddle a turkey flat-footed. They buzzed around our ears until we gave it up and got inside the tent and pulled the mosquito netting over the open front flaps. I took some bug spray from my camping bag, and we took turns spraying it on each other.

When we felt the tent was secure from mosquitoes, I slipped back out, got some camping gear out of the car, including a camping light, which I hung from a loop in the top of the tent. I got some cooking goods too. A frying pan, a couple pots, a Dutch oven and a coffeepot and a bag of Maxwell House coffee. I had a box with a bag of flour and a can of lard in it, sourdough starter my mom had prepared for me, pepper, salt, some odds and ends for frying up fish, which we didn't have. I had a container of water with a spout, and I brought that in too. I was only missing a TV set and a tall antenna to bring in programs from Shreveport.

Under the lantern light, Leonard started cleaning out the square of bricks with a little camp shovel. I took a hatchet and went looking for firewood.

The wood around the tent was damp, so I had to go into the woods a bit. I was able to find some thin pieces of fairly dried wood, and a couple of larger limbs I could bust open with an axe to get at the pith and use for fire starter. I also managed to acquire a few ticks on my balls, which I stealthily picked off outside the tent.

After I got the fire going, it was hot inside the tent, but the flap being opened helped. The wind made the mosquito net in the doorway tremble.

I used a bit of flour and the starter and stuck it together with lard, and used a bit of water to make it smooth. I decided not to use any eggs. I rolled the dough with my hands on a paper bag placed on the picnic table until I had a small, thin blanket of dough. I coated the dough with a filmy layer of lard, dropped the hot dogs onto it, and wrapped the dough around them. I coated the inside of the Dutch oven with lard and put the dough and hot dogs inside of it, set the lid down over it. I used the little camp shovel to make room in the firewood and ash and sat the oven in that, shoveled some of the burning coals on top of the lid. Leonard found a spot where he could set the coffeepot, and he got the water inside boiling and he put the grounds directly into the water, cowboy style.

When I thought it was done, I worked the lid off again, and set it aside. It smelled really good.

We cut some slices out of the dough, like it was a deep-dish pie, and put them on the sacks the supplies had been in. We sat at the picnic table and ate with our hands. Food eaten outdoors like that, cooked on a fire, seems to taste better to me. Maybe it’s psychological, but it sure was fine.

The smoke inside the tent was annoying, and we fanned out the smoke and spread the coals inside the brick square, then rolled out our sleeping bags. We put one on each side of the table, on the concrete benches. It was a little narrow, but it worked well enough and made us less worried about snakes. We stretched out and lay in the dark, except for a little red glow that came from the brick fire pit. The air smelled of burnt wood and the remains of our supper.

“Trudy, you’re officially divorced from her?”

“Yep. Got my papers when I was in the can.”

“I don’t want to shit on sacred memories, Hap, but she’s a neurotic do-gooder that’s mainly doing herself good. She’s an idealist without a real agenda. She’s bad for you, buddy.”

“I know. But I miss her. I tell you, right now, knowing all that, I’d take her back in a heartbeat. I love her, man.”

“You want to fuck her. Not the same thing.”

“That isn’t it.”

“I don’t know. You’re pretty pussy-trained. I work on the other side of the fence, and that can train you too, the old wiener craving, but I got to think that pussy for you must be powerful stuff.”

“It’s pretty powerful, but that isn’t it. I really love her.”

“Don’t matter how you feel, she’s got to feel the same, and she don’t.”

“Thanks for the reminder.”

“Just trying to talk straight to you.”

“I know. I don’t have to like it, though.”

“Thing is, what’s true is going to be true no matter what. When you were out of sight, you were pretty much out of mind, except for her having an address for the divorce papers."

"Don't keep boosting my confidence. I might get the big head. Shit. You know a lot about me, for being in Nam."

"I got your letters. You wrote a lot of them. It was like you were my mother."

"Prison gives you a lot of free time."

"Let's change the subject. We used to box, and you showed me some of the other stuff you learned, the martial arts stuff. I got some more of that in the army, though the hand-to-hand stuff they teach you is mostly shit. I think we should start practicing, doing some sparring and stuff."

"We can do that. I want to do that."

"I need a job too."

"We can go see if there's a job at the aluminum chair plant. Go together."

"Yeah. That's good. Been my life's ambition, to make fucking aluminum chairs."

We talked awhile longer, and then grew silent. The night sounds from outside grew, a chorus of insects and frogs, and we could hear the water running fast and gurgling below the high bank. The glow from the fire pit was gone and the cool air blew through the mosquito netting and we were comfortable in there.

In the morning I awoke early, before the crack of dawn, went outside and sat in one of the lawn chairs near the bank. The air smelled sweet and fresh from yesterday's rain. I had brought my rod and reel out with me, and I put an artificial bait on it by feel.

When first light showed yellow behind me and fell warm on my shoulders, I cast my line out into the water, which, though still moving fast, was not rushing as before.

I sat there and, bathed in the daylight, saw that the trees on the other side of the river were filled with black birds, almost more birds than leaves it seemed, and as the sun continued to rise behind me, and the sky strained out the purple and let in the blue, the birds suddenly took to the sky with a burst of wings and a squawking of voice.

A fish hit my line. I reeled it in. It was a small bass. I took it off the hook and ran a string through its gills, dropped the fish in the water and tied the end of the string to my chair.

I cast again, and almost immediately another bass hit, and in short time I had four of them. None of them were big, but they were all eating size.

I pulled them out of the water and off the string, used my pocketknife to gut them. I rinsed them in the river, took them up to the tent. When I pushed through the mosquito net, Leonard sat up.

"That's the first real night's sleep I've had. Didn't dream guts and blood and all that shit. Didn't see that fucker on the bicycle. It was like I was innocent and had never borrowed money."

"I slept good too," I said. "I woke up, thought for a brief moment I was still in Leavenworth, then felt overwhelmingly happy when I knew I wasn't."

Leonard pulled back the sleeping bag, got out of it, and began to slip on his pants. "I see you got a few fish. Go to the store?"

"Without you out there they been biting. We're having fried eggs and fish for breakfast."

"Sounds good."

Leonard went out and gathered wood, using the hatchet. When we got the fire going well, I made some flat bread, fried the eggs and fish. I made the coffee this time, strained the grounds through a cloth. It wasn't great coffee, but at least there weren't any grounds to chew on.

When we finished eating, without really talking about it, operating with that one mind we seemed to share, we packed up everything and drove away. We rolled our windows down and felt the cool morning air come in. We could smell the green of the woods and the wet of the river, and then we were on the little road out. "You know, I'd be lying there in the jungle," Leonard said, "and I could hear people praying, but I didn't pray, because, like you, I'm not a believer. I felt to even think about it was silly, as I didn't believe in God. But I damn sure believed in hope then, because that's all I had to believe in, except being ready. So, I always tried to be ready. I had to be ready every minute, every second out there. Last night, I wasn't ready. I wasn't cautious. It felt good to not be ready, to just sleep. I find you irritating, but soothing at the same time."

"I guess I'm supposed to believe there's a compliment in that.

Thing was, in prison, in my cell, I was all right, I felt fine there. It's when we went outside on the yard, or when we went to eat, all of us near one another, that's when I felt worried. That's when I was cranked up and ready, every fucking minute, especially after seeing that stabbing right in front of me. When I was in the cell, I was fine. I didn't have a bunk mate. It was just me. I had some books there, and I read a lot. I exercised in my cell, slept there, dreamed there, and confining as it was, I felt better and safer behind those bars than out on the concrete. When I left prison, got home, I didn't sleep well. I could be in my bed in my parents' house, and I'd feel like someone was behind me. But last night. It was fantastic."

"That's because I was there, big boy."

"Maybe."

We drove on, heading toward where Leonard would stay with his uncle, provided his uncle would let him, and then I would go home. I would cross the Sabine Bridge with its high water, sinking down now, finding its place between the shores, and I would go to bed tonight after a warm glass of milk. Leonard wouldn't be near. We wouldn't be able to talk and joke or fish. That concerned me a little.

Leonard made me promise that before bed we would go out and look at the North Star, and we'd know we were both doing it, even if not at that same moment. That was our connection. We were both home from the war and from prison, and we told ourselves we'd be fine, and we should look at that North Star every night as a way of feeling connected.

“Don’t forget,” Leonard said.

I didn’t forget. I did just that for a lot of nights that followed, looking up at that North Star, knowing my brother was looking too, and that we were star companions.

Sometime later, when I finally saw Leonard again. I told him how I had done what he suggested, and how fine it made me feel, and what a good idea it was.

“Oh, yeah,” Leonard said. “I remember now. I forgot about it.”

THE RECIPES OF HAP AND LEONARD

KASEY LANSDALE

HAP'S DISCLAIMER: These are the recipes as I remember them from my youth. Some of them handed down, some of them original, and some I can't remember. Feel free to experiment, and don't take every direction to heart. (Except when I specifically tell you to take something to heart. Ice water means ice water, by golly.) Also, since you're rich enough to buy this book, I'm going to assume you're rich enough to have an electric stove too. So everything will be presented to you as though that were true.

HC’s Iced Tea

I decided it might be best to ease you in slow. Like training wheels on a bicycle, see if you can get yourself a batch of iced tea together without putting an eye out before we move on to something more lavish.

Water
3–4 tea bags (black tea is my preference)
Lemon
Ice
Sugar (optional)

Boil some water on the stove then turn off the heat. Toss the tea bags in the water. Remember, the number of bags can be subjective depending on how much water you boiled, which is based on how much tea you want. Let the tea bags steep for about 4 minutes. Don’t let it sit too much longer than that or your tea will turn more bitter than Uncle Chester about having a gay nephew. Pour it in a jug full of ice. Add some lemon or sugar if you feel so inclined. Pour it into a big glass and enjoy.

Mama’s Pecan Bread

There was one major rule in the house when pecan bread was on the menu. Absolutely no running or slamming doors inside, lest you cause the bread to fall. I never did know if this really made a difference, but I wasn’t trying to find out. I could see it now, the headline would read something like “Local boy accused of ruining pecan bread found snatched up, hide tanned. Mother questions where things went so wrong.” My folks weren’t big on whippings, and I wanted to keep it that way.

1 cup sugar

1 cup brown sugar

4 eggs

1 cup vegetable oil

1½ cups self-rising flour

1 tsp vanilla

2 cups chopped-up pecans (better when they’re from the trees out back)

Turn on your oven and get it warmed up to 350 degrees. Spray a 9x13 casserole dish with some Pam, or get a stick of butter and rub it inside the pan. Get a glass bowl and mix together the sugar, brown sugar, eggs, and oil. Stir with a fork or whisk. Next, add the flour and the vanilla. Now stir that up until everything is smooth, with a nice golden color. Once your bowl looks like a wheat field, add your pecans.

Pay attention now, do not add all of them.

You want to save some, about a half a cup, to put on the top. So help me if you add all the pecans at once, you’re on your own. Stir it around until the pecans are mixed in, then spoon it into the greased dish. Spread it out evenly, then add the remaining pecans. It should look pretty covered, like ants on a picnic.

Bake that sucker for about a half hour, then let it cool. Cut it up into squares and marvel at the wonder that is Mama’s Pecan Bread. And remember, no running in the house.

Mimi’s Pie Crust

My honest opinion: it’s wrong to buy your pie crust already made. It’s like cheating at cards. You might get away with it, but that don’t make it right. And besides, there’s nothing like your own flaky disc of deliciousness that you put your own blood, sweat, and tears into. Metaphorically of course. Just ask yourself, what could possibly go wrong? I ask Leonard that all the time. Though come to think of it, he usually answers with “Do you know us?” Ignore him; he ain’t always right.

1½ cups Crisco (vegetable shortening)

3 cups all purpose flour

1 egg

Salt

1 tbsp white vinegar

1 egg

5 tbsp ice cold water (that doesn't mean run the tap to cold)

Salt

First things first, and let's just get this out of the way. You can't use butter. You sure as hell can't use olive oil or some other fancy pants butter alternative. You must use Crisco. Lord forgive me for what I am doing to my arteries, but if you want a flaky and delicious pie crust, that's just what you have to do. Now, put the flour in a bowl and add the Crisco. I grew up with a girl who used to work the mules in the fields, plowing all day in the hot sun. She'd come home starving, would take a big old spoonful of Crisco and then dip it in sugar, and eat it straight. She died very young. I am not saying those two things are connected, but I'm not saying they ain't.

Anyway, find your pastry cutter (or two knives if you're able) and work that Crisco through the flour. Do this until there's no chunky bits in it. This part takes a little practice, but eventually you can see the texture and know it's ready. Take your egg and crack it into a different clean bowl. Grab you a fork and whip that egg like it stole something. Now pour it onto the flour mixture and add the cold water and vinegar. Add the salt. Mix it together lightly. Don’t beat the tar out of it: the mixture is not your enemy. Take that ball of dough and wrap it in plastic. Put it in the ice box for about four hours (you can leave it until the next day even). If you are ready to make the pie now, separate the dough into manageable sections, and freeze it slightly flattened for 20–30 minutes.

*Side note: When you are ready to spread the dough out for baking, get a rolling pin and flour whatever hard surface you have. Sheet metal or butcher block is always perfect for this. You don’t need an extravagant kitchen, just a hard surface you can spread some flour on. Roll out the dough from the center until it’s flat. This is not your cousin’s Play-Doh, so don’t treat it as such. If you find the dough sticking to the pin as you roll, add a little more flour. You don’t want it to be watery as you spread it out. I hope you don’t have any prior engagements, ’cause getting the crust rolled out to the right size can take some time. Flour and flip as needed, and don’t be afraid to get your mitts in there and firm up the edges when things start to crack. It ain’t rocket science, just make it look like every other pie crust you’ve seen in your life. Roll the finished, flat dough up on your rolling pin like a scroll, then transfer it to your pie pan rather than trying to scrape it up off the countertop. You want the dough to fall over the edges of the pie pan when you finally put it in. Metal pie pans are the way to go, but you do what you have to do. Tuck the edges of the crust under and then get a fork and crimp around the perimeter. If you just can't imagine placing a pie down in front of your family that isn't one hundred percent aesthetically pleasing, you can always use your fingers to pinch the border in for that clover look. (If you're a bit on the ostentatious side, a spoon or tongs can work too.)

O'Reta's Chocolate Pie Filling

I don't know what people have against writing down recipes, but this is how I remember it from when I was a kid. I had to make a few tweaks here and there until the memory and the taste aligned, but this is as old-fashioned and Southern-style as a chocolate pie can be. Now when I make this pie, which is usually only around holiday time 'cause let's be honest, nobody's getting younger and, for certain, nobody's getting thinner, least not 'round here, I always think of Mama. There she'd be, in the kitchen making all kinds of goodies. When we finally got a television, I'd come home from wherever I'd been that day and she'd have her stories on in the background. You weren't to disturb her then. You could be on fire and it wouldn't matter, not until the end of the program. That woman, though, could make anything out of anything. She was the MacGyver of ingredients.

1 cup evaporated milk
3 tbsp flour
3 tbsp unsweetened cocoa powder (One day I'll tell you 'bout the brownies Mama used to make using this same powder)
1 cup sugar
3 eggs, separated
2 tsp vanilla extract

Go ahead and turn on your oven to 350 degrees. Whether you bought it at the store, or you made it yourself, get your pie crust ready. Put a saucepan on the stove, but don't turn it on yet. Don't want you burning the filling before we even get started. Combine the milk, flour, cocoa powder, sugar, egg yolks, and vanilla. Now you can turn it on to medium. This next part is super-important: whisk that mix like Zeus trying to start a hurricane. You got to keep that liquid moving. It has been said that if you stop stirring, not only will you end up with a too-thick pie filling, there will also be a voodoo curse that descends upon your family from now to eternity. Nobody wants a voodoo curse, trust me. Once that filling starts bubbling up, you can reduce the heat to a simmer, and let it cook until it thickens. It'll sneak up on you and be too thick if you don't pay attention. What you want is a pudding consistency. Some people use pudding as their filling in general, but those people are wrong. You should have your pie crust at the ready, and with the filling still hot and the right consistency, pour that liquid gold into the crust.

*Don't ignore me now. It's very important that the meringue goes on the pie while the chocolate filling is still super-hot. You need to seal this puppy like your life depends on it. If you have questions, refer over to the meringue recipe. If you still have questions, call your mom. You should call her anyway without me having to say as much. Act like an adult. That woman gave birth to you. Show a little respect. If Mama ain't around no more, bless her soul, call someone who you know would love to hear from you. Don't wait on me to tell you who it is. Take some responsibility. Anyway, after you seal the pie, let it cool at room temperature.

Uncle Chester's Meringue

4 egg whites
¼ cup sugar, ground extra fine
¼ teaspoon cream of tartar (Uncle Chester would say this is a white man's addition, but

I like it.)

Leonard here . . . Wasn't no way I was gonna let Hap here tell y'all about my Uncle Chester's meringue recipe. Uncle Chester always told me the secret to good meringue was this: cold eggs. You gotta separate the eggs from the egg whites straight out of the icebox. Then you leave them alone and let them reach room temperature. Go read a book, do a puzzle, put on some Ernest Tubb. Whatever you have to do to give them enough alone time so that your meringue turns out "Chester-Ready."

Uncle Chester used to always say, "Let them sit if you wanna whip."

I never had the heart to tell him it wasn't a great rhyme.

While you're waiting, put your sugar in a blender and let it get real fine. It holds a lot better when the sugar is almost powdery. I don't recommend using powdered sugar though. There's a difference, is what I'm saying.

Once you're sure it's been long enough, pour the egg whites into a clean bowl that has been sitting in the icebox a few minutes. Listen to me when I say clean, 'cause I mean clean like baby Jesus is coming over for dinner kind of clean, and whip them until they are as glossy white as Hap's ass. Unlike Hap's ass, do not over-whip. Add the cream of tartar so the eggs will hold their shape. I don't remember seeing Chester use cream of tartar, but I know I haven't been able to make a chocolate meringue pie myself without it. Slowly add the sugar to the egg whites, about a tablespoon at a time.

Now, if you'll notice, Hap said before that it's very important that the meringue goes on the pie while the chocolate filling is still super-hot! This is still true. Also as Hap said before, you need to seal the pie correctly. You can do so by taking your meringue all the way to the outer edges of the pie so that when it does shrink, it still covers all the filling. Trust me, nobody wants shrinkage. Uncle Chester taught me that early on about several things. This meringue can also be used on top of my namesake banana pudding.

Now you have the crust, the filling, and the meringue recipes all at your disposal. Go forth, good luck, and Godspeed.

Kill Ya Dead Jalapeño Cornbread

I know some people like sweet yellow cornbread, and it’s true that I’ve been known to indulge myself on some occasions. But real cornbread, the old style like Mama used to make, wasn’t even called cornbread. It was known as “corn pone,” and it sure didn’t have no sugar.

Full disclosure though, I can’t really tell you what the true difference is. Mind’s been busy with other things, solving the world’s problems and whatnot, but I know my mama was adamant that they were in fact, different.

Mark Twain even went so far as to suggest, “You tell me whar a man gits his corn pone, en I’ll tell you what his ’pinions is.” So as you can see, cornbread, or corn pone as it’s known, has highly permeated Southern culture. It was Twain who also said, “The North thinks it knows how to make cornbread, but this is gross superstition.”

1 tbsp shortening
1 cup cornmeal
1 slight tsp salt
1 cup boiling water
Jalapeños to taste

Ample bacon grease (Just use what’s in the Folgers coffee can on the back of the stove.) *Ample can be defined as how much grease your body can handle today

It should be said that if you plan on using jalapeños straight off the vine, you should conduct a taste test on your batch to see what you’re dealing with on the spice scale. Remember, without any sugar in the recipe, there’s nothing to cut the heat from within. I suggest having a big glass of buttermilk nearby to keep those seeds from sneaking up on you, lest you find yourself yelling s’wanee and passing out right at the kitchen table.

Start off by melting the shortening in a heavy iron skillet, then put the cornmeal and the salt in a different bowl. Use another pot on the back burner to get some water boiling. Take a cup of boiling water and pour it over the cornmeal and the salt. Believe me when I say it needs to be hotter than a billygoat with a blowtorch. Go ahead and add the melted shortening (and chopped jalapeños if you’re using them) and stir it up with a long wooden spoon. Once things cool off, portion it out evenly into little cakes. Keep it sort of thick, don’t flatten it out. We aren’t making pancakes over here. Next, put you some bacon grease in the skillet, about ¼ of an inch, and turn the heat to medium. Let it get hot, then place the cakes in the skillet until they fry up brown. Should take five minutes or so, and for Pete's sake, don't forget to do both sides.

Minnie's Minestrone Soup

To this day I still think of Minnie, especially when I hear the word "Minestrone." I think of how ashamed I was that I didn't stand up to Dash that first time. I also think that maybe I'd be laying next to Minnie if I had. I think too of my father, how in his own way, the best way he knew how, told me some things just ain't never going to be right in this world. That sometimes bad things happen to good, and bad, people, and life ain't always fair. How that feeling, that discovery, don't make you special, but part of a sad little club nobody wants to be a member of.

Making this soup, though, makes me smile. I smile knowing that Minnie was a fighter right up until the end. A cruel end that came too soon. That maybe, just maybe, meeting me, getting away once, even if only for a short time, made her stronger somehow. In the end, didn't help enough, but it's the only way I can make any sort of peace with what happened. I never did see Dash again, but I heard that he got liver cancer, and suffered right up until he died alone, penniless. I hoped it was true. So Minnie, here's for you.

1 tbsp olive oil

1 tbsp butter

2 large carrots, diced

1 medium onion, chopped

2 celery ribs, chopped

3 garlic cloves, minced

2 cans (14½ ounces) chicken broth

2 cans (8 ounces) no-salt-added tomato sauce (I'm trying to watch my girlish figure.)

1 can (16 ounces) kidney beans, rinsed and drained

1 can (14½ ounces) diced tomatoes, undrained

1½ cups shredded spinach

1 tbsp dried basil

1½ tsp dried parsley flakes

1 tsp dried oregano

½ tsp pepper

1 whole shredded or sliced zucchini

1 cup uncooked elbow

macaroni (or whatever you have left in the cabinet)

*Poisoned rats optional.

Find you a big saucepan (like the state of Texas big,) and put the butter and oil in it. Then, sauté your carrots, onion, and your celery. Next, add the garlic. Let that cook for about another minute, then add everything but your noodles. Cook that until it boils up, stir it, then reduce the heat. Put a lid on it, and let it simmer for about 15 minutes. If you're ready to eat it, add the macaroni and cook without the lid on another 7 or so minutes. Basically, just keep your eyes on things, and if the pasta looks done, and the veggies look done, it's safe to assume that they are. You can be sure by poking around in there with a fork, or some other pointy object, to make sure things are tender.

There's a lot of stuff that goes into this soup, but there's not really that much to it as far as the cooking process. Also, it's sort of a kitchen sink recipe. In other words, if you've got it, go ahead and toss it in there. If you prefer fresh tomatoes, for example, or low-sodium options, that's all you. I know some people add more vegetables, or chickpeas, or they sub the macaroni with another type of pasta. If you're a vegetarian, you can use vegetable broth instead of chicken. There's lots you can do with this recipe to make it your own. Spice it up or tone it down as you see fit. You can also add grated parmesan cheese when you're ready to serve, but I wouldn't do it if you plan to freeze it (see below).

*This makes a huge helping of soup. If you plan to freeze some for later, cook the pasta another time and add it in when you're ready to eat it so that it won't get gooey. Also, let the soup cool down before you freeze it.

Mom's Mexican Mess

Mom started making what became known as "Mexican Mess" when one day at dinnertime, she realized she didn't have enough ingredients for one of the meals in her regular rotation. She had some ground beef leftover from our cow, Spare Ribs. (We named him that to keep reminding us he wasn't our pet, he was lunch.) She had some canned goods and a bag of chips, and with that, Mexican Mess was born. She started tossing everything together on the stove and created her signature "Mess." Because it was always a mishmash of things, there weren't really consistent measurements. This recipe continues to evolve over time, but my favorite iteration is as follows:

1 pound hamburger meat (easier when you don't know the cow personally)

Taco seasoning (Buy a pouch of it at the market. This is my splurge and I won't feel guilty about it.)

1 can whole kernel corn (This we usually got from the neighbors in exchange for work Daddy did on the man's car. It typically arrived in a wooden basket, was usually still on the cob and in the husk. Nowadays, I like to buy it in a can or even a freezer bag, ready to go. If you use it from the can, drain it first.)

1 can pinto beans (You can buy them dry and soak them, but sometimes the Piggly Wiggly runs a special, and it's easier to just stock up at that time.)

1 can Black beans (This addition came about later, when black beans suddenly became a part of every American’s consciousness. You can always substitute kidney beans, and no need to drain either if you’re using from the can.)

Fritos (If you don’t have Fritos, which makes me question you and is a whole ’nother conversation, get some old tortillas and fry them until they’re crispy, then rip them into strips.)

Jalapeños(From the pepper plant on the front porch. Hard to believe we got those little seeds to not only sprout up, but live through a number of scorching Texas summers.)

Shredded cheese, added on top to taste

*A great addition on the top of this mess pile is some Hit Ya So Hard Homemade Hot Sauce.

Toss what’s left of poor Spare Ribs on the stove in a greased pan and cook the meat until it browns. Drain off the fat as best you can, then add the taco seasoning. After the seasoning cooks through, dump the corn and beans into the mix. Stir it up nice, and when the smell starts to permeate the kitchen, turn off the heat and scoop it into a bowl. You can even put the Fritos on the bottom of the bowl, or put a tortilla on a plate, scoop the mess into the tortilla and roll it up. Don’t forget to add the jalapeños and cheese as desired. If you’re watching your figure like Leonard and me have been lately, skip the chips and tortillas and just eat the mess as is with a fork. Comfort food at its finest.

Pop’s Chocolate Shake

¾ cup milk (the fatty kind, none of that new age crap)
¼ cup chocolate syrup (have an affection for Hershey's)
1 tbsp malted milk powder
1½ cups ice cream (vanilla was Pop’s favorite, chocolate is mine. You can use any kind you want ’cause you’re grown.)

Whipped cream (a dollop’ll do you.)

Cherries (1–3 per shake)

Over at the café they used to make the shakes pretty simple-like. They would pour the milk, chocolate syrup, malted milk powder, and ice cream all together in a blender and let it run until it was the right consistency: smooth like mashed potatoes. Then, they would pour it into a tall glass that had been stored in the freezer. Pop always got his topped off with whipped cream and one cherry. Pop wasn’t a glutton. I, on the other, hand prefer mine with three cherries. Tastes better with three, if you ask me. If you happen to be making a birthday shake of some sort, you can always add sprinkles.

Bud’s Warm Milk

This one should be pretty self-explanatory, but there’s a few little tweaks you can do to make a nighttime glass of warm milk go from good to downright delicious. Now, Dad wasn’t much into froufrou stuff, but every once in a while, he would warm up a glass of milk on the stove and add in some vanilla extract, nutmeg or cinnamon (cinnamon sticks if you’re feeling fancy), and if the neighbors had dropped some off from their hives, fresh honey. You want to be sure you don’t let the milk sit too long on the stove lest you end up with a scalded batch. And don’t forget to stir the milk as it gets warm, ’cause nothing tastes worse than burnt milk. Okay that’s not true, there’s actually plenty things worse than burnt milk, but that doesn’t make it taste any better.

As seen in “The Watering Shed”

Watering Shed Moonshine

After the Watering Shed got slapped with a few citations for distributing moonshine without a license, they quit making it in the bathtub, letting it ferment for weeks at a time, and started using the stove. Seemed like a novel idea, you ask me. Not being much of a drinker myself, I couldn’t really taste the difference of that made in the tub and that on the stove. Either way, it all has a flavor about as subtle as rocket fuel.

Enough cinnamon sticks that is starts to smell like Christmas (about 10)
1 gallon apple cider (see below *)
4 cups apple juice (You can buy it at any Piggly Wiggly.)
3 cups brown sugar
1 cup white sugar
Everclear, 190 proof (only illegal in some states)
(If you happen to be a Yankee —anywhere outside of Texas

—you may need to find a high-proof alcohol alternative. You’ll need a little over 3 cups.)

1 cup rum, 70 proof (Rumor has it that Shank uses Captain Morgan, and has even used up to 2 cups per batch instead of 1.)

And gather up 12-ish Mason jars and their lids from whatever jams you and your cousins have finished off.

Easy way to make apple cider:

1/3 bushel fresh Delicious apples

Clean the apples and cut out any rough spots. Leave the skins, no need to make extra work for yourself. Quarter them and toss them in the blender until they look like applesauce. Get you a cheesecloth, and place that mush on top of it. With the cloth over a bowl, start squeezing like you’re milking a goat. There. Fresh apple cider.

Making the shine:

Take the sticks (cinnamon, that is), apple cider, and apple juice, and put them together in a big pot on a stove or over a campfire and bring it to a mild simmer. When it looks like Leonard's bathwater, add in the sugars and stir 5 to 10 minutes, until the sugar is gone. Turn off the heat and go find you a book. Read that book, then come back and check on the shine. Now that the mixture is at room temperature or slightly below, stir in the Everclear and the rum. (If you skip reading the book and go straight to adding the booze, it'll burn off some of the alcohol.) Now you can pour that soul-scorching nectar into a Mason jar, and if you're feeling fancy, you can add a cinnamon stick inside there too. Pinkies up.

Shank's Cherry Bombs

The Watering Shed doesn't exactly scream variety, but Shank always has something in the back just in case someone ventures out to his establishment with a hankering for something a little more exotic. Disclaimer: Cherry Bombs have been known to cause vomiting, dehydration, pregnancy, and death.

"Leftover" Everclear from the moonshine Jar of Maraschino cherries (Piggly Wiggly is still your best best.)

Drain the jar of cherries, and once the juice is out, replace said juice with the Everclear and let them soak a few days in the icebox. Can be served with soda or eaten alone. Be careful though: eat too many, you might be visiting Philip sooner than later.

Leonard’s Banana Pudding

Ain’t a soul alive don’t know that vanilla cookies is Leonard’s favorite. I’ve seen him throw hands over someone just looking at his cookies. I can’t say as I blame him; they are pretty great. No matter how broke we may be, he’s always got to get the brand-name vanilla wafers. Leonard’s funny about that. They taste the same to me, but he swears up and down there’s a difference, and who am I to come between a man and his cookies? So with all this in mind, it’s no wonder Leonard’s favorite dessert is banana pudding. If we poured Dr Pepper on top we might just be uncovering his holy grail. Though I don’t recommend you pour anything on top of the banana pudding other than caramel sauce. That’s a little decadent if you ask me, but so long as it ain’t a soft drink I guess that’s okay. One great thing about banana pudding is it doesn’t take long to make. So, if it turns out you got kin dropping by in an hour, no need to panic, and you likely already have everything you need.

4 tbsp all purpose flour

1½ cups sugar

Pinch of salt

3 egg yolks (You can save these egg whites to put towards the Meringue.)

3 cups milk

1 tsp vanilla extract

Box of Nilla Wafers (from anywhere but Leonard's pantry)

6 bananas

Fire up the stove to 325 degrees and let it heat up. Grab you a saucepan with some weight behind it, and put in the flour, sugar, and salt. In a different bowl, beat three egg yolks like they owe you money, and add the milk to the same bowl with the eggs. Pour that mixture into the saucepan and then cook over medium heat, stirring constantly, like it's your full-time job, until everything is smooth as a baby's bottom. Take the pan off the heat and stir in the vanilla. Once that pudding mixture has cooled, arrange some of the vanilla wafers on the bottom of a glass dish. Slice up your bananas, and place some of them on top of the wafers. Then pour about 1/3 of the pudding over the layers and repeat, ending with the cookies on top. If you want to add meringue, then by all means. Who am I to stop you?

Hit Ya So Hard Homemade Hot Sauce

Pound of fresh chiles (Serrano, poblano, chiltepin, jalapeño, habanero . . . you get the point. You can stick to one or experiment with a mix. I usually just use whatever I managed to grow this season that the bugs ain't gotten into.)

1½ tbsp minced garlic

½ cup diced onion

2 tbsp salt

1½ cups white vinegar

I have also used smoked salt, and a dash of paprika a time or two, but neither of those things are necessary, and it's been reported that some people don't like the cross-up of that many tastes for their hot sauce. To each his own, as they say.

Toss the chiles, garlic, and the diced onion, along with the salt, into the blender until it's the consistency of a chunky tomato sauce. Pour the puree into a Mason jar, cover loosely, and leave it out on the countertop overnight. The next day, add your vinegar, then stir. Don't go to town on it, just make sure it permeates the sauce. Now, this is where you just have to wait. You let it sit on that same counter (okay, it doesn't have to be the same counter) and leave it there for up to a week. The longer it sits, the more concentrated it'll be. Once enough time has passed, pour that mixture back into the blender and let it run until smooth. Pour it back into that Mason jar and store it in the icebox. Technically, it will last you four months, but I think we both know it'll never make it that long. If you pull it out and it looks weird, don't worry, it's supposed to separate. Make sure that lid's on there tighter than a hair in a biscuit, and shake it up until it smooths back out. Can be enjoyed with everything. Seriously, you can add hot sauce to anything. Can and should are not the same, but nonetheless.

As seen in “The Sabine Was High”

Hap’s Hard Eggs and Cheese

2–3 eggs (depending on how hungry you are; that’s sort of up to you)
Shredded cheese (same thing)
Salt and pepper to taste
Cayenne pepper (optional)

There’s no great magic happening here, and this recipe came about one day by mistake. I was just getting breakfast ready on the stove when Leonard came knocking on the door, distracting me from what I was doing. I went to answer, we got to talking, and damned if I hadn’t forgotten about my breakfast. By the time he went on and I made it back to what I was doing, there they were. Hard eggs. All you got to do is put some Pam cooking spray or some kind of oil in your pan and let it get hot. Now crack your eggs into the pan. I know most people would recommend doing it in a bowl first, stirring everything together, but I like to cut out the extra dirty dishes. It’ll be fine. Besides, an old trick I learned to get eggshells out of anything is the get a spoon, run it under the water faucet, and eggshells will stick to that wet spoon. You're welcome.

So, as I was saying, crack your eggs into the pan and let them sit. That's about all there is to it. If your best friend comes knocking at the door with news, don't be shy about it. Go on, answer the door. When you come back, those eggs should be getting nice and hard. You can let them keep cooking, and then add cheese and seasoning as desired. If you're tired of waiting, you can scramble up what remains and then add the cheese and seasoning. Either way, the eggs will be delicious and not much labor involved on this one. When they look right to you, scrape those suckers onto a plate and enjoy. Don't forget you can add some homemade hot sauce too.

Brer Rabbit Cookies

Mama started baking these cookies during the sugar rationing of World War Two, and never stopped. To me, brother rabbit was just that. A rabbit. I'd seen him fight a baby made of tar as a kid, which at the time I accepted as plausible and factual. As I got older, it became clear to me that old Brer Rabbit was the cause of most of his own troubles. He was cunning, all right, but only after he put himself in a piss-poor situation to begin with.

Don't get me started on Walt Disney. Wasn't until I was older and heard about Uncle Remus, I realized that Disney had pulled another fast one on me. Another, you might ask? That's right, I found out the hard way that Mickey was a guy in a suit. I don't want to talk about it. Anyhow, I digress. If you're rationing sugar for one reason or another, or you just like the taste of molasses, these cookies are for you. This is the recipe exactly as I remember it on the back of the bottle.

¾ cup shortening
1 cup sugar
1 large egg (I'm serious about it being large, not giant.)
¼ cup unsulphured molasses
2 cups flour
2 tsp baking soda
½ tsp clove
½ tsp ginger
1 tsp cinnamon
½ tsp salt

Start by melting your shortening, then let it cool. Seems counterproductive I suppose, but stay with me here. Once things have cooled off, add your sugar, your egg, and then the star of the cookie show, your molasses. Remind me at another time to tell you about the first time I was offered a mole-ass cookie at Christmastime. Neither here nor there . . . Sift the rest of the ingredients together in a different bowl, and once combined, add them all together with the shortening mixture. Beat this mixture well. I mean really get in there. Now that it's all mixed up, let it chill a few hours, or leave it until tomorrow. When you're ready, take out the mix and form it into small balls. I'm gonna just keep plowing forward here . . . Roll this mixture in some extra sugar you have set aside (probably should have mentioned that up top) and place them on a greased cookie sheet a few inches apart. I probably should have also told you to preheat the oven to 375 degrees. The small ball thing threw me for a loop. Bake the cookies about 7 minutes. You're looking for light-as-a-cloud-like on the texture scale.

Doing all this cooking brings back many memories of my childhood. My parents always made sure I didn't do without, even if they did. So sometimes, when I make these cookies, I put a little spoonful of Brer Rabbit Molasses on a saucer and do something I remember seeing Dad do. He'd pour hot coffee on top of a glob of Brer Rabbit Syrup, (or "surp" as he would call it). Then he would wipe it up with a biscuit, piece of plain cornbread, or a slice of toast. Sometimes he'd add bacon. When you're broke, you get inventive, as you can tell from some of these recipes.

Death by Chili

Even though I didn't get a chance to tell y'all about some of my chili adventures in this collection, I thought it important to include this recipe, as it's the quintessential Hap Collins dish. How do you think I got Trudy, or Brett, or Florida? Wasn't just my boyish charm. This chili recipe is foolproof. I'm the living, breathing example of that. And so, I wanted to share this with you because if there's one thing Hap Collins knows a thing or two about, it's chili. Especially Bad Chili, which this is not. On that note, there will be zero debate about where the best chili is made. It's Texas. End of discussion. To make your own bowl of red, you'll need everything listed below, as well as some wet wipes and a roll of TUMS handy. You will thank me later. And don't go adding beans in there. That's just wrong. This is best served with Kill Ya Dead Jalapeño Cornbread.

Hamburger meat (a lot)

Steak strips (also a lot)

1–2 cups water

10 oz tomato paste

2 tsp sugar

4 tsp chili powder

10 jalapeño peppers, sliced

Dash of cayenne

Dash of Tabasco sauce

2 cloves garlic, minced

1 tbsp olive oil

3 ripe tomatoes

1 small onion

½ tsp oregano

1 tbsp black pepper

Pinch of salt

Ghost chili pepper (optional)

First, cook the hamburger meat and brown it, and then drain the grease. I'm not sure how much is a lot, but a lot. Take that cooked meat and put it in a big pot on the stove. Now get the steak and cut it into strips. Add the steak strips to the empty pan until they start to brown. Once the meat is the right temperature, put it on a cutting board and cut it into chunks. Then, add it to the pot.

Now here's where you have to pay attention, 'cause you don't want to make it too watery, this ain't the Sabine. Turn the heat to medium, add a cup of water, and about 10 ounces of tomato paste. Stir it up with a long wooden spoon. Keep stirring and put in the sugar, chili powder, and jalapeño peppers. If it seems too thick, add some more water. If it seems runny, add some more tomato paste (assuming you had some left in the can).

Full disclosure, I've seen some people use ketchup in a pinch. Now toss in the cayenne, Tabasco, and garlic. You are your own master, so if this don't seem right, adjust according to your own taste. Also, don't forget the oil. Lard is always an option, but I like olive oil. Add a tablespoon to grease the proverbial wheels. Again, you'll thank me later.

Take the fresh tomatoes, cut them up, and toss them into the mix. Dice up a small onion and do the same. Add oregano, some pepper, and a pinch of salt. Let simmer a long damn time. When you think it's been long enough, let it simmer just a little bit more. You can add water as needed, but do so sparingly. When it comes time to eat, it should be just right. If it isn't, you may have followed the recipe too closely. You have only yourself to blame.

These recipes may change over time, but the comfort they provide, sometimes only in familiarity, remains the same.

There is one thing that will never change. As Leonard says, "I ain't having none of that pie they use whip cream on the top and not meringue, I'll tell you that."

From mine and Leonard's family to yours.

—Hap Collins

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I'd like to thank Rick Klaw for his editorship and friendship over the years, and thanks to my daughter, Kasey, for the recipes and for being so magnificent. And thanks to Karen, my wife, and Keith, my son, for always being so supportive. And thanks too to all the Hap and Leonard fans who have enjoyed their adventures over the years.
